MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that the facts are that several shots were fired from a considerable distance at a special train leaving Banbridge for Ballyronney after the sham fight at Scarva, on the evening of the 14th July. One bullet entered a carriage; but, fortunately, no one was in the compartment. A number of Orangemen were in the train. The locality is a Roman Catholic one. The police have made very minute inquiries; but they have not succeeded in getting any information which would enable them to take action. Shots had been fired by Orangemen from a train in this locality on the 12th, and the shots on the 14th are supposed to have been fired in retaliation. It is right to add that it is not known that the shots fired from the train on the 12th contained bullets.

IRELAND — ORANGE PROCESSIONS — THE 12TH OF JULY CELEBRATIONS — ORANGE ARCH, GLENARM, CO. ANTRIM.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a letter which appeared in The Belfast News Letter on the 23rd instant—

"The Arch at Glenarm.—Sir, We, the owners and occupiers of the two houses from which the Orange arch was suspended on 12th July last, are very much surprised at the reply given by the Chief Secretary to Lord Arthur Hill in the House of Commons last night.

"We beg to give the statements therein made the fullest and most emphatic contradiction. No arch was ever erected there against our will, nor was there ever any disturbance in Glenarm in connection with an arch.

"We are prepared to make affidavits to this effect.

"In to-day's issue of Morning News we see that Mr. Sexton insinuated that the arch was attached to the house of the parish priest. All we can say in reply to this is that neither of us is a parish priest.

"(Signed) JOHN COBAIN,

and, whether he still adheres to the statement which he made on the 22nd instant, or whether he proposes to modify it in any manner?

MR. TREVELYAN: The further inquiries made in this matter do not necessitate any material alteration in what I said on a former occasion. Before the original Report was submitted to me, the Head Constable of the district had made personal inquiries at the houses of both John Cobain and William Hunter, and had learned from the wife of the former that no permission had been asked to erect the arch; and from the latter, that, when asked, he had refused permission for its erection. It is now alleged that it was his wife who had refused the permission. With regard to the suggestion that the house of the parish priest was not concerned in the matter, the facts are that the arch was attached on one side to a pipe which runs down between the houses of the parish priest and John Cobain, and was stretched across the street at an angle in front of the priest's windows, being fastened on the opposite side to a pipe on Hunter's house. I was correctly informed that a disturbance occurred in connection with an arch erected in this place on a former occasion. The circumstance took place in 1878, and a repetition of it on this occasion was apprehended.

Mr. SEXTON asked whether the arch was not within two feet of the parish priest's window?

Mr. TREVELYAN said, he thought that extremely probable.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—INQUIRY AT COOTE-HILL, CO. TYRONE.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that, at the Cootehill inquiry, it transpired that Vaughan Montgomery, Esq. J.P., Crilly, Aughnacloy, county Tyrone, lodged a claim to vote as lessor of Patrick McCabe, Mountain Lodge, on a valuation of £19 10s., and that, by the sworn evidence of Mr. P. McCabe, his lease, and rent receipts, it was proved that Mr. Montgomery had no interest, directly or indirectly, in this holding; and, will he ask this magistrate for an explanation of the filing of this claim?

Mr. TREVELYAN: I have already more than once answered the Question as it stands on the Paper; but I presume that what the hon. Member desires to know is what view is taken of Mr. Montgomery's explanation. The Attorney General advised me yesterday that it is not satisfactory, and that he would give such directions as he may think proper for the enforcement of the law. I have, however, this day received, through the hon. Member for the County of Tyrone, a further statement from Mr. Montgomery on the subject, which I shall forward at once to the Attorney General. Whether or not it will modify his view of the case I cannot at present undertake to say.

Mr. HEALY: In addition to that, will the facts be laid before the Lord Chancellor?

Mr. TREVELYAN: I think the best way to ascertain the facts is to try them in a Court of Law.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT — LIGHT SOVEREIGNS AND HALF-SOVEREIGNS.

Sir EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If, for the convenience of the public, he will direct written notices to be affixed in various parts of the Inland Revenue Department at Somerset House, informing persons who come there to make payments in gold, that they will be mulcted for any deficiency of weight in the sovereign and half-sovereign?

Mr. COURTNEY: I am told that a printed notice to the effect suggested by the hon. Baronet is already affixed to every desk in Somerset House at which money is received.

Sir EARDLEY WILMOT: Was it done yesterday?

Mr. COURTNEY: No; they have been there some time.

PUBLIC HEALTH—VACCINATION—THE DEWSBURY GUARDIANS.

Mr. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the stipulation proposed by the Dewsbury Guardians on the appointment of a public vaccinator, that he should "guarantee children from any injury from vaccination, and accept the responsibility of any injuries that might arise from his vaccination of any person," will be sanctioned by the Department?

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL: As regards the function of a public vaccinator, he is bound to obey rules which are sufficient to prevent any but a very minute risk of injury to any vaccinated person; and the Local Government Board consider that such an official ought not to be called on for more than a due observance of those rules.

MR. HOPWOOD: I understand, then, that the public vaccinator cannot guarantee children from any injury, and cannot accept responsibility for injuries.

[No reply.]

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)— TIPPERARY GRAND JURY, SOUTH RIDING.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Tipperary Grand Jury, South Riding, have persistently declined to contribute towards the support of children from that county in industrial schools?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools informs me that the Grand Jury of the South Riding of Tipperary have never, so far as he is aware, contributed to industrial schools. It has been recommended by the Royal Commission that such contributions from local rates should be made compulsory; but this would, of course, require legislation.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART— THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is a fact that the annual value of the premises occupied by the Royal Academy, at the public expense, at Burlington House, may be estimated at £7,000 a-year, or what is the estimated annual value of the said premises?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that the value of the land and buildings handed over to the Royal Academy in 1866 was £84,000. They were transferred for a term of 999 years at a nominal rent. Since then the Academy had made large additions to the buildings, by adding a storey and a gallery, at their own cost.

ARMY—MILITARY PENSIONERS—COM- PETITION FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. GREER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that Military pensioners are not permitted to compete with civilians for an appointment in connection with the War Office Department; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of altering the Warrant, so as to enable pensioners to compete for such appointments?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Not only are pensioners not excluded from competition for offices in the Civil Service, but they are protected from exclusion under the limits of age by being allowed to deduct from their actual age at the time of competition the period they have passed in the Military Service.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE RAJAH OFTENOM—CREW OF THE “NISERO.”

MR. STOREY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Dutch Government continues to make it one of the conditions of its joint action, that the Rajah shall give in his submission to Holland as his lawful suzerain, thereby using the affair of the Nisero as a lever for securing what it has vainly sought for years to gain by force of arms; and, whether it is the case that the Government are prepared to embark in joint Military action with the Dutch, in face of the view of the Governor of Singapore that only a compromise between the Dutch and Achinese can save the loss of the crew of the Nisero, and without obtaining the opinion of our competent officers on the spot as to the wisdom and sufficiency of the contemplated action?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Rajah some years ago signed a formal submission to the Netherlands Authorities; and, as may be seen from Mr. Maxwell's Report (page 8, Netherlands, No. 1), the Netherlands Government have now made it one of the conditions of their re-opening the ports to trade, and thereby putting an end to the state of things which has been the cause of the seizure of the crew of the Nisero, that the Rajah should cease from his rebellion. The blockade, as I have already explained, was a belligerent measure adopted by the Dutch; and unless Her Majesty's Government were prepared either to have had recourse to naval action so as to put an end to it, and thereby enforce their own views, or to have violated Dutch territory by sending an armed expedition into the interior without the consent of the Netherlands Government, no other course was open to them but that now adopted, which is the most likely to succeed—namely, to act in concert with the Netherlands Government on terms mutually agreed upon. The projected action is taken on the full responsibility of the Home Authorities. The projected arrangement is in the character of a compromise, as the Dutch undertake, in the event of the surrender of the crew and the submission of the Rajah, to open the ports, and keep them open, and also to pay the Rajah a sum of money. I trust that, all the principal points for which the Rajah has been contending having now been practically conceded to him, the prisoners will be released, and Her Majesty's Government will be spared the necessity of having recourse to the only alternative which will then be left to them—namely, a joint armed expedition to effect their release by force, and punish the Rajah.

ABYSSINIA—CONCESSION UNDER THE TREATY OF ADOWA.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, by Articles II. and III. of the Treaty of Adowa of 3rd June 1884, concluded between Admiral Hewett, on behalf of Great Britain and Egypt, and King Johannis of Abyssinia, Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit are, after the 1st of September of this year, to be ceded to King Johannis; whether Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit did not become the property of Turkey after their conquest by Mehemet Ali and the subsequent Treaty of 1840; and, whether the Porte was consulted by Her Majesty's Government prior to the conclusion of the present Treaty, and consented to relinquish its rights over the above-named places in favour of King Johannis?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Article III. of the Abyssinian Treaty, by which the King of Abyssinia engages to facilitate the withdrawal of the Khedive's troops from the Soudan, means that he is to allow these troops to pass through his territory, or whether it contemplates his sending an army into the Soudan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Neither Kassala nor Amedib has been ceded under the Treaty. On and after the 1st of September the disputed territory called the Bogos country, in which Sanhit is situated, is to be restored to Abyssinia. The respective claims of Egypt and Abyssinia to the Bogos country have been a matter of dispute between Egypt and Abyssinia for many years, and there is nothing to show that it ever formed part of the territories comprised in any of the Firmans; and it was, therefore, not necessary to consult the Porte. My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) will see by the text of the Treaty that the Third Article only contemplates facilities being afforded for the passage of the Egyptian troops through the territory of King John; but if he will refer to Abyssinia, No. 1, 1884, page 6, he will find that Sir William Hewett believes the King to intend to take possession of Kassala and Amedib upon the retirement of the Egyptian garrisons.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—POSTAL FACILITIES IN LEWIS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Postmaster General, If his attention has been called to the want of postal facilities in the district between Loch Eriaart and Loch Shell in Lewis, where, with a population of over 1,500, there is no postal communication of any kind; and, if he will consider the possibility of opening a Post Office at some convenient point?

MR. FAWCETT: My attention has not been previously called to the postal deficiency referred to; but I will make inquiries and communicate with the hon. Member.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—THE ENGLISH CHURCH AT VIENNA.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, By what right the Foreign Office appropriated a church in Vienna, which was paid for by the British residents in that city, and whether he will see that it be handed back to its real owners; and, whether he is aware that this church is at present closed, as the Chaplain of the Embassy has left Vienna on a holiday without making any provision for the services of the church to be conducted during his absence?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Foreign Office has not appropriated a British church at Vienna. The funds for building the church referred to were raised by public subscription. The property is not vested in Her Majesty's Government, but in the Bishop of London and his successors, with the consent of the British residents at Vienna who were subscribers to the church fund. The building was placed under the control and jurisdiction of the British Ambassador in 1875, in order to remove difficulties caused by the fact that the Church of England form of worship not being one of those recognized by Austrian law the services would have been illegal. It is presumed that the Chaplain, if he is absent, has proceeded on leave of absence; but Her Majesty's Ambassador at Vienna has not reported his departure or the closing of the church.

MR. CAUSTON: I would like to ask the noble Lord if the Chaplain referred to is the same as the Chaplain at Vienna, to whom we vote every year £300 in the Estimates?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: That is quite correct. That Chaplain has an annual holiday, and he is taking that holiday now.

FOREIGN OFFICE—FRONTIER REGULATIONS ON THE CONTINENT.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, for the benefit of those travelling or about to travel on the Continent, he will direct Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Agents abroad to keep the Foreign Office informed of all regulations affecting passengers, which are temporarily ordered by Foreign Governments at the Frontiers of their respective States, and make public the same through the medium of the Press?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The regulations referred to by the hon. Member are supplied regularly by Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Agents abroad, and are at once published by the Board of Trade in The London Gazette.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—THE ARREST OF MR. CHANCE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What course he intends to take with the policeman who arrested Mr. Chance, solicitor?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Commissioner of Police reports as follows:—

“Owing to threats by letter and otherwise Alice Carroll has been under police protection since the Phoenix Park trials. Yesterday, between 2 and 3 o'clock, Constable 79 D saw two men, strangers to him, go into the house of Alice Carroll. The girl's father said they were strangers, and remarked to the constable that they might not be after any good. Mrs. Carroll then came out of the house, and told the constable he need not be uneasy as the two men inside were police-constables of the F Division, and they were joking Alice about Constable Fanners, of that division, who had formerly been a sweetheart of hers. The constable remained outside the door, and in a few minutes Mrs. Carroll again came out and appeared frightened, saying that the two men were questioning Alice in the room alone with them, and that the questions were about Mr. Bolton. Mrs. Carroll then called Alice to come out of the room, and on her coming out Alice spoke to the constable. She said she was afraid the two men were not up to any good, that at first they had told her they were sent by Mr. Mallon to make inquiries, but that they now denied it; also that they had been asking her about Mr. Bolton, and that she knew nothing about Mr. Bolton. Jane Carroll, sister to Alice, then also came out, and said the men were not there with any good intention. 149 D came up, and he accompanied 79 D into the house. On going into the room in which the two men were, the man who was afterwards identified as Mr. Chance said, ‘What do you want?’ The constable replied that he wanted to know his (Chance's) business there, as the family were afraid of him. Mr. Chance said they need not be afraid, as he was making inquiries. The constable asked his name, and Chance gave his name as well as that of Meiklejohn. The constable said they must come to the station-house until inquiries would be made as to their identity. Mr. Chance replied he could not go unless he was arrested. The constable said he must bring him to the station, and did so. On coming to Mountjoy Station Mr. Chance gave his name, and being recognized by a sergeant was at once released. Mr. Chance asked to have a charge preferred against him, but the constable replied that as the name and address given were correct he had no charge against him. On coming into the Carroll's house Mr. Chance and Meiklejohn distinctly stated that they got the address from Mallon, and that he had sent them; but afterwards, on Alice Carroll's saying she would go and see Mr. Mallon herself, Mr. Chance told her not to imagine that they had come from Mr. Mallon, that their names were Chance and Meiklejohn, and that they were making inquiries about Mr. Bolton. They did not get the length of asking many questions about Mr. Bolton before the constables came in. The entire circumstances under which this inquiry was attempted to be carried out by Mr. Chance were so extraordinary, and so unusual in a professional way, that it was not very surprising to find the suspicions of the constable aroused.”

MR. HEALY: Is this your own?

MR. TREVELYAN: No; it is all part of the Report. [Resumes reading.]

“I think the constable's action was justifiable under all the circumstances.”

This Report is signed by Mr. Harrel, Chief Commissioner of Police.

MR. HEALY: My Question was not addressed to Mr. Harrel, but to the right hon. Gentleman himself. I wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman what course he himself intends to take?

MR. TREVELYAN: In the case of a person who is under police protection, and who, with her family, are in great danger of annoyance and intimidation, I must say that, when two persons go in and represent themselves—I am now making the case given by the police—when two men represent themselves as detectives and sent by the head of the Detective Force, and then afterwards allow that they were not sent, I think a person in that position has a perfect right to appeal for protection to the police, and I think the police should afford that protection. [Ministerial cheers.]

MR. HEALY: As the right hon. Gentleman has secured the applause of the House by that statement, I would ask him whether it does not rest solely upon the testimony of two policemen incriminated in this matter? I would ask him whether any application has been made to Mr. Chance and Mr. Meiklejohn for their version; and whether he is now content to leave the matter of this arrest of two persons carrying out an investigation against a Government official simply upon the statement of two policemen who have committed the crime of false imprisonment?

MR. TREVELYAN: As I stated before, what passed in Mrs. Carroll's house is not in question. The question is what the Carrolls told the policemen which induced the policemen to go in for the purpose of taking measures to protect them.

MR. HEALY: If I am to understand from the Government that they will take no steps whatever—[Cries of "Order!"]
—I am quite in Order in this matter—I will call attention to the subject on the Vote for the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

MR. GRAY: Have any policemen in Ireland a right to take into custody any individual, and then refuse to enter a charge against him? [Cries of "Answer!"] Did the right hon. Gentleman give any authority to policemen to take any person into custody, and then to refuse to enter a charge against him?

MR. TREVELYAN: That is a Question of which I would prefer Notice.

If there are suspicious circumstances against a man who is stated to have given a false name to a person who demands protection, and he is arrested, when he gives his true name he should be released.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman read the Report again, and say where—[“Oh, oh!”]—well, the right hon. Gentleman has insinuated that Mr. Chance gave a false name. According to the statement read by the right hon. Gentleman, Mr. Chance, when asked his name, gave it on two occasions. I wish to ask is that the fact?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Chance gave his name.

MR. HEALY: Then, what is the insinuation about a false name? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. TREVELYAN: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will treat me with the courtesy I always show him. I made no insinuation about a false name; but the statement certainly of Alice Carroll and her sister, which was conveyed to the policeman, was that these men had stated they were detectives sent by Mr. Mallon. “False name” would not be a correct expression to use; but they began by saying they were detectives sent by Mr. Mallon. Afterwards they gave their real names. When they had given different accounts of themselves it was only natural the police should arrest them.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—GLEBE LANDS OF DRUMCREE, CO. ARMAGH.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the Land Commissioners have, in the case of the Glebe Lands of Drumcree, county Armagh, reduced, by 18 per cent., rents proved to have been unchanged since 1827, and, subject to which, tenants were proved to have, even so lately as 1880, given 12 10s. per acre for the tenant-right; whether said lands were purchased from the Church Commissioners by the present owner, Mr. Law; whether the rental furnished by them showed the old rents; and whether the valuation made by the Commissioners' valuator, Mr. M. O'Brien, to give the tenants the benefit of the clause in the Church Act in their favour, placed nearly twenty-four years' purchase on said rents, and thus represented them as moderate rents; and, whether the Government are prepared, out of the Irish Church surplus, which got the benefit of the price produced by the Commissioners' representations, to refund Mr. Law the proportion of the purchase-money so obtained from him by such representations?

MR. TREVELYAN: This Question is on the Paper without Notice, and it cannot be answered without reference to the Sub-Commission sitting in the county of Armagh.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—CATTLE IMPORTATION FROM IRELAND.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether it is true that, at the reception of a deputation which waited upon the President of the Council and himself on Friday, and which was composed of gentlemen interested in the importation of cattle from Wyoming, it was stated by Lord Wenlock that the English graziers ran constant risk by the importation of diseased cattle from Ireland; whether this statement was allowed to pass without contradiction; whether he was aware of a Parliamentary Return recently issued, in which it is shown that in 1879 only 64 cases of foot-and-mouth disease existed in Ireland; that in 1880, 1881, and 1882 the country was free from disease, and that in 1883 the number of cases amounted to 114,502; and, whether, having regard to the fact that for three years Ireland has had clean bill of health, and that in 1883 it was well known that foot and mouth disease were introduced into the island by a bull imported from England, and bearing in mind that that outbreak was speedily stamped out, and that there has not been for some months a case of foot and mouth disease in Ireland, he will take steps to remove the impression that English farmers have reason to fear the importation of Irish cattle, which his silence with regard to Lord Wenlock's statement might foster?

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I rise, Sir, to a point of Order. The hon. and gallant Member states in his Question that the deputation which waited upon the President of the Council and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, on Friday, was composed of gentlemen interested in the importation of cattle from Wyoming. Now, that deputation, as I have reason to know, consisted mainly of Members of this House. I wish, therefore, to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. and gallant Member is not called upon to take steps in order to remove an erroneous impression?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Gentleman to object to the recital in the Question on the ground that it seems to imply that the deputation had a direct interest in the matter?

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: Yes.

MR. SPEAKER: I have no doubt that the hon. and gallant Member will amend the recital in that respect.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I have no wish to convey an impression that the deputation had any direct personal interest in the matter.

MR. DODSON: I do not know the precise words used by Lord Wenlock; but the question under discussion was the risk of the introduction of pleuropneumonia into this country if cattle were admitted from Wyoming. It is, of course, possible that in referring to the risk of importation of disease from Ireland, the noble Lord may have had foot-and-mouth disease in his mind as well as pleuro-pneumonia. It is obvious that the risk of the introduction of disease from one part of the United Kingdom to another is greater than from a foreign country, because animals from abroad are inspected at the port of landing, and if one be found diseased the whole cargo is slaughtered. I believe that Ireland was free from foot-and-mouth disease in 1880, 1881, and 1882, and that in 1883 it unfortunately prevailed to a considerable extent, as mentioned in the Question. Ireland was officially declared free from it in April last, and since the end of that month no case of it was brought to our knowledge till a few days before the deputation. I regret to say that on the 18th instant, an outbreak took place in the county of Meath, two animals being affected out of a herd of 11. The whole number were, however, slaughtered by order of the Local Authority, and I hope that no further cases will occur.

EGYPT—THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION (REINFORCEMENTS).

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a second regiment has been despatched to Assouan; and, whether fresh troops have been ordered to Egypt?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have not been informed by General Stephenson that another battalion has been despatched to Assouan. No other troops have been ordered to Egypt since I gave an answer on the 17th of the month.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT inquired whether the noble Marquess was aware that half a battalion had been ordered from Cyprus to Egypt within the last 10 days, and whether the 56th Regiment was under orders to proceed from Cairo to Assouan to-morrow?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am aware that there is a transfer of troops from Cyprus to Egyptian and other stations, but I cannot give details. It is not an absolute increase of the Force in Egypt. As I stated, I have not been informed by the General Officer Commanding in Egypt whether he has ordered another battalion to Assouan.

EGYPT—(EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether General Gordon, in the message alleged to have been received through the Mudir of Dongola, stated that he would on no account desert those whom he went out to rescue?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The message, as far as Mr. Egerton has communicated it, contains no statement of the kind.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether Her Majesty's Government had considered the advisability of sending out a General Officer of superior rank to General Gordon to bring him home?

NAVY—DOCKYARD FACTORY DEPARTMENT—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has now considered the Petition of the hired men of the Factory Department, praying for extension of time for compulsory retirement?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The present rule is that all classes of workmen in the Dockyards should be retired at the age of 60. This rule is only relaxed in exceptional cases. It has not yet been decided whether any further relaxation of the rule is desirable.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) — NUMBER OF CHILDREN CHARGEABLE TO CORPORATION OF CORK.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state how many children, male and female, distinguishing Catholics from Protestants, in industrial schools in Ireland, are partially chargeable to the Corporation of Cork; and, whether he is prepared to alter the certificate of the Greenmount School, so as to enable the managers to accommodate 50 additional boys?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir John Lentaigne informs me that, according to the latest Returns, dated June 30, there were on that date 444 children in industrial schools who had been committed from Cork Police Court. Of these, 132 boys and 200 girls were Roman Catholics, and 67 boys and 45 girls were Protestants. The Government cannot hold out any hope at present of enlarging the certificates of industrial schools.

POST OFFICE—THE TELEPHONE.

MR. GRAY asked the First Lord of Treasury, Whether he is aware that the late Government, by Clause 3 of the Telegraph Bill, 1878, as brought from the Lords, sought to obtain control over the telephone by an extended definition of the word telegraph, within the meaning of the original Telegraph Act; whether he is aware that the Journals of this House show that, on the 12th of August, the Commons "disagreed to the said Clause;" whether the Government have, ever since, invited the House to reverse or reconsider that expression of opinion; whether he is aware that, although the House had thus refused to give to the Post Office control over the telephones, the Department obtained a legal decision on a technical point, to the effect that a telephonic message was a telegraphic message within the meaning of the Act of 1869, although at the time the Act was passed the telephone was not in existence; and, whether he is aware that since that date the Post Office has levied a tax upon the use of the telephone, and has imposed constantly increasing restrictions, eventually amounting to practical prohibition of its use for exchange purposes?

MR. GLADSTONE: This Question refers more to a Treasury matter, and would be more correctly addressed to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have made inquiry on the subject, and I find that it is true that a certain clause in the Telegraph Bill of the late Government was disagreed to by the House of Commons. Objection has been taken to the sufficiency of the present law. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether a legal decision was not obtained by the Department on a technical point? According to the advice which the Government have received, the judgment was by no means on a technical point, but upon a substantial matter, and it was to the effect that the Crown was in possession of a certain right by the existing law. That being so, it was the absolute duty of the Department to assert that right. But with regard to the last paragraph of the Question, whether—

“Since that date the Post Office has levied a tax upon the use of the telephone, and has imposed constantly increasing restrictions, eventually amounting to practical prohibition of its use for exchange purposes?”

I am not prepared to say what the proper decision to arrive at may be; but the Postmaster General is seriously engaged in considering whether he can, in justice to the Crown and the country, introduce relaxations into the rules now in force.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What results have been arrived at in the matter of the Suez Canal negotiations, with the view of providing the requisite increased accommodation for British trade to the East through the Isthmus of Suez; and, whether the widespread dissatisfaction at the overcharges and general mismanagement, expressed last year at a meeting representing upwards of three million tons of British shipping, against M. De Lesseps and his agents, and brought under the notice of the Government, has induced the Government to take any steps in furtherance of the interests of British trade and commerce in respect of the waterway of the Canal?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am under the impression, from seeing this Question, that my right hon. Friend is not aware of what has taken place in this House upon the subject. This Question repeats, in the main, the substance of a Question put to me on the 23rd of June by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac), and then answered. But, briefly stated, the answer is this. In pursuance of the Articles of Agreement entered into between M. de Lesseps and the representatives of the shipowners, a Commission was appointed, consisting of engineers, naval men, and shipowners, to examine and report on the best method to be adopted to carry out the objects in view. That Commission appointed a Sub Commission which was to visit—and, I believe, has visited—the Isthmus, and it will prepare a Report on the subject for the consideration of the Commissioners. With respect to the latter part of the Question, the Agreement between the Suez Canal Company and the shipowners provides for a large reduction of the dues levied in the Canal, besides securing ultimate advantages of great importance to the interests of British trade and shipping.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY (NUMBERS).

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state to the House what is the number of officers and men in the Constabulary Force in Ireland permitted to be wholly chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, under the Acts regulating the same; what is the number of officers and men wholly paid for out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for the year ending the 31st March 1885; what is the number of extra officers and men, the moiety of whose cost is charged upon the ratepayers for the same year; and, the number of additional officers and men whose cost, or a portion thereof, is charged upon the ratepayers for the same year, under the provisions of the Crimes Act?

MR. TREVELYAN: The total number in the Constabulary Force in Ireland which may be charged to Votes of Parliament, if the Lord Lieutenant so fixes, in the quinquennial redistribution, is 280 officers, 350 head constables, and 10,006 sergeants and constables. This maximum limit, it is to be observed, is permissive, and not a right. The total number of officers and men wholly paid for out of moneys to be provided by Parliament in the current financial year, is 269 officers, 268 head constables, and 9,469 men, exclusive of Revenue force and reserve, and these, I suppose, are some 500 men. The extra force, the moiety of which will be charged for portion of the year, is under Section 12 of the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV., under Section 13, 2,383, under Section 12, 561. There is also an extra force in Belfast and Derry of 365. The number charged under the Crimes Act is 195. The numbers under Section 13 of the Act of 6 Will. IV. and under the Crimes Act, have been greatly reduced since this estimate was framed. They now stand at about 1,870 and 30 respectively.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART— THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SIR ROBERT PEELE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to his recent statement that he was awaiting a communication from the Royal Academy, Whether he is now in a position to state when the promised Returns will be laid upon the Table? He should like to say in explanation that, although this Question had been repeatedly on the Paper, it really appeared that the Academy were shirking from giving the information which he had asked for in continuation of the Returns which had been already laid on the Table.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the view which my right hon. Friend has expressed is wholly without foundation. The Academy is, to a certain extent, and, I think, justly, jealous of that degree of independence which has been established for it by its history and its relations with the Crown; and I do not believe that the House of Commons has the slightest inclination to interfere with that qualified independence, or to substitute a different description of relations, or to place a great Institution, which stands now apart, under Parliament, as if it were an ordinary Department. With regard to the communication which I am waiting from the Royal Academy, the matter stands thus. I believe it would have been possible to have secured the completion of the communication in time to be laid before Parliament during the present Session if the current year had been excluded from the Return; but the President communicated to me that he thought it would be very unsatisfactory to Parliament to have this year excluded, and, consequently, it will not be possible to make the statement complete during the present Session. Therefore, it cannot be laid on the Table before the Prorogation. The communication when made will contain all the particulars which have been given in any former Return or communication.

PARLIAMENT—THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the frequent statements throughout the Country of the Conservative Leaders, that the House of Lords has not thrown out the Franchise Bill, the Government will again move the Second Reading of the Bill in the Upper House, and give to their Lordships another opportunity to vote on that measure before the end of the Session?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe that my hon. Friend is correct in his reference to statements to the effect that the Franchise Bill has not been thrown out by the House of Lords, although I find that in a speech ascribed to Lord Salisbury—I rather think in the papers of to-day—there is the following passage:—

“The House of Lords has a right to say, ‘We do not approve of the measure which you bring forward. If you like to accept its rejection, well and good; if you object to its rejection, your remedy is to go to the people.’”

That I take to imply that the Bill has been rejected. However, I am under the impression that the Bill has not been strictly rejected as regards the Forms of the House of Lords; but it has been laid on the shelf by two Motions—one made after the other, and carried by not inconsiderable majorities, although the second majority was somewhat less than the first. I have communicated with the Leader of the House of Lords, and I find that the Representatives of the Government in that House have no intention of making any further Motion on the Bill as at present advised; and their reason is, that without insuring any important public advantage, it would give trouble to the House of Lords, which ought not to have any trouble of that kind put upon it, and would only result in the production of some third bye-Motion. If we could have some direct issue taken on the Bill itself, I think that would be very desirable; but I do not think it would be in our power to procure it.

LUNACY LAWS—"WELDON v. SEMPLE."

Mr. MOLLOY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, if his attention has been drawn to the case of Weldon v. Semple, the evidence given in the case in connection with the granting of certificates, and the summing up of the learned Judge; if he will undertake, as a Government measure, to introduce a Bill for the alteration of the Lunacy Laws in respect to the granting of certificates of insanity, and for the abolition of private lunatic asylums; and, whether the Government propose to take any action in the matter of Weldon v. Semple?

Mr. GLADSTONE: This is a matter with respect to which interesting evidence has been given to the country; but the Government has no special information with reference to it, and the hon. Member will not be surprised when I say that I am not able to make any communication upon the subject to the House. At the same time, I quite recognize that it is a subject of very great delicacy and importance, and due attention will be given to it.

Mr. MOLLOY asked whether he was to understand that the right hon. Gentleman required more time in which to consider the case?

Mr. GLADSTONE: The matter is not one for my especial consideration. It is a matter of great delicacy and importance, and, perhaps, no more difficult subject can be proposed in connection with law. Therefore, I need not make any apology to the House for not making a detailed statement. What I say is that attention will be given to the subject.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE: With reference to the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, in regard to the proceedings of the Conference, I wish to ask whether the members of that Conference have received the answers to the communications which the right hon. Gentleman said that they would have to make to their respective Governments, and we should like to know what is the general position of the Conference?

Mr. GLADSTONE: The Conference met to-day, in pursuance of the arrangement of yesterday; but the answers to which I referred had not been received.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE: Not any of them?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I understand that none have been received. At the request of the Members of the Conference, Lord Granville agreed to postpone the next meeting until Thursday instead of until to-morrow; but I have no reason to withdraw the statement I made, that I believe the Members of the Conference are exceedingly anxious to bring it to a prompt conclusion.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—PROGRESS OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman state when the Diplomatic Vote will be taken, and whether it will be taken first in the evening?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Business is not sufficiently advanced to allow me to make a statement on that point.

MAGISTRATES (IRELAND) SALARIES BILL.

Mr. PARNELL asked at what hour the Government proposed to take the Magistrates (Ireland) Salaries Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that he was not present during the discussion which had taken place last night; but he had been made aware of what had passed on a former occasion earlier in the year. The question arose on the Supplementary Estimates in respect to the salaries of certain magistrates in Ireland. On that occasion the matter was discussed until a very early hour on Sunday morning. The strong impression then seemed to be that the increased salaries should be fixed by Statute, and not made from year to year greater than the present Statute named by Vote in Supply, and in a Bill brought in early that Session a clause to that effect was introduced. That Bill had been, with a number of other important measures, dropped; but another Bill of a single clause effecting this had been introduced and discussed on the previous night. Considering the number of hours which the Bill was under discussion, they did not propose, so far as the present Session was concerned, to advance it further; but the increased salaries would be discussed in a Supply Vote that night.

MR. PARNELL: In reference to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night as to the position of the Irish Members regarding these salaries, I beg to say that their opinion remains the same, and that they entirely object to have these salaries increased.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I was not in the House last night; but I heard from others that they were not unwilling that the discussion on these Votes should take place in Supply.

MR. GIBSON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having brought in this Bill, in deference to the wishes of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and having now dropped it under a misconception, in apparent deference to the wishes of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, he would state what the Government propose to do?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I entirely dispute the premises of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. As to the future, we propose to take these increases in Supply.

MR. GIBSON: Is that a conclusion without a premise?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): That is the correct conclusion.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA: Have the Government determined who are the fortunate individuals who are to receive this additional pay?

MR. TREVELYAN: The gentlemen who will receive it are the four gentlemen at present holding the posts of Divisional Magistrates, and the fifth, if a fifth should be appointed. It is the clear intention of the Government that any Divisional Magistrate appointed from this time forward shall be an officer serving in the Police Force.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

MR. COURTNEY said, he proposed to make a statement to the Committee in reference to these Estimates.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL rose to Order. He wished to know if it was competent for the hon. Gentleman to make a statement when there was no Question before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood that the hon. Gentleman was about to move a Vote.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL remarked, that the hon. Gentleman had himself said that he desired to make a statement.

MR. COURTNEY said, that, in the ordinary course, the Committee would begin where they left off; but he proposed that the Votes for Law Charges and Prosecutions in Ireland, and for the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, which would be taken first, in the ordinary course, should be postponed. He, therefore, intended to move the third Vote in Order—namely, that to complete the sum of £18,670 for the Registry of Deeds.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. HEALY wished to ask the Chairman, upon the point of Order, in what way the manner in which the Secretary to the Treasury was acting at the present moment could be challenged? But before the Chairman gave his decision, he should like to point out the important points that were involved in the course now proposed to be taken. They were promised yesterday that the Votes should be taken seriatim, and they had come down to the House that day with the intention of so discussing them. It was notorious that the reason why it was proposed that these two Votes should be postponed, although the Secretary to the Treasury had not said so, was because they included the salary of Mr. George Bolton. The idea in the mind of the Secretary to the Treasury, therefore, was that he would wait until the trial in Belfast, in which Mr. George Bolton was concerned, was over, and then, if the verdict was given for Bolton, he would be able to come down to the House triumphantly, and move the Vote. The contention of the Irish Members, however, was that, no matter what the verdict might be in Belfast, Bolton ought to be dismissed from the offices he now occupied. The verdict in Belfast could have nothing to do with Bolton's position. The point to be decided at Belfast was whether this man had been libelled in having been charged with committing a certain offence; but the charge made against Bolton in the House of Commons had nothing to do with that. He was charged here with being a bankrupt, a fraudulent trustee, a gentleman who had acted dishonestly in regard to his own wife; and there were various other charges against him which need not be gone into. It was a monstrous thing, therefore, for the Secretary to the Treasury to attempt by a side-wind, in defiance of a pledge which had been given to the House, to place a crown of glory on Bolton's head, after the verdict at Belfast had been given. How long were these Votes to be postponed? Would they postpone the Bankruptcy Vote until they had an opportunity of hearing the decision of Judge Walsh upon Bolton's Petition in Bankruptcy? Judge Walsh, the Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, had already postponed Bolton's case in that Court for 10 days, and they would arrive at the 9th of August before they could possibly get the decision of that Judge. He wished to know whether the Secretary to the Treasury intended to postpone the Bankruptcy Vote until a decision had been given in that case also; or whether these Votes were to be postponed simply in view of the trial which was to take place in Belfast that day? If he did so intend to postpone the Vote for the bankruptcy proceedings, he (Mr. Healy) must say that a more uncalled for, or a more unheard of, proceeding had never taken place in that House. What he wished to ask was—whether the postponement asked for was merely in consequence of the proceedings in Belfast, which had nothing to do with the Vote, or whether everything relating to Bolton was to be put off until after the decision of the Court of Bankruptcy; and whether the House was to be kept sitting until there was a final decision as to whether George Bolton was a bankrupt or not?

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, as a point of Order, wished to say that the Secretary to the Treasury had moved the postponement of three Votes. ["No!"] He had distinctly heard the hon. Gentleman say that he intended to move the postponement of three Votes. He wanted to know whether that could be done—whether, if the Votes were not moved in their proper order, the Votes left out were not withdrawn from the Estimates by that course of action?

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no obligation to take the Votes in the order in which they stand in the Estimates. The hon. Gentleman can propose any Vote in the Civil Service Estimates which is upon the Paper for consideration to-day. He is not obliged to proceed with the Estimates in the order in which they stand here in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. JOSEPH COWEN remarked, that if the Secretary to the Treasury were not absolutely bound to take the Votes in the order in which they stood, he ought to give some explanation of the course he proposed to take. Some time ago, a Question was directly put to the hon. Gentleman as to the order in which the Estimates would be taken, and he had then stated that they would be taken in their regular order. It was distinctly within his (Mr. Cowen's) own knowledge that that answer was given, and yet now, without any explanation whatever, the hon. Gentleman asked the Committee to deviate from that arrangement. He thought the hon. Gentleman might fairly be asked if there was any reason for that course?

Mr. COURTNEY said, he had not the slightest hesitation in giving his reason for postponing these Votes. He had thought that, in making the proposal, he was really consulting the wishes of hon. Members opposite, for it was only on Tuesday or Wednesday last that they had proposed the postponement of the Valuation Vote while the trial of Mr. Bolton's action was pending. On that occasion hon. Members urged the withdrawal of the Vote, or its postponement until the trial was over. As the same questions could be raised on the Votes for Criminal Prosecutions and the Court of Bankruptcy, he had thought that he would be consulting the convenience of the Irish Members by not taking those two Votes now, while the trial was proceeding. That was his simple reason for asking for a postponement. He certainly thought that the House would be in a better position to discuss those Votes on Thursday than they were then. [Mr. HEALY: No.] As he had said, that was the real reason why he asked the Committee to put aside this Vote for the present. He had no interest in the matter, either one way or the other.

MR. SEXTON said, that upon the last occasion on which the Votes came on a number of Irish Votes were allowed to pass without question, on the understanding that the Estimates would be proceeded with seriatim. Whatever recommendation the course now proposed might have in the mind of the hon. Gentleman, it certainly amounted to a breach of faith with the Committee. If the hon. Gentleman wished to get through Supply for Ireland, without the case of Mr. George Bolton being discussed, he would have very considerably to disorganize the order of the Votes, as Mr. Bolton took a salary under most of them. The claims of George Bolton upon the Crown were comprised in various Votes. It was quite true that he took a salary under the Criminal Prosecutions Vote, and his character and antecedents would come under the purview of the Committee when the Vote for the Court of Bankruptcy was reached. Upon Votes 29 and 30 the Irish Members would also be entitled to call Bolton to account in relation to his visits to certain Irish prisons in connection with the Constabulary. Upon Votes 7 and 8, in Class III., an opportunity would also be afforded for discussing George Bolton's affairs. Therefore, there must be an extreme disorganization of the Business of Supply, if everything upon which Mr. Bolton's conduct could be discussed was to be postponed. He would only point out, further, that the present proposal involved a reversal of the Constitutional theory that Supply was the proper occasion for calling attention to grievances. He presumed that it was because grievances existed in the case of George Bolton that the facts relating to his salary and employment were not brought before the House on the last occasion the Vote for Bolton's salary was brought on. In that case, there was no previous Notice; but on this occasion, the Vote was brought on after a Notice, to a certain extent, had been given, and the Irish Members had come down for the express purpose of discussing Bolton's career. It was, therefore, highly objectionable that the Secretary to the Treasury should now suddenly seek to withdraw the Vote from the consideration of the Committee, in order that he might plunge into others, to which the Committee had no opportunity of devoting their attention.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he hoped the Government would not press this course of procedure, because it was not only an abandonment of the pledge the Secretary to the Treasury had himself given to the Irish Members, but it was a total departure from the pledge given by the Prime Minister to the House at large, that the Votes would be discussed seriatim. Only yesterday, an attempt was made to persuade the Prime Minister to take them a little out of their turn; but the right hon. Gentleman distinctly told the House he was not able to do so, because he had promised to take them seriatim. All this jumping about from Vote to Vote was extremely inconvenient for those who wished to discuss a particular Vote—such, for instance, as the Diplomatic Vote—and had been calculating when it would be reached. If any hon. Member was inclined to go to a Division against the proposal of the Secretary to the Treasury, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) would certainly support him, as a protest against this alteration of the original arrangement of the Government. He could only regard the proposal as an attempt to evade a Constitutional discussion in that House, and as far as the plea went that they were not to consider certain Votes in Supply, because an action brought by a private individual was pending, was, to say the least of it, a remarkably singular one. What had the House of Commons to do with the proceedings in the Law Courts; and what had the proceedings in the Law Courts to do with the Votes in Supply in the House of Commons? The proceedings of the Committee of Supply had nothing to do with actions pending in the Law Courts, and it was altogether unconstitutional for the Secretary to the Treasury to put forward such a plea as a ground for delaying the Vote.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the point which had been raised was a very narrow one. He had come down there fully prepared to discuss the Vote for Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions; but his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, who had been attending more recently to the debates on the matter, had led him to imagine that it would be more convenient to the Committee if this Vote were postponed. He was absolutely certain that his hon. Friend had no other motive in the course he had suggested; but he had gathered that that was the wish of the House, from the debate which took place on Wednesday last. It was pretty plain, however, from the discussion which had just taken place, that such was not the wish of the Committee, and he was anxious, therefore, with the shortest possible expenditure of time, to revert to the original order of the Estimates. He would remind the noble Lord that it was not always the Government who wished to postpone particular Estimates, or to take them out of their proper order. Hitherto, on three or four occasions, the Irish Estimates had been taken out of their proper course at the suggestion, and with the full concurrence, of the Irish Members. It was always a proceeding the Government were unwilling to resort to, and they were quite ready to withdraw the Vote, and proceed with the Vote for Law Charges.

Mr. HEALY: The Government will withdraw the Vote?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Yes.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. SEXTON said, it appeared to him that the Irish Members had a right, upon this Vote, to demand from the Government very full and particular explanations. He confessed that he regarded it as an Estimate of a very suspicious character, and he did not think that it was the Irish Members only who had the right, or the inclination, to demand from the Government explanations in regard to it; but every Member of the House, whether he came from Ireland or not, who had a regard for the interests of public economy and the purity of the Public Service, would be startled, if not disgusted, by the extravagant amount of the Estimate now before the Committee. The first fact upon which he desired to fasten the attention of the Committee was the extraordinary one that the amount of the Vote had, during the past year, undergone no material diminution. The amount last year was slightly over £100,000. The amount now was only £1,000 less, because the Committee were asked to vote £99,031 for this year's cost of the Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions in Ireland. He would not quarrel with the undiminished amount of the Vote, if it could be contended, or if it could be alleged, that crime had not greatly fallen off, and that tranquillity had not greatly increased in Ireland. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that he had inaugurated his part of the Business of the Session by a remarkable speech which still lingered in the memory of most hon. Members—a speech in which the right hon. Gentleman congratulated the House and the country on the great improvement which had taken place in the state of crime in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House, still more recently, that the diminution and falling off of crime was still going on, and that tranquillity was generally on the increase throughout the length and breadth of the country. Indeed, he had gone so far as to say that but for some isolated efforts on the part of the Orange Brotherhood in the Province of Ulster, they would have enjoyed last year a very quiet winter in Ireland. He might also refer to the great change which was visible to anyone who glanced over the criminal calendar, or who studied the speeches of the County Chairmen, and contrasted them with a similar calendar of crime and speeches a year or two ago, they would be aware that the outrages, which were then counted by the hundred, were now counted by the unit. The Returns of special outrages were for the most part blank. The Judges of Assize, instead of painting in vivid colours the growth of crime and the disorganization of society, were now vying with each other in congratulating the Grand Juries of the various counties on the disappearance of crime. They had heard of the presentation of white gloves this year in many cities of Ireland, and they had also heard, what it would be difficult to rival either in England or Scotland, that the Judges of Assize had themselves been the recipients of white gloves. For a long time grave crimes had almost entirely disappeared, and every kind of crime was becoming rare. That being so, he called upon the Government to account for the inflated condition of this Estimate for Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions. Crime was the material from which prosecutions largely sprung. The Government of Ireland, however, appeared to be able to make bricks without straw, and to carry on prosecutions although crime had practically ceased. That was an anomaly which he called upon the Government to explain. He found on Page 273 of the present Estimates certain items which seemed to him to go far towards explaining this extraordinary condition of affairs. The salary of the Attorney General for Ireland was £1,159 a-year; and he was entitled also, in the shape of an allowance in lieu of fees now abolished, to the sum of £1,420, making the total emoluments, in the way of salary received by the Irish Attorney General for the year, £2,579. The salary of the Solicitor General was £974, and he was entitled, by way of an allowance in lieu of fees abolished, to a further sum of £800, making the salary of the Solicitor General £1,774; and, with the £2,579 paid to the Attorney General, making the salaries of the two Law Officers £4,353 a-year. He asked the Committee to turn now to an item in the Estimates under the head of Fees to the Law Officers in the course of the year for which the Estimate was framed—fees to the Attorney General for conducting criminal prosecutions and other contentious business, and also similar fees to the Solicitor General, amounting to—what did the Committee think?—to the sum of £8,000. The salaries paid to these two Officers amounted to £4,000, and their fees for directing prosecutions to £8,000. Now, he contended that if the salaries of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General for Ireland were too small, they ought to be increased. So far as the Solicitor General was concerned, he knew him to be a most careful and painstaking Officer; and if his remuneration was insufficient, he was satisfied there would be no objection to make a reasonable increase. But he did object to the system on which these Law Officers were paid—namely, one-third by salaries, and two-thirds by fees. The Law Officers of the Crown shared the heritage which was the common lot of human nature; and it was not fair to them, nor considerate to the public, to put the bulk of their income on a system which obliged them to direct prosecutions in order that they might get fees. He would much prefer that the salaries of these Law Officers should be fixed at £8,000, because, if the learned Solicitor General, in addition to the £1,700 he received in the shape of salary, was to receive £2,000 or £3,000 more, in accordance with the number of prosecutions he directed, it was evident that a direct premium was held out in favour of prosecutions. He should be sorry to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman would direct a prosecution unless he found ample cause for doing so; but what he contended was, that they were subjecting the hon. and learned Gentleman to a temptation which he ought not to be placed under. He entirely condemned the system of fees, and he was of opinion that both the Solicitor General and the Attorney General ought to be paid for the services they performed by salary, and that the temptation and inducement ought not to be held out to them to direct prosecutions in order that they might receive the fees. Then, again, it would be seen from the Estimate that the fees of Counsel, other than the Attorney General and Solicitor General, for conducting Crown prosecutions, which amounted last year to £18,600, had amounted this year to £17,000. In the name of reason, and in the name of common sense, he asked the learned Solicitor General and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to make it apparent and intelligible how it was that the amount of fees to Counsel in Ireland remained practically the same as last year, in face of the notorious fact that the gaols were empty, that agrarian crime had disappeared, that crime of any kind was of rare occurrence, and that the Judges had nothing to offer to the Grand Juries but congratulations on the peace, order, and tranquillity which prevailed throughout the country. Then, again, there was this year, as there was last year, an item of Miscellaneous Charges, under which would probably be found the special expenses of persons like George Bolton, who went to the West of Ireland in order to visit a prisoner, and succeeded in driving him to a state of desperation, and then to the commission of suicide. The Miscellaneous

Charges last year were £5,679, and this year they amounted to £6,740. It was quite evident that the trade of prosecution in Ireland was a merry trade, if the salaries and amounts derived from it were so very large. There was, however, another sub-head of which he asked for an explanation from the Government. He referred to the expenses of prosecutions and witnesses previous to the 1st of April. According to the Estimate, they amounted to £26,000 last year; this year they had reached the same total of £26,000. What was the explanation of that? He was afraid it was a sad and sorry explanation. It was one of the most disgraceful and scandalous items in the Estimates, the money being spent, in reality, in maintaining a brood of social vipers—informers and spies—men who were easily engendered by unscrupulous employers with plenty of money in their hands, and willing to spend it lavishly; but although easily engendered, they were not so easily got rid of. When the Executive Government once took into the public pay a body of creatures, whose trade was perjury—when once they showed them that the necessity for hard work on their part was over, and that they could live for the rest of their lives in ease and plenty by merely betraying the liberties and swearing away the lives of men—they established a lucrative business that was very apt to thrive on their hands, and not likely to cease when they simply desired it. He said that this £26,000 a-year, which was a scandal and a disgrace to the Public Estimates, was being spent in the nurture and sustenance of this brood of social vipers. He was entitled to be heard; and he asserted that the time had come when, according to the Government's own figures and Returns, and the statements of their own Judges, there was nothing in the criminal or social condition of the country to justify the continuance of this charge, and that they ought to feel called upon to discontinue it, and to send these informers and spies about their business. He could not wonder at the inflation of the Estimates when he considered the fact that he had himself been compelled to complain not long ago in that House of the course which the Law Officers of the Crown were pursuing. He had found that 11 of his own constituents had been arrested on the gravest of all possible charges except that of murder. They were taken away from their business, removed from their families, and thrown into prison four months ago—men occupying a respectable position, against whose character, until the voice of the informer was listened to, nothing had been alleged; and he had found these men remanded week after week, dealt with by private inquiries only, and the evidence against them doled out by instalments. After four months' imprisonment, when the Assizes came round, the Crown, on the flimsiest of pretences, declined to put these men upon their trial. He was afraid that the country would have to go on paying these enormous sums every year unless Parliament compelled the Irish Government to refrain from arresting at random men against whom there was no evidence, and whom they kept in prison, postponing their trial from time to time, in the hope that some informer would turn up against them. By these means, and by these inflated Estimates, the purity and independence of the Bar itself were injured, if not destroyed, and the members of it were converted into employés of the Castle, because the gentlemen of the Irish Bar received refreshers during the prolonged course of every one of these investigations. What he called upon the Government to do was to return to the ordinary paths of the Constitution. There was nothing in the condition of Ireland to justify the Committee in agreeing to this Vote. So long as conspiracies existed and crime was committed, or so long as there was anything dangerous or threatening in the social condition of Ireland, no one would object to such expenses as these; but in the present condition of Ireland the claim to the disallowance of this expenditure was irresistible and unanswerable. He would say to the English Members, that, whatever their desire might be to economize the expenditure of public money, that expenditure would continue to go on year after year until the Government refrained from arresting men without evidence, and, having arrested them, abstained from bringing them to trial. They were holding them in prison year after year, hoping that some informer more base than another might turn up with evidence, instead of bringing every man who was arrested to trial at once, with a view to his conviction if guilty. If there was anything unreasonable in what he had stated, he desired the Government to point it out. He had made a series of plain assertions, and he held them to apply to the figures contained in the official Returns. If any of his allegations could be denied, let him have the denial. This assertion, at any rate, could not be denied, because it rested upon undeniable facts—namely, that the claim he had urged was a claim which neither in the spirit of good government, nor in the pursuance of a wise policy, ought to be questioned. He would leave it to his hon. Friends near him to consider what reduction of the Vote they would move in respect of the whole of this horrible system of prolonged examinations and telescopic trials in Ireland; but there was one subject upon which he felt bound himself to move a reduction. He had no doubt that the Government and the Chief Secretary would anticipate what he was about to say. He felt himself again obliged, by a sense of public duty, to mention the name of George Bolton; and so long as that man continued in the Public Service, and he (Mr. Sexton) remained a Member of that House, he would never suffer 1d. of public money to be voted for Mr. Bolton's emoluments without giving to the proposition the utmost resistance he was able to give with the assistance of his Friends. The position of George Bolton had been made a little more plain since his case had been discussed last week. There was some doubt last week whether Bolton had himself lodged a Petition before the Court of Bankruptcy in Dublin. He had now before him a copy of the Petition, and it showed beyond doubt that Bolton himself had applied to the Court of Bankruptcy for an arrangement. On the last day when the case was under discussion, it was said that if an English Civil servant of any grade had placed himself in a similar position, there was no Department in England in regard to which the House, and even the Department itself, would not have demanded his suspension. He contended that the moment George Bolton brought his affairs into the Court of Bankruptcy he ought to have been suspended. The question whether he should afterwards resume his post, or be allowed to retain it, might very well be left to await the result of the Petition; but as the first and preliminary step, the Crown should have suspended Bolton from his public offices the moment he applied to the Court of Bankruptcy to effect an arrangement between his creditors and himself. This gentleman owed, not, as had been said before, £90,000, but £100,000; and he appeared to derive from the public an income of about £2,000 a-year. He had given Notice a few days ago to the hon. and learned Solicitor General that he would ask him upon this Vote what was the amount of emolument derived by George Bolton. It was well known that he had £400 a-year as Solicitor to the Valuation and Boundary Office; that he had £400 a-year as Crown Solicitor for the County of Tipperary; and he (Mr. Sexton) would now call attention to a statement made in the Irish Court of Bankruptcy on Friday last. The learned gentleman who appeared for the executors under the will of the late Sophia Bolton—the wife of this official—asked for a return of Bolton's salaries, and pointed out that, even taking the account which had been mentioned last year, it amounted to at least £1,900 a-year. Yet this man, who was receiving from public employments £1,900 or £2,000 a-year, owed between £90,000 and £100,000; so that if he devoted the whole of his income to the payment of his creditors, he would arrive at a complete settlement of his affairs somewhere about the middle of the 20th century. And what was the offer which this gentleman made to his creditors? He had offered—hon. Members would hardly believe the audacity that was developed in the bosom of an Irish official—George Bolton had offered to allot £200 a-year to the benefit of his creditors; and when pressed by their representative, he consented to increase the sum to £300, but would not go beyond that amount. From that date there had been no advance upon £300 a-year. He held that the position taken by Mr. Bolton was scandalous and disgraceful; and he wanted to know, now the facts had been made known, whether the Government meant to tolerate his continued employment? Was it not an audacious trifling with the principles of justice for a man owing £90,000, and receiving £2,000 a-year from the public purse, to appear in Court and say that he was only willing to allow £300 for the settlement of the claims of his creditors? They had been told that it was not desirable to discuss this Vote that day, because the trial, in which George Bolton was plaintiff and Mr. O'Brien—the Member for Mallow—was defendant, was proceeding at Belfast. Now, what had happened at Belfast that day? Mr. Bolton went to Belfast to defend his character, and the Government were so anxious that he should be allowed a full opportunity to patch up his somewhat damaged character, that they were unwilling that a word should be said in the House in the discussion of his salary until the trial was determined. Mr. Bolton saw himself described from week to week and month to month in United Ireland as a person who was guilty of fraud and forgery, and who had introduced the arts of a swindler into his own house, and defrauded the wife who trusted him. So long as those charges were made against him he was silent; and it was only on a question of the construction of the heading of a paragraph, which he looked upon as imputing to him an unnatural offence, that Mr. Bolton went into Court to clear his character. How had he proceeded to clear his character? He (Mr. Sexton) was informed that in the Court at Belfast that day Mr. Bolton had been called upon to go into the witness-box, and that he had refused to do so. Did the Government regard that as fulfilling their hope as to the manner in which a public official should defend his character? Was that the way to meet accusations of the kind which had been levelled against Mr. Bolton? If the reports which reached him from Belfast were true, and no one could doubt them, he maintained that the case against Mr. O'Brien had already closed, and by the refusal of Mr. Bolton to go into the witness-box to offer himself for examination, and to throw open his life before the jury and the Court—by his refusal to go through that ordeal—the case against the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had gone by default, and George Bolton was already practically found guilty. He (Mr. Sexton) begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,600, which, so far as he was able to estimate, was that portion of the Vote which would otherwise go to George

Bolton for salaries and expenses; and in making that Motion he would conclude by saying that he awaited with curiosity to learn what action was left for the Crown, in the new condition of things revealed at Belfast that day, in carrying further their obstinate and unwise defence of this disgraceful official.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. TREVELYAN said, the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), in approaching this Estimate in the character of an economist, regretted that the amount had undergone no material diminution since last year. He thought the hon. Member would, indeed, have good reason to regret it if such was in any sense the case. Undoubtedly the Estimate this year was, on the face of it, very much the same as last year; but the hon. Member had omitted a most important consideration. The Estimate for 1883-4 was £100,000; the Estimate for 1884-5 was £99,000. The hon. Member, however, could not have forgotten that in the course of the many debates in which they had been engaged this year, and especially early in the Session, the Government had found it necessary to bring forward a Supplementary Estimate of something over £15,000; so that the actual Estimate for last year amounted, not to £100,000, but to £115,000; and, therefore, the reduction between this Estimate and the actual Estimate of last year amounted to £16,000. The hon. Member connected the amount of the Estimate with the state of crime in Ireland. In that respect it would be interesting to the economists of the House to watch the gradual growth, and he was glad to add the gradual reduction, of the Estimate now under consideration, and to observe how closely it followed the course, not so much of crime as the detection and punishment of crime in Ireland. In the year 1878-9 the actual expenditure on this Estimate stood at £82,000. It was noticeable that this was the amount, roughly speaking, of the actual expenditure of the Estimate for a great number of years past. There had been only one exceptional year since 1870, and that was the year 1873-4. In that case there had been a Supplementary Estimate of £22,000, which brought up the expenditure upon the Law Charges to £100,000. That was the year in which the riot cases in the Phoenix Park were tried, and the Estimate was swelled by a considerable amount of expenditure on what might be termed the public litigation which took place before the period on which he was about to enter. In 1876 the actual expenditure was £82,000. In 1879-80 the actual expenditure was £80,244; but in the last months of 1879 and in the earlier months of 1880—with increasing velocity throughout 1880—that state of crime began which they had all deplored, and the first signs of it were shown in the Estimates of 1880-1, which rose to £87,000. In 1881-2, as crime grew worse, the Estimate rose to £105,000.

MR. SEXTON: The Estimate or the expenditure?

MR. TREVELYAN: The expenditure. In 1881-2 the expenditure rose to £105,000. In 1882-3, which he took to have been a sort of culminating point when the state of crime was worse and its detection had begun, the Estimate rose to £118,000. In 1883-4 the actual expenditure, as shown by the bills already got in up to the present time, amounted to £110,633.

MR. SEXTON: £10,000 over the Estimate.

MR. TREVELYAN: £10,000 over the Estimate, and £7,000 under the combined Estimate and Supplementary Estimate together. That was to say, that while the expenditure for the detection and suppression of crime had risen gradually from £82,000 to £118,000, in 1882-3 the actual expenditure fell off by about £8,000, as far as he had been able to ascertain. Being anxious not to have a Supplementary Estimate, they had estimated the expenditure in November and December at £99,000, thus showing another steady falling off. He had every reason to hope that next year, by which time not only would crime have very much diminished from what it was at its worst, but its detection would have begun to be much less material in its operation, and, therefore, much less active, they would be able, judging from the actual expenditure of 1884-5, to make a very sensible reduction in the Estimates of 1885-6. To show how completely this was the case, and how far this expenditure was due, not to salaries, but to the actual operation of the punishment and detection of crime both present and old, he had taken out the fees to the Law Officers, the fees to counsel, the general law expenses in regard to prosecutions, and the witnesses' expenses, as items which spoke of the actual work done; and he found that in 1878-9 they amounted to £48,000; in 1880-1 to £55,000; 1881-2, £74,000; 1882-3, £83,000; 1883-4, 75,000; and the present Estimate was £69,000, which brought the expenses upon these items down to £14,000 below the actual expenditure of 1882-3. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) thought this was not a sufficient reduction to represent the actual diminution of crime; but it was, nevertheless, a large reduction, and a steady reduction. Crime had fallen off, and so had the expenditure; and he was bound to say that a great part of the tranquillity which Ireland now enjoyed was due to the manner in which the crimes in the past had been dragged to light, and the manner in which they were followed up—an operation still going on, and which had certainly not yet come to an end. [MR. PARNELL: Hear, hear!] He hoped that all hon. Gentlemen would cheer that sentiment. The detection of past crime was one of the most important functions of the Government. It must be remembered, however, that they must not talk even of a diminution of crime with too much triumph. It was quite true that a beneficial change had taken place up to that moment. The outrages reported in some months of the year had fallen very much in number below what were recorded in the most peaceful years in Ireland. But the country was still, in some districts especially, in a state where justice must still keep a tight hand upon crime and disorder; and although the expenditure upon justice must be most closely watched, and reductions made, he maintained that reductions had been made in such a manner as to afford sufficient scope for the operations of justice, while, at the same time, gratifying the economists of that House. He by no means wished to boast; but he still desired to impress upon the Committee that, taking the actual Estimates of last year, and the actual Estimates of this, there was an actual reduction of about £19,000.

MR. H. H. FOWLER asked if his right hon. Friend could give the actual number of cases represented in the prosecutions last year?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was not able to say that.

MR. MOLLOY asked if the right hon. Gentleman could give any indication within 30 or 50?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he did not know that he was even able to give that information; nor was he aware that the Returns even in the case of England gave judicial statistics in that respect. He was under the impression, so far as Ireland was concerned, that the judicial statistics were not drawn on the principle of giving a Return of that kind. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) objected to the system on which the Irish Law Officers were paid. Although he admitted that their salaries were small in proportion to those of the English Law Officers, the hon. Gentleman said the salaries ought to bear a larger proportion to the expenditure which was incurred in the shape of fees. The hon. Member objected to the payment of fees as holding out an inducement to the Law Officers to promote prosecutions, although, at the same time, he added that he did not think the Solicitor General was influenced by that fact. The hon. Gentleman must remember that prosecutions were not always bad things. He (Mr. Trevelyan) had heard from the Benches on which the hon. Member sat a very warm protest against the Government abstaining from prosecutions in certain cases. Hon. Members opposite were constantly referring to cases in which they thought there ought to be prosecutions. Only that day he had informed an hon. Gentleman who sat near the hon. Member that a person who had falsified voting papers would probably be prosecuted, and that information appeared to give the hon. Gentleman some satisfaction. But he himself reminded the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that, as far as the payment by fees appertained, it appertained in preventing prosecutions which ought not to be undertaken from being set on foot. An uncalled-for prosecution was disgraceful, and the injury done to the reputation of the Law Officers who set it on foot, if it could be shown that it was set on foot from any such motive, would be infinitely greater than any compensation that could be obtained from the fees. The hon. Member had referred to the imprisonment without trial of a number of persons in a district where his own political opinions had great influence.

MR. SEXTON said, that since he last spoke he had received a telegram from the Tubbercurry prisoners, who wished to have it pressed upon the House that their trial should take place on the 5th of August, and intimating their willingness to waive all right to notice—such as that which was required to be given in a change of venue.

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was unfortunate that those telegrams came during the debate, and thus acquired additional interest from so coming, because it was absolutely impossible that they could receive the attention which properly ought to be given to them. He would certainly prefer that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General should consider the bearing of this request, as he certainly could not answer off-hand what would be the proper course to take. He could only say, in regard to the complaints of the hon. Member of the arrests of men on insufficient evidence, that in the heat and hurry of the early days of the suppression of the state of crime which had existed in Ireland, it was possible, as it was in the case of a terrible war, for things to have been done hastily in the way of arrests, and from the want of proper communications having been kept up between the Law Officers and others who were Law Officers no longer, and the responsible magistrates and police. He did not know much about the facts of this particular case; but nothing had engaged his attention more than this—namely, the propriety of impressing upon all those who were concerned in the detection of crime that they were not to make arrests, except in serious cases, until the case had been laid in full before the Law Officers. That ought not to be done except in the most exceptional cases, where the suspected person was likely to leave the country, or where there was imminent danger of a crime being about to be committed. Exceptional circumstances only would warrant a sudden arrest being made, because a sudden and ill-considered arrest was frequently productive of fatal results. He had been glad to hear the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) lay particular emphasis upon this particular case, because it made him think the hon. Member realized the fact that there were not many unfortunate men still left in the position of being remanded over and over again. He believed that resulted from the caution now displayed by persons in authority, who saw that arrests were not made without very great deliberation, and on a full case being established. He thought he had now gone through everything the hon. Member had alleged, with the exception of his remarks in reference to Mr. Bolton. He must say that he deprecated any conclusion being drawn—such as the hon. Member had drawn from the telegram he had read to the House. He knew nothing about the facts of the case; but he could very well conceive that when a very grave charge had been made, and the person who made it was being prosecuted as a libeller—he could well conceive that before going into the box to be examined as to the whole of his life, on any question which might be put to him, the plaintiff might insist that some prima facie case should be made out against him. He might give an instance in illustration of what he meant. If a man was charged with having stolen a watch, he might bring an action for libel, but refuse to go into the box to be examined as to whether, at a contested election, he had given a man 5s. to buy some ale. He might insist that a prima facie case of his having stolen the watch should be made out, in the first instance, and that the libel should be properly established before he was called upon to refute it. But he did not think that this was a case to be argued in Parliament while it was pending in a Court of Law, and he had no wish to argue it. But if the hon. Member thought it right to prejudice the case against Mr. Bolton during the progress of the trial by commenting upon a single fact which had come to his knowledge, and which might bear a very different complexion from that which the telegram put upon it, he thought it right to say, on the other side, that there might be a possible explanation of everything stated in the telegram. He did not think, however, that the House of Commons ought at present to concern itself with the general character of Mr. Bolton. He thought that the character of that gentleman was at that moment sacred; and hon. Members must have an opinion whether the course pursued was not calculated to prejudice the case in the public mind. While litigation was proceeding with regard to the attempt of Mr. Bolton to vindicate his character, and while Mr. Bolton was in the position of a litigant vindicating his character, that character ought to be sacred, and ought not to be discussed in that House. From that point of view, he altogether deprecated any remark upon Mr. Bolton's general character. As to the question of Mr. Bolton's bankruptcy, he was aware how grave a matter the question of bankruptcy in regard to a public officer was. He was perfectly aware what the practice was in the case of English Civil servants, and he considered that practice, in the essence of it, to be a righteous one, and that no man whose private affairs were brought under the notice of the Government, by bankruptcy, or by proceedings equivalent to bankruptcy, should be continued in his position, unless, on examination, it turned out that his difficulties were not occasioned by fraud, or by culpable extravagance, or by culpable improvidence.

MR. SEXTON asked if the right hon. Gentleman meant that the Government was to form its opinion upon these matters by the examination which took place in the Bankruptcy Court?

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, of course, the materials upon which the Government would be required to form a conclusion would be what came before the Court of Bankruptcy. What he maintained was, that the Government would have to satisfy themselves on these points by what was brought under their notice by the proceedings in bankruptcy, or proceedings equivalent to bankruptcy. That was the principle adopted in regard to the English Civil servants, and it was the principle on which the Irish Government intended to act in regard to Mr. Bolton, and in the case of any Civil servant who received a salary under the Crown. He thought that was a plain and simple statement on the part of the Government, so far as Mr. Bolton was concerned. In regard to any other question relating to Mr. Bolton, they could not enter into it while the trial was pending.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he had never heard anything more convincing than the speech delivered by the Prime Minister last Wednesday against the postponement of the Vote. He agreed with what the right hon. Gentleman then said, that the proceedings now going on at Belfast had nothing whatever to do with the Vote before the House; and if he had any influence with hon. Members opposite, he would certainly ask them to avoid in this discussion any reference to the trial now going on, which could have nothing whatever to do with the present Vote. There was not a Member in that House who did not think that very great extravagance was apparent in regard to the Irish Law Charges, and he knew that in the whole of Europe there was not a similar case in which the salaries of the judicial officers of the country bore such an extravagant proportion to the Revenues of the country in which they lived. He had risen, however, for the purpose of making one or two remarks directly in reference to Mr. Bolton. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary had given a definition of what he considered ought to be the policy of Her Majesty's Government in reference to Civil servants. He was sorry to differ from so great and respectable an authority as his right hon. Friend, but he did differ entirely from him in regard to this matter. When the discussion took place the other day, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) said that Mr. Bolton had not presented a Petition in Bankruptcy. The right hon. Gentleman did not pretend to make that statement to-day. It was now admitted by the learned Solicitor General for Ireland, and it was perfectly well known in all quarters of the House, that Mr. Bolton had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy. That being so, he held that there ought to be an inviolable rule that when a public servant presented a Petition in Bankruptcy he should be immediately suspended. He differed entirely from the Chief Secretary in thinking that Her Majesty's Government ought to suspend their judgment until there had been an adjudication in reference to that Petition in Bankruptcy. What had happened in this particular case was this. Only two days ago it came to light in the proceedings connected with Mr. George Bolton's bankruptcy, which were fully and accurately reported in The Times newspaper, that Mr. Bolton had made an offer to his creditors of £300 from his annual official salaries. The Judge of the Court was advised to make Mr. Bolton a bankrupt; but he declined to do so, because that course would probably involve the loss of the official salaries. What was now happening was only what would happen in any case of default. Bolton, farmed by his creditors, might go on for years, and it might happen that the money voted by the House of Commons might, under the existing conditions of the case, be made available by a person who had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy for meeting the demands of his creditors, and preventing an adjudication in bankruptcy from taking place. The debtor had in this case an interest in continuing in the receipt of his salary in order that it might be farmed—although the debtor was an officer in Her Majesty's Service—by his creditors. Now, he held most strongly that no officer of the Crown ought to be in that position—that he ought not to be in a position in which he could be farmed by any one of Her Majesty's subjects. Holding that view, he should support the Motion for reducing the Vote by the amount of Mr. Bolton's salary.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, they had had a speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland of a kind which had unfortunately become too common in connection with this case. The right hon. Gentleman, a man of brilliant abilities, well able to hold his own in debate with almost all comers, had been struggling almost incoherently, for half-an-hour, in a lame and halting speech, to screen Mr. Bolton. In fact, he did not think there had ever been a more remarkable instance in that House of an official palpably and obviously discharging a duty which was odious and loathsome to him than that which the right hon. Gentleman had afforded that evening. As to the excessive amount of the Estimates now under the consideration of the Committee, he would leave the case where it had been put by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and the hon. Gentleman who had just now spoken. The conviction was firm and fixed, and no amount of rambling speeches by the Chief Secretary would remove it from the mind of the Committee and from the public of this country, as well as of Ireland that the Law Charges in connection with Ireland were beyond all reason and beyond all decency. That was a fact which had passed out of the sphere of disputable or disputed proposals, and was well established in every rational and unofficial mind. He would now refer to the Tubbercurry prisoners. The right hon. Gentleman commented on the fact that the case had been brought forward so frequently by his hon. Friend, and he had drawn the extraordinary inference that it was the only case of the kind in Ireland. As a matter of fact, the explanation of the interest taken by his hon. Friend in the case was that the prisoners were his own constituents, whose grievances he was specially required to bring under the notice of the House. That there were other cases in which similar hardships were experienced he had not the slightest doubt; but in all probability the persons who had been so treated had not the good fortune to possess a Representative in that House as energetic and as influential as his hon. Friend. With regard to the Tubbercurry prisoners, they had been in gaol since the 2nd of April, and now on the 29th of July they were still untried, and had not been admitted to bail. The right hon. Gentleman had himself deprecated the principle of making fishing arrests in Ireland; but the circumstances of this case, in which men had been kept in prison from the 2nd of April until the 29th of July without being brought to trial, afforded convincing proof that the arrest was a fishing arrest. The mere statement of the facts must bring conviction home to the mind of every hon. Member that when the Government arrested these men they had no evidence against them; but that they took up the case experimentally, in the hope of being able to get evidence by-and-bye. When at last, in obedience to the strong pressure put upon the Government by his hon. Friend, these men were brought to the Assizes for trial, the Government again suggested the postponement on the miserable and flimsy pretence that subscriptions were being got up by their neighbours to assist them in their defence. In this country, even in the case of the most odious criminal, if the public had an idea that he was in danger of being unfairly tried for the want of legal advice, an appeal would at once be made for support, in order to produce evidence and see that the case was adequately conducted. It was within his own recollection that many criminals of the worst type had been helped in this way to defend themselves lest the sacredness of trial by jury should be violated, and they should not receive proper treatment. The Tubbercurry prisoners, through their solicitor, had addressed a telegram to his hon. Friend, asking that they should be tried on the 5th of August; and he should like to hear from the Solicitor General for Ireland any ground why this reasonable request on their part should not be complied with. They were perfectly convinced of being able to establish their innocence. All that they asked was that they should be tried on the first opportunity, and not kept languishing in prison week after week and month after month because no opportunity was afforded to them of establishing their innocence. The re-appearance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary on the present occasion suggested some strange inquiries. Why was the right hon. Gentleman not in his place when the case of George Bolton was under discussion last week? There was a general impression last Wednesday that the absence of the right hon. Gentleman from the House was due to the fatigue he had undergone for several days in defending his Department from the attacks which had been made upon it in that House. No doubt the amount of labour the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to go through owing to the responsibilities which attached to his Office were extremely onerous; but he wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman this question. It was a categorical question, and he hoped that a categorical answer would be given. Was the right hon. Gentleman wilfully absent from the House on Wednesday last when the Vote for Mr. Bolton's salary was under discussion? Was his absence deliberate and intentional, or the result of accident and the consequence of fatigue? All he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) could say was that the Irish Members had seen the re-appearance of the right hon. Gentleman upon the Treasury Bench in order to defend these Votes with a certain amount of curiosity and interest, especially after his absence on Wednesday. He must say that the position of the right hon. Gentleman was one which entitled him to sympathy. What evil fate had condemned him to stand up in the defence of such men as George Bolton; and if his conscience did not justify him, what evil fate compelled him to swallow the odious dose? The right hon. Gentleman ought not to stop a moment longer in Office if he found that he could not discharge the duties of it with the full consent of his heart and conscience. He would recall to the memory of the right hon. Gentleman a remarkable incident which occurred in the last Parliament, and in which the right hon. Gentleman himself took a prominent part. A noble Lord sitting on the Bench which the right hon. Gentleman now occupied was a Member of the Administration of Lord Beaconsfield. There was a financial trial going on in the City of London at the time, and in the course of the evidence at the trial certain transactions with which the noble Lord had been concerned were brought to light. They were supposed to have been of a somewhat questionable nature. Who was the man who then stood up in that House and compelled the resignation of the noble Lord? It was the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was now the advocate and exponent of George Bolton. Although the noble Lord might have committed a certain amount of indiscretion, there was sufficient proof in the exposure which took place that there was nothing criminal in the transaction. His conduct might have been foolish, thoughtless, and unworthy of a man occupying his high position; but his (Mr. T. P. O'Connor's) sympathies were with the noble Lord, rather than with the right hon. Gentleman, who had taken a malignant course in matters which he himself—a man of large fortune—might have treated with indulgence. Yet this rigid economist, this relentless purist, was the man who got up now night after night to defend as bad a class of criminals as any who ever had the misfortune to be connected with the Civil Service of any country in the world. He wished to correct one misconception on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking on the attitude of the Irish Members towards George Bolton, admitted that the result of the trial at Belfast would have a material influence upon the action of the Government. Now, the position of the Irish Members in reference to George Bolton was that he ought to have been dismissed long ago. He asked any English Member to rise in his place and declare that any man with the antecedents and character of George Bolton ought to have been retained for a single week in the Civil Service of this country? That was a fair challenge. Would any Member who was not a Member of the Government—indeed, would any Member of the Government except the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland get up and declare that a man with the antecedents and character and position of George Bolton ought to be kept for a single hour in the service of this country? He awaited with some curiosity to see the manner in which that challenge would be taken up by the Government. The real secret of all these matters was that the Government of Ireland were determined to stand by their tools, no matter what dirty instruments they might be. There was not a single man whose dismissal had been agreed to by the Government during the last two or three years who had been dismissed voluntarily, or who would have been dismissed at all but for the constant pressure of public opinion, and after wearisome discussions in that House. Every official who had been prosecuted had been proceeded against at the eleventh hour, and after the Government had exhausted every means of evading a prosecution. He maintained that that was a shameful and pitiable position for the right hon. Gentleman to occupy. For the right hon. Gentleman himself he had great respect and sympathy; but he must say that his official conduct in these matters had brought about all the trouble in which he found himself involved.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the question was not precisely whether Mr. Bolton ought to be dismissed for his past misconduct, because all that had been condoned. The real question was whether he ought to be suspended at present. Now, it appeared to him that in suggesting his suspension hon. Members only treated Mr. Bolton precisely in the same way as every other public servant was treated, and as they were treated themselves if any one of them filed a Petition in Bankruptcy. If an hon. Member presented a Petition in Bankruptcy he was suspended from all legislative functions until that Petition was disposed of; and he thought they had a right to ask that the same rule which was applied to Members of Parliament, and which was applied to all public servants in England, should also be applied to those who were employed in Ireland. They had been told that one reason why this course had not been taken in regard to Mr. Bolton, and why Mr. Bolton had not been suspended, was that he was proposing to enter into some bargain with his creditors, by which he was to hand over to them some portion of his official emoluments. He had always understood that the salary given to an official was in order that he might maintain a certain position in society; and it would be very strange to have a man occupying an official position, with the greater part of his salary in the hands of his creditors. What could be more objectionable than that a man, holding the position of Crown Solicitor in Ireland, and exercising legal functions, and obliged to conduct the prosecution of prisoners, should be, to all intents and purposes, in the hands of his creditors? He knew nothing about Mr. Bolton, except what he had read and heard in that House; but, speaking generally, he thought the facts which were admitted by the Treasury Bench rendered it only just and proper that Mr. Bolton should be at once suspended.

Mr. GREGORY said, it was not his province to defend Her Majesty's Government, nor did he know anything about this case beyond what had been said in that House; but he did think that there ought to be some right understanding as to the course which should be adopted. What was now before the Committee was the proposal that Mr. Bolton's salary should be omitted from the present Vote; that he should, in fact, be deprived of his professional remuneration, and dismissed as a solicitor from public employment. He did not think that sufficient reasons had been assigned for taking such a course. He had very little respect for the antecedents of Mr. Bolton, and he was not there to defend that gentleman; but if he had been a fraudulent trustee there were remedies in Ireland, as well as in England, which could be put in force against him, and he might have been prosecuted in that capacity. If he had committed an unprofessional act, he presumed that there might have been an application to strike him off the rolls in Ireland, as in England; but he could not find that either one step or the other had been taken against Mr. Bolton. All that was left was the Petition in Bankruptcy, and the proceedings which were now pending in the Court at Belfast. It was admitted that that House ought not to be influenced by those proceedings. Reference had been made to the fact that Mr. Bolton had not appeared when he was called upon to appear as a witness in Court in the case now pending at Belfast. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had put that matter very fairly. He might, of course, have been examined from one end of his life to another; and until some case was made out by the other side to justify the libel it was not for Mr. Bolton to go into the box at the call of the other side. ["Oh!" from Irish Members.] He hoped that hon. Members would hear him out. If a plaintiff was required by the defendant to appear in the witness-box, the defendant had the means in his own hands of putting him there. He might summon him by subpoena, and ask him pretty well what questions he liked, treating him even as a hostile witness. Therefore, he did not think much importance attached to the refusal of Mr. Bolton to go into the witness-box in this instance. In all probability the telegram which had been referred to was founded upon some observation in Court—such as "Where is Mr. Bolton?" or something of that kind. Nor did it follow that Mr. Bolton would not present himself as a witness at the proper time. Then it was said that Mr. Bolton had presented a Petition in Bankruptcy. Now, as he understood, the bankruptcy was brought about in consequence of some unfortunate purchases which Mr. Bolton had made in the Landed Estates Court of Ireland. Mr. Bolton had fancied the purchases he made to be of very much larger value than they turned out to be. Many other gentlemen had made mistakes in the purchase of land, and had lost something in consequence. The Committee had a right to assume that, being pressed by his creditors, Mr. Bolton had presented a Petition in the Court of Bankruptcy for the proper administration of his estate, in order to secure that it should be duly administered among his creditors generally. It would appear from the investigation, when it took place, whether the circumstances attending the bankruptcy were discreditable to Mr. Bolton or not; and, therefore, he did not see that there was sufficient ground for taking steps against Mr. Bolton until the circumstances of the bankruptcy were disclosed. Until those proceedings were fully heard, he did not think it would be right to suspend Mr. Bolton during the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings he had invited. Of course, if it turned out that the circumstances of the bankruptcy were discreditable to him, or that there had been anything fraudulent in his transactions, the case would be different, or even if it should turn out that the bankruptcy had been brought about by undue means, such as extravagance, or wanton expenditure, it would be another question, and the Government would have it in their power to deal with him; but until that fact was ascertained, he did not think there was any ground for the refusal of his salary. If it were purely a bankruptcy of misfortune, not attributable to the fault of the bankrupt, it would be a harsh thing that he should at once lose his appointment.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH said, he thought the point raised by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) was really the one which the Committee were called upon to consider. As to the trial at Belfast, it seemed to him that the Government were wise in not throwing the weight of a feather in either scale. The simple question was, what was the ordinary rule of the Service in the case of the bankruptcy of a public servant? If it was the rule in other Departments to suspend a public servant in the event of bankruptcy where the bankruptcy was the act of the servant or of his creditors, there ought to be no difference made in Mr. Bolton's case. He knew the case of a young officer in the Army who had undertaken to pay his father's debts by instalments, and, having failed to do so, bankruptcy proceedings were brought against him; and he (Mr. Illingworth) was told that, in spite of all the interest brought to bear to save this young officer, he had been compelled by the Commander-in-Chief to resign his position. What he held, and what every right-minded man would hold, was that if the rule ordinarily observed was suspension there ought to be no exception made in the case of Mr. Bolton. Of course, if any of the charges now made against Mr. Bolton were substantiated, then it was clear that suspension would not be sufficient, but that it must be followed by absolute dismissal with disgrace. All he said was that the Government would not be justified in this case in deviating from the clear and well-understood rule in all other cases when a man was overtaken by embarrassment in regard to his pecuniary circumstances, and matters had proceeded so far as to involve a Petition in Bankruptcy. It seemed that the proper course which ought to be taken in this case was to suspend Mr. Bolton.

Mr. GIBSON said, he had understood on the last occasion this question was before the House that it was stated from the Treasury Bench that there was no certain rule laid down as to bankruptcy or arrangement with creditors. Of course, there were bankruptcies and bankruptcies; and, therefore, it was absolutely impossible to lay down an absolutely rigid rule. Last Wednesday the statement made was that the presentation of a Petition for arrangement, or even adjudication, in bankruptcy would not, ipso facto, necessarily cause dismissal from the Public Service, and it was pointed out that every case must be considered on its own merits, and on the circumstances which brought the bankruptcy about. As an illustration to show the reasonableness of this rule, the case was given of a person who had been trustee of moneys invested in shares in the City of Glasgow Bank. The failure of that bank had brought about the ruin of such trustee, whose own affairs were put into the Bankruptcy Court, with the result that the trustee was adjudicated a bankrupt. Now, it was obvious that such a bankruptcy was perfectly consistent with the entire innocence of the man who was made bankrupt, and it would be an extreme hardship to subject a man under such circumstances, who ought to have the sympathy of all persons, to a dismissal which would deprive him of the only means he had of effecting a settlement with his creditors. He did not assert that that was the case here, and he did not pretend to have any special knowledge of the rules enforced either in the Army or in the Public Service. But the statement from the Treasury Bench on Wednesday last was not challenged or contradicted in any part of the House; and he was bound to say that it seemed to him to be a rule which, if applied with discretion, would recommend itself to the common sense of everyone.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, it was quite possible that a man might become bankrupt by accident or misfortune, and many bankrupts were neither fraudulent or disreputable persons. In his part of the country he was satisfied that many persons whose estates were administered under the Bankruptcy Act, and who were held to be bankrupt, had become so by misfortune; but in this case it was evident that Mr. Bolton was a man of questionable character, and while legal proceedings were pending against him in the Courts of this country the Government, having full knowledge of the proceedings, not only took no steps against him, but actually promoted him. In this case, instead of suspending him or instituting a full inquiry into the charges against him, his superiors acted as his protectors. He (Mr. Joseph Cowen) maintained that the Government were fully aware of Mr. Bolton's antecedents, and therefore he should support the Amendment.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he also intended to support the Amendment for the reduction of the Vote, and he agreed with the Mover of the Motion in the opinion he had expressed that the Law Charges in Ireland were altogether swollen beyond the necessities and requirements of the case. His hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had shown the Committee that there had been very little diminution in these charges, notwithstanding the fact that there had been a very considerable diminution in the crime of the country, and not only in the crime of the country, but in many other respects. The one thing which would not diminish, so long as it was possible to keep it up to high water mark, was the Law Charges, the fees paid to lawyers and policemen, the reward of spies, informers, Crown Prosecutors, and all the rest of them. Those charges were kept up at the highest level, notwithstanding the fact that crime and outrage were decreasing, and the population and wealth of the country were also decreasing. No doubt there had been a high old time for the lawyers, who had an interest in keeping up the Law Charges as long as they could. This class of people had been rolling in wealth and wallowing in the public money for years past; and, of course, it was very desirable on their part to continue the same game as long as possible. As regarded George Bolton, he had been the pet of Dublin Castle—the pet of the Executive, and the Public Service of that country. He had not one salary only, but many; and yet, out of those many salaries, he could not afford to pay his creditors. He enjoyed an income from the Government of £2,000 a-year. He contracted debts to the amount of £100,000, and he found that the Government and the House of Commons did their best to shield and shelter him. He (Mr. Sullivan) had seen the evidence of what had occurred recently in Dublin, when the Judge of the Bankruptcy Court kindly consented to postpone the hearing of Bolton's case in order that Mr. Bolton might have an opportunity of obtaining damages at Belfast. That was the sort of support he got from men in high office in Ireland. When they came into that House—the highest Court of Justice—they found an endeavour to postpone the Votes lest the fair fame of Mr. George Bolton should suffer. They found Ministers of the Crown standing up and defending him when there was a clear case against him. Using the word "Crown" put him in mind that in Ireland Mr. George Bolton was "the Crown;" that admirable gentleman, in conducting prosecutions in Ireland called himself "the Crown," and the Judges and Magistrates referred to the excellent and famous George Bolton as "the Crown." Ought not the Government to be ashamed at such a name being applied to such a man, and that such a man should be retained in the Public Service? He said it was a public scandal that these things should be; it was one of the many scandals connected with the Government Departments in Ireland, and the Government had good reason that night to be ashamed of it.

Mr. TREVELYAN said, he was not quite sure whether the Treasury Minute of November, 1868, had been read to the House; but it had been very often cited, and it might be well to read the exact words, which were as follows:—

“In the event of any civil servant being arrested, or being adjudicated a bankrupt, or entering into a composition with his creditors under the Bankruptcy Act, he will, on the fact being known, be suspended from duty and from salary, and he will not be reinstated unless, after examination of the facts and of the schedule prepared for the Court, it shall appear that his difficulties have been occasioned by misfortune, and not by extravagance or culpable improvidence, or unless the case shall be characterized by previous circumstances of extenuation.”

That was the measure which the Irish Government were anxious to apply to Irish Civil servants; they included Mr. Bolton in that category, and that measure, and no other, they proposed to apply to him. The question obviously was, whether he had hitherto come under any one of the first three heads—being arrested, or being adjudicated a bankrupt, or entering into a composition with his creditors. What was the meaning of “adjudicated a bankrupt?” That was the point, and he was not willing to state the opinion of someone on the Treasury Bench on so purely legal a question; but they proposed to lay the case before the Law Officers, and likewise to apply to the proper authority, whom he would not then name, to ascertain what was the practice in the English Civil Service; and exactly that practice, so far as it could be ascertained, would be followed in this case. This was a clear statement of the course which the Government proposed to take, and he earnestly hoped it would be satisfactory to the Committee.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought the Committee were in a position of some difficulty, because they had not had much light from the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who contented himself with the oracular remark that there were bankruptcies and bankruptcies, and then sat down and left the Committee where they were before. The Committee wanted to know the rule that was in force in the Service from official sources, and that had been clearly stated by the right hon. Gentleman who read the Treasury Minute. And they wanted to ascertain clearly the course which the Government intended to pursue, and they learned that it was one which differed widely from the course they had taken in other cases, because it appeared by the Minute that where a man was arrested or adjudicated a bankrupt, or made a composition with his creditors, he was to be at once suspended from the Public Service. He understood that, under the new Bankruptcy Act, the first step to be taken in order to make a composition with creditors was to file a Petition; and though he did not state it as a question of law, he was informed that a composition could not be made without first filing a Petition in Bankruptcy. At any rate, the fact remained that, on the 24th of June last, Mr. Bolton filed a Petition in Bankruptcy, with a view to compounding with his creditors; and, without sympathizing with hon. Members behind him in their attack on Mr. Bolton, he did not see why a rule should be laid down for him different from that applied to others. Nor did he see why the fact that Mr. Bolton was attacked by a certain party and defended by others should give him a privileged position. They had Mr. Bolton applying to the Bankruptcy Court on the 24th of June last, with a view to compounding with his creditors. Why, then, did not the Treasury Rule come into operation? Not only did the Rule not come into operation when Mr. Bolton filed a Petition in Bankruptcy, but he doubted whether it would have come into operation at all but for the question having been raised by hon. Members behind him. If Members of that House and of the House of Peers became, during the time of bankruptcy, incapable of discharging public duties, he would ask the Prime Minister whether he thought that exceptional treatment should be adopted in the case of a legal official in the Public Service, and whether he thought it advantageous with regard to Ireland that an official who had come very prominently before the public, and who occupied a position which exposed men to much adverse criticism—namely, that of Crown Prosecutor—that such an individual should be singled out above all other officials for exceptional treatment? He thought, if it were necessary, as a general rule, to exercise care in administration, that extreme care should be exercised when the Irish Government was concerned, because, unfortunately, the Irish Government did not enjoy the respect of the great majority of the people of Ireland; and he could conceive nothing more likely to stimulate the unpopularity of that Government than that the House of Commons should be led to understand that an official of the Government was to be exempt from the operation of one of the ordinary Rules of the Public Service.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could venture to assure the noble Lord that nothing was further from the intention of the Government than to apply an exceptional mode of treatment to the case of Mr. Bolton. The whole question was this. What was the rule of the Public Service, and what was the just application of that rule? The question put by his hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) a few minutes ago had been answered by what had been read by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from the Treasury Minute of November, 1868. When the noble Lord spoke to him he had no recollection in the matter which was very serviceable; but his recollection was, that the administration of the Minute had generally been in conformity with what had been said by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson)—that there were bankruptcies and bankruptcies—that was to say, that everything depended upon the character of the bankruptcy. It might be said that this was with regard to the ultimate steps to be taken, and that suspension was not inevitable in any case; but suspension was not invariably insisted upon, and there was the case of a person in the Education Department, whom it would not be necessary to name, holding an important situation, who was actually adjudicated a bankrupt, but who was not suspended for an hour, so far was the nature of the case known to be in his favour. That, however, he admitted, was not a case in the same sense. It appeared to him that there was no room left for doubt. The Minute of November, 1868, was clearly in the nature of a penal law, and, being so, it was the duty of the Treasury to administer it strictly; and, whatever might be the amount of feeling in that House, it was their duty to ascertain its legal construction—not stretch its application—and that his right hon. Friend said was being done by the best means in his power. The Secretary to the Treasury was said to have been defending Mr. Bolton; but the extent of that defence was to see that strict justice was administered to him. He had one addition to make to what had been stated by his right hon. Friend, which, he thought, would satisfy the Committee. His right hon. Friend had promised that he would obtain the best legal judgment he could of the meaning and construction of this Rule; and to that he might add, as it was fair matter for discussion, that if this Vote were now allowed to pass, the Government proposed that the Report of the Vote should not be taken until his right hon. Friend had obtained the judgment he sought. He hoped the Committee, under the circumstances, would see that, if the Vote were passed, this question could be raised at a time when the Government would be in a position to state decisively their course.

MR. SEXTON said, they were entitled to demand from the Government to take immediately a step which they were clearly not disposed to take. He failed to discover any reason in the statements of Members of the Government why this should not be done. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had read a Treasury Minute to the Committee, the existence of which was quite as well known to the Government on Wednesday last as it was that night. Now, that Minute provided that if a Civil servant became bankrupt, or entered into a composition with his creditors, he should be suspended in consequence. What was the position of Mr. Bolton? He had filed affidavits in the Court of Bankruptcy; one of them, dated the 2nd of July, was headed "In the Bankruptcy Court, Ireland, in the matter of George Bolton. Petition for arrangement." He (Mr. Sexton) said then that Mr. Bolton had entered into a composition with his creditors, so far as it was possible for him to do so. He had done all in his power to make a composition with his creditors; and he maintained that, applying the rule of the English Civil Service, the Government were bound to suspend him. They were told that action would be taken when the construction of the Minute was ascertained; but he said that Mr. Bolton ought to be suspended now. No doubt, as it was said, there were bankruptcies and bankruptcies—so much the worse for Mr. Bolton, for a bankruptcy like his had not been seen for a long time. Judge Walsh had declared his conduct towards his own relatives and family to have been of a fearful character, and yet the Prime Minister contended that there were reasons for still further delay. He would not go so far as to say that if the Government agreed to take the Report of the Vote at a reasonable hour, and undertook before that to ascertain the law, they might not change the character of their present opposition to the Vote.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, the term "reasonable hour" was a relative one. As Mr. Speaker had stated the other day from the Chair, it did not mean exactly the same thing in August as it did in the month of May. With that reservation he was prepared to assent to the proposal of the hon. Member.

Mr. HEALY said, he supposed the Government meant by a "reasonable hour" 9 or 10 o'clock. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] No doubt, then, they considered 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning a reasonable hour. They had just had an instance of that, for the House had been discussing the Irish Magistrates Bill until 5 o'clock that morning. But there was one point about which he should like to have some information at the present moment. Mr. Bolton had committed flat perjury on Thursday last. What notice had been taken of that by the Government? He swore before Judge Walsh, in order to procure a postponement, that he required an adjournment on the ground that he was a material and necessary witness. His words were—

"I say I am a material and necessary witness, and I believe a material witness for myself on the trial of both actions."

That affidavit was sworn in the Bankruptcy Court on Thursday last. But what had occurred to-day in Belfast? After swearing in the Bankruptcy Court the other day that he was a necessary and material witness for himself for the purpose of procuring a postponement, Mr. Bolton declined to go into the witness box at Belfast. Now, he asked, what notice were the Government going to take of that affidavit? Here was a man charged with a series of crimes by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) in United Ireland; he had been called by that hon. Member everything but one thing; and, notwithstanding the affidavit he had made, his case had to-day been closed without his daring to go into the witness box. They asked the postponement of the Vote; but he must say it was not merely as a bankrupt that he impeached Mr. Bolton. He regarded him as a fraudulent, perjured swindler, all along the line. He cared nothing whether he was a bankrupt or not. However his bankruptcy might go, or whatever might be the verdict, he said it was a disgrace and a scandal for the Government to keep the case over the Belfast Assize. Then they were told that it was a question whether Mr. Bolton's bankruptcy was of a character which ought to carry with it the penal action prescribed by the Treasury Minute. He would ask, who were the people seeking to make Mr. Bolton a bankrupt? Why, it was his wife's trustees, who claimed to the extent of £26,000; and it was with regard to that money that Judge Walsh declared that Mr. Bolton had acted in a fearful manner towards his wife. Bolton had been let off by the late Lord Chancellor Law in this way—he produced a letter from his wife stating that if she got this £26,000, she was willing that her husband should continue in the Public Service—she did not want, so to speak, to take the bread out of his mouth. Having entrapped Lord Chancellor Law into continuing him in his position, what did he do? So far from paying the £26,000, he had pocketed the money which he got by a fraudulent deed; he had acted as a fraudulent trustee, and in a way contrary to the rules of the Profession, and in such a way that the Judge declared that he ought to be struck off the Rolls. And now it was his wife's trustees who were seeking to make him bankrupt in Dublin. Such was the man whom the Government retained in the Public Service. The declaration of the Judge alone, with regard to his conduct, he should have thought would have been sufficient to induce the Government to come to a speedy issue in this matter. Whether the Rule of 1868 applied or not, George Bolton was not the man whom it was desirable should conduct prosecutions in Ireland. Hon. Members on those Benches had pointed out his acts in that House; they had shown exactly the position in which he stood to English Gentlemen, not once but many times.

MR. DAWSON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had used the expression with regard to this case that there were "bankruptcies and bankruptcies;" and the Prime Minister also appeared to convey that the nature of the bankruptcy should be considered; but one of the most extraordinary excuses for Mr. Bolton was that which had been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Mr. Bolton, it appeared, had bought a lot of land; he had raised the rents, and when he was wringing out of his unfortunate tenants sufficient to pay his debts, that laudable object was defeated by the operation of the Land Act. He (Mr. Dawson) asked whether that would be considered an extenuating circumstance when Mr. Bolton's bankruptcy was considered? Would any man, who had acted as Mr. Bolton had acted, be allowed to remain member of a London Club, an institution which, of course, had no responsibility, as the Government had, towards the people of Ireland. He wished to say a few words on a subject referred to in connection with this Estimate before the Prime Minister entered the House. There were remarks made upon the payments by fees instead of by salary, in the case of the legal officials in Ireland. That practice, payment by results, pervaded the whole system of Government in Ireland. It was the cause of the delay in the administration of the law, because every delay was money to the Law Officers; it was profit in the hands of those who denied justice; and the people of Ireland in consequence did not get that justice which, as the Attorney General for England said, the English people so much respected. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary pointed out that the hon. Member for Sligo had forgotten to refer to the £15,000 in the Supplementary Estimate, which he should have taken into his calculation. But how, he asked, were hon. Members to have information which was not put into their hands until it was too late to be considered? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had disestablished the English Church in Ireland; the right hon. Gentleman must also disestablish that hierarchy of people in Ireland, who held their position on the pernicious system of payment by results, if he would complete the improvement of the condition of the Irish people. It had been shown by evidence given before the Committee sitting to inquire into the prisons' system that there were Assizes in Ireland without crimes to try, and prisons without prisoners; and, therefore, that there was no need for the expensive arrangements with which the country was saddled, and no reason for this enormous expenditure on prosecutions and law establishments. They had no Assize business of any moment; and, therefore, it came to this—that if the men who were receiving the enormous salaries complained of were to give some value for the money they received, crime must be directly promoted, so that there would be some justification for the great Law Charges in Ireland. He agreed with the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was very badly paid. He (Mr. Dawson) had a very high opinion of the conspicuous professional ability of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and he should certainly be disposed to give him a salary commensurate with his abilities; but to give a salary of £5,000 a-year, and fees to the amount of £8,000 a-year, pointed the moral of the tale which the Irish Members were anxious to lay before the Committee. He trusted that at no distant date public officials in Ireland would be paid by some fixed salary.

MR. HARRINGTON said, there was just one point he wished to direct attention to with regard to Mr. George Bolton. He was perfectly satisfied with the assurance given to his hon. Friend by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and he believed that that the inquiry which the right hon. Gentleman had promised to make could result in nothing but that which he (Mr. Harrington) and his hon. Friends had for some time been fighting for. He wished, however, to point out to the Government what the position of Mr. George Bolton was at the present time before the Court of Bankruptcy. As a matter of fact, Mr. George Bolton pledged the Government and the character of the Government and the Treasury in trust to his creditors. Now, that was a position which the Government ought immediately to take steps to disassociate themselves from. The chief objection to the position Mr. Bolton had assumed was that he pledged himself to give out of his salary a sum of £300 a-year to his creditors as a portion of his arrangement. Now, he thought it should be made clear at the earliest possible moment to Mr. Bolton and his creditors that while the Government was considering the question of the character of the bankruptcy—that was to say, considering whether Bolton had been brought into Court by his own misconduct or by the course of circumstances over which he had no control—the Government should take steps to secure that his promise to pledge them and their credit should not be a portion of any arrangement which he proposed to make with his creditors. He (Mr. Harrington) was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would see the justice of that suggestion. In the first place, what he suggested was only just to the country. It was not that a public servant, whose conduct was to be made the subject of an official inquiry, should be able to pledge the credit of the Government as one of the means he intended to employ in order to escape from the position he had been reduced to. Then, again, it was not just to the creditors that Bolton should be able to state to them that he would allocate the sum of £300 a-year out of his salary. The creditors knew the man's position in the Government of Ireland, they knew the character of the man, they were aware of the influence he had with the Executive, and they would naturally imagine that it was only by an arrangement with Her Majesty's Government that he was able to make the offer in question. It was, therefore, of the utmost importance that, at the earliest possible moment, it should be clearly stated that Bolton was not in a position to offer £300 a-year out of his salary until Her Majesty's Government had considered whether his bankruptcy had been brought about by his own misconduct, or by the course of circumstances over which he had no control. That was the only point to which he

(Mr. Harrington) wished to direct attention. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had taken a very judicious and proper course in promising to inquire into this case. No doubt, Mr. George Bolton had for a long time been in the service of the Crown in Ireland; but if the right hon. Gentleman knew the character of Mr. Bolton's services—if he knew the estimation in which those services were held by the vast majority of the people of Ireland—a majority composed of people who differed very widely as to political opinions and religious convictions—he would have no hesitation in saying that the length of Bolton's services to the Crown in Ireland should be no element in the consideration of whether justice ought to be done; whether a man who had misused his position, and who had been a source of vital contention between the Government and the people of Ireland for years, should not be removed from office.

Mr. D. GRANT said, he could not fail to admire the Irish Members for the clearness and power with which they had put their case before the Committee. As they always did, they had on the present occasion put their case in the very best aspect before the Committee; but it was impossible to disguise from one's mind the fact that for a considerable time the Committee had been subjected to a repetition of the same arguments, the same phrases, and the same expressions, all of which led to the same conclusion. He put it to hon. Members opposite whether, when they had once stated their case with great fulness, and with the skill and power which was characteristic of their race, it was not fair to the Committee generally that they should be allowed to proceed with the work in hand? Was it not particularly reasonable that hon. Gentlemen should allow Business to be done on the present occasion, inasmuch as they had extracted from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland a pledge, as distinct and clear as it was possible to be, that before the matter proceeded one step further, it should be fully considered in all its bearings? Furthermore, the pledge had been given that Mr. George Bolton should be placed on exactly the same footing as that on which any English Civil servant stood. What more could be asked? If the pledges of the Government were accepted, why discuss the subject further? If they rejected the pledges of the Government, of course, the question assumed an altogether new phase. He hoped the Irish Members would now be content with the assurances of the Government, and allow the Vote to be taken.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, inasmuch as the assurance had been given that the subject should be discussed on Report, it would be rather hard on the Committee and on the Government, if hon. Gentlemen insisted on debating it now. It was generally admitted that the offer of the Government was a fair one; and, therefore, he thought he would not be asking too much if he asked that the Committee should now be allowed to proceed with its Business.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had made an offer which, under all the circumstances of the cases, was a fair one, and one which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), before he left the House, commissioned him to accept in his name. But before doing so, he wished to direct the attention of the Committee to two points with reference to this matter. First of all, they might fairly ask that the decision of the Government with regard to the suspension of Mr. Bolton should be taken without any unnecessary delay. They were entitled to ask that, because it was two months since this matter was first brought to the attention of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and he (Mr. Parnell) was certainly entitled to say that so far there had been very unreasonable delay on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. It was only now, after the lapse of two months since the differences in the customs regulating the English and Irish Civil Services was first brought before the notice of the House, that the Irish Members were told that the Irish Executive would inquire how far the suspension of Mr. Bolton would be necessitated by following out the custom of the English Civil service. Under the circumstances, he thought he was entitled to ask, firstly, that there should be no unnecessary delay in coming to the decision with regard to Mr. Bolton's suspension; and, secondly, that the Report of this Vote should be brought on at a not unreasonable hour—say, after 11 or half-past 11 o'clock at night.

Mr. D. Grant

He had now to ask, in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), for leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. KENNY said, he did not rise for the purpose of continuing the discussion with regard to the case of Mr. Bolton; but there were one or two points on this Vote which he should like to bring under the notice of the Committee. He should like, in the first place, to say, in passing, that if Irish Members were sometimes forced to repeat arguments, it was owing to the stolid indifference with which their arguments were received by the Members of the Treasury Bench. One of the points to which he wished to direct attention concerned the Law Adviser to the Crown. It seemed, from a foot-note, that the salary attached to this Office had ceased; and what he desired to know was, whether it was proposed to discontinue it altogether? The second point to which he had to refer was that some time ago he called attention to the conviction of two persons at the Cork Winter Assizes of last year. The name of the persons convicted was Delahunty, and the significant point in the case was that one of the witnesses examined had since died; but immediately before his death he made a declaration to the effect that a policeman had induced him to swear against the prisoners, although, as a matter of fact, he knew nothing at all against them. That dying declaration was of so unusual a character that the Chief Secretary decided to submit it to the Judge who tried the case—Mr. Justice Barry—and to ask the learned Judge's opinion as to its bearing upon the conviction. Seeing that that dying declaration was submitted to Mr. Justice Barry six weeks or two months ago, and seeing that the Delahuntys were still in penal servitude, and knowing, as he (Mr. Kenny) did, they had been convicted on the most trivial evidence, a portion of which, according to the dying declaration of a witness, was suborned, it would be of great interest to the people of the district in Ireland to which the prisoners belonged, and also of great interest to many Members of the House, to know what the opinion of the learned Judge was in the matter. He (Mr. Kenny) gave Notice last night of his intention to ask further questions of the Chief Secretary on the subject next Friday, in order that, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman might, when the Vote was taken—he (Mr. Kenny) was not aware it would be taken to-night—be in a position to make some explanation regarding the case of the unfortunate men in question.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he should prefer to say nothing upon the question that night. His impression was that the papers were still with Mr. Justice Barry. He would attend to the matter at once, and he had no doubt that by Friday he would be in a position to answer the question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny). He had no difficulty, however, in answering the question with regard to the Vote for the Law Adviser. It was absolutely necessary that the Government in Dublin—at any rate, it had been thought necessary during the last four or five years—should have someone who could fill the part of Law Adviser. That position was filled at present by the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Naish). If the time should ever come when the Attorney General for Ireland and the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) both found seats in the House of Commons, it would become necessary to consider whether a Law Adviser should be appointed. He assured the hon. Gentleman that the Office would not be revived unless the services of a Law Adviser would warrant the payment of his salary. That contingency had not occurred, and he conceived it would not occur for some little time to come. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with his assurance as to the case of the Delahunty's.

MR. KENNY said, of late it had been very difficult to get opinions on legal subjects from Dublin Castle. He did not know whether that arose from the lapse of the Office of Law Adviser; but he hoped that in future it would not take three or four months to get an opinion from the Law Officers with respect to a very simple point of law. There were two other items in the Vote which struck him as very remarkable. One was the increase in the Estimate for the support of Crown witnesses. He presumed that the Estimate was for the year beginning on the 1st of April, 1884, and ending on the 31st of March, 1885, so that the £1,000 which was put down for the support of Crown witnesses was pure guess work. But the charge was £250 in excess of the amount which was required last year. Now, they all knew that criminal prosecutions in Ireland, especially prosecutions of that character in which it was necessary for the Government to get under their control, and to keep under their control, for a considerable period persons who were required to swear against others charged with serious crimes and offences had greatly diminished; and, therefore, he was anxious to receive some explanation of the extra amount which was asked for. The other item he had to bring under notice was the defence of prisoners in case of murder. Now, the fees which were paid by the Crown under the Prevention of Crime Act to counsel who were engaged to defend prisoners were notoriously small; indeed, they were so small that it frequently happened—it happened in the case of the Phoenix Park murders—that the prisoners were deprived of the most efficient legal advice which was obtainable, and which, if it had been obtained, might have seriously altered the aspect of affairs. The item for the defence of prisoners was increased by the sum of £85. In view of the diminution of cases of murder, it was very surprising that the expenses in connection with them should have increased in so striking a manner.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) pointed out that the item for defence of prisoners charged with the crime of murder had no reference to the cases of murder which came under the Prevention of Crime Act.

MR. PARNELL said, that some time ago his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant a Question with regard to the case of the Tubbercurry prisoners, and the right hon. Gentleman read a telegram which had been received from the prisoners' solicitor, asking that those of them whom the Government intended to bring to trial should be brought to trial at once before the Dublin Commission, and waiving, on their behalf, the usual notice of trial which prisoners were entitled to receive. He (Mr. Parnell) would be glad to know whether the matter had received the attention of the right hon.

Gentleman in the interval which had occurred, and whether he had any announcement to make?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the Government would be very glad to bring these prisoners to trial at the earliest possible moment; but, as the hon. Gentleman must see, it would be impossible to dispense with the usual notice, because the result would be a mis-trial.

MR. PARNELL: What are you going to do?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the prisoners could not be tried at the coming Commission. It was impossible. [Mr. PARNELL: Why?] Because there was not sufficient time to serve the notice of trial; the earliest day the men could be tried would be some day in October.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought that the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman was monstrous. It was now some weeks since the postponement of the trial of these prisoners was obtained from the Judge at the Sligo Assize, on the ground that the trial could not fairly take place in Sligo. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Walker): Not very long ago.] It was more than 10 days ago; that was to say the Crown had ample time, and more than ample time, to serve the requisite notice with regard to the trial of these prisoners at the August Assize. Did he understand the hon. and learned Gentleman adhered to that statement as a matter of fact? [The SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Walker): I do.] He should like to know why it was, if the only motive of the Government, with regard to the case of Mr. Fitzgerald and the other Tubbercurry prisoners, was to secure a change of venue, in order to obtain a fair and impartial trial, they did not proceed to take steps for a trial elsewhere immediately after they obtained the postponement of the trial? What were the Irish Members and the Irish people to infer from the conduct of the Government in this matter? Was it the opinion of the Government that it was undesirable to keep untried prisoners in Ireland awaiting trial for lengthened terms; and if it be not the opinion of the Government that it was so undesirable, then all he could say was that all the understandings, and protests, and accusations upon which the Government obtained the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1882 for changing venues would be utterly thrown on one side by their conduct with reference to this case. Having regard to the whole course of the Crown prosecution with reference to the Tubbercurry prisoners, it was monstrous that a Liberal Government, having resorted to the policy of delay from the very commencement of these proceedings, after having obtained repeated adjournments of the proceedings before the magistrates, after having postponed the trial before the Sligo Assize upon flimsy pretexts that the act of another person in connection with the prisoners had prejudiced the chance of the Crown obtaining a conviction—he said it was monstrous they should not have immediately proceeded, with all the machinery at their command, to put the men upon their trial in a Dublin Court. What had the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Naish), with his swollen salary and his enormous fees, which the Committee were asked to pay him, to do but to attend to matters of this kind? He (Mr. Parnell) asserted it was monstrous that the Government should lose a single minute in taking the necessary steps to bring these Tubbercurry prisoners to trial. On a former occasion his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) read a telegram, which he had received from the solicitors to the parties, offering to waive the customary notice; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland now said that the waiver would be of no use, and that it was impossible to bring the prisoners to trial on the 5th of August, as 10 days' notice of trial must by law be served on the prisoners, and that it was not in the power of prisoners in criminal cases to waive that duty on the part of the Crown. But this matter was under discussion four or five days ago in Committee, and the demand was specifically made that the Government should bring these men to trial at once. A telegram was sent from the prisoners claiming to be placed on their trial at the forthcoming Dublin Sessions; and the Chief Secretary replied, in the usual stereotyped fashion, that there was no unnecessary time being lost. He had another telegram from one of these long-suffering men from Sligo Gaol—

"Please press the Chief Secretary to put us on trial at the Commission which opens early next month in Dublin."

In the face of the repeated delays and subterfuges resorted to by the Government, if these men could not be placed on their trial next month, the only other honest and straightforward course open to the Government was to release them all on bail. How could they trust the declarations of the Government that they would bring these men to speedy trial, when this was the way in which a number of prisoners were bandied about, and kept in prison for seven months, as they would have been next October, which, according to the Solicitor General for Ireland, was the next earliest time when they could be put on their trial? The truth of the matter was that, from the first moment of their arrest, the Government had no case against them, and they knew it. They were fishing for evidence, and were attempting to work on the fears of the prisoners, and in that illegal manner to induce them to turn Queen's evidence against each other. They had a wretched informer, a man whose character was so bad that the Government were obliged to apply for a change of venue, because they could not produce this wretched character in the box as their sole reliance, in a district where his character and history were so well known. What evidence had they against Mr. Fitzgerald, one of his constituents in Cork? He was a gentleman whom he had known for years, and was as incapable of any dishonourable act as the Chief Secretary himself; and he would say that, although Mr. Fitzgerald had opposed him more than once in political matters. He was arrested in the streets of London opposite Scotland Yard five months ago, and the English newspapers were at once instructed to insert paragraphs about his arrest, saying that it signalized the arrival in London to show what a great man he was, and how speedily he could unravel the designs of the rebels against the Queen. He was arrested without a warrant. They had heard the other day of the unwillingness of the police to arrest persons accused of the most horrible offences without warrant; but there was no such unwillingness in the case of Mr. Fitzgerald. He was arrested without a warrant, and the English papers were at once instructed to say that the chief of the dynamiters had been discovered. He was then hurried over to Ireland and put in prison in Dublin; he was then sent to the prison in Sligo, and a rumour was sent round by the Crown officers that he had turned Queen's evidence against the persons who had been previously arrested. Every attempt was made to prejudice his case and excite public opinion in this country against him. Then he was charged with treason-felony; then with conspiracy to murder; next the charge of conspiracy to murder was withdrawn, and the charge of treason-felony only was proceeded with. In 1882, when the Prevention of Crime Act was being passed, the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary gave an assurance that these charges of treason-felony should not be raked up against men under the provisions of that Act, and he now claimed the fulfilment of that pledge. In view of the fact that the Government had taken the necessary steps to bring these prisoners to trial at the Special Commission in Dublin and not at Sligo, and that there had been abundant time to serve the notices on the Judges in Dublin for a change of venue, there was now no course open to the Government but to release these men on the solid and substantial bail they were prepared to give. They would all come up for trial when the time arrived. It was abominable and infamous that the wives and families of these men should be left in starvation owing to the illegal conduct of the Government towards these prisoners. He could not see what difference there was between the state of affairs in Ireland now and last year under the Prevention of Crime Act of the present Chief Secretary and under the Coercion Act of the former Chief Secretary (Mr. W. E. Forster). The right hon. Member for Bradford kept a vast number of men in prison for a long time without trial under the ordinary laws; and it was not right, or just, or Constitutional, or in accordance with the traditions of the Liberal Party, that this course of conduct should be persisted in, and he demanded from the Government the release of these men on that solid and substantial bail they were prepared to offer, or else that they should be at once put upon their trial.

MR. HARRINGTON said, the Chief Secretary would do well to listen to the advice of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). It was evident that the Government had been doing all in their power to delay bringing these men to trial; and although, no doubt, the Solicitor General for Ireland was technically accurate when he said there would be no opportunity of accepting the offer of the prisoners to bring them to trial before October next, yet he wished to draw attention to this fact—that a true bill had been found against these men at the Sligo Assizes. It was not necessary that they should be put on trial at the opening of the Commission in Dublin. A true bill having been found against them by the Grand Jury in Sligo, it was not necessary to have their case submitted to the Grand Jury in Dublin. If the Commission was to last several days in Dublin, was there not still time to serve the 10 days' notice of bringing these men to trial before the end of the Commission? If not, then he would ask the Government to recognize the fact that the delay in this case had been all their own. From the commencement these men had been most anxious to be brought to trial, and they had challenged the Government to bring them into Court and try the charge made against them. A postponement was obtained at the recent Sligo Assizes, on the ground that a document had been circulated throughout the country asking for evidence for the defence of these men, and that that had been circulated in order to prejudice their trial. If that was so, the document was certainly circulated a month or two before the day of trial; and if the document was circulated so early as that, the Government had cognizance of it. Why, then, did they not change the venue in time to bring the men to trial on the 5th of August? Whatever might be the interpretation Ministers in London put on the action of officials in Ireland, the people in Ireland would only take one view, and that was that this was only a part of the Government policy in that country for years past. They had taken innocent men and put them in prison, and then worked upon their fears to get some of them to give information against others, and so get convictions against them. If that was not the intention of the Government what was their objection to admit these men to bail? They might, at least, admit some of them to bail. They had said the evidence was not so strong against some as against others; but they had no right to set themselves up as judges of these men. The delays were not the fault of the men, but of the Government, and it was quite true that the Government stated they would not oppose the release of these men on bail. Bad as was the administration of the right hon. Member for Bradford when he was in Ireland; infamous as was the system practised under his régime, the policy of keeping men in prison month after month and year after year without trial was far more infamous and disgraceful than anything practised by the right hon. Member for Bradford. There were now in prison in Ireland men who had been kept there for 18 or 19 months; and some men who had recently been put upon their trial at Sligo had been kept in prison waiting for trial 18 months. When the man who was charged with and convicted of the murder of a policeman in Galway was put upon his trial he had been kept waiting for 18 months in prison, and whatever means he had of defending himself having been exhausted in that time, when he met his accusers in Court he was unable to meet the charge against him. When this man was convicted a further postponement was obtained of the trial of the other men who had been kept in prison 18 months. He himself had seen them brought to the prison office day after day, and there, without the presence of any of their friends, or of the Press, or any protection such as men in their unfortunate position ought to have had, an informal inquiry was made, and the remand was granted. On no less than nine occasions they were removed, and what was the object? Was it to get additional evidence? No; the evidence obtained at first was not altered in the least, and the evidence upon which they were committed on the last day was the evidence sworn to on the first day. What, then, was the object of the Crown in these repeated applications for delay? Simply to allow the Assizes then being held to slip over, so that the Crown would then not have to make application to the Assizes for an adjournment; and that enabled the Government to get over one Assizes. The March Assizes came on shortly afterwards, and then they claimed an adjournment on the strange ground that they were searching for witnesses, and because they were searching in America for evidence these men were kept in prison six months longer. At the end of those six months there was another opportunity of bringing them to trial; but another application was made by the Crown for an adjournment, and on the very same ground that they were searching for a witness in America. A more monstrous proceeding could not take place in any part of the world—on the flimsy pretext that they were searching for a material witness in America! That material witness in America had not yet turned up, and the Crown could not possibly make an application for another adjournment on that flimsy pretext; but this time they had applied for an adjournment at Sligo, and another remand had been granted. They had no faith in the intention of the Crown to try these men. They believed that their policy with regard to these men was precisely the policy they had been pursuing and intended to pursue with regard to Mr. Fitzgerald and the other prisoners in Sligo Gaol. What had occurred with regard to the man who had been convicted of the murder of a policeman? He had been offered a free pardon if he would give evidence against other men. The Government might say they had not offered that; but so long as they engaged such a man as Bolton they knew what the system was. If the Government wished to free themselves from the character of keeping men in prison in order to give information against others, and to swear away the lives of other men—a character which they held in Ireland, and very well deserved—there was only one course to adopt, and that was to at once consent to the release of these men on bail. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to look at this question in something like a fair spirit. Here was the case of Fitzgerald, 200 miles away from his home and friends. He was first arrested in London, and most infamous rumours were circulated about him by the police officers who arrested him, to the effect that he intended to become an informer, and had offered to do so. That unfortunate man was taken not to Cork, his native place, where he could have communicated with his family and his friends, but to Sligo; and although his material witnesses were in Cork, and all the expense of bringing them to Sligo would fall upon him until his innocence or his guilt was established, yet the Government would not admit him to bail on the substantial securities he was able to give them. What was it the Government wanted? They wanted, he supposed, to put these men on trial. Well, the largest possible security necessary they were willing to give to come up for trial and to meet their accusers and establish their innocence; and if they offered the most solvent security, what was the pretext upon which the right hon. Gentleman defended the action of the Crown in refusing to admit these men to bail? If he wanted to rid himself of the character of keeping men in prison in order to make them become informers and swear away each other's lives, he would no longer justify their continued imprisonment.

Mr. SEXTON said, this Tubbercurry case was a very painful one, and he had no choice but to denounce the course pursued by the Government, as announced by the Solicitor General for Ireland, as a scandalous outrage upon justice. Four months had passed away since these men were arrested. There was no pretence for saying that their conduct in life or their personal character was open to the slightest suspicion. Their lives had been honourable; their position was respectable. They were suddenly seized on the 2nd of April, upon the whisper of an informer, and were taken from their farms in the district of Tubbercurry, and from their shops in the town, and thrown into the gaol at Sligo. The whole course of the Government in regard to these men had been furtive and stealthy. It was the course of men who, conscious that they had no case against the prisoners, deprived them of their liberty on one pretext or another in the hope that some man might come and patch up a case against them. The first step taken by the Government was significant of the course they intended to take against these men. It was to refuse the admission of their relatives and their solicitor to the gaol. It had been said, when he had repeatedly called attention to this case, that such cases were few in Ireland. If he had been obliged repeatedly to call attention to this case, it was because at every step he had found the Government, and the agents of the Government in England, determined to pursue these men by mean and cowardly tactics. Why were they refused the right of the admission of their relatives? Why was their solicitor forbidden to see them? Why was it necessary for him to take advantage of the Rules of that House before the ordinary right of prisoners under such conditions to see their friends and their legal adviser was granted? After their arrest, what was the next step? A system of "Star Chamber" inquiry—secret examination. There was an absurd pretence of a judicial inquiry by the Resident Magistrate, who went to Sligo Gaol every eight days, and went through a formal examination of these men. What was there in that proceeding in the nature of a proper examination? No witnesses were examined. The paid agent of the Government went every eight days, and sat down at a desk and received some formal police evidence, and then went through the insulting and outrageous form of further remanding these men, although the principle of the Constitution was that no man should be imprisoned unless there was cause shown. Several weeks had passed away, several remands had taken place, without anything like a proper examination. At last he had succeeded in putting an end to that system; but what happened then? He found, as he had found at every stage of this disgraceful case, that the Government pursued oblique and cowardly tactics such as the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was never mean enough to pursue, and while "giving a promise to the ear broke it to the hope." After they had undertaken to abandon this system of secret remand, he had surely reason to expect that they would proceed in a proper way to prove their case in Court, or confess that they could not do so. They had already exhausted all the tactics of their unscrupulous police agents and spies. They had circulated from day to day general rumours with regard to Fitzgerald and the other men. He would invite hon. Members to allow their minds to travel to the prison cells where these men were lying without association with other men; and to consider the state of mind of a man in such a position when a George Bolton or some other agent crept into the cell and told him the abominable lie that some of his friends had informed against him. No matter how innocent that man might be, no one could tell what suspicions might enter his mind, and he might say it was better to save his own name and liberty, at the cost even of perjury, than to allow others to do so at his expense. This was how perjury was promoted. During the weeks following the arrest of these men, society in Sligo was saturated with such rumours by the agency of the police. The police went to every one of these men and told him if he wanted to save his own life and liberty, and to have a fortune by-and-bye, he had better be the first to give information, lest he should be too late. At the same time, they were scouring the county of Sligo day and night for evidence. They established in Tubbercurry an inquisition far more terrible than that of the Star Chamber, and so ruthlessly was that conducted that the aged mother of two of these men was taken by the police to Sligo Gaol, and there subjected to a secret examination. And now, he asked if, after four whole months of constant endeavour to convict these men by resorting to these shameful tactics, it was not time to do either one thing or the other with regard to them? If it had taken so many months to make out a case against them, was there not a strong presumption of their innocence? There had been secret inquiries conducted by a magistrate who had raised himself from a humble position in connection with the Constabulary; but all the skill of Mr. Horne and of the police had not been sufficient to enable them to send the men for trial with a confidence that they would be convicted. Under such circumstances, had not the time come when the prisoners should be set free, or allowed to go out on bail; or, failing these alternatives, to be put upon their trial at once? When did the Government mean to have them tried? When was this private inquiry system to end? When they professed to bring it to an end they only "kept the promise to the ear and broke it to the hope." They distributed the evidence of informers as if it was precious manna—they gave it only in small fragments; it was evidently too rich a thing to be wasted. They would not allow it to be published all at once; and it was only at intervals of eight days that the Gospel, according to the Informer Moran, was doled out. Some months had been wasted in this way, and when he had renewed his appeals for justice, he had found himself fooled and humbugged over and over again. It was impossible for any public man to place any reliance nowadays upon the words of a Minister. If a Member of Parliament chose to believe the statements that were made to him, he would find that he would gain nothing by his credulity, but that he would be regarded by the constituents he represented as little short of an idiot. In this way the Irish Executive exhausted a few more weeks, and in the meanwhile the minor Fouches of Ireland were roaming all over the county of Sligo, holding private inquiries, although nothing came of them in the end. On his third appeal upon the floor of that House he obtained a promise that the Crown would give them the last fragment of their precious manna, by either bringing the men to trial, or by setting them at liberty. All this time the families of these men were left without care or guidance, and their businesses, both in town and country, were without supervision, so that the men themselves had been driven by the efforts of the Crown to secure what they called justice to that pitch of bankruptcy which seemed now to be so fashionable among the pet Crown agents in Ireland. On the 16th of June, when the Crown made up its mind to commit these men for trial, an appeal was made for funds to help the prisoners and to assist them in obtaining a fair trial. That appeal was circulated throughout the county of Sligo, and the learned Solicitor General claimed that it was framed in terms that were calculated to intimidate the jury and prevent a fair trial in that county. If that were so, why did the Government delay to take action in reference to that appeal until the Sligo Assizes were over. The Attorney General went down to Sligo to conduct the trial—at least, so it was said. Let who would believe it, he (Mr. Sexton) refused to do so. The Attorney General knew on the day he went down to Sligo, as well as upon the day he left it, that this appeal had been in print and had been circulated. The hon. and learned Gentleman went down for the purpose of other trials, and not for this. He would be aware at the earliest possible moment what the terms and substance of the appeal were; and he would, therefore, know whether it was calculated to warp the judgment of any jury who might be selected in the county of Sligo. What did the Attorney General for Ireland do? He allowed a week or a fortnight to pass; and it was only when the Assizes were coming to a conclusion, and when it was too late for the unfortunate prisoners to secure that any action should be taken in their own behalf, that the Attorney General for Ireland, at the last moment, came forward, possessed of full knowledge of the evidence on which he claimed a conviction from a jury, and having all the facts in the dark recesses of his mind; but instead of avowing them, and allowing the prisoners out on bail, he came down at the last moment and pitifully put forward the fact of this appeal, published eight weeks before, as a reason why the trial was to be postponed. And now as to the question of bail. These 11 prisoners were almost all of them in the same boat. Two informers—one, a branded soldier dismissed from the Army; and another, possessing a treble qualification in consequence of having first committed a cowardly highway robbery upon a poor woman, next an attempt to murder a Judge, and charged, lastly, with being mixed up with the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke—it was upon the evidence of such a man as that that these unfortunate prisoners were kept month after month without their liberty. The whole of the evidence against them was that of this branded soldier and this monstrous criminal. What happened? When the question of bail arose, the Solicitor General for Ireland spoke to him (Mr. Sexton) as if he ought to be thankful because the Crown allowed three of the accused persons to be admitted to bail, and also because the bail was small. Now, if the Crown seriously believed that such an offence as treason-felony, and such a combination of offences as treason-felony and conspiracy to murder, could be proved against these three men, or that there was a shadow of hope of securing their conviction, did the Solicitor General mean to say that the Crown would have liberated them on bail for the paltry sum of £25? The admission of a man to bail upon such terms would appear to show that it was not of the least importance whether he ever turned up again or not. It was perfectly evident that if the Crown had a case against these men, they would never have admitted them to bail upon such terms as would be hardly likely to secure their appearance in the event of their being wanted again. Further, there was no difference whatever in the case of any one of these men as contrasted with that of the rest; and he could only conclude that the Crown believed that no jury would—he would not say hang a dog, but even consent to put a dog to momentary discomfort, upon the evidence of this wretched brace of informers. He had received two telegrams that evening, which his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had already read to the Committee. In the first of these he was desired to impress upon the Government and the Committee the necessity of putting these men upon their trial at once. In the second telegram the prisoners implored that they might be brought to trial, and declared their readiness to waive their right in respect of any change of venue. The Solicitor General for Ireland was a lawyer, and he told them that this waiver of right by the prisoners would not save the Crown. When he (Mr. Sexton) stated the other night that the motion of the Attorney General for Ireland at Sligo for the postponement of the trial was interpreted by some persons as indicating the intention of postponing the trial to the next Assizes, the hon. and learned Gentleman told him that the Crown had no such intention at all. Then why, when the postponement of the trial was moved for, had not due notice been given in regard to when and where it was to take place? It had been said that the appeal which had been made to the public would have the effect of preventing a fair trial in the county of Sligo; but the Attorney General for Ireland had not conveyed, in any way, an opinion that the circulation of that appeal would prevent a fair trial in any other county of Ireland. The 5th of August, when the Commission was to meet, was still seven days distant, and there had been between a fortnight and three weeks for the Attorney General for Ireland to give the necessary 10 days' notice. What he now pressed for was a trial in some other part of Ireland than the county of Sligo, and he could not understand why the Attorney General for Ireland, on making the application to postpone the trial, had not served the prisoners with the necessary 10 days notice of his intention to move the High Court of Justice in Dublin to change the venue and proceed with the trial elsewhere. He contended that the Government had broken faith with him, and that there was not a shadow of pretence for any further delay. There was no evidence which they did not possess now which they would get hereafter. He therefore called upon them, and he hoped his hon. Friends would support him and persist in the demand, to take the necessary steps for bringing forward the trial at once. The course they were at present pursuing simply conveyed to the public mind a sense of the unfairness of the treatment to which these men were subjected. After four months of imprisonment, and after having exhausted all the tactics of prosecutors, informers, and spies, it was their duty either to bring the men to trial at once, or to liberate them. He could not say where they were to be tried, and the prisoners themselves cared not; they were ready for trial anywhere. If the Crown declined to put them upon trial, let them then take the only legal alternative, and accept bail for their appearance, setting them at liberty until they were prepared to put them upon their trial.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had called attention at some length to the case of the Tubbercurry prisoners. He desired, therefore, to state to the Committee the position in which the matter stood. The crime of which these men were accused occurred some years ago. There were in all 12 men charged, and the charge brought against them was for one of the most grievous offences which could be imagined—namely, conspiracy to murder a Government official connected with the workhouse in that town, who, beyond all doubt, was fired at by some person. The other charge against these 12 men was one of treason-felony, which was also in itself a grave and serious crime. As he had said, these crimes occurred some time ago—as a matter of fact, two years ago—and he thought it would occur to the common sense of all in the House that when crimes of that nature had oc-surred a couple of years ago, and the number of men accused was 12, that it would require a much greater time to complete and to inquire into the evidence than if the charges were against one man, or if the crime had been of recent date. Some time in April last, these prisoners having been arrested, evidence was taken in the usual and authorized way, according to the Act of Parliament, under the powers vested in the Executive by the Prevention of Crime Act. It was the duty of the Executive to enforce the law, and they would be very much to blame if they did not do so. In pursuance of the power the law vested in them for the suppression of crime, inquiries were held from time to time under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and also when the men were arraigned. It was perfectly true that there had been a considerable number of remands in the course of the inquiries, and it was inevitable from the nature of the case that these remands should take place. There were a considerable number of prisoners, and a very large number of witnesses, and they had to make out a case not only against each, but against everyone of them. It was, therefore, impossible to bring the case to a complete issue until a considerable time had elapsed, and it was for the benefit of the prisoners themselves, and in the interests of justice, that in every case a complete case should be made out before they were committed for trial, so that they might not find fresh charges launched against them on the trial. The evidence given upon the committal was the property of the prisoners. They were able to use it, and sift it thoroughly between the date of the committal and the period fixed for the trial. Therefore, it was in the interests of the prisoners themselves, and in the interests of justice, that a complete case should be made out, as far as possible, in every instance before prisoners were committed for trial. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had commented upon the refusal to allow the prisoners to see their solicitor. What occurred was this. There were 12 men accused, and the 12 men had one solicitor in common, and the Prison Rules did not allow the 12 men to be brought into one room for the purpose of consulting him. The Attorney General for Ireland, however, as soon as the difficulty was communicated to the Government, in the exercise of his discretion, gave orders that the prisoners should be allowed to see their solicitor together, subject to the Prison Regulations, and that was done. The inquiries had proceeded, and necessarily they had occupied considerable time. They went on diem in diem for a number of days. The evidence of Moran, the informer, took up a considerable time. He told a long and a succinct story; but his cross-examination occupied a considerable time. It was said that a rumour had been circulated throughout the prison that information had been given by A. and by B., and Mr. Bolton's name was mentioned as appearing on the scene, and endeavouring to poison the mind of this or that person in obtaining evidence for the Crown. That was altogether a gratuitous assertion as far as Mr. Bolton was concerned. He had neither acted nor appeared in any shape in this prosecution, which had been conducted entirely by the Solicitor for the county—Mr. Anderson. It was stated by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), that after the prisoners were committed for trial, the Attorney General for Ireland did not go down to conduct the prosecution. He would not notice the imputation which had been made against his right hon. and learned Friend in regard to the motives upon which he had acted. It was asserted that his right hon. and learned Friend went down there as a sham, and that he had no intention when he went down to Sligo of conducting this trial at all. Now, what was it that occurred? His right hon. and learned Friend went down to Sligo. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had taken the opportunity, in the course of his speech, of going through the evidence, from his own point of view, and of commenting upon the evidence of the informer, Moran. He had not only commented upon that evidence, but all the other evidence, and with all the eloquence he was master of he had condemned the case for the Crown. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) proposed to leave the evidence against the prisoners exactly where it was, remembering that these men were still to be tried, and because he did not think it his duty for one moment to answer the hon. Member. All he could say was that there was a strong prima facie case against the prisoners; but it would be improper for any person holding the position he did, now that a trial was pending, to go into the evidence and endeavour to establish a case in answer to the statements of the hon. Member. Then, what was it that occurred? In the local newspapers there was circulated a document, dated the 16th of April, appealing to the public throughout the county for what was called a fair trial for these men. This appeal was made before the trial was to have taken place; and in consequence of the influence which such appeals were likely to have upon the minds of the jurors, the document having been circulated throughout the county not two months before the trial, but immediately preceding it—in consequence of that, a conclusion was arrived at that the trial ought to be postponed. The learned Judge who presided at the Assizes, in the exercise of his discretion, came to the conclusion that a fair trial could not be had in the county of Sligo, and he, therefore, postponed the case. It was proved, to the satisfaction of the Judge, that these documents had been circulated, and circulated in order to influence the minds of the jury, and to produce such an amount of terrorism as might affect their verdict. It was upon that ground, and upon that ground alone, that the learned Judge, who was otherwise quite prepared to try the case, came to the conclusion that the trial ought to be postponed. He was not there to say that the learned Judge did not exercise a proper discretion, having the documents before him; it certainly was a wise and prudent discretion. He had gone down solely for the purpose of hearing the Tubbercurry trial. The Judge had come to the conclusion that a fair trial could not be had in Sligo. Was it, then, the fault of the Public Prosecutor that the venue had been changed? The prisoners could not be altogether dissociated from those who were their false friends. The letters of these false friends it was which led the Judge to the conclusion that a fair trial could not be had on the spot. The Attorney General for Ireland, therefore, was coerced to the conclusion that a fair trial could not be had in Sligo, and the case was postponed until the next Assizes. What, then, did he start with? In the first place, with the authority of the Judge that a fair trial could not be had in Sligo. He was told that the Crown was responsible for the delay—abuse was poured on the Crown officials unstintingly because of the postponement; but through whose act was the postponement? Why, through the act of the prisoners themselves, or those for whom they were responsible.

MR. MOLLOY: Who made the affidavit on which the Judge acted?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The District Inspector of Tubbercurry himself, who was thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of the case. ["Oh!" and a laugh.] Hon. Members opposite sneered—did they wish to imply that a District Inspector was not to be believed in Ireland?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Not as a rule.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he should let that observation have all the weight it was entitled to. He should pass from it.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: District Inspectors are entitled to no more credence than any other officials in Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member for Wexford continues these interruptions after I now call him to Order, I shall have to call attention to his conduct.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the Judge had considered the evidence impartially, and, acting on his discretion, had come to the conclusion that the trial should be postponed. It was the Judge who had come to that conclusion, and no one else. When this matter was considered in the House on Friday last, the complaint was that the prisoners were not going to be tried in Dublin at all. The hon. Member for Sligo (MR. SEXTON) had brought it forward in Committee of Supply, and he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had said a few words in answer to him. He had stated then, as he stated now, that the men were to be tried in October, the earliest time at which they could be tried. No complaint was made then about the postponement, the only grievance being that the venue was to be changed, and that the prisoners had not been let out on bail. The complaint now seemed to be that, at the time the order was made to postpone the trial, the Judge should have seen that such postponement was unnecessary, and that the venue should have been changed then, if it was necessary to change it at all. But at that time it was doubtful whether it was necessary to change the venue. The Attorney General for Ireland had to exercise his discretion in the matter. Within a few days the Attorney General for Ireland came to the conclusion that the proper course for him to follow, in the exercise of his discretion, was to change the venue; and before this subject was discussed on Friday last, July 25th, the Attorney General for Ireland had come to the conclusion that the proper course for him to adopt was to change the venue, and change it to Dublin. It was said now—telegrams were produced by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) from the legal adviser of the prisoners—that the prisoners were willing to waive the 10 days' notice to which they were entitled under the Prevention of Crime Act. That was an idle and empty offer. Coming from a lawyer it was an idle and empty argument, because every lawyer knew that prisoners could not waive their right. No man accused of a crime could give any consent of the kind on which the Crown could act. The Government were in the position in which they were on Friday last, when they stated openly in the House that the case was to be tried in October, the earliest time at which it could be tried. No objection was made on Friday, the objection then taken being against the trial being held in Dublin at all, instead of the locality in which the offence was committed, which would have led to the case being postponed until March. So far as the interests of justice would permit, and even stretching a point—considering the observations which had been made about a delay of two months—the Attorney General for Ireland would, he was sure, carefully consider the case of every one of the prisoners, in order to see how far he could add to the number who had been let out on bail—namely, three; and, speaking for himself, he might say he should be glad to see the Attorney General for Ireland exercise his discretion as largely as possible with that object.

MR. HARRINGTON: Is it not possible to serve the 10 days' notice and take the prisoners to trial at a later date?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): No.

MR. HARRINGTON: A true bill has been found. It is not necessary for the case to go before the Grand Jury at all.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he did not rise for the purpose of unnecessarily prolonging the discussion; but he was bound to say, having listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, that the only impression that speech had conveyed to his mind was this—that the hon. and learned Gentleman evidently was aware that he had a very bad case indeed to defend, and had endeavoured to make that case appear less bad by making a long and rambling speech such as they had just listened to. He (Mr. W. Redmond) ventured to think that the case now under discussion was absolutely without parallel. It was a case which affected the liberty—he might almost say the lives—of 11 respectable men in Ireland, and the people who were dependent on them for a livelihood. It was a case which he really believed would recommend itself to the consideration of the people of England, if it could be fairly stated to them. It would, if properly presented, create such an impression in this country as would compel Her Majesty's Government to take that action which it appeared they would not take upon the mere representation of the Irish Members of the House. Complaints were made from time to time against matters of this kind being discussed in that Assembly. Well, that Assembly was commonly called the High Court of Justice of this Kingdom. And what did they find when they came to this High Court to discuss a case of this kind? [Laughter.] It was all very well for two right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to laugh when the case of 11 men who might be about to lose their liberty, even their lives, was mentioned; but he did not complain of it, for that was not the first time they had had experience of the great disposition on the part of right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to be unnaturally hilarious when serious matters affecting the welfare of Irishmen were under discussion. He had been going to observe, when in-terraptured by the somewhat boisterous laughter of Members on the Treasury Bench, that it was a discouraging thing for Members from Ireland to come there and state calmly and fairly the affairs of certain men in Ireland who were about to be brought to trial, and to find that not more than a couple of dozen English and Scotch Members attended to hear the matter discussed. It was frequently said the Irish Members had no right to complain, because Ireland was fairly represented in the House. What representation had she? Why, whenever a case of this kind cropped up—a case which interested a large majority of the Irish Members—little or no attention was paid to it by the bulk of the Members of the House. They found it as much as they could do to get a quorum of Members to come in, from time to time, moving a “count.” It was an extremely discouraging thing, and a thing which should be impressed on the people of Ireland, that when their Representatives discussed a case of this kind they did so to absolutely empty Benches, no English or Scotch Members considering it worth their while to come down to listen to the claims the Irish Members were bringing forward. However, the Irish Members would not be deterred, by the absence of English and Scotch Members, from discussing the grievances and claims of their country. What was the case of these men in Sligo Gaol? Why, some four months ago 11 men were arrested without any specific charge being brought against them at all. They had been four months in gaol, cut off from their occupations and their families. They had been remanded time after time, with no evidence against them. If that was considered by the Government a proceeding consistent with justice, he did not think there were many people in the country who would agree with them. If these men were arrested on specific charges, why had they not been placed in the dock, why had not evidence been brought against them, and why had they not been made to stand their trial before their fellow-countrymen? Why, they had not been tried because there was no case against them. They had been arrested, it was believed, in order to satisfy the ambition of certain police officials who were craving distinction in this particular way. They were arrested upon what with even a jury of Englishmen and Protestants would fail to obtain a conviction, and they were kept in gaol while the police and officials were scouring the country for informers to give evidence against them. The Solicitor General for Ireland, who spoke just now, and had precipitately retreated after his speech, as though ashamed of the part he had had to take, had said it was impossible, from the nature of the case, to avoid frequent remands. It was all very well to say that there was something in the case which made these remands necessary; but in order to prove their justice it was desirable that the circumstances which had led to them should be plainly stated, and not hinted at, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had hinted at them in his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman in the course of his observations complained that until that evening no dissatisfaction was expressed by the Irish Members at the trial having been postponed until October. Well, it was true no dissatisfaction had hitherto been expressed; but the reason was that it was only that evening that Members on the Irish Benches absolutely realized or even heard that such a monstrous outrage was going to be perpetrated by the Government as the postponement of the trial of these men for two months longer, and the consequent detention of the accused for another two months longer without a tittle of evidence being brought against them. It was not at all the duty of Irish Members of Parliament to see that men who were arrested by the Government were brought to trial at once. It was not a part of their legitimate duty; it was owing to the distorted state of affairs in Ireland that Irish Members of Parliament were obliged to occupy the attention and time of the House of Commons in pressing claims of this kind upon the attention of Englishmen and Scotchmen. He could perfectly realize that it was with considerable indifference that Gentlemen representing English and Scotch constituencies listened to a case such as that now under discussion; but it was absolutely necessary that if justice was not meted out to the people of Ireland by the authorized officers of the Crown in that country, the Irish Members should bring the action of those officers before Parliament, and, if possible, try to create such a state of public opinion as would serve to cause these unfortunate men to be brought to trial at the earliest possible moment. Supposing these men when brought to trial were acquitted—as very probably they would be—what would be their position? They would have been six months in prison, cut off from their occupations, from their friends and from their families, and then even an acquittal would give them little satisfaction. The way the men were being treated was absolutely outrageous. He did not believe that any where else in the world, even under the most despotic Government in existence, could men be arrested in the light of day, could be thrown into prison, and remanded day after day, week after week, and month after month, without a single iota of evidence being brought against them. This kind of thing could not go on much longer in Ireland. The Irish Members had thrashed the case out very fully in the House of Commons. They had shown the injustice of arresting men and keeping them in prison without bringing evidence against them—they had shown the system to be inhuman, unconstitutional, and distinctly despotic. He (Mr. W. Redmond) would say, from his position as an Irish Representative, that he believed in his soul that if cases like these multiplied in Ireland, and if the Government persisted in arresting men and sending them to prison for long terms without bringing evidence against them, there would be a feeling aroused in that country against English rule far more extensive than any which had ever yet been aroused. If the Government did not take steps to put an end to the present mode of government—the present Liberal mode of government—they would find at the next General Election and in the House that the Irish people and their Representatives knew how to treat an Administration which called itself Liberal, but which was before the world the most despotic in existence.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, this was a very serious case, and one which appeared to him to be made much more serious by the kind of defence set up by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He (Mr. M'Carthy) had not known much about the facts until he heard that night the powerful appeal of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and the singularly confused and confusing answer of the Solicitor General for Ireland. Out of all the brambles and brushwood of law, with which the hon. and learned Gentleman encumbered his speech, they got two or three facts for the understanding of men who were not lawyers. They got the fact that some four or five months ago some men were arrested on some charge or other, that from that time to this they had been kept in gaol without trial, and that the earliest date at which they could be brought to trial was two months off. They got the fact that though the men were seemingly charged with a grave and serious crime, three of them had been since set at liberty, on a bail of £25 each. He would ask the Committee to say whether there could be anything serious in the charge, or whether they believed there was evidence of any kind to be brought against any of these men, seeing that some of them were allowed to be at large on bail of £25? What reasons did the hon. and learned Gentleman give for keeping these men in prison? Why, first of all, he said that the 11 men were charged with the one offence, and that it took a much longer time to bring charges of guilt home against 11 men than against one man. If that was so, it was, he supposed, owing to his having an illegal and unenlightened sort of understanding that he was unable to comprehend it. If these 11 men were all accused of the same crime, the same evidence which would convict one would convict all of them, or, at least, so he should suppose. If they committed one crime, it must have been committed together, or in some kind of combination; and he altogether failed to understand why a longer time should be required to get together evidence to convict 11 than would be required to get together evidence to convict one. He did not know why, in a case of murder, it should take longer to prove that a person was killed by three men, by five men, or by a dozen men, than that he was killed by one. He could not see what reason there could be for postponing the trial month after month in a case where the Crown must soon have exhausted the evidence. The hon. and learned Gentleman had given them another reason. He had told them what one official thought and what he did not think, and then he declared that the trial had to be put off because someone had said or done or published something rather indiscreet, which made the learned Judge think that there should be a postponement. If this was a principle of law, they placed accused persons not only at the mercy of indiscreet friends, but also at the mercy of enemies who chose to publish statements apparently on their behalf. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said the fault was the prisoners' own. How could that be? How could he hold persons in prison responsible for statements published by other persons outside? What reason was there for saying the prisoners had authorized the publication? Were they to understand it as a point of their law, that when a man was charged with an offence, and some friend or enemy of his did an indiscreet thing, the man so charged was to be punished, as a sort of vengeance on his head, by having his case postponed? He did not think such a principle would be listened to for a moment, unless in the case of a charge brought against some Irishman. If the hon. and learned Gentleman's contention was correct, he (Mr. M'Carthy) saw no reason why these men should ever be released or tried. At any moment, as the time of trial drew near, some indiscreet friend or some malignant enemy might publish or say something which would make the Judge say justice could not be done whilst the echo of it lived in the minds of the people. If the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement were the defence of the Government, all he could say was, that the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), eloquent as it had been, was made ten times more eloquent in its defence of public justice by the hon. and learned Gentleman's attempt to reply to it.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had now left the House; but his place had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. These two Gentlemen reminded him of a toy which combined instruction with amusement—a toy in which there were two figures, one of which came out in fair weather and the other in foul; the only difference being that, in the case of the two Gentlemen, they both represented foul weather. With regard to the case under discussion, if it had occurred in the Dominions of the Ozar, they would have had Englishmen speaking in the House and writing in the newspapers about the tyranny of the Russian officials; they would have had presented to them highly-coloured pictures of miserable men confined in dungeons for months without trial—for months of wretched days and melancholy nights—and they would have heard a great deal about the blessings of English rule and the happiness of living in Great Britain. The history of the case was in many ways an instructive one. It was now many months since Mr. Fitzgerald was arrested. He was arrested, as he (Mr. M'Carthy) believed, without warrant, and hurried over to Ireland without being allowed to see anyone. He had been imprisoned and kept for many months without any attempt at a trial, although, on the 24th of April, the Irish Members were informed that he would be brought to trial as soon as possible. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) at that time was censured in the House for speaking of the inquiry as it was then being conducted, as a "hugger-mugger inquiry." It was difficult to say what the words "hugger-mugger" precisely meant; but if they were at all applicable to this case at the time they were used, they were certainly much more applicable now, when the "hugger-mugger" inquiry was becoming more "hugger-mugger" than ever. These unfortunate prisoners, no doubt, had a fair appreciation of the position in which they had been placed by Her Majesty's Government when they spoke of being "robbed" by the Government. They were robbed of their worldly goods by being kept in prison, and deprived of the means of earning their livelihood; but, more than that, they were robbed of their liberty, and of that sense of truth and justice which every citizen had at heart; while, seemingly, the only hope the Government had of obtaining a verdict was by some "Star Chamber" inquisition. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had been informed, months ago, that Mr. Fitzgerald was to be tried on charges of treason-felony and conspiracy to murder; but when it was pointed out that the two offences could not be included in the one indictment, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary promptly shifted his ground, and declared that the time for drawing up the indictment had not yet arrived. It seemed that the time for framing the indictment was never going to arrive. The prisoners were in a worse position than the historical Flying Dutchman—they were never going to be set free at all. On the 23rd of April, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary again informed the Irish Members that it was the desire of the Executive to close the case at the next hearing, and that there was no intention whatever to postpone the trial over the summer. Now they learnt that the trial was to be postponed over the summer. It would probably be postponed over the autumn, and then over the spring. Next summer might come and go and find these men still in prison. It was almost useless to make an appeal to the Government in these cases; so he would only ask them whether in this matter they thought their conduct just and reasonable—whether they did not think it passed into the region of the absurd?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and also to the reply delivered by the Solicitor General for Ireland. A lawyer was a trained disputant, and it would be a very bad case indeed in which the Solicitor General for Ireland could not bring some arguments to bear in support of the position he was defending. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not, however, be congratulated on the strength of his arguments that night. The hon. and learned Gentleman had assumed the whole case as he went along. Again and again he had repeated the statement that every delay which occurred was owing to the fault of the prisoners; but never once did he offer an atom of proof. He had said it was owing to the fault of the prisoners. What fault? If the hon. and learned Gentleman were present, he (Mr. Sullivan) should press for an answer to that question. The hon. and learned Gentleman ought to be present whilst this subject was under discussion; why was he not? Could he not be summoned—he was within the precincts of the House? What fault had he to allege against the prisoners as having caused the delay of the trial? The hon. and learned Gentleman had never stated that; but he had gone on triumphantly assuming to the end that it was the prisoners' own fault. That style of debate ought not to pass muster in the House of Commons, or elsewhere. Then, apologizing for the fact that these prisoners were not allowed freely to see their solicitor, he had said that they all had the one legal adviser, and that it was not desirable that they should all see him at one time. Why was it undesirable? The hon. and learned Gentleman had said these men were charged individually and collectively. It came to this, then—that the men were to be charged collectively, and might be hanged in a batch; but they were not to see their solicitor collectively, so as to prepare a common defence? Was that fair play? Was it fair that the Crown should be able to make a collective charge against them, whilst they were not allowed to make a collective defence? Would that be considered fair play by any other assembly of Englishmen or Scotchmen in the world? Another great point of the hon. and learned Gentleman was that the learned Judge, acting on his discretion, decided that because certain documents had been published in the locality it was not desirable that the case should there and then be brought to trial. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—"The Judge so decided." Did he suppose that amongst Irishmen in Ireland that statement would carry any weight whatever? They knew how Judges decided cases in Ireland—they knew that as soon as the Judges found how the wind blew from Dublin Castle they trimmed their sails according to the breeze. The Judges knew what was required of them by Dublin Castle, and acted accordingly. It amounted to nothing to say the Judge, acting on documents submitted to him by the Crown, took a certain view of the case. But a more startling doctrine still, propounded by the Solicitor General for Ireland, was this—that the prisoners were responsible for the acts of their indiscreet friends. "It was impossible," said the hon. and learned Gentleman, "to dissociate these individuals from the action of their indiscreet friends." He (Mr. Sullivan) denied that doctrine altogether. It was simply monstrous. There could be no safety for prisoners in Ireland if they were to be held accountable while safe behind prison bars for the action of their friends. That House was becoming accustomed to extraordinary and unconstitutional doctrines, and he thought there should be some revolt against them, not only from those Benches, but from all parts of the House. The doctrine the hon. and learned Gentleman had laid down that night was monstrous and unconstitutional, and a case which rested in any way on such a device as that was flimsy and rotten. It was said that when things were done in a hurry, doubtless, mistakes were made—it was said there had been no deliberation exercised in connection with these matters. He said that the defence offered by the Solicitor General for Ireland, instead of meeting this case, had made it worse. The case was one which called for speedy action, and he asked the Committee to consider it in order that justice might be done.

Mr. GREGORY said, this case had been laid before the Committee by the hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) as one calling for the interference of the Committee. If it were true that these men, having been arrested in Ireland, had been subject to constant remands without evidence; if their trial had been adjourned by the Judge without any proper justification; if they had been put on their trial without any evidence, or without any indictment being preferred against them—why, then, the case was monstrous. But, as an old practitioner, he ventured to doubt whether such things could happen; he doubted whether men could be remanded from time to time without any evidence being brought against them. In England, he knew they could not. Nor would men be put on trial in England without any indictment being prepared against them. He took the case as stated by the Solicitor General for Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman had very truly remarked that it took considerably more time to complete a case against a number of persons than would be required to complete the case against one individual, because the prosecution had, with regard to the commission of a certain act, to connect them with it and with each other—to bring them together, so to speak, and to ascertain their motives in connection with each other. All that, as a matter of fact, occupied a great deal of time, which everyone would know who was practically acquainted with business of the kind. Again, he presumed that evidence was from time to time brought before the magistrates previously to the remands of the prisoners; and he was satisfied that the magistrates would not have remanded them without evidence sufficient to justify that course, nor would they have committed them for trial without sufficient presumption. Then he came to the postponement of the trial. It was alleged by the Solicitor General for Ireland that when the trial was about to take place in Ireland, a large number of publications appeared, which would necessarily influence the jury, and which, in the opinion of the Judge, was calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury in respect of the trial of the prisoners. Now, that was a matter on which the Judge was strictly correct in exercising his discretion; if the Judge on that occasion thought that a fair trial could not be had, it was quite right that the trial should be postponed. With regard to the place of trial, he did not know why the case was not tried in Dublin. He freely admitted that the 10 days' notice was an objection as to the time; but yet it seemed to him that the trial might have taken place at Dublin. It appeared to him that, in all other respects, the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman was a sufficient answer on the Crown case—that time was necessary to get the case up, and that remands were necessary from time to time, and he was satisfied that evidence was produced to justify those remands. He also believed that evidence was produced before the magistrates to justify the committal of the prisoners for trial; and, further, that an indictment was preferred against them; and, finally, having regard to the circumstances of the time, bearing in mind the effect which the publications to which the Solicitor General for Ireland had referred were likely to have on the minds of the jury, he ventured to think that the Judge was fully justified in changing the venue.

Mr. HARRINGTON said, the Committee had to deal, not with the presumptions of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), but with the facts of the case, and those facts had been stated by hon. Members on those Benches, and were known to everyone in the House. They by no means accorded with the extraordinary and fanciful presumption on which the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down took up his position. The hon. Gentleman assumed, of course, that everything had been done in a perfectly regular manner. Hon. Members in that House invariably did presume that everything was regularly done in such matters in Ireland, and it was only the force of circumstances that in time compelled them to admit that things did not go on quite so happily there as they had been led to believe. It was not at all strange that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, who represented at that moment the Irish Government in that House, had not made use of any of those extraordinary presumptions which the hon. Member for East Sussex had indulged in. He had referred, in the earlier part of the discussion, to a case within his own cognizance in Ireland in which there were no less than nine remands, extending over a period of nine weeks, and in which the evidence adduced at the final remand was precisely the same as that brought forward on the first day. The Solicitor General for Ireland knew the case he was referring to, and he could give him the names of the prisoners. He challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to deny the statement he had made—that the evidence on the ninth day was precisely the same as that brought forward on the first. The Crown had recourse to those remands in order to tide the trial over the period of the Assizes; to keep the prisoners in their cells for months, in order, if possible, to pry into their thoughts, and to hold the thumbscrew over them with the object of making them give evidence against their companions. One of those prisoners was offered a free pardon if he consented to give evidence against his companions. He asked the Members of that House to look at the actual facts, and to contemplate the position of the unfortunate man in gaol without friends, as that unfortunate policeman was; let them consider what a risk was run in asking him to give evidence to save his life. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not blot out from the minds of the people of Ireland the belief that fearful misdeeds were worked by a system like this, and no amount of persuasion on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman could get rid of the fact that everything of this kind was possible under the system of legal chicanery which was bringing the English Government in Ireland into disrepute. He should be sorry to accuse the hon. and learned Gentleman of making a statement which was calculated to injure men in the position of these unfortunate prisoners, or of intending to do them an injury; but, undoubtedly, one portion of his speech was as unfair and ill borne out by facts as if he had the deliberate intention of injuring the prisoners. He alluded to the statement that the cause of the delay which had taken place in regard to the trial of the prisoners was due to the conduct of the prisoners themselves. The statement was that the prisoners in gaol were connected with the circulation of the appeals which were made in their behalf for a fair trial; and with reference to that he challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to produce one tittle of evidence in support of his statement. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the last debate on this subject, admitted that there was no opportunity of establishing any connection between the prisoners in gaol and the documents circulated throughout the country; and everyone who knew anything of the gaol practice in Ireland, and the rigid gaol supervision exercised towards prisoners, would know perfectly well that the statement about their being able to publish documents outside was absolutely absurd. Again, the Solicitor General for Ireland had not at all addressed himself to the case to which he (Mr. Harrington) had drawn his attention—that was to say, to the case of the Galway prisoners who were remanded nine times. He mentioned the case, because in it the Crown had, in his opinion, acted in a manner precisely similar to that in which they had acted towards the men now in prison in Sligo. In the Galway case, it was then two years since the unfortunate men were taken away from their homes; and, in spite of all the means at their disposal under the Prevention of Crime Act for packing juries and for bringing them to speedy trial, the Crown still kept them in prison without trial. Irish Members knew what the Crown had done in the case of the Galway prisoners, and they felt that, were it not for the advocacy of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), the Crown would act towards the Tubbercurry prisoners in the same manner—that was to say, keep them in gaol for two years without trial, working on their fears, and tempting them with bribes, in the hope of inducing them to give information which would save their own lives, by taking the lives of others perfectly innocent. He thought that the Solicitor General for Ireland would find it necessary to supplement by another statement his observations made with the endeavour of connecting these unfortunate men with the documents circulated in their behalf. There had been no evidence brought forward at any time that these men shut up in prison had any opportunity of communicating with persons outside. Besides, he contended that the document, although, perhaps, strongly worded, was perfectly fair, and a perfectly lawful document, and that, although it might have created some sympathy amongst the people, it could not at the trial have had the slightest effect on the jury, because the Crown took care that they should pack into the jury boxes in Ireland not men standing impartially between Crown and prisoner—men who were sworn to look impartially at the facts of the case—but men from whom they were secure of a verdict.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the sympathies of hon. Members below the Gangway throughout the discussion was all on one side. There did not seem to be any sympathy for the unfortunate persons who had been foully murdered during the Reign of Terror in Ireland, or for their families. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) had said a good deal about presumptions. He (Colonel King-Harman) was inclined to think that it was a fair presumption that these men were the perpetrators of some of the deeds which had disgraced Ireland, and that they should be kept in gaol as long as there was a fair opportunity of getting evidence against them. And then the hon. Gentleman spoke of the merciless grasp of the law. He would like to know what mercy had been shown to the unfortunate men whose lives had been taken? Why did the assassins now plead for mercy; or why did the advocates of assassins plead for mercy in their behalf?

MR. HARRINGTON rose to Order. He asked whether the hon. and gallant Member was entitled to charge Members of that House with being the advocates of assassins and murderers in Ireland?

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not understand the hon. and gallant Gentleman to apply the term to hon. Members.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had not done so. If any charge of making false accusations could be brought against any Member of that House, it would not be brought against him, but against hon. Members below the Gangway, who charged the Government with keeping these men in gaol in order to get information from them which would enable them to bring innocent men to the gallows. It was they who charged the Government with being the defenders of assassins. [Laughter.] They might think this a matter for laughter; but they knew there had been a Reign of Terror in Ireland for the last four years, and they knew that it was only by the determination of the Government in Ireland, and by the determination of the Judges and jurors, that crime had been put down there, and that honest men had now a little chance of living in security. When murder was going on throughout the length and breadth of the land, hon. Members below the Gangway took care not to denounce it; and now, whenever there was a reasonable case against the murderers, they vilified the Government for trying to bring them to justice. If these men had not committed the crimes imputed to them, they would have the security of being tried by a jury of their countrymen; and it was perfectly ridiculous to tell the House about jury-packing under the present law. If the men were guilty, they would be convicted; and if they were not, they would be acquitted. And hon. Members had no more right to step between them and the jury, and try to prejudice the House in their favour, than he should have were he to declare that they were guilty, and try to prejudice the House against them. But there was this to be said. He knew the neighbourhood where the crime was committed, and he had lived in the county in spite of combination and intimidation, and had refused to be driven out of it. There was a foul conspiracy there to commit outrage, and murder was committed there. If hon. Gentlemen chose to defend men accused of murder, the condition of their minds must be such as he did not envy, and their conduct was but a simple waste of the time of the House, for they had not adduced a single fact that was not already known. And as to the persons for trial, he did not think they would be benefited by it.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had gone through a very chivalrous performance; he was for some time Member of Parliament for the county in which these unfortunate men resided, and he said that he lived in the county, and was obliged to leave it. That might be true in a certain sense; but in a political sense he had been driven out of it when he became recreant to the principles of his life, and he (Mr. Sexton) could assure him that the sentiments of the people in Sligo towards him were such that the Orders of Debate would not allow him to discuss them. The hon. and gallant Member, either by the profession of arms, or from some other source, was entitled to be called "gallant" in that House; and it was a great thing for him to stand up there, and with a voice which, although loud, was but the exponent of a puny intellect, to declaim against an appeal on behalf of these unfortunate men for the right to which they were entitled. He had cast insinuations on hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and when those insinuations were found out he had retired behind those insinuations; and when called to Order, refused to accept the obvious meaning of his own language—the only meaning of which that language was susceptible—and withdrew.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I never withdrew a single expression.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken of murder, and the advocates of murder. He (Mr. Sexton) knew as much of Ireland as the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and he preserved quite as vivid a recollection of the scenes which had taken place there during the last four years. He knew that Irish Members did denounce murder, and not murder alone, but they denounced the smaller forms of outrage and illegality; and he knew, too, that men who denounced murder and outrage were thrown into prison; and, further, he knew that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department announced, in reply to a Question, that Mr. Davitt had been thrown into a cell at Portland, the House shook with the cheers of hon. Gentlemen.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I was not a Member of the House at the time.

MR. SEXTON said, he supposed the hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept the cheers of the Tory Party on that occasion. There was, probably, no one more glad than he was to hear of the arrest of Michael Davitt. It required a strong conscience to denounce illegality when the landlords did nothing to help their starving tenants, and when the Government rewarded those who did denounce it with a convict cell. Would the hon. and gallant Gentleman say that the landlords helped the people?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I say that they helped the people enormously.

MR. SEXTON: I say that when the peasants were shivering in the cold, the hon. and gallant Gentleman cut off the supply of turf.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I rise to make a personal explanation. There is not the slightest foundation for that statement.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman will have an opportunity of replying.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman came down that evening and raised his voice against the undeniable right of these men to be brought before a jury even of Orangemen in Sligo. Did they say a single word in palliation of murder or outrage? What was their contention? Simply, that these men who were in prison were respectable men, and had been so throughout their lives; that they were honourable men, and that they should have the same right of having their case brought before a jury which was given to the commonest foot-pad, and which would be granted to those criminals, nurtured in Dublin Castle, whose atrocities were now the horror of the civilized world. They asked nothing but what was right; and he trusted that no Member of that House would be led away by the hon. and gallant Member, who had made an attempt, which he would not characterize in the language it deserved, to interpose between these unfortunate men and the House of Commons in their appeal for justice.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he wished to reply to one portion of the attack made upon himself by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and from that point he would ask the Committee to judge of the rest of the hon. Member's statements. The statement was that in the winter of 1880-1, when fuel was scarce, he took the opportunity of cutting off the supply of turf from his tenants. Upon his honour—as he stood before God—during all that winter he strained every nerve to supply his tenants with fuel; he never charged them a single 6d.; he put down every farthing he could afford to raise fuel for them. He had had timber cut down, and the tenants were allowed to take away every root and branch and everything else they could take, and there was hardly a man on the whole property who suffered from a want of fuel. And he did not think there was one of them who at the end of the winter had not thanked him for what he had done. He had done his best, and the charge brought against him by the hon. Member was entirely unfounded.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman's contradiction turned on a question of time; but there was a period when the turbary was taken away.

MR. SEXTON wished to add a word or two in reference to a certain matter that was notorious in Roscommon and all over Ireland—namely, the correspondence which was published in The Freeman's Journal, in which it was shown that those who previously owned this property never charged the tenants for turbary; but the hon. and gallant Member avenged himself for the Land Act by putting a charge on the turbary. This was exposed in The Freeman's Journal by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), who had never made an accusation against any man, whether an official or not, without proving it.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, this statement was made in The Freeman's Journal, but he had proved it to be absolutely false, and he was willing to appeal from the hon. Members to his own tenants as to what he had done.

MR. HARRINGTON said, there was a matter which had not been touched upon by any of the previous speakers, and that was the item for the expenses of Crown Solicitors in connection with crimes in Ireland. He wished to point out to the Committee that one of the greatest injustices inflicted on men in Ireland who were waiting for trial was this changing of the venue, which threw upon them the onus of bringing their witnesses down and keeping them for many days during the Assizes at enormous cost. At the Winter Assizes many of the prisoners were removed from the different counties within the Circuit to the one town appointed for the Province. He would take the case of the prisoners awaiting their trial in Kerry. When their cases came on they were removed to Cork, where the Winter Assizes were generally held, and the rule at the Assizes as to prisoners was the same as with regard to Special Commissions and generally with regard to cases in which the venue had been changed. There was a case in the past year in which a number of prisoners who had been arrested in Mayo were taken for trial in Cork. That was practically disabling those unfortunate men, whatever might be the charge against them, or whatever might be the evidence by which the Crown was able to sustain the charge, from meeting the charge. It reduced them to this position—that to get anything like a fair trial they would have to incur enormous expense, which men of their position were not able to bear. That inflicted upon them great hardships, and even the risk of losing their liberty, because they were unable to bear these expenses. He believed that it was provided by Statute that when prisoners had been removed by a change of venue it should be competent to the Crown to pay the expenses of witnesses for the prisoners. That was all very well, but when did the Crown pay these expenses? Not before the witnesses left home to attend the trial; not when they reached the Assize town where the trial was to be held, but after the trial was over. Then the Crown would pay the expenses of any witnesses whom the Crown Solicitor had considered necessary for the defence of the prisoner, but that was not a practice in accordance with justice. It did not meet the justice of the case to pay the expenses of a prisoner's witnesses after the issue had been tried, and after the onus had first been thrown upon the prisoner of maintaining those witnesses, whether few or many, for many weeks in some cases, in the Assize town. Hardship of the gravest nature was inflicted in that way; and he knew of cases in which prisoners had been absolutely unable to bring up the witnesses necessary for their defence. Numerous cases of this kind had occurred—cases in which prisoners had witnesses who would have been able to prove an alibi, and completely rebut the evidence of the Crown. The Crown officials, of course, looked after their own witnesses, brought them up at the public expense, provided their travelling expenses, and everything else; but what was the case with regard to the witnesses whom the unfortunate prisoner might find necessary? They might come up if they desired to come; there was no compelling them to do so; and, taken as they were from a humble rank in life, and having such slender means as they generally had, it was impossible for the prisoner to have adequate justice done him by having the necessary witnesses present, except by the aid of some influential friends such as, unfortunately, rarely assisted them. What he contended was that the Crown, where it undertook to pay the expenses of a prisoner's witnesses, should do precisely what it did in the case of the witnesses for the Crown. The Solicitor for the Crown should obtain from the prisoner's solicitor a list of the witnesses whom he considered necessary for the defence of the prisoner, and that the expenses of those witnesses, or, at least, a reasonable portion of the expenses, should be given to them before they were required to leave their homes to go long distances and remain for long periods at the Assize town. Suppose a prisoner required a dozen witnesses; he must have them up at the opening of the Assizes. He had known cases in which the Assizes lasted three weeks. In Cork they had more than once extended over three weeks. A prisoner must assume that his trial would come on upon the opening day; and he must, therefore, have his witnesses up on that day. They must now come up at his expense, if they were not sufficiently devoted to him and to the interests of justice to come up at their own expense. The onus of bringing them up was thrown upon the prisoner; the Assizes might last three weeks, and he might have to keep them there all that time at his own expense, or get his solicitor to maintain them on his behalf. That provision for paying the expenses of a prisoner's witnesses was absolutely useless and worthless; because, owing to the money not being paid until after the trial, the witnesses for the defence could not be brought up at the time when they were necessary. He was not speaking of abstract matters at all, but of cases within his own knowledge. He knew that cases had occurred in Sligo County, in which prisoners had been taken from Galway to Sligo, and kept waiting some weeks for their trial, and their witnesses were knocking about the streets begging, in the endeavour to maintain themselves until the trial at which they were to give evidence should come on. And he had known of cases in which witnesses had been unable, through this cause, to remain in the Assize town long enough to give their evidence in defence of unfortunate prisoners. If the Crown wished to meet the justice of the case they must make provision for giving to the witnesses for a prisoner the same facilities for travelling and maintenance as they gave to Crown witnesses. They took great care of the witnesses for the Crown, giving them travelling expenses and maintaining them in the Assize town; but they told the prisoner that if he was rich enough to bring up his witnesses for his defence and keep them as long as they were wanted, then, when the case was over and he had been consigned to a cell or had regained his freedom, the Crown would consider whether they would pay for those witnesses. If such a case occurred in the county in which the prisoner was arrested, the grievance would not be so great, because the witnesses would not have to travel very long distances, and it would be easier to maintain them; but it was unfair, unjust, and contrary to every principle of equity that the onus should be thrown upon a prisoner of bringing witnesses perhaps 200 miles away from home, and of maintaining them for weeks in the town to give evidence for him, when he should have been tried in the county in which he was arrested. He hoped they would have some statement from the Solicitor General for Ireland upon this point. The hon. and learned Gentleman's connection with these cases had not been a very long one yet; but he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that he could quote many cases in Ireland in which witnesses had returned home from the Assize town before a trial had come on, and left the prisoner to his fate, simply because they were unable to maintain themselves, and the prisoner, owing to his position in life and having no friends to assist him, could not maintain them.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the point to which the hon. Member had called attention was one which might produce hardship; but the hon. Member surely did not contend that in every case under the Prevention of Crime Act the expenses of witnesses for a prisoner had not been paid until after the trial was over. In his own knowledge that was not the case; and the course adopted by the Crown in regard to prisoners' witnesses was the same as with regard to Crown witnesses.

MR. HARRINGTON said, he had known of several cases in which applications for the expenses of prisoners' witnesses before a trial had been refused. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the course adopted was the same in regard to Crown and prisoners' witnesses. Undoubtedly the expenses were paid in the end; but Crown witnesses were taken in hand at once by a policeman who paid their railway fares, took them to lodgings, and paid all that was necessary until they were paid by the Crown on the close of the trial. But the opposite to this was the practice with regard to the witnesses for the defence. No care was taken of them unless the prisoner had sufficient means to maintain them.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) replied that he had no doubt that if, in such a case as the hon. Member had mentioned, application was made to the Attorney General for Ireland or the Solicitor General for Ireland, he would take care that the expenses were provided.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had expected that the hon. and learned Gentleman would intimate that the Government would reconsider their position in regard to this matter; but he had been disappointed, for the hon. and learned Gentleman had confined himself to observations on the minor point raised by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington). The hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman) sympathized very warmly with the persons who had been murdered in Ireland in recent years; but why the hon. and gallant Member reserved all his sympathy for those persons he did not know. He and his hon. Friends sympathized with men who were still suffering from injustice and oppression. The men whom the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County had denounced were men who, in the theory of the law, were at that moment innocent men, because they had not yet been proved guilty. They believed those men could not be proved guilty, because they were innocent. The speech of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) was to an Irish Member perfectly disheartening. That hon. Member presumed that everybody employed under the Government was acting honestly, conscientiously, and consistently; that whatever the Crown might do was done on good grounds; that there was ample evidence to justify constant remands of these men, and that there was good ground for supposing that a conviction was likely to follow. That sort of view was calculated to drive Irish Members to despair. English Members would always assume that whatever was done by the Crown in Ireland was beyond challenge. They assumed that French was an immaculate person, although Irish Members had denounced him until it was impossible at last for the Government to pretend that they had any faith in him. They had denounced Cornwall in the same way, and now he was abandoned. They had denounced Bolton, and now Bolton had been dealt with in the same way. Now, when they complained of the treatment by the Crown of these unfortunate prisoners, there was the same presumption, always readily springing up in the mind of English Members, that their complaints were utterly groundless, and that the Crown was beyond rebuke in regard to its action in Ireland. They must, therefore, go on, as they had in the past, and endeavour by constant iteration to drive into the minds of English Members, who were not particularly quick to comprehend anything from Ireland, that there was a grievous cause of complaint; and however long it might be, and however hard it might be, they would not shrink from doing their duty in that House. The Committee was about to proceed to the discussion of a Scotch measure. That might be of great importance to Scotchmen; but they must excuse Irish Members if, in the discharge of what they conceived to be their duty, they stood some time longer in the way of the Scotch Bill being brought before the House. The Solicitor General for Ireland had not, in his opinion, given a satisfactory declaration, or manifested that readiness to be considerate in his dealings with these prisoners, which a fair-minded and considerate man ought to have manifested. Englishmen ought to understand that the Irish Members were fighting now the same fight that was fought by Hampden and his friends in England. They were contending now for those principles which the learned Selden did so much to engraft upon the recognized law of this country, and they were maintaining for these 11 unfortunate men at Sligo that right which was established beyond question in this country under an Act of Geo. III., which provided that, after a man had been committed, he should have an absolute right to be tried at the next ensuing Term, or Session, or Assize. That right was withheld from these men; but it was a right which was admitted and recognized in this country, and they claimed for these Irishmen who were now committed that same right which was unquestionably the birthright of Englishmen. They had not yet got that, and it was necessary to keep on hammering away as best they could by the instrumentality of these Estimates, first of all upon Parliament, and then indirectly on the public mind of England. However long it might take them, they must pursue that course, and as a first step he begged to move the reduction of this Vote by the first item—namely, the pay of the Attorney General for Ireland and his allowances, and the pay and allowances of the Solicitor General for Ireland, £4,353.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. DEASY said, he was glad his hon. Friend had moved to reduce the Vote by the salaries of the Attorney General and Solicitor General for Ireland, because he wished to make some remarks with regard to their conduct in forcing the trial of prisoners from different parts of the South of Ireland on the jurors of the City of Cork. Last March he had brought under the notice of the House the manner in which the County and City of Cork were treated under the Prevention of Crime Act; and he was sorry to have to say, with regard to the undertaking which he then understood the Solicitor General for Ireland to give—namely, that no further jury-packing should take place—that that practice still prevailed as much as ever. It had again been put in force in the City of Cork, and jurors who had served in the last three or four Assizes under the Prevention of Crime Act had again been summoned to attend the present Assizes. He need not point out to those who knew Ireland the serious inconvenience and loss to which these men were subjected by being drawn from their business day after day, though they were scarcely ever permitted to act on a jury. Under the old system the penalty for non-attendance was only £2; but under the Prevention of Crime Act it was £20, and although these men were invariably told to stand aside by the Sheriff, yet they were not released from duty, and if they failed even on one occasion to answer to their names the Judge inflicted the full penalty of £20. He protested against that practice, and against the way in which prisoners who had been brought to Cork for trial under the Prevention of Crime Act were treated. It was impossible for them to get a fair trial under the system now pursued. He did not say that juries empannelled in these cases went into the box with a determination to bring in verdicts of "guilty;" but they were so prejudiced by passion that they could not take an impartial view of any case of an agrarian character. In a few days these jurors would again be called upon to try prisoners; and he appealed to the Solicitor General for Ireland to do all in his power to prevent these juries from being packed, and to prevent Roman Catholic jurors in Cork from being insulted when called upon to act as jurymen. There was another item in this Vote to which he wished to call attention, and that was the item for the expenses in connection with actions taken against Resident Magistrates, Divisional and other Justices, and the Constabulary, for acts done in the execution of their duty. How much of this, he wished to know, had been spent in conducting the case of Constable Griffin at Cork Assizes, for the balance of 2s. 7½d. blood tax? The circumstances were as follows:—A gentleman, named Hallissey, in Cork, had had to leave the country some time ago, because he was "Boycotted;" but before he left a large force of police were quartered in the district where he lived, and the cost of these policemen levied on that district. The farmers refused to pay it, and one of them living near Mallow had a mule taken for the debt. This mule was put up for auction by Constable Griffin and bought by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) for 2½d. This left a balance due of 2s. 7½d., which Constable Griffin sought to recover before the Judge of Assize, but failed, the jury having given a verdict for the defendant. He (Mr. Deasy) should like to know how much of the expenses under this head had been devoted to paying counsel in the case? It would be interesting to know how much this 2s. 7½d. had cost the Government. There was another matter under Sub-head D to which he wished to draw attention. Some months ago, a case was brought before the Rivers-town, near Cork, Petty Session, in which an Emergency man was charged with having fired at a farmer with intent to kill him. The Crown Prosecutor refused to prosecute the Emergency man; and the result was that the magistrates, who, from their Orange leanings, were on the side of the landlord, did not send the case for trial. He was in favour of reducing the Vote on account of the case he had cited; and when the Division had been taken upon the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) he (Mr. Deasy) should consider the propriety of asking the Committee to reduce it by £300, which he believed was the salary of the Crown Prosecutor in that part of the county of Cork in which the case to which he had referred occurred. As to the case which the Committee had been considering all that evening, he did not wish to say much; but he had personal knowledge of the fact that on the arrest of Mr. Fitzgerald that gentleman's solicitor's agent was not permitted to see him in Sligo Gaol. His hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien)

asked a Question on the subject in the House, and the answer given by the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) was that the police made all possible inquiries as to whether the agent was authorized by the prisoner's solicitor to interview him in Sligo Gaol; and they were unable in the course of 24 hours to ascertain whether the man was really a solicitor's clerk or not. He (Mr. Deasy) met the clerk on his way from Sligo, and he gave a different account altogether of what took place. The clerk stated that the policemen knew him well; but told him that they were instructed by the authorities not to permit anyone, even the solicitor himself, to see Mr. Fitzgerald. He (Mr. Deasy) hoped the discussion which had taken place would have the effect of bringing about either the release of the prisoners or their speedy trial. There would be no difficulty at all in trying the prisoners in the City of Cork; and hitherto the Government had not objected to bringing prisoners from all parts of Ireland to Cork to be tried. The case of the Tubbercurry prisoners was an exceptional one; and there was not one on the Irish Benches who would object to have the prisoners tried even by an Orange jury in that city, if the alternative was indefinite imprisonment without trial; but he supposed the Government would keep the men in confinement a little longer, in the hope that they might get such evidence against them as would lead a jury to convict them, it being quite clear that no such evidence was then in the possession of the Crown. If the men were not brought to trial immediately, surely it was not unreasonable to ask that they should be liberated on bail. If Mr. Fitzgerald were liberated on bail, or gave his word that he would not leave the country, he would be as sure to appear when called upon as he would now that he was shut up in Sligo Gaol. Although he (Mr. Deasy) had no personal knowledge of the other prisoners, he believed the same could be said of them. Why was it, therefore, that, perhaps in a week or so, only two out of 11 might be released? It had been said, in palliation of the action of the Government in the case, that three of the prisoners were already on bail in the nominal sum of £25 each. He did not regard the admission of the three men to bail as any great concession on the part of the Government. The people of Ireland could not be expected to have confidence in the administration of the law if these unfortunate men were kept, month after month, and perhaps year after year, in prison, so that the Government might be able to trump up a case against them. He hoped that before the debate closed, and he did not propose that it should close for some time, the Committee would receive some more satisfactory assurance from the Government than they had done up to the present. He believed that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could, even at the eleventh hour, give them the assurance that the Tubbercurry prisoners would be treated justly and fairly much would be done to bring about the early Prorogation of the Session. It could not be expected that the Irish Members would go back to Ireland without being able to show that they had done everything in their power to see that justice was meted out to the men who had been so long and unjustly confined within the walls of Sligo Gaol.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 29; Noes 126: Majority 97.—(Div. List, No. 192.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SMALL said, he thought all Members were agreed that some explanation ought to be afforded of the item of £5,650, which represented the office expenses of the Crown Solicitors. To admit of an explanation being afforded by the Solicitor General for Ireland he moved to reduce the Vote by £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL NOLAN said, that perhaps he might trespass upon the time of the Committee before the Solicitor General for Ireland replied to his hon. Friend, as he wished to call attention to a point he had on previous occasions brought before the House. He noticed that there was a great deal of money put down for Law Officers; but only a small sum was charged for jurors. Now, he had always contended that jurors should be paid as well as counsel. Counsel were paid large sums of money; and why should the jurors who had to assist in trials be absolutely out of pocket in consequence of their attendance in Court? In his county jurors were summoned in large numbers to attend the Court in the town of Galway. Many of them had to travel so far as 16 statute miles, and they had to pay their expenses the whole way. He did not propose exactly that the jurors should be paid money in pocket; but he thought that at least the Crown should pay them their travelling expenses, and so much to cover their hotel bills. Jurors were fully entitled to the payment he suggested, because they had to give up their time, which at this time of the year—harvest time—especially was very valuable; and if farmers gave up their time they had done a great deal for the country. As he had said, the jurors in Ireland were summoned in large numbers, and a great many of them were objected to. They had, however, to remain in Court. Under such circumstances, it would be far better not to bring them in, because they would then be saved considerable trouble and expense. If the Crown were obliged to pay jurors their travelling expenses and so much a day, he was convinced that too many would not be summoned. It was really high time that the Executive Government in Ireland should pay some attention to this matter. He had no doubt it would be said that jurors were not paid in England, and why should they be paid in Ireland? He was not sure they should not be paid in England; but, anyhow, the case of Ireland was very different. In England, jurors were, as a rule, men in good positions; and, besides, the Circuits were very conveniently arranged. Yorkshire, for instance, was divided into three Ridings, and the railway facilities were very great. In Ireland, however, the jurors were required to travel very long distances, and very frequently they had to do so by road. He submitted to the Irish Law Officers, and also to the Prime Minister, whom he was glad to see in his place, that some arrangement should at least be made by which Irish jurors could be paid their travelling expenses and hotel bills, because it was not defended for a minute that jurors should have to pay hard cash out of pocket for their attendance in Court. There was another reason why jurors in Ireland ought to be paid. Unfortunately, the weight of the Irish jury system fell, in almost all cases, on the farming class. Somehow or other the landlords escaped the duty of serving on juries; and they either lived out of Ireland, or they had certain occupations which exempted them from serving; and most of the professional men were exempted also. The consequence was that a great deal too much jury-work was thrown on the farmers, upon whom, as long as they were obliged to pay their own expenses, the duty was a very heavy tax. He hoped the Law Officers would take this great practical grievance into their serious consideration.

SIR JOHN HAY rose (at 20 minutes to 12 o'clock) to move to report Progress. He pointed out that at the commencement of the Sitting an arrangement was made that at half-past 11 Progress should be reported, in order that the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill should be taken into consideration. He understood that the discussion upon this Vote was likely to last some considerable time longer; and if that were so, it would be extremely inconvenient to Scotch, and other Members, that they should be kept in attendance until the small hours of the morning, in order to consider the merits of such an important measure as that he had mentioned. He was sorry to interfere with the Business of the Committee; but, under the circumstances, he felt bound to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir John Hay.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman knew very well that such engagements as to which he had alluded were made in perfect good faith, but that some latitude must be allowed. The Government would not ask very much latitude; but it must be borne in mind that they had not yet taken the Vote. Under the circumstances, and having disposed, as the Committee had done, of several important Amendments to the Vote, he hoped that more time would be allowed to-night in which it might be possible to take the Vote. The Government would not trespass upon the patience of hon. Members too much.

SIR JOHN HAY asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed,

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that in reply to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Small), he had simply to say that the Crown Solicitors undertook certain duties, and they were paid fixed salaries. The question which was raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for County Galway (Colonel Nolan) was a very large one. It was, indeed, a question of general policy, and therefore did not lie within the province of any Law Officers; it could not be dealt with by any administrative official.

MR. SMALL said, the item he referred to was the allowance for office expenses of Crown Solicitors. He wished to know what those expenses were?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the item represented the salaries of the clerks which Crown Solicitors were obliged to keep, in order that they could discharge their duties properly.

MR. HARRINGTON said, there was one other case to which he wished to direct the attention of the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) and the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). From time to time he had drawn attention to the case—namely, that of the failure of justice in the prosecution instituted by the Government against Colonel Digby, a landlord in the county of Westmeath. The case curiously illustrated the manner in which the law operated with regard to the different classes in Ireland. If a poor person had been involved, no difficulty would have been experienced; but it was simply because the man concerned was a landlord and a Justice of the Peace that the Crown had found themselves wholly unable to bring him to justice. As early as the commencement of the Session his attention was drawn to a case where this gentleman made a deliberate attempt to obtain arrears by fraud—by lodging an affidavit, and getting a certain number of tenants to join him in it, alleging, falsely, that rent was due to him. Some time after that, attention was called to another case by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy); and Colonel Digby then saw the danger of the course he was entering upon, and wrote to the Land Commissioners, after they had certified him that the Court was prepared to fix the arrears, to say that he had made a mistake in the case. This was when attention was drawn to the case of John Burke, the Surveyor General in Dublin. It was strange that the Solicitor to the Land Commissioners acceded to the application of Colonel Digby to have the case withdrawn. The Commissioners had before them the affidavits sworn by the landlord and by the tenants; and though he had made his formal application, the Land Commissioners, having before them the clearest evidence of an attempt to commit a fraud, allowed the withdrawal of the application, and never took the slightest step to bring the offender to justice for an attempt at fraud. This was in itself a very extraordinary case, and it showed how the whole system of officials and official life in Ireland worked for the benefit of one class of people as against the benefit of another class, and how, with perfect impunity, a certain class of men occupying high social positions in Ireland did what they liked to trample on the laws, and to commit injustice and attempt embezzlement. When the facts were brought under his notice, as the Representative of the county, he had drawn the attention of the Land Commissioners to them. He had pointed out the early period at which the affidavit had been made by the landlord and the tenants, and had laid before the Land Commissioners two depositions sworn to by tenants, in which they stated that Colonel Digby had entered into a treaty with them to endeavour to defraud the Court; that he had told them they were fools, and that he could get money for them from the Court. The tenants also, in these depositions, stated that, in order to satisfy the very pointed demands of this gentleman for his rent, they had borrowed the money to pay him; and that, therefore, they themselves believed, the money having been borrowed, that they had acted in bona fides. How about the position of the landlord? Here was a Grand Juror of Westmeath swearing falsely that arrears of rent were due, and getting these men also to swear an affidavit in the matter. The attention of the Land Commissioners had been specifically drawn to the case. At first they decided it as an application to discharge the case from Court, and they made no effort to bring the offender to justice. Several months afterwards, when he brought it again under the attention of the Commissioners, drawing their attention to that section of the Act which invested them with the power, where an attempt had been made to commit a fraud on the Court, to proceed against the person so attempting to commit a fraud. Not alone did the Act empower the Commissioners to take action where a person had committed a fraud, but where he had attempted to do so. The Commissioners did not move themselves, and when he brought the facts clearly before their notice through a solicitor in Dublin, in whose charge he gave the case, the Commissioners refused to move one step in the matter. It would be a long time before the impression was removed from the minds of the people of Ireland that these Commissioners, to whom they had given the power of settling rents in Ireland, if they made themselves the friends of the landlords by refusing to punish them for fraud, would equally make themselves the friends of the landlords when appeals were lodged against decisions in favour of tenants. He (Mr. Harrington) had felt it necessary, when the Land Commission refused to take up the case, to send all the documents to the Attorney General for Ireland. It was complained in another case that evidence had not been given; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not raise such a plea in this matter, because all the evidence, including depositions sworn before the magistrates, and the rent receipts, clearly establishing the fraud, had been submitted to him. Well, after some time, the Attorney General for Ireland did move in the business, and sent down the Crown Solicitor for Westmeath to examine into the circumstances of the case, with the result that a prosecution was instituted against Colonel Digby for attempting fraudulently to obtain arrears from the Land Commissioners in respect of two tenants. What happened? Why, at the Petty Sessions where the case was tried, the Resident Magistrate attended, and with him two local Justices, one of whom put in an appearance for the first time for two years. Mark this fact. For a period of two years this dispenser of justice, this officer of the law in Ireland, had not put in an appearance in that local Petty Sessions Court; but he came down on this occasion, when one of his friends was in a little trouble, to shield him from that justice which he was supposed to be there to administer. The second of the two local magistrates, he was informed, had not, until the occasion in question, attended at the Petty Sessions for a period of nine months. He was a very irregular attendant at the Court—he very rarely turned up. At the conclusion of the hearing of the case, the trial having proceeded upon only one of the attempts at fraud, one of the tenants was examined, and the rent receipts were produced in Court; and because Colonel Digby had written this letter to the Land Court, withdrawing his application, or endeavouring to save himself from the consequences of his action, the two local Justices founded their decision upon that fact, and refused to return him for trial at the Assizes, though the Resident Magistrate expressed an opinion the other way, and was strongly in favour of committing the man for trial. Justice, therefore, was not done in the case. He (Mr. Harrington) believed it was competent for the Resident Magistrate to have committed Colonel Digby for trial, in spite of the local magistrates; and, if that were so, it was surprising that he had not done it. He did not know whether he was right in his statement of the law; but he believed it was competent for the Resident Magistrate, even where the local magistrates did not concur, to have received the informations and have returned the case for trial at the Assizes. He (Mr. Harrington) had put a Question to the Government in the House on this case. He had asked whether they intended to prosecute, and a further step had been taken. The Grand Jury of Westmeath had been asked to present a bill; but they had decided in favour of Colonel Digby, and had saved him from the consequences of the heinous crime of endeavouring to embezzle a sum from the Treasury. The Grand Jury threw out the bill. It was competent for the Crown to move to change the venue from the County of Westmeath; but they had done nothing at all of the kind. They had not changed the venue, and up to the present time they had taken no step whatever to endeavour to bring this gentleman to justice. A stronger case had since come to light, and stronger facts had been gathered. Immediately after the bill had been thrown out by the Grand Jury, he (Mr. Harrington) had received information directing his attention to a case where not alone was an effort made by this gentleman to abstract money from the Land Court, but where he succeeded in getting it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had admitted the facts so far as this—that, in the instance pointed out, application was made for arrears of rent which were alleged to be due, and that at the time the application was made this man had actually disposed of his interest in the holding—that when he had made the application, he had sold the holding to a tenant who had promised to pay him the amount of the rent due. Now, this was a case where there could be no question at all as to intention. The question raised before, in the other case, was as to the intent to defraud. Here, however, where the man received the money and pocketed it, there could be no question of the intention. He (Mr. Harrington) contended that a most unfortunate impression would be produced in the minds of the people of Ireland if the Government showed they were unable to bring men to justice when they attempted a fraud and admitted—as they seemed inclined to do in this case—that they were wholly unable to bring to justice men of high social position who attempted to swindle the Government. Would the Crown attempt to bring this man to justice—would they, as they had done in the case of so many agrarian crimes in Ireland, change the venue and bring the man to trial outside his own county, where he would not be on the Grand Jury and have brother jurors to protect him?

Mr. TREVELYAN: This is a case which, so far as it relates to Members of the Government and officers whose salaries are being considered, can be dealt with in one sentence. The charge is against Justices of the Peace, who are unpaid, and against members of the Grand Jury, who are unpaid likewise. The main charge is, that this gentleman attempted to take money corruptly from the Exchequer—attempted first, and then obtained it afterwards. What was the action of the Government? Why, in the first instance, they applied for information from the Bench of Magistrates. The magistrates refused to give it, and there, in the ordinary course of events, the case would have stopped. But the Government, thinking the case important, went further. They sent the case up to the Grand Jury without obtaining information from the magistrates, and the Grand Jury threw the bill out. The Government may, therefore, be said to have exhausted all the means at their disposal for obtaining a conviction.

MR. HARRINGTON: Why did you not change the venue?

MR. TREVELYAN: That would have been improper at a time when there was no reason to suspect favouritism. The Government made full use of all the documents placed in their hands on the previous occasion. The Crown Solicitor—who is the only person concerned whose salary we are now considering—was not to be blamed. The Government are still considering the matter—they are obtaining information and explanations. If they are satisfactory, the case will stand as at present; if they are not, the Attorney General for Ireland will adopt the best means for bringing about a prosecution. Until he has the full case before him, it is impossible to say what may be done.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he rose to move that the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. He should be very much surprised indeed if the Scotch Members were satisfied with the attempt the Prime Minister had made to release himself from the engagement he had deliberately entered into in the hearing of every Member of the House with reference to the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill. What reason had the right hon. Gentleman given for it? Why, that the Government had not obtained any money. Why had they not obtained money? Because of their determined defence of a position for three hours—their defence of a position which, in the end, they had abandoned—surrendered to hon. Gentlemen sitting behind them. The Scotch Members were not responsible for that. He believed the Scotch Members would join with him in refusing to have their Business postponed to such a late hour. The Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill was a considerable Bill, consisting of 529 clauses. It was opposed, and could not be taken after half-past 12—that was to say, in another 20 minutes it could not come on. It was opposed, not by Members representing Scotch constituencies, but by an hon. Member representing an English borough.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot discuss the position of the Bill on the Question that I report Progress.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: I want to point out that the Bill, being blocked, cannot be brought on after half-past 12. I move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the speech we have just heard might very well have been spared, coming from a Scotch Member who desires to save time, and to prevent this Bill, being blocked. I will not reply to his kind compliment to me, that I have endeavoured to escape from my engagement. I think there are very few in this House who will agree with him in that charge. I do not think I am capable of endeavouring to escape from an engagement.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: The right hon. Gen.—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Baronet has had his say. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) kindly and courteously admitted the force of what I said; and I have actually suggested to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that it was time for us to say we might now report Progress and bring on the Bill. I shall say no more. Progress will be reported.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

REVENUE, &C. (LICENCE, &C.)

Considered in Committee.(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the imposition of an Excise Duty of five shillings and three pence for the sale of Tobacco in Railway Carriages.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to direct to be written off, the claim of the Exchequer for any sum due in account from the Post Office, in respect of the excess of the expenses of granting and managing Government Annuities over and above the fees received.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 296.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. M'LAREN said, that though he had given Notice of opposition to this stage, he had no desire to oppose it in any disagreeable spirit, as he understood it was the wish of the majority of the Scotch Members that the Bill should be proceeded with as far as possible at that late period of the Session. But he thought it right to call the attention of the House to the very great importance of this measure, as well as to its enormous length. It was a Bill of over 500 clauses, which dealt in the most drastic and severe fashion with every phase of life in urban districts in Scotland; and such a Bill seemed to him to deserve a greater degree of attention in that House than it had received or was likely to receive. It interfered with the liberty of every citizen in Scotland in his domestic and public relations; and it was singular that the discussion of the Bill had not taken place in any public shape. Hon. Members who had received the Report of the Select Committee to which the Bill was committed would observe that the first Division in Committee was on the question whether reporters should be admitted, and he was surprised to see that the Committee decided to deal with the Bill with closed doors. He believed it was a fact that during all these days the Bill had been under discussion, not one single day's proceedings had been reported in any of the Scotch newspapers. The Committee was so appointed as to supply the place of the Grand Committee. Well, the proceedings of the Grand Committees were reported, their business being conducted with open doors; but not so in the case of this Bill. In 1882, a large number of Private Bills were introduced by the authorities of English and Scotch boroughs, going over much the same ground as the present Bill; and, thanks to the energy of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), those Private Bills were referred to a Select Committee, presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Schlater-Booth). As a Member of that Committee, he (Mr. M'Laren) was bound to say that the attention given to those Bills, of far less relative importance than the present measure, was far greater than the attention given to this Bill. He did not wish to disparage the Select Committee on the Police Bill; but the Police and Sanitary Committee of 1882 took evidence in regard to the clauses which were now to be passed without the slightest discussion in this measure. The Local Government Board had supplied memoranda with regard to all parts of the Bills. Gentlemen attended from the Local Government Board, and gave their opinion as to the effect of these clauses. They cross-examined these gentlemen with considerable minuteness, and also numerous Medical Officers, Officers of Health, Aldermen, Town Councillors, and all who came up in support of the Bills, the result being that a vast number of clauses were struck out which now appeared in this larger measure. He admitted there was a difference between the Bills of 1882 and the present measure. The Bills in 1882 were Private Bills, and the Committee had proceeded on the principle that it was not right to discuss in Private Bills matters affecting popular liberty, and which ought to be dealt with by the Whole House. He admitted this was a Public Bill, and that it was perfectly right to deal with all these questions in it; but he did appeal to English as well as to Scotch Members—was it possible for a Bill of 500 clauses, at that period of the Session, to meet with the attention it deserved? He did not wish to occupy the time of the House in debating the clauses of the Bill, therefore, he would say nothing whatever about them. When the Speaker left the Chair—as he would shortly—he should not hesitate to press the Amendments of which he had given Notice; and he trusted his hon. Friends and other Scotch Members who had given Notice of Amendments would do the same. He felt sure that his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, be disposed to make such concessions as he could in these particular clauses. If that were not done, he (Mr. M'Laren) was confident in the wisdom of “another place,” and he had very little doubt that the Bill would receive very severe treatment if ever it left the door of this House. He should not press the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell) seemed to think that he (Mr. Hopwood) owed an apology to the House for interfering in this matter, because he was an English Member who had undertaken to call attention to this Bill, which proposed to deal with Scotland alone. But he supposed the hon. Member had no objection to Englishmen travelling in or residing in Scotland; and it did seem necessary that English Members of Parliament should take under their care the laws which greeted them when they arrived in Scotland. Nobody disputed the fact that Scotch Members had a perfect right to interfere in, and to endeavour to improve, English legislation. With this short apology, he would just say a word or two on the action he had ventured to take in this matter. His hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down had described what was done by a former Committee. His hon. and learned Friend had rendered excellent service on that Committee, and so also did his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler); and the same Gentlemen, with other Members of the House, rendered great service in going through a number of Bills. They had spent 30 days in going through those Bills relating to England. The Scotch Members who sat on the Committee upon the Scotch Bills devoted a number of days to the work, no doubt; but they had not sought to bring the measure into harmony with English law, which was what he wanted to see done, as much as possible, in these matters, and the result was that there would be different laws for the two countries. He quite admitted that it was impossible for that House to effect this in Committee; but it was possible for him to make some protest upon the subject; and he thought it was right that he should do so, because, with all respect for the hon. Members who supported this measure, there was in Scotland a notion among the higher orders of men—the bailies, magistrates, Commissioners, and such like—that arbitrary powers were to be placed in their hands and in the hands of the police to guide and govern everybody in minute relations of life. He would avoid going into details generally; but he wished in several respects to invite the attention of the House to the condition of things. Most of the provisions of this measure were, he believed, founded upon the various Improvement Bills which had been passed into law for various burghs in Scotland, and some of these Improvement Bills had been of the most arbitrary description. He was aware that the Lord Advocate had considerably modified some of these provisions—provisions of such a character that they strongly attracted attention in the case of several Scotch towns, and provisions which were far more arbitrary than those sought to be brought in by the Municipal Authorities of English towns. It was this which brought about that reference to the Select Committee on which his hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) did such excellent service. A short review of what was intended to be done by some of these provisions would certainly prove interesting. There were police regulations as to lighting and cleansing on the staircases of “common dwellings,” and so on. That was a specimen of the minuteness with which they condescended to such small matters in Scotland—nothing was to be done without the police, and the public authority insisted on the carrying out of the details of the private relations of people under the terror of penalties. Then there were orders for licensing porters and news-vendors. There was no such thing as free trade—everybody was to be dependent on the goodwill of a couple of magistrates, as would be found on reference to Clause 360. That was the sort of thing that was to find its way into an Act for the whole of Scotland. It was thought necessary to provide power to break into a house in case of fire—that was how they legislated for Scotland—though he should have thought that the very necessity of the matter provided law and excuse enough. Then he absolutely found that if a swimmer passed certain boundary posts, when he came back he would find himself in the hands of the police, and would be fined 40s.! That was the sort of thing which ran through the Bill throughout. He should abstain from going into details, though they would make his case very much stronger. There were a series of bye-laws for controlling old clothes dealers, and he protested against any burgh being allowed to frame such a series of bye-laws, even though the high sanction of the Sheriff was required to be given to them before they were to have the force of law. He found that the only check upon all this was that it was to be not repugnant to the law of Scotland. But he supposed that every fresh enactment was in a sense repugnant to the existing law, because it was a new law; and if these burghs were to be permitted to control all these various matters, and others which he did not specify, because other Members might call attention to them bye and bye, the situation would be intolerable. Then there was authority to repeal, to alter, and to re-enact these bye-laws, so that there might be a perpetually shifting body of law. It was true that most of these provisions had reference to humble trades and occupations, where, perhaps, the poverty of the people, or their lowness in the social scale, might render them powerless to object; and he protested on behalf of poor Scotchmen, just as he would on behalf of poor Englishmen, against their being made subject to shifting bye-laws and to various penalties to be altered at the will of the Commissioners when sanctioned by the Sheriff. Then he came to the sanitary provisions, and he would commend them to the attention of any hon. Member as a perfect curiosity. He believed these sanitary provisions were not considered stiff enough for one or two towns which already had more severe ones of their own; but they presented a remarkable curiosity in legislation, as anyone might see, by looking at the clauses following the 321st. He did not intend to go through them in succession; but he thought he might pronounce them to be exceedingly arbitrary. He found that, having named certain infectious diseases, for the notification of which provision was made, there was power given to the Commissioners, with the approval of the Board of Supervision—which was something like the Local Government Board in this country—to add any other infectious disease to the number of those specifically mentioned. Then there were powers to remove persons, to prevent the spread of infectious diseases; and all that had to be done was to get a certificate, signed by a medical officer, for the removal from a house of all the residents therein who were not suffering from the disease. The whole thing depended upon the discretion of a medical officer. He would ask hon. Members how they would like to inflict such a law upon their own friends and families—to apply it to their own houses? Here was a single medical officer, who might be a first class man, or who might, on the other hand, be a very inferior man; and, at all events, as a rule, he would be a man who had his spurs to win, for the best medical men were not likely to take these appointments—and upon the certificate of that man a whole family might be removed at his will and pleasure. Of course, it was argued that this sort of thing could only be done on the production of a certificate signed by a medical officer; but, on the production of such a certificate, any magistrate might make the order. Then there were powers as to the disinfection of premises, and so on. Of course, all these provisions were perfectly futile and useless in the case of persons who had good houses of their own, and who might be as daring and as reckless as they pleased; but those who happened to be rather poor, and who had not a house to themselves, but dwelt with others, could not call their house their own, or be free from the Inspector or the medical officer, who might harass them in any way he pleased. He would give another specimen. It was provided that no one must deposit in any midden anything that might communicate any infectious disease. He would abstain from reading the clause, for decency would not allow it; but it was Clause 328. Many of the powers given were such as could be much better carried out, not by legislative enactment, but by coaxing, and by moral authority; and to give to a magistrate power to tear away from a family those who were most dear to it, whether living or dead, and all at the will of a medical officer—these were things which he must most strongly protest against. He believed that the sanitary regulation of the burghs of Scotland could be much better provided for without all these terrors and penalties, or the placing of such extensive powers in the hands of the police. One of these sanitary regulations he should like to draw attention to for a moment. It provided that any person who took in washing, and whose house contained anyone supposed to be suffering from an infectious disease, was liable to a penalty for allowing the linen to go back from her house. That affected the poor laundress; and here he wished to point out how little the other side of the case was thought of, for he did not find any prohibition against those who employed the laundress. A man who had a house of his own, and who was rich enough to order the linen to be sent out, might have a child laid up with measles or scarlet fever, and might recklessly send the whole of the linen used by that child to the laundress, and infect her family with the disease; but if the laundress did it she was liable to a penalty. That was Clause 230. What he complained of was that nothing was left to personal prudence. Then he came to the offences, beginning at Clause 392, and they really formed a curiosity of legal study. He could hear an hon. Friend rather boasting, as if these were patterns to be followed; but he could only say that if such enactments were to be applied to England, he hoped that all the old women of the streets would stand up in revolution against them. He would mention one provision as a matter of curiosity. If anyone used in any way whatever any sham bank note, whether it was done in sport or not, he would be liable to be charged as for an offence in Scotland. Then, in the street regulations, great care was taken in pointing out on which side of the street—whether on the right or the left—a man should be permitted to drive a cart; and, by Sub-section 9 of Clause 393, a penalty was provided for the man who was driving a cart slowly, and who would not get out of the way quickly enough for a swift carriage, perhaps driven by some imperious fellow. It was also provided that prostitutes and street-walkers should be liable to penalties, if they loitered about or importuned passengers; and that anybody who habitually or persistently importuned or solicited women or children should be liable to penalties. This was the first time that such a provision had ever been put into a Bill; and it did seem to be carrying the law to a point that had never been reached before. At the same time, he was rather glad to see that men who habitually or persistently importuned were to be put on a more equal footing with the other sex for breaking the laws of morality. He did not see why the law should not be a little levelled down, to put men and women more on an equality in this matter. Then he found it was an offence to place a flower pot in an upper window without a sufficient guard to it to prevent accidents, or for anyone to throw from a roof any slate or brick. Surely, these things might be left to the natural protection afforded by the fact that the man who did this sort of thing was liable to damages for any accident that might happen, and that fact generally induced people to act with sufficient caution. If an injury was caused, then let the conduct of the offending person be an offence. He did not wish to waste the time of the House, and he thought he had justified, to some extent, what he undertook to do. He found it was provided that no one under the age of 14 years should drive anything, or be in charge of any vehicle, or, he supposed, should even hold a horse for a horseman. Then he turned to disorderly houses. He did not wish to dwell on that subject; but he maintained that the whole policy pursued in that matter was to put things into the hands of the police, and everybody knew the difficulty and danger that ensued from that. When the police were employed for these matters very great risks were run. The proper business of the police was to preserve order and to detect crime; and when they were provided with inducements to watch these houses and control them they became a source of manifest danger to the country, for, possessing the power of laying informations, or informing their superiors of the existence of these places, it was not to be expected that men who were being paid 25s. a-week would be able to resist the temptations which the keepers of disorderly houses would be sure to place in their way. It was very possible that any policeman might, under such circumstances, be corrupted; and when a policeman was corrupted it was easy to imagine what would be the result. The consequence of too great severity in the laws was well enough known. Where a policeman had power to bring a man before the magistrates for an offence, the first penalty for which was £20, with accumulating penalties for every subsequent offence, the natural result was to make their cities whited sepulchres, looking well enough outside, but no one knowing what abominations were going on inside, or, possibly, just outside their boundaries, where all the immorality might be congregated together. Then there was the question of the suppression of vagrants. It was very desirable to suppress vagrants; but it might be done too cruelly, with too great severity—and he believed that many people who read the clauses of the Bill, from Clause 423 onwards, would look upon them as exceeding the real requirements of the case. He did not think he had wasted the time of the House; but he could not pursue this particular point any further. He came now to brokers and pawnbrokers, and he found that they were treated with uncommon severity. He found that it was not possible for a broker to carry on his trade without having his books, and the nature of his entries therein, prescribed for him. Such provisions did not repress the dishonest man, who would have his books in order with sham entries; but the honest trader was harassed in every way in carrying on his business. He had now done all that he could in pointing out these matters, though he felt that he could, perhaps, interest the House by continuing the catalogue. Hon. Gentlemen who were enamoured of this despotic kind of legislation did not like to hear all these things; and, no doubt, it would be much easier and more comfortable to pass the Bill and go home to bed than to stop there to discuss it. But here were 500 clauses to be passed in this way long after midnight, and he suggested that this was not the way in which legislation should be carried on.

He did not undervalue the services of those of his hon. Friends who sat on the Committee, and his personal inclination to gratify them would incline him at once to withdraw from any further opposition, but for the fact that duty was a matter far beyond any personal gratification of that kind. However, he felt that the House had now given him a sufficient hearing, and he could assure hon. Gentlemen that his statement of the case had much suffered from his anxious desire to bring his remarks within as small a compass as possible. He begged to move that the House do go into Committee on the Bill on that day three months.

MR. WARTON, in seconding the Amendment, desired to say that while he had every disposition to believe in the good sense of Scotland, he could see very little common sense in this Bill, which was one of a most extraordinary nature, abounding in petty tyrannies, and containing so many absurdities and tomfooleries that he thought the good sense of those Scotchmen who approved of it had utterly vanished. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had not at all exaggerated the absurdities of the Bill. In this country it had been found necessary to check the almost insane tendency of little petty persons dressed in a little brief authority to make tyrannical laws in the most Puritanical spirit. If there had been collected all the most ridiculous specimens of regulations that could be found, and they had all been concentrated into one single focus of absurdity, there could not have been made a worse Bill than this. He saw sitting on the Treasury Bench opposite the parent of the phrase "grandmotherly legislation;" and he must say that he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do something to rescue his Colleagues from the shame that would be cast upon them if this Bill were allowed to pass. If such a Bill were to pass at all, it should have been brought in at an earlier period of the Session, when it could have been properly discussed and amended. At 5 o'clock that morning the Government gave way in the case of another measure, because the Irish Members had the sense to see that the Bill was absurd; but Scotland, it seemed, was to be treated differently, and a Bill was to be passed to prohibit children under 10 years of age from selling newspapers in the streets. Some of the extraordinary provisions of the Bill dealt with swine, and the places in which they were to be kept. It almost seemed to give colour to the view that their Scotch fellow-citizens were descendants of the lost tribes, for they seemed to have the Jewish antipathy to swine. Then the curfew was actually to be re-established. The old Saxons, who did not like to be played with, almost thought that the most cruel and bitter thing which their conquerors did was to extinguish their fires at 8 o'clock; but the curfew was actually to be re-established in the 19th century in civilized Scotland, or semi-civilized Scotland, as it ought now to be called. Times were to be fixed for lighting and extinguishing the lights in common-stairs, passages, and private coverts, and the order was to be fixed in which the occupiers of flats were to be responsible for extinguishing the lights. The Norman Conqueror cruelly fixed a time for putting out the lights; but these modern people not only said when the lights were to go out, but how it was to be done, and fixed the order of rotation. Then there were regulations as to when the stairs were to be swept. The people must not sweep their stairs when they liked—it was to be a matter of regulation and law. Then there were regulations as to the numerous receptacles for every kind of filth, mentioned with elaboration and scant decency, in the Bill. Without entering into anything uncommonly nasty—though the Bill was full of such material—he might mention that one bye-law forbade foul water from percolating from one house or building to another; and then there were to be dépôts established—a grand word for receptacles for bones, carrion, and rags. These ridiculous and paltry little matters were to be dealt with by a fine of 10s. for every day the offence was committed. It was difficult to express one's opinion of this without indignation. Then they were weak enough to think that they could make everyone moral by petty restrictions; but the days of Puritanism had gone by. It might be a sad thing that women should traverse the streets; but this wretched piece of legislation decreed that they must move at a certain regulated pace, according to the bye-laws. The poor wretch must not loiter. Again, the boy who threw a snowball, which was an act contrary to the bye-laws—what Member of that House had not thrown a snowball?—was liable to severe punishment, and, worse than that, the poor boy who flew a kite was also liable to be punished. Wherever this Act was not extremely tyrannical it was supremely ridiculous. Here was another instance. If they were building a house and were having any lime ground up with the plaster, and the wind blew it about, that was another crime, because they ought to have put down water to prevent its being blown about. And then there was a moral injunction against shaking and beating any carpets or rugs, because it was contrary to the bye-laws. If one happened to crush up against a person in the streets of a town in Scotland, that was a crime; and if a person stood on the sill of a window for the purpose of cleaning the panes, even if the sill were only two feet from the ground, he was to be punished. Then there was another provision about pieces of orange peel being thrown upon the pavements, which was also an offence under this Act. Hon. Members must know that a great number of offences set forth in the Bill were punishable at Common Law; but that was not sufficient for the framers of this Bill; they must deal with acts of juvenility in the way he had described. In Clause 394 they found an extraordinary provision, which he did not think would be sanctioned by Parliament. In that clause they were told that no public procession should take place without the consent of the magistrates. He rather commended that clause to the consideration of Liberal Members who might want to get up demonstrations; and he would ask them whether it was, or was not, a violation of the freedom of the subject? Was it, or was it not, the right of all persons to walk in an orderly way through the streets in procession? As a Tory, he was in favour of the liberty of the subject; but he found that tyranny was always inflicted by the Liberals. He asked them whether it was really intended that no public procession, not even that of a Sunday School with its teachers, should be allowed to walk along the streets, however small the procession, five, six, or seven, as the case might be, without the consent of the magistrates? If the Bill were a sensible one, he should have no objection to its being read a second time; but, under the circumstances, he should feel it his duty to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport; and unless Scotch Members wished to cover themselves with ridicule he thought they would do well in following his example.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—
(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. WEBSTER said, without at all adopting the views of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), he felt bound to express the strong feeling which prevailed in Scotland, that sufficient time and opportunity had not been allowed for the full consideration of this measure. He was in favour of the codification of the law, and also, in the main, in favour of the Bill itself. He had been a Member of the Committee, which had devoted the greatest attention to this Bill in discussing the clauses seriatim for very many days; but he could inform the House that the prevailing feeling in Scotland was one of regret with regard to the shortness of time at their disposal for the consideration of the measure. He held in his hand a letter from the Town Clerk of the Town Council of Aberdeen which had passed a Resolution to this effect—

"That the Town Council are of opinion that sufficient time has not been allowed for the consideration in Scotland of this Bill, as amended, and they strongly recommend that it be not passed by Parliament during the present Session."

The Bill was of enormous length, and it embraced the whole field of the duties and functions of administration in burghs with regard to police, public health, and the details of sanitary matters generally. The Bill had, no doubt, been carefully considered by the Select Committee; but there were very many clauses struck out altogether, and many materially altered; and he was sorry to find that the Town Council of Aberdeen, at least, did not consider that in many cases any improvement had been effected thereby. There had been, besides, many clauses added, and other large changes made, and the Bill, as amended, was formally ordered by the House to be reprinted so recently as the 18th of the present month; and, therefore, he was bound to admit that there was some solid ground for the contention of the public Bodies that they had not been allowed sufficient opportunity to consider a measure which travelled over so wide a field, and which was of such immense importance. It must be considered also that the present Bill overrode and superseded the existing Police Acts, which had been framed with very great care, and which, in many of their clauses, were, perhaps, actually better than the corresponding clauses in this Bill. He felt bound to say, in conclusion, that the feeling prevailing in the burgh which he had the honour to represent (Aberdeen) appeared to him to be very greatly in favour of the postponement of the Bill.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that in the remarks which he made at an earlier part of the discussion he intended no reference whatever to the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) with regard to the course he had taken in this matter. As a matter of fact, he thought that the hon. and learned Member was fully justified in opposing this Bill. It was not reasonable to ask the House to consider a Bill containing 529 clauses on the 30th of July at 1 o'clock in the morning, especially when they remembered that the House was still sitting at 5 o'clock yesterday morning. He rose, however, for the purpose of offering some observations on the course adopted by the hon. and learned Member for Stafford (Mr. M'Laren). The hon. and learned Member had stated that he would not persist in his objection to the Bill; he said he was not reconciled to the measure; but he expressed himself perfectly satisfied that the Bill would be effectively and finally dealt with in "another place." Now, he did not think that that was a course either creditable to the hon. and learned Member or that House. They had to decide with regard to the Bill upon its merits; and he thought it likely that when the hon. and learned Member went into the country he would have something to say more or less complimentary of the other House. And one of his complaints would probably be that the time spent by hon. Members in the House of Commons in the consideration of Bills such as this was utterly lost in consequence of the action taken by the House of Peers. He thought he had replied to the observations which fell from the hon. and learned Member as to whether the Bill should be allowed to go into Committee or not. They would probably hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate on that question, as it was that on which would probably depend all his hopes of carrying the Bill through. In his opinion, it would be most regrettable, if, in consequence of the mode in which Her Majesty's Government had dealt with the time at their disposal, the labours of the Select Committee should be entirely lost. Had Her Majesty's Government seen fit to introduce this Bill at a reasonable period of the Session, which he thought was quite within their power, it would have received the amount of consideration given it by the Select Committee; and there would have been, besides, ample time for it to have been discussed and fully considered in that House. Believing that the Bill, as a whole, was desirable, if the Lord Advocate persevered in his determination to carry it through the Committee stage, he should very cordially support him.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, the Bill was of a very detailed character, and such as only men of great experience in municipal affairs could adequately criticize; but it had been very carefully considered by the Select Committee. It had issued from them within the last two weeks, and the earliest day on which his constituents could have got a copy of the amended Bill was last Wednesday morning. They proceeded immediately they received the Bill to take it into consideration, and in order to make the position plain he would relate to the House what took place before the Bill was received. The Bill was sent to a Select Committee; according to the Rules of the House that Committee sat with closed doors; but it was moved in the Committee that the public should be admitted in order that the various Amendments proposed might be reported and the progress of the Bill known out-of-doors. But that Amendment was defeated, and the result was that the municipal authorities in Scotland had been unable to follow the discussions which had taken place, or the Amendments made in the Committee, and that the Bill came down to the House practically a new measure. He would put it to the Government, in view of what had taken place, whether it was reasonable, at that period of the Session—within, as they hoped, a week of the Prorogation, to endeavour to urge through the House a Bill of these enormous dimensions, which, on account of its great elaboration of detail, could not possibly be discussed as it ought to be. Not only did the Corporation of Edinburgh strongly disapprove the Bill being hurried through Parliament without adequate discussion, but every day that the Bill was before the Select Committee he received numbers of letters asking if such or such a clause was retained in the Bill, what was the meaning of this alteration, was there any possibility of having the Bill restored its original form, and what opportunity there would be of submitting to the House the Amendments thought necessary? The Bill had been very carefully considered in the Committee; but in the case of an enormous measure like this, when a great number of Amendments were suggested, it was almost impossible, with even the utmost care, to avoid inserting Amendments in one part that were contradictory of other portions, and to avoid the insertion of clauses which were absolutely incongruous with others. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate must be aware that the Bill was full of errors and contradictions, and he would ask him what line he proposed to take with the view of amending those defects? Of course, he did not consider it the duty of a private Member of the House to attempt to cope with the matter; and, for his own part, he had only to propose one or two Amendments on behalf of his constituents. He trusted there would be a general expression of opinion on both sides of the House, and he was certain that the opinion of all the large burghs in Scotland was against the further progress of the Bill that Session. Finally, he put it to Her Majesty's Government whether it was fair, at that late period of the Session, to proceed with a Bill of such enormous detail, and which could not fail to put in endless confusion the whole burgh administration of the country?

Mr. ANDERSON said, he felt bound to support the view taken by the hon.

Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) with regard to this Bill. Ever since the Bill had passed from the Select Committee, he had been receiving the strongest remonstrances from the authorities in Glasgow against its being allowed to go any further that Session. They complained that the Sittings of the Select Committee were held in camera, and that they knew nothing of what was going on, and that they knew nothing of the form of the Bill until they saw the reprint of it. He had that morning received a telegram requesting him to replace all the Amendments which they had on the Paper, many of which had been rejected. They complained that the Bill had been made worse rather than better by the Amendments which had been introduced into it. He had also received a letter from Dr. Russell, a man of great authority in Glasgow in sanitary matters, who had been so successful in stamping out small-pox there, and whose opinion was deserving of the greatest attention. That gentleman wrote to say that the Bill, as it stood, was in his opinion unworkable, and that he would not like to undertake to work it in its present form; and, further, that it would upset many private local Acts which had been passed. He had represented the matter to the Lord Advocate, who had given his assurance that these things would be put right in one way or another, and he (Mr. Anderson) had agreed to stop in his opposition to the Bill going forward. But he was now bound to say that if the Bill went forward he should be obliged to vote against it. His constituents in one point considered the Bill a very dangerous one, and that was in respect of the clause enabling burghs to amalgamate; but they had offered to withdraw their opposition to that clause if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would agree to a Royal Commission to deal with the boundaries of the great burghs in Scotland. That the right hon. and learned Gentleman had refused to do, and the Bill therefore found no favour in Glasgow; and consequently he was satisfied that he should be doing his duty to his constituents in voting against the Bill going into Committee.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he should regret it as much as anyone, if the Bill

did not pass into law; and he confessed that he should be astonished if the Lord Advocate were to drop the measure without making an attempt to get it into Committee. Such a course would be simply trifling with the people of Scotland, who were most anxious about the Bill, and also with regard to the Bill for creating a Secretary of State for Scotland. He ventured to say that those two measures were of far more value and consequence to Scotland than the Representation of the People Bill, because they knew that either this year or next the franchise would be extended. He was in a position to know what was desired in the matter of legislation in Scotland, and he could assure the House that the people of Scotland were most anxious about this measure. He had had the honour of being a Member of the Committee upstairs, and he was bound to say that nothing could exceed the courtesy of their Chairman, the Lord Advocate, in all matters relating to the Bill. The Bill, he believed, was in a shape which provided better law than at present existed in Scotland. It might be improved, no doubt; but he considered it better to pass it now as it was, than wait another year for this legislation.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I believe this measure is very generally desired throughout Scotland, except in the case of four or five of the largest towns which have Acts of their own open to grave question; and but for these large towns there would be no opposition to the Bill at all. In 1862 a very important measure was passed, generally known as the Police Act, for Scotland. That Act has been of infinite benefit to the populous places of that country. We have had 22 years' experience of it, and in the course of that time it has been found that in several particulars it required amendment. The consequence was that many boroughs and populous places, which desired to obtain the benefit of municipal institutions, made a representation to the Government that it would be extremely desirable to amend the measure and extend its benefits. As a result, the first edition of this Bill was prepared two years ago. I may say it originated very much with the Convention of Royal Burghs. It has been before the country for two years, and has been the subject of a great deal of adjustment, and I am not guilty of inaccuracy when I say that I do not believe there has been any Bill placed before this House to which there has been so large a contribution of assistance and of suggestion from the various towns and populous places throughout the country. No doubt, we should have been very glad if it had been in our power to have had the measure brought forward at an earlier period of the Session; but after the Bill had been before the country for two years it was referred to a Select Committee, consisting of 27 Members, of whom 22 were Scotch. We had some nine or ten meetings, and the Bill was gone through with very great care, with the benefit of multitudes of suggestions from all the classes interested, and what is now before the House is the result. I do think it would be a great misfortune if the result of so much labour, and, I believe, beneficial labour, were lost. The number of Amendments on the Paper for this evening is very small, and I do not think that when we get to them their discussion will last any length of time. It is only right that the House should be aware that the opposition, at least so far as we believe, and has been indicated by the speaking to-night, has come almost entirely, if not entirely, from those places which have Acts which are open to the very gravest criticism. I am not going to follow what has been said by some of my hon. Friends; but I may just say that, in framing the measure, we had before us the result of the labours of the Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Solater-Booth) two years ago. We had their Report before us, and one of the advantages of that Report was that it put an end to legislation by separate Private Bills, which very often contained provisions that, if brought before the House distinctly in important measures, never could become law. The fact of the Committee having reported and recommended against that separate legislation in these Bills made it all the more imperative that such a measure as the present should be brought forward. I do not desire to delay the House by going into arguments as to the different provisions of the Bill. I gather that there is a great majority of Scotch opinion in favour of it. We have been very much pressed to carry it through, and, under the circumstances, believing that the Bill is a good Bill—I do not know that there is any measure which could not be made more perfect if the ordinary conditions of time and place were to be disregarded—and taking into consideration all that has conduced to make the Bill what it is now, I think it would be a great misfortune if we did not go into Committee.

MR. HENDERSON said, he rose for the purpose of corroborating what had fallen from his hon. Friends the Members for Aberdeen (Mr. Webster), Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), and Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He could assure the House that it was with great reluctance that he rose to offer any objection to the Bill. He knew very well there was a very strong feeling in Scotland, especially amongst the small boroughs, that some such measure as this was necessary, and that they had waited patiently for the Bills which had been brought before the House during last year and this year. He could quite corroborate what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had said as to the strong desire which existed in Scotland for the measure; but, at the same time, for years he had taken an active interest in local administration, and, having some knowledge of this kind of legislation, he was bound to say that he was afraid that this Bill, as presented to the House, would not fulfil the expectations of those who had been so long desiring legislation. He made that statement with great reluctance, because, as he said, he believed the Bill contained many very valuable provisions. Looking at its full sense, at the manner in which it was drafted in the first instance—or, he might say, at the manner in which it was constructed—and considering that it had passed through Committee, and that great care and attention had been devoted to it, he was very reluctant to offer opposition to it; but, in passing through the Select Committee, it had been so altered that many of the large boroughs had not had time to consider what its present effect would be. He could not describe himself as adverse to the measure; but, from representations which had been made to him by authorities in his own burgh—particularly by the police clerk, who was one of the most experienced police clerks in Scotland—it seemed there was a very strong feeling that it would be well to allow the Bill to be thought over by the country for another year before being pressed. These representations, he was bound to say, corresponded with his own opinion. From his own experience in matters of this kind, he was afraid that the measure would disappoint those who looked forward with so much pleasure and satisfaction to its passing. Altogether, therefore, if the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) pressed his Resolution, he (Mr. Henderson) should have to support it, although from very different reasons to those which prompted the hon. and learned Gentleman in bringing it forward. He, in fact, took this opportunity of protesting against the line the hon. and learned Gentleman took with reference to these Bills promoted by Scotch burghs. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to look at these matters from a purely political point of view, and—as he understood from his remarks, and as he could show if necessary—knew nothing whatever of local administration. If he had known anything about it, he would never have uttered the sentiments he had uttered in that House. The hon. and learned Gentleman had taken the strongest objection to the Bill proposed in 1882 by his (Mr. Henderson's) own burgh (Dundee), and also to the Bill of the hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Dick-Peddie), who had fallen into the same mistake of bringing the Bill in as a small private measure. The great objection taken to the Dundee Bill, which was a Consolidating Bill, relating to clauses which had been in operation for 11 years, with the sanction of the House, to the great benefit of the community, was that it was proposed to re-enact these clauses in it with the full consent of the inhabitants. The sanitary provisions of the present measure, instead of being too stringent, were, in his opinion, too lax, and that was one of the reasons why Dundee objected to the Bill. The Lord Advocate had stated that legislation in respect of these matters had fallen back since 1862, and that the large boroughs had been obliged to promote local Acts of their own to remedy the existing evils. Well, the fault he (Mr. Henderson) found with the Bill was that, instead of bringing up the general law of Scotland to the advanced position reached by the burghs which had secured their own local Police Acts, it proposed to level down these particular burghs to the condition of the whole country. It would level down, instead of bringing the whole country up to the position which the burghs he referred to had arrived by long experience of the defects of the existing law. In the present Bill a retrograde reactionary step was taken. He felt very strongly on this point, and in Committee he should have to bring forward many Amendments. Some Amendments he had put on the Paper; but there were many more which he should have to move which he had been unable to bring forward up to this time; and he believed there were other hon. Members in the same position as himself. Though the Motion for going into Committee were passed, there would still be a great deal to do. The Amendments on the Paper did not by any means represent the number which would be put down if they got into Committee. He made these remarks, as he had said, with the greatest reluctance. He should have been much better pleased if he could have found himself able to support the Lord Advocate in pushing forward the measure. He should have supported it if it had not been for the conviction that if it were passed it would, instead of reflecting credit on the legislation of this year, so far as Scotland was concerned, tend to the reverse state of things, and prove provocative of opposition and objection.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, there were many things in the Bill of which he did not approve, and which he should be glad to see altered; but, for the most part, these clauses referring to them were of a re-enacting and consolidating character. They had heard quite enough from hon. Members representing important towns in Scotland—and they had also heard the mild and mitigated protest of the Lord Advocate—to show the extravagance of the Acts in force in some towns in Scotland. These Acts did not always meet with the concurrence and approval of the Local Authorities; and he (Mr. Solater-Booth) had come to the conclusion that it would be better to go forward with this Bill, and get a reasonable measure passed for the whole of Scotland, than to allow these eccentric Acts in force in some Scotch towns longer to prevail. For his own part, he was entirely in favour of the policy which guided the Committee of 1882, to which reference had been made, and which guided the Committee which had been sitting this year. He trusted the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) would see that this measure was a step in the right direction. The Lord Advocate had been of great service in 1882, when the Scotch Improvement Bills were under consideration, in getting some extravagant provisions cut out of them. The right hon. and learned Lord had been very much struck by the views which prevailed on that Committee; and it had, evidently, been his intention and desire in framing the Bill to have regard to those views. He (Mr. Selater-Booth) would be very sorry indeed if they were not to go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE wished to point out that the Scotch Members who had spoken against proceeding with the Bill were, without exception, Representatives of the large burghs, which had already Acts of their own. It might be of no great consequence to these large burghs that a general measure, such as that before the House, should pass; but it was of very great importance to the small burghs, which had not the benefit of special Acts, that there should be a consolidation of the various imperfect general Acts, under which their police and sanitary affairs were regulated. At the same time, it was most desirable that the large burghs should be freed from the tyrannical provisions which were found in their special Acts. His hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) spoke of Edinburgh as "enjoying" its Acts. He (Mr. Dick-Peddle) had been a citizen of Edinburgh for a much longer time than his hon. Friend; and he could testify that, by many of his fellow-citizens, the provisions of the local Acts were regarded as most oppressive. The Acts would have been found intolerable, had it not been that the authorities did not venture to enforce many of the powers conferred on them by these Acts. He sympathized generally with much that had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) regarding the undue interference with personal liberty, authorized by some of the local Acts, and the inquisitorial nature of many of their provisions; but he thought that some of the criticisms of the measure now before the House, which had fallen from his hon. Friend, would not have been made had he been more familiar with Scotland than he was. While the Bill before the House contained clauses which might be objected to, it went far in the direction of modifying the stringency of many provisions found in existing local Acts; and, therefore, he trusted the House would agree to proceed with it. The small burghs wished to have a consolidation of the various Acts regulating their police and sanitary affairs. Though hon. Members said that Edinburgh enjoyed its Act, and had done so for many years, those who had resided in the Scotch capital for a long period—longer than those hon. Members—knew that it did not enjoy the advantages which were supposed to have been conferred upon it. If similar Acts were in force in England, it would not be long before there would be a revolution in the country. Seeing that the present was a modified Act, he trusted that the House would take it into consideration.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he quite agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Dick-Peddle) when he said that the small burghs desired to have a consolidation of their various Acts, and that an Act should be passed which would be generally applicable to the small burghs. He must say, however, as representing two small burghs, that he understood they were opposed to the Bill. As a matter of fact, he had presented a Petition from one of them, the other day, against the passing of the Bill. Speaking from his own experience—and he must claim to have had some experience of local administration—he thought the measure, in many of its parts, was very unworkable, and required a great deal more adjustment, consideration, and amendment than it had, apparently, received. He sympathized with the views of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) to a great extent. Many of the clauses of the Bill gave extreme powers—utterly despotic powers—to the police. He had made some attempt to modify them; but was bound to say he had met with little support on the Committee. A great many people thought that these powers could only be applied against evilly-disposed persons. If that were so, there would not be much to object to; but it must be remembered that the application of the clauses in the Bill lay, in the first place, in the hands of the policemen who exercised the powers they had in many cases in an arbitrary manner. The chief power would be exercised by the magistrates or baillies, as they were called in Scotland—very excellent gentlemen, no doubt, but gentlemen who knew very little about the law. They were very respectable townspeople; but, however respectable townspeople might be, it could not be expected of them that they should know much about the Laws of Evidence, or even enough to be able to say what was evidence, and what was not. He was, therefore, very reluctant to give such powers as some of those contained in the Bill to ordinary citizens. The Lord Advocate said that many of the Police Bills, under which many large towns were governed, would not be able to withstand the scrutiny of the House. Well, he (Mr. Barclay) would say that many of the clauses of this Bill would not be able to withstand the scrutiny of the House. They were very stringent—seriously affecting the liberty of the subject—and he did not think that if they were brought under the scrutiny of the House there would be the smallest chance of their becoming law. He had another objection to the Bill. The Lord Advocate said that one of its objects was to prevent burghs, for the future, coming to Parliament for separate enactments. Now, he did not think this measure would be applicable to the case of small burghs growing into large ones. From his own experience, he knew how, when a burgh grew, and new streets and pavements and municipal arrangements became necessary, how necessary it was to come to the House for a special Act dealing with these improvements. The clauses embodied in this Bill were very much the same as the law already existing in the burghs, but which was from time to time found to be insufficient. He was, therefore, of opinion that in these respects, at all events, the Bill was open to very considerable amendment, so as to make it workable and applicable to the cases of all the burghs, whether small or large—particularly to small burghs, to enable them to grow from time to time without a special Act. For the reasons he had given, speaking on behalf of two small burghs at least within his own constituency, he thought it would be much better for the consideration of the Bill to be deferred till another Session. To make it a workable Bill and insure the purpose intended, a good deal more consideration than it had yet received should be given to the Bill. No doubt the Select Committee—of which he had had the honour to be a Member—had devoted a considerable amount of attention to the measure; but he did not think sufficient attention had been given to it to make it what it ought to be. The Session had not provided sufficient time to make the Bill such as deserved to receive general support. He should support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Hopwood).

MR. A. GRANT said, he must express the great regret he felt at the opposition which had developed itself against this Bill on the part of some of the Representatives of the large burghs in Scotland. The burgh he had the honour to represent (Leith) was, perhaps, the largest in Scotland which had not a Police Act of its own. It was at present under the General Police Act of 1862; and he could assure the House—after having been very lately in conversation with some of the members of the Corporation of Leith—that that burgh most cordially approved of the Bill, and earnestly hoped it might pass into law that Session. He was sure the opinion the Corporation of Leith entertained was the opinion of all other Corporations under the General Police Act. The Bill made provision for a great many new wants which had sprung up in connection with municipal government since the passing of the Act of 1862; and it embodied all that was really useful, and all that was defensible, and all that was reasonable in the Act of 1862, as well as all that was defensible in the different Private Acts which had been obtained by the various burghs since the Act of 1862 was passed. The measure—as had been already stated—after having passed its second reading, was referred to a large representative Select Committee, by whom it was carefully scrutinized, and gone over at the expense of much time and labour. He might say, further, that the Bill had the cordial approval of the Convention of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs; and he thought he might say, with the exception of one or two of the largest towns, had the cordial approval of public opinion throughout Scotland. Furthermore, he might say that the Bill was framed in such a way as to deal most leniently with the large towns which were now opposed to it. Out of seven parts of the Bill there were only two made obligatory, and those two were concerned with police offences, and penalties, and sanitary regulations. He appealed to the House whether it was not desirable that all the burghs in the country should be placed under one uniform law as to police offences and penalties? Whence came the opposition to the Bill which had developed itself that night? It had come partly from hon. Members who had no connection with Scotland at all; but that was not where the real opposition had come from. The real opposition lay amongst certain Municipal Corporations of Scotland, and it had been expressed by their Representatives, not as the individual opinions of these gentlemen themselves, but as the opinions furnished to them by the Local Authorities of burghs which had their own Acts—Local Authorities who were really the authors of those Acts. It was natural that the authors of those Acts should be in love with them, and should think they were the perfection of municipal government. He frankly admitted that in many aspects the clauses of these Local Acts were most useful for local purposes. Some of the clauses referring to police offences were useful, no doubt; but there were other clauses in the Private Acts of a different character. Many of them were most indefensible encroachments upon private rights, and upon the liberty of the subject under the Common Law; and it was only last year—as had already been noticed that night—that the House had found that the practice of putting these indefensible stipulations into Private Bills had reached to such a height that it was compelled to interfere and prevent the practice from going further. He would only give the House one instance of the way in which these clauses in the private measures acted to the detriment of the people living in neighbouring towns. The Burgh of Edinburgh had obtained a very strict and stringent private Police Act in 1875. In that Act there were clauses referring to the regulation of improper houses. Those clauses were of such a nature that raids were made on the houses, and the inmates were driven out of the Burgh of Edinburgh. The burgh which he represented (Leith) lay contiguous to Edinburgh, the division line being often only a formal one running down the centre of a street; and what was the consequence to Leith of this exceptional clause, which had been slipped into the Edinburgh Act merely because there was no one present to prevent it, the Bill being passed as a private measure? In fact, with regard to that Private Bill the Earl of Redesdale in "another place" declared that if anyone lifted his little finger against it, he would prevent the Bill being passed, saying also—"If Edinburgh is unanimous in demanding such a Bill I must give it to them; but God forbid that I should ever find myself in Edinburgh after this Bill has been passed!" To such an extent had this exceptional legislation on the part of Edinburgh acted to the detriment of Leith that the state of things had become intolerable. A Memorial had been presented by the inhabitants of the districts in Leith which these people had invaded, stating the condition of things brought about by these persons in the neighbourhood. This district was immediately adjoining Edinburgh, and the Memorialists complained that since the Act came into operation in 1875 they had been sorely afflicted by these people, and that there were now in the district 59 brothels, containing 177 prostitutes, conducted in the most shameless manner, and exercising a most injurious influence, the behaviour of the inmates, even in the broad daylight in Leith Walk and other places, being most indecent. They added that the effect had been to lower the value of property in the neighbourhood, to drive respectable people away, and alter entirely the character of the locality. Now, he would not say for a moment that it was in the power of that House to put down immorality; but he did say that Parliament was bound to interfere to compel each different locality to bear its own burden of the mischief, and to prevent its neighbours from being inundated by its moral sewage. The proposal in this Bill to make the keeping of an improper house an offence, and to make the penalties uniform throughout the country, would have that effect; and he trusted the Lord Advocate would not be turned aside by any selfish representations on the part of large towns, such as Edinburgh, from using every effort to pass the Bill into law in the present Session.

Mr. H. H. FOWLER said, that having sat on the Committee of 1882, and for 30 days this Session on a similar Committee, he should like to say a few words on the facts of the question. The Scotch Bill which came before the Committee of 1882 was, without any exception, the worst of them all, and the most grotesque; and he should be within the mark if he said that the Committee struck out 100 clauses from that Bill. They were very much assisted in that by the Lord Advocate. He agreed in the necessity for some general legislation with reference to sanitary matters, and the Report of the Committee strongly urged that with reference to England and Wales. This was an attempt, and a very praiseworthy attempt, on the part of the Lord Advocate to secure general legislation for Scotland; but he wanted to ask the Government how they were going to deal with this as a practical matter of business when winding up the affairs of the Session? This was not, as he understood it, exceptional legislation, but a general enactment of what the House thought should be the law which ought to prevail in Scotland; and no doubt it would be argued that if it was good for Scotland it was good for England and Wales. The Bill had been sent to a Select Committee, which he thought most unfortunately sat with closed doors. The Committee only sat for nine or ten days; and, therefore, it must be assumed that there was a vast mass of matter still demanding consideration, if they were to pass any general legislation which would be quoted as a precedent. Several of the clauses which had been read that night had been struck out unanimously by the Committee of which he was a Member, for they would not allow them to apply to England, considering them improper and oppressive. The Members of that Committee could not sit still and be parties to passing for Scotland enactments which they had reported ought not to be applied to England. There were 429 clauses in this Bill; it was now 2 o'clock on the 30th of July; when the Government had got their last Vote in Supply they would bring in the Appropriation Bill and close the Session with a view to the Autumn Session; and, valuable as this Bill might be, was there any reasonable prospect of its receiving that consideration which it deserved and ought to have? He did not think Scotland would suffer by the Bill standing over for six months for consideration. That interval would enable Local Authorities to give it careful consideration and suggest Amendments next Session, and the Bill next year would have that moral support which it had not at the present time, and would be the more likely to secure the general approbation of the House. He hoped the Government would say whether they thought that on the 30th of July, when they were intending to wind up the Session within a few days, they could pass a contentious Bill containing between 400 and 500 clauses; and whether they could expect the House to give time and attention to a portion of the Bill, and then turn round and say it was useless to attempt to proceed with it. He thought they had a right to ask the Government to say either that they would go on with the Bill to the bitter end, even to the end of August, or that they would abandon it now.

Mr. J. A. CAMPBELL agreed with many hon. Members that some Bill of this kind was required in Scotland; but he also agreed that this Bill was of too voluminous a character, and dealt with subjects too complicated, to be properly considered at that period of the Session. It must also be considered that the Bill was not known in Scotland in its present form, for it had been considerably altered by the Committee, and Scotch Members were receiving letters from Scotland every day with regard to it, showing that there was a good deal of dissatisfaction with many of the alterations made by the Committee. It would, he thought, be a misfortune if a measure of this kind was rushed through Parliament at the end of the Session; and it would, therefore, be better to postpone legislation upon this subject until the country had had a fuller opportunity of considering the Bill in its altered form. He hoped the Lord Advocate would reconsider his decision, and agree to postpone this measure until another Session.

Mr. JACOB BRIGHT said, he thoroughly agreed with every word of the appeal of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). It should be remembered that a considerable majority of Members were against this Bill, and had announced that they would vote against it. Four or five of the Members who had spoken that night had deprecated proceeding with it further. Some Members from Scotland surrounding him had said a good deal in favour of the Bill; but they would vote with the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood); and, therefore, under all the circumstances, it would, he thought, be unreasonable to go on with it now.

MR. GRAY observed, that it was commonly said to require a surgical operation to get a joke into the head of a Scotchman; but after looking at this Bill he thought there was no truth in that saying. The Bill contained some of the most comical provisions. Clause 329 provided a penalty against "any person who attempts to commit a falsehood." He supposed the Bill only applied to Scotchmen, as Scotchmen in Scotland, and within a special district.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the hon. Member had been misled by the punctuation. "Falsehood and fraud" was the name in Scotland for the well-known crime of swindling.

MR. GRAY said, he presumed that the penalty would only apply to a certain district. Then the police regulations in Part VII. were of the most extraordinary character. A boy who dropped a piece of orange peel, or laid hold of the end of a cart without the express permission of the owner, and so on, was to be punished by a fine of 40s. Really, to ask the House of Commons at the end of the Session to discuss all those details was something too preposterous. There was a provision against cruelty to animals, and another providing a penalty for anyone who drove a bull through the streets unless the bull had a ring through its nose, which, of course, was not at all cruelty to the beast. If these provisions were intended to be enforced they were really of a most tyrannical character. For instance, a medical man must not send out circulars even enclosed in envelopes, without being liable to penalties. He did not wish to detain the House; but there was a provision that any person who hung from the back of any cart or carriage was to be punished; and, again—

"If any persons shall stand together in the street so as to annoy foot passengers"— not so as to obstruct them, but only so as to annoy them—they were to be liable to punishment; and—he should be fined. In fact, under this Bill people might be fined for anything. The only excuse for these provisions was, he supposed, that the Bill was not intended to be carried out. No person might have a bagatelle or a billiard-table. With regard to the regulations for disorderly houses, no doubt the special constituency which the hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) represented would desire to have some regulations of that kind after the history he had given; but after the statistics that had been given he thought no one else would desire to impose such ridiculous regulations as these. It could not be seriously intended to enforce the provisions of the Bill. Any person finding any goods and not giving them up was to be subject to a penalty. He did not think it could be seriously intended to enforce that.

"If any person loiters, sits, or lies, on the footway to the annoyance of the foot passengers,"

MR. ILLINGWORTH asked for some authoritative statement as to the prospect before the House. It would be objectionable for English Members to interfere with Scotch Business, and he did not mean to do so, except to say that it would be a most extraordinary thing if a Bill of this magnitude should be passed through Parliament without any proper public discussion; without even a discussion on the second reading, and after a few Sittings of a Committee upstairs, and without any Reports of their proceedings having been published. If the Bill was a valuable one it must not be pushed through at the tail end of the Session, but must be deliberately entered upon. His object in speaking was to ask what the Government intended to do with regard to general Business. To go on with this Bill seemed to him a breach of the understanding generally arrived at. It was understood that contentious Business was not to be proceeded with, and that the Government were strongly opposed to any such Business being entered upon. He would like to know why the Home Secretary had withdrawn his London Government Bill if that was not the case. If they were to enter upon any Bill of length and importance, that Bill, having advanced so far, was entitled to be taken up. He was satisfied that nothing would be lost by taking the winter for a fair and careful consideration of this measure, and that it could be entered upon early next Session, and passed with greater satisfaction than was now possible.

MR. DILLWYN said, he thought the House had a right to a categorical answer to the question of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler)—namely, whether the Government did or did not intend to carry this Bill to its conclusion? If they did, the House must prepare to sit until September. If they did not, they were wasting time, and it was not fair to ask Members to make a House for them to take up Bills which they did not intend to push to a legitimate end. He hoped that before the House went into Committee the Government would give some answer to that question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Of course, the Government are in the hands of the House, and more particularly of the Scotch Members, upon a measure of this kind. Certainly, the Government had very strong reason to believe with reference to this Bill that there was—I will not say a unanimous, but—a predominant agreement on the part of Scotch Members in favour of this Bill; but when the Division is taken we shall see what the opinion of the Scotch Members is, and, of course, the Government will be guided very much by the result of the Division. Everybody knows that a Bill of this kind affords opportunities for opposition; but certainly this Bill having been through a Select Committee, we supposed that, with the exception of several large towns in Scotland which had Bills of their own, and did not want any general Bill, the greater part of Scotland was in favour of this Bill, and wanted it. The Government were prepared to go as far as they could to try to pass this Bill into law this Session; but this question must be decided very much by the Division about to be taken.

The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 32: Majority 26.—(Div. List, No. 193.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Mr. Illingworth

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. M'LAREN: I beg to move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.—(Mr. M'Laren.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): We will agree to reporting Progress after the 1st clause is disposed of.

Clause 1 agreed to.

MR. GRAY: It is moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

CHARTERED COMPANIES BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Solicitor General.)

[BILL 304.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I would appeal to the House to allow the Bill to be read a third time—looking at the period of the Session, and at the fact that the measure is only a small one.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) (DISTRICTS) BILL.—[BILL 311.]

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not think there was much harm in the Bill. It seemed to him to afford a great opportunity to the Executive for removing a blot in the Public Health Act by which Town Commissioners were precluded from borrowing money to build Town Halls unless they were sanitary authorities. That was a most absurd state of things. It was a mistake in the legislation of the past, and the Government ought to pass a Bill and rectify the error as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].

(Mr. Attorney General.)

[BILL 307.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I understand there is no opposition to the House going into Committee on this Bill; but the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), I believe, desires to move an Amendment in Committee. I shall, therefore, propose to take the Committee stage pro forma—moving at once, when in Committee, to report Progress.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (REPEAL,
&c.) BILL.—[BILL 254.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

MR. HIBBERT said, there were three Amendments, two being meant to amplify and explain an Amendment in the 4th clause of the Bill by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), the others being merely explanatory as to auditors.

MR. WARTON said, he merely wished to complain that no means were adopted to bring before the notice of the House what the Lords' Amendments were—not only in the case of this Bill, but in the case of all other Bills. There were no Amendments on the Paper to-day, and no one, but, he supposed, those in charge of the Bill, had any opportunity of knowing what the Amendments were. He must acknowledge the courtesy with which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Hibbert) had met him; but he must insist that the House should be afforded some better opportunity than at present existed of knowing what was going on between the one House and the other. It was very doubtful whether anyone but himself and the hon. Member (Mr. Hibbert) knew what, in the present instance, the Lords' Amendments were. To his mind it was a serious defect in the procedure of the House that there was no way of informing hon. Members, as they ought to be informed, of what was going on, and what Amendments were being considered.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

INFANTS' BILL.—[BILL 308.]

(Mr. Bryce, Mr. Horace Davey, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Staveley Hill.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. BRYCE: I move that this Bill, as amended, be now considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."—(Mr. Bryce.)

MR. WARTON: I rise to Order—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bryce) is in charge of the Bill; he has a right to make the Motion.

MR. WARTON: I have a right to be heard. I have given Notice of a Motion to re-commit the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bryce) is in Order.

MR. WARTON: I have a right to be heard.

MR. SPEAKER: That is not the case; the hon. and learned Gentleman is disorderly.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to move that this Bill be re-committed with respect to a new Clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be re-committed in respect of a new Clause (Court may make orders as to custody)."—(Mr. Bryce.)

MR. WARTON: With the utmost deference, Mr. Speaker, I beg to call your attention to the fact that, under Standing Order 375, I was entitled to move my Motion. The words of the Standing Order are very distinct indeed, as it appears to me; and I now put it to you whether the fact of the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill having put down one Amendment has not precluded him from the right to re-commit the Bill generally?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member for Bridport is entitled to raise this question. He can move to leave out the words "in respect of a new Clause;" and, if the Motion is carried, he can move the general re-commitment of the Bill.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he did not know what the form of the Motion before the House was, as it was not on the Paper; but he desired to move that the Bill be re-committed as a whole, or to strike out the words "in respect of a new Clause." He wished to call attention to the manner in which the Bill was carried through the Committee last week. It was considered two days—first on Tuesday, and the Committee was then ordered for Thursday; but, by subsequent arrangement, the day was altered to Friday, and the consequence of that, to his (Mr. Tomlinson's) knowledge, was that several hon. Members who had intended to take part in the discussion in Committee were not present. It was probably owing to that circumstance that the Bill came before them in its present form, a form which all must confess a very awkward one. Clause 3, it seemed to him, was in a shape which was quite nonsensical. The hon. and learned Member in charge of the Bill had given Notice of two new Clauses on Report, and there were a large number of Amendments, some of which, he submitted, were necessary to make the measure a workable one. If the Bill was to pass at all, it was very unfortunate that they should have all these Amendments on Report.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "in respect of a new Clause."
—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. WARTON said, he was very sorry that he should have appeared disorderly in trying to press a point on Mr. Speaker when Mr. Speaker did not think he was right in so doing. He (Mr. Warton) had given Notice of his Motion; he did not wish to argue the point; but desired to apologize if he had been disorderly in putting to Mr. Speaker what he thought he was entitled to put. He was within the hearing of Members who were present late on Friday night, when the Solicitor General took a lively interest in the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman, it would be remembered, was opposed to reporting Progress, a Motion for which was made because there was an extraordinary clause in the Bill, a clause which had not met with the approval of the House. There had been a dispute as to whether the clause should be withdrawn or Progress should be reported. Ultimately the clause was withdrawn, on the understanding that it should be brought forward again in a modified form. He found to-day that very slight alteration had been made in accordance with the Amendment proposed by himself to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). The obnoxious provision had only been slightly altered. But, irrespective of that, it was obviously the feeling of the Committee with regard to the Bill—which was an important one, affecting the relations existing between husband and wife, between father and mother and child, and bringing up a great number of important questions—that it should not be gone on with this Session. The 2nd clause had been cut out, and was to be very materially altered; and, seeing that it was such an important measure, interfering so seriously with domestic relations, it should not be proceeded with at so late an hour in the morning; but, under any circumstances, it was important that it should go back to Committee, for the reason that, on Report, Members could only speak once on each Amendment. They could have fairer, fuller, and freer discussion in Committee, and could lay their heads together and see what could be done to improve the Bill. The Solicitor General was very fair and candid in the matter on Friday; and he (Mr. Warton) would put it to him whether the Bill should not be now re-committed?

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to make an observation on a point of procedure and Order. He believed that all the objection the last time the Bill was before them was to a particular clause now withdrawn. It had been omitted by the hon. and learned Member in charge of the measure, and another was to be substituted for it. What he wanted to know was, where they were to see this new clause? It was not on the Paper.

MR. BRYCE: It is on the Paper.

COLONEL NOLAN: The clause moved last time?

MR. BRYCE: No; the substituted clause.

COLONEL NOLAN: That, then, is satisfactory.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 6: Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 194.)

Main Question put.

Bill re-committed.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BRYCE said, he had to move the new Clause—"Court may make orders as to custody." It provided that the Court might, on application, make order for the custody of the infant. He had omitted all reference to the question of religion and education, to which objection was taken at the last Sitting, and he hoped the Committee would see no objection now to accepting it.

New Clause:—

(Court may make orders as to custody.)

"The court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant, having regard to the welfare of the infant, and to the conduct of the parents, and to the wishes as well of the mother as of the father, and may alter, vary, or discharge such order on the application of either parent, or, after the death of either parent, of any guardian under this Act,"—brought up, and read the first time.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported, as amended.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. BRYCE said, the clause of which he had given Notice he moved in consequence of a suggestion of the Solicitor General. It had reference to the removal of proceedings and to appeals, giving either party to a case power to make application for the removal of the case from the County Court, or in Scotland from the Sheriff's Court, to the Superior Court—namely, the High Court of Justice in England or Ireland, or to the Court of Session in Scotland. Precedents in regard to the removal of cases had been followed in either case. There was also a provision for an appeal from the County Court or Sheriff's Court decisions to the Superior Court in England, Ireland, or Scotland.

New Clause:—

(As to removing proceedings and appeals.)

"(In England and Ireland when any application has been made under this Act to a county court the High Court of Justice may, at the instance of any party to such application, order such application to be removed to the High Court of Justice and there proceeded with before a judge of the Chancery Division, on such terms as to costs or otherwise as it may think proper.

"In England and Ireland an appeal shall lie to the High Court of Justice from any order made by a county court under this Act; and, subject to any Rules of Court made after the passing of this Act, any such appeal shall be heard by a judge of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice at Chambers or in Court, as he shall direct.

"In Scotland any application made under this Act to a sheriff court may be removed to the court of session, at the instance of any party, in the manner provided by and subject to the conditions prescribed by the ninth section of 'The Sheriff Court (Scotland) Act, 1877.'

"In Scotland an appeal shall lie to either division of the court of session from any order made by a sheriff court under this Act."—(Mr. Bryce.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. WARTON said, his objection was in regard to the jurisdiction of the County Court under this Act. It was rather an awkward manner of discussing the point on this Amendment. He was sure the hon. and learned Member did not wish to get the consent of the House beforehand, so that they would come to the consideration of the point with hands tied. It was obvious they could not give it the same consideration they could in Committee. But he had a great objection to any jurisdiction of the County Court whatever—it would be better in such cases to go at once to the High Court. In so far as this clause involved the County Court, he thought this clause was unnecessary; and he submitted to the hon. and learned Member that the fairer way to decide the point would be to withdraw the clause now, and to introduce it as a sub-section at the end of the 6th section; because those who attacked the clause altogether could raise the question fairly there, for though this was a new clause, logically it would come after the 6th clause, and should not be introduced on a previous Amendment. If the House did not pass the clause now, he should, in one sense, be sorry; for if the House adhered to the retention of the County Court jurisdiction which the Committee adopted in Clause 6, of course there would be no objection to this clause; as a part of and necessary pendant to Clause 6, it would be a very proper provision indeed. But the objection now was it committed the House in advance, and tied them down to the 6th section. For his own part, he might say it was his intention to strike out County Courts, for he was quite sure it was an improper tribunal to be intrusted with jurisdiction over such delicate points as these. He did not know what view the Solicitor General might take; he should like to have it, for it would very much guide his (Mr. Warton's) opinion. What he submitted now was that if the House assented to this clause they committed themselves to Clause 6, whereas if it were withdrawn now it could very well be introduced at the end of Clause 6.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the course he proposed to take was to propose certain Amendments to the clause to make it clear—which he did not feel it was at present—that any party to the application should have the right to remove the case to the Superior Court. At present the clause stood—"the High Court of Justice may, at the instance of any party, &c."; he would have it made clear that parties were entitled to have it removed. Safe-guarded in that way they might leave the County Court with jurisdiction safely where no party objected.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he regretted the Solicitor General had proposed this Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) explained he had not done so yet.

MR. INCE said, he thought the question would be better considered after Clause 6. He thought the hon. and learned Member had not improved his Bill by putting in the reference to County Courts. In cases of dispute between husband and wife it was as well there should be a little difficulty and some expense before the parties could rush into Court. He should be prepared to strike out the words "or County Court of the district," his object being not in the slightest way to cast a doubt upon the County Court, but simply because, if disputes arose, there should be a little difficulty in the way before the parties could make those disputes public by rushing into Court, giving a little time for reflection and for the bitterness to pass away. The practitioners in County Courts were not of the highest class, and he thought it was very undesirable that second or third-rate attorneys should be brought into actions of this kind. The more a little difficulty, and even a little expense, could be introduced, the better for all parties it would be in the long run. He would ask the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) to defer further consideration of the clause, to postpone it to the 6th clause, in order that the House might not be fettered when they approached the consideration of that.

MR. TOMLINSON said, an appeal had been made to the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets to take the clause after Clause 6; he would like to ask the Speaker's ruling, could not the House accede to that? His desire was to put the Bill in the best form possible.

MR. SPEAKER: That cannot be done.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he proposed to amend the clause in the second line by leaving out the words "the High Court of Justice may, at the instance of;" and then, in the next line, after "application," to leave out "order such application to," and insert, "shall be entitled to an order of the High Court of Justice that such application shall." So the clause would run thus—

"In England and Ireland, when any application has been made under this Act to a County Court, any party to such application shall be entitled to an order of the High Court of Justice that such application shall be removed to the High Court of Justice," and so on. That would make it clear it was a matter of right. And then, in the next line but one, he would propose to leave out the words after "division." He did not think there should be any other power but the absolute right of removal from the County Court to the High Court.

Amendment proposed, in line 2 of new Clause, to leave out the words "the High Court of Justice may, at the instance of."—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the new Clause."

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he regretted the Solicitor General had proposed this Amendment. He quite recognized the desire that there should be a line drawn beyond which applications should be to the High Court, and, of course, there was no line that could be defined by value; but, at the same time, those who were interested in this Bill felt that it was a Bill for the benefit of the poor as well as the rich—perhaps mainly for the benefit of the poor. Though it might be quite true, as the hon. and learned Member for Hastings (Mr. Ince) said, that County Court jurisdiction might not always be administered with that nicety and precision which characterized the High Court, still people did appreciate the County Courts whose purses were not long enough to go to the High Court. He regretted that the Solicitor General made it compulsory for the Court to make an order, for the effect would be in some cases to deprive those persons whose purses were not long of the benefit of the Act. An applicant to a County Court, perhaps, might not have the means of applying to the Higher Court; and the other side might then, having larger means, by the transfer to the High Court, deprive the applicant of justice. But they were at the mercy of the Government in respect of the Bill. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bryce) would have an opportunity of speaking; perhaps, in the interest of the Bill, he would accept the Amendment; but if his hon. and learned Friend divided against it he should support him. As a matter of drafting, he would suggest to the Solicitor General that, with less alteration of the clause, his object would be accomplished by substituting the word "shall" for the word "may."

MR. HEALY said, speaking with some knowledge of the County Courts of Ireland, and their manner of administering justice, he strongly endorsed what the Solicitor General had said.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he agreed the Amendment would result in a denial to many of the benefit of the Act. In cases of a struggle between man and wife, it was ten to one the husband had the heaviest purse, and the wife small means of asserting her right. In going to a County Court, the result would very likely be the parties would be satisfied with the fair decision of the County Court Judge, and he should have hoped this was the case in Ireland as well as England; if they were not satisfied, there was still an appeal open. But now, instead of that, there would be the means in the hands of the party who wished to delay the matter to say—"No, it shall be removed to the High Court in the Metropolis or in Dublin." He extremely regretted the Amendment had been moved.

MR. BRYCE regretted the line the Solicitor General had taken, and he thought it would considerably impair the value of the Bill; but at that hour of the night and time of the Session it would be useless to oppose the suggestion from the Government Bench, and he should not oppose the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it must be remembered this proposal in respect to the County Court having jurisdiction was only an afterthought; it was not in the original Bill.

MR. INCE said, he had some doubt if the Amendment really carried out the Solicitor General's intention. There would be always a dispute whether the case should be heard in a Superior Court or not, interlarding another dispute to the one in existence. Would it not be better to introduce after "shall" the words "as a matter of course," or "as a matter of right?" That would carry out the intention which, as he understood it, was that, as a matter of course, it should be carried to the Superior Court. If the words were left as they stood, there would always be a preliminary dispute as to whether it was a case to be taken to the Superior Court or not.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, perhaps the simpler way would be to substitute "shall" for "may." It was sometimes objected that to make it peremptory and say "the High Court shall," was not respectful to the High Court; but he did not see much in the objection himself. He would, with the leave of the House, withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in line 2 of the new Clause, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."
—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 5 of new Clause, to leave out the words "or otherwise."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he did not quite know whether his Amendment would now come in; it was to add, after the word "Division," the words—

"Or, in the case of any application within the County Palatine of Lancaster, to the Court of Chancery of the County of Lancaster."

He wished to introduce this, for it was a Court that for many centuries had had jurisdiction over infants, and was perfectly competent to have that jurisdiction; and it had the advantage that it lay at the door ready of access to parties.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot move the Amendment as he proposes; the House has passed the point at which he wishes to insert his Amendment, and has omitted subsequent words.

MR. TOMLINSON said, then he would move the Amendment at the end of the sixth line after the word "Justice." The Amendment would then apply to appeals; and he urged it for the reasons he had given.

Amendment proposed,

In line 6, after the word "Justice," to insert the words, "or, in the case of any application within the County Palatine of Lancaster, to the Court of Chancery of the County of Lancaster."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he should now move the insertion of the new clause, of which he had given Notice, after Clause 3. The House was well aware by this time that the Bill effected very great changes in the law relating to infants; and he thought that parties entering into the state of matrimony would have before them the state of things applicable to their own case; and, under the circumstances, it was only fair and right that persons should have the power of determining, by ante-nuptial settlement, the relations they wished to exist in the event of premature death, which might happen shortly after marriage. He thought it essential, in view of the change in the law, that parties should have the power of making such provision as they thought proper.

New Clause:—

(Power to appoint guardians by ante-nuptial settlement.)

"It shall be competent for all persons in contemplation of marriage, by ante-nuptial settlement or agreement for settlement, to make provision for the guardianship of the infant children of the marriage; and in such cases sections two and three of this Act, so far as they are inconsistent with such provisions, shall not apply,"—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. BRYCE said, he hoped the House would not agree to the second reading of this clause, which was quite contrary to the principle of the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. WARTON said, the next new clause standing in his name was intended to provide for the religious education of children by deed or marriage settlement executed before marriage. If a father promised to bring up his children in a certain religion, and afterwards broke that promise, he could avail himself of the Common Law right. It seemed to him that the clause was very necessary, because without it there would be no means of carrying out the wishes of the parents with regard to the religion of their children. The effect of the clause would be to prevent hasty promises being made, and afterwards broken. The clause of which he begged to move the second reading was as follows:—

"Any contract made, or covenant entered into, by means of any deed or marriage settlement executed before, and in contemplation of, marriage, touching the religion, education, or guardianship of any child or children to be born of such marriage, shall prevail over the provisions of this Act."

MR. ANDERSON rose to Order. He asked whether this clause, if not in the same words, was not substantially the same as the clause which had just been negatived?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not see any difference between the two clauses. The Motion of the hon. and learned Member cannot be put.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, to leave out the words "and shall come into operation on its passing."—(Mr. Warton.)

Amendment negatived.

MR. TOMLINSON said, it was now by Statute a rule of construction that the masculine included the feminine, but the neuter included neither the feminine nor the masculine. In line 10 of Clause 2, the word "its" occurred, and as it was not customary except in the case of very young children to speak of infants as of the neuter gender, he should move that the word "his" be substituted for "its."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, to leave out the word "its," and insert the word "his."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question, "That the word 'its' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON said, he had to propose an Amendment to Clause 3, which did not make it at all clear that it was to apply when the parents of the infants were living together. However repugnant the idea of divorce might be, yet divorce was the law of the land. It was quite clear that marriages were dissolved in two ways by law—sometimes by divorce, and sometimes by judicial separation. He wanted to know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman who brought in this Bill had considered for a moment the positions of parties who, although married, were separated by the law? He did not speak of those who separated themselves, but of those who were judicially separated—that was to say, persons separated by order of the law; because it was the duty of those otherwise separated to come together. Had the hon. and learned Gentleman considered whether a person divorced on the ground of cruelty or adultery was to have the same rights as a person only judicially separated, or did he consider that the words were sufficiently wide to cover this case? If not, he hoped the hon. and learned Solicitor General would interpose the weight of his authority in favour of his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, before the word "each," to insert the words "while the marriage is subsisting, and before any decree or order for divorce or judicial separation has been made."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BRYCE said, the point raised by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member was, no doubt, important; but he and his hon. Friend had considered it, and come to the conclusion that that case was met by the 35th section of the existing Act, and they were, therefore, unwilling to disturb the wording of the clause.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he felt bound to state that the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman did not satisfy him. The Act referred to related to a state of things which would cease when the present Bill became law. They must remember that this Bill was introduced for the purpose of changing the law with regard to infants, and he did not understand how it could be said that under the previous Act the Court had power to deal with the cases contemplated by the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

Question put.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

HULL, BARNSELEY, AND WEST RIDING JUNCTION RAILWAY AND DOCK (MONEY) BILL.

CONSIDERATION. THIRD READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the case of the Hull, Barnsley, and West Riding Junction Railway and Dock (Money) Bill, Standing Orders 84, 207, 214, 215, and 229 be suspended, and that the Bill be now taken into consideration, provided amended prints shall have been previously deposited."—(Colonel Gerard Smith.)

MR. PULESTON said, he had no desire to occupy the time of the House, nor did he wish unnecessarily to divide the House upon this Bill, and he was perfectly prepared to state his views in opposition to the measure yesterday. He might say that he had no personal interest whatever in the Bill, nor was he acquainted with anyone who was directly or indirectly concerned in it. His opposition to it was based entirely upon a question of procedure, and he would venture to suggest that the hon. and gallant Member for Wycombe (Colonel Gerard Smith) should give some reason why he proposed that all the Standing Orders of the House should be suspended by wholesale for the purpose of passing, in this way, a Bill of very great importance, the provisions of which were at variance with all the Forms of the House and with Parliamentary usage. It also ignored some very important principles laid down by the Standing Orders for the conduct of Private Business. The promoters of the Bill applied to Parliament for power to create Debenture

Stock to the extent of £1,500,000, and hitherto the rule upon which Debenture Stock was granted had been rigidly enforced by Parliament—namely, that a proportionate amount of share capital should also be issued. As he understood, this Company had already passed a Bill which sanctioned the issue of this £1,500,000; but they had failed to issue it under the name of Preference Stock. They, therefore, came to the House for power to call it Debenture Stock. Now, he thought it was only reasonable that there should be very strong reasons assigned before the House consented, in a hurried manner, at a late period of the Session, to accede to a request to suspend by wholesale every Standing Order of the House in such an important case as this. The Standing Orders required that a Bill should have been printed three clear days before the House was asked to consider it; and, further, that the third reading and the consideration of it should not be taken on the same day. There were one or two other Standing Orders which also involved important principles, but which were proposed to be set aside exceptionally in this case. He thought it was necessary, before the House consented to the Resolution proposed by the hon. and gallant Member, that they should have a statement of the main provisions of the Bill, and know why this extraordinary course was proposed to be taken. He certainly must protest against such an attempt to promote Private Bill Legislation, and to occupy the time of the House by stretching its Rules to a point never previously proposed. He might further state, for the information of the House, that the Company promoting the Bill had already had, during the Session, two Bills before the House, one of which only obtained the Royal Assent last month, and it was certainly competent for the Company to have included in that Bill the provisions now asked for, instead of leaving an important matter of this kind to the last days of the Session, and then rushing the Bill through the House at railroad speed, in violation of every Rule and Standing Order of the House, and in violation of the fixed principle he had referred to—that a proportionate amount of shares should accompany the issue of Debenture Stock. The Bill, utterly regardless of the interests either of shareholders, or debenture-holders, or of the time of the House, involved an innovation in the legislation of Parliament which ought not to be sanctioned. Having said so much, he would add that he had no desire whatever, in opposition to the opinion of the House, to call for a Division; and he thought a Division might be avoided if the hon. and gallant Member who had charge of the Bill would assign any adequate reason for departing from the usual course of Business in that House.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he thought it was desirable that he, as one of the Members of the Committee appointed to deal with the Bill, should make an early statement as to what the facts were. It appeared to him that the opposition of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Puleston) ought to have been directed against the suspension of the Standing Orders on the second reading of the Bill. The House, however, had determined that they would take the Bill into consideration. They had appointed a Committee to consider it, and had instructed that Committee to inquire into its provisions. The Committee sat for two days, and did not dispose of the Bill in any hurried manner whatever. Four hours each day they devoted to a consideration of the Bill, and they listened to the bondholders' view of the subject, because the bondholders were represented before them by counsel. He could only say that the Committee were unanimous in passing the Preamble of the Bill. The fact was, as far as the Committee were able to make things out, that the original promoters of the undertaking had miscalculated the cost which was involved in the construction of the works. It was also mentioned that they had suffered indirectly from losses which no prudence or foresight could have guarded against, and which no precaution, as far as he could see, would have prevented. Under those circumstances, the Committee unanimously decided that the Preamble of the Bill was proved. They took pains, however, to insert clauses in the Bill, by means of which the interests of the bondholders were protected in the fullest way; and they also took precautions to provide that the money to be raised under the Bill should be devoted entirely to the completion of the original projected line from Barnsley to Hull. As he had said, they devoted two days to the consideration of the measure, and they were not responsible for the suspension of the usual Forms of the House. Whatever injury was done to the Forms of the House, the House itself had done with its eyes open. He would add, however, that a vast amount of injury would be done if, after the Committee had arrived at the conclusion they had, solely upon the merits of the case, the House were now to reject the Bill. If the House decided that the Standing Orders ought not to be suspended, the labours of the Committee would have been entirely thrown away.

MR. PULESTON said, he begged his hon. Friend's pardon. The Committee had nothing whatever to do with the suspension or non-suspension of the Standing Orders.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, the House had decided to suspend the Standing Orders, and had referred the Bill to a Committee; and that Committee now, in accordance with the reference to them, suggested that the Standing Orders might be further suspended, in order that the Bill might pass through its financial stages.

MR. PULESTON said, he maintained that the Committee had nothing to do with the proposal for suspending the Standing Orders of the House.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he would admit that the suspension of the Standing Orders was a very grave proceeding; but this was a very peculiar emergency, and one in which the House might easily concede the request now made, without inflicting any great amount of injury upon the regularity and safety of their proceedings. All he would say was that he was under the impression—and he believed it was the impression of the entire body of the Committee—that it was fair and right to give this important undertaking the chance of going on. The Committee had been assured, on unquestionable evidence, that the expenditure of the sum now asked for would be sufficient to complete the railway and convert it into a going concern, turning that which was at the present moment an unprofitable and unsuccessful undertaking into one of profit and success. At any rate, that was the view taken by the Committee. He hoped, therefore, that the House would agree to suspend the Standing Orders, and allow the Bill to proceed. The difficulties which had been stated in regard to the conduct of this Bill were very considerable. A large amount of money had been laid out, and the suspension of the works upon the railway would necessitate, if not the final abandonment of the scheme, a considerable deterioration of property. The non-construction of the railway would be most injurious to the district which it was intended to serve. It was well known that the railway was greatly desired by a large body of persons who were connected with the locality; and, beyond that, he thought, although he made no charge against anybody, for he had no right to do so, that it was the business of the House to do all it possibly could to assist this struggling railway in competing with larger and more powerful Companies. One of the greatest dangers this country ran was in the monopoly of the great Railway Companies, and in a combination among a few Companies to get the traffic in their own hands. They did not always succeed, even where they had obtained a monopoly, in getting all the gain for themselves; for one of the leading gentlemen connected with a great Railway Company remarked to him the other day that he believed Railway Companies occupied much more of their time in spending £5, in order to prevent competition, than in earning an honest sovereign for themselves. He thought it was the duty of Parliament to assist in the creation of independent lines, as far as possible, and not to throw an obstacle in the way of their being carried out. It was true that there had been a great miscalculation in the case of this line, and that was the reason why the scheme had proved a failure; but, for all that, it was most desirable, in the general interests of the public, that the project should be carried into effect.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he wished to say a very few words on this very important Bill. He quite agreed that, under ordinary circumstances, the suspension of the Standing Orders of the House ought not to be permitted. But the Committee which sat upon this Bill was a Hybrid Committee, and he presumed that fact was due to the very peculiar character of the Bill, it having been considered by the House that the question involved in the measure deserved more serious consideration than Bills which were originally sent to a Private Bill Committee. But he, for one, was not prepared to blink the great question involved in the Bill, because it had been proved to the Committee, even by the leading counsel who promoted the Bill. He would not say that there had been gross extravagance; but there had been very great extravagance in the construction of the line. It was a highly responsible matter for a body of Directors, like those of the Hull and Barnsley Line, having already called up capital to the amount of £4,000,000 of money, not to take every means in their power to see that the works they had undertaken to perform for a certain amount of money were carried out. He was not going to say there might not have been some excuse, but hardly for the great miscalculations they had made; nor did he think, under the circumstances, they deserved any great amount of sympathy. He believed the line might have been constructed at a far less cost, and he only mentioned the matter because he thought it was right that the House and the public should know the real state of the facts, and especially that the shareholders, who had subscribed their money in good faith, on the understanding that the capital was fairly, judiciously, and properly expended, should know what the position of affairs was. That, however, was not a matter with which the Committee had anything to do. What they had to deal with was a line which was very nearly completed. When the main line was laid down, a very important communication would be established between one great centre of industry and another, and he presumed that Parliament had originally granted the undertaking on the ground that it was to be independent of other lines. That was the point of view from which the Committee had to look at the matter, and they had also to consider the interests of the shareholders themselves, who, if this money was not raised, would, in many instances, be absolutely ruined. The Committee took into their consideration whether it was right that the money should be raised, and, if so, under what conditions it should be raised? They did not agree to the Preamble of the Bill, until they had framed in their own minds what should be done, and they insisted upon certain clauses being inserted in the Bill, by means of which important conditions were laid down. First of all, they provided that the present debenture-holders should have their money repaid in full, with all interest, before any other dividends were paid; and they further provided that the new shares to be raised on Debentures should rank after and behind the £1,000,000 of Debentures created by the original scheme. That was the first condition the Committee imposed, and he was of opinion that their intentions were very well carried out by the provisions of the Bill as they now stood. The second condition was that no extension to Huddersfield and Halifax should be carried out until the line between Barnsley and Hull was absolutely completed. The third condition was that the money the Company were authorized to raise should be expended in completing that portion of the line, so that the Company should be able to earn something towards paying the interest on the cost of the construction of one portion of the undertaking. At any rate, until that was done, it was provided that no extra expense should be incurred. They had the assurance of Mr. Forbes that no extra expense should be incurred. ["Oh, oh!"] He heard murmurs; but surely they would all admit that Mr. Forbes knew how to make a pound go as far as any man. He believed the only interest Mr. Forbes had in becoming a Director of the line was to see that it should be put into working order, which was one of the conditions which the Committee had imposed upon the Company. Having seen that these three proposals were embodied in the Bill, the Committee thought it right to pass the Preamble, and to ask the House to accept the Bill. He was not surprised at the remarks which had been made. He had made some strong remarks himself, but it was an exceptional case. He hoped they would never have another case of the kind; and he trusted the House would agree to the recommendation of the Committee, which they themselves—a perfectly independent Committee, who had nothing whatever to do with the line—had agreed to, and that they would allow the Bill to pass through its remaining stages that day.

MR. CROPPER said, that although in some degree he agreed with the remarks which had fallen from the hon.

and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), he felt bound to support the views of the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston). He thought the Committee had given powers to this Company which enabled them to break the ordinary laws and rules which had been long established in regard to railway undertakings, and, especially, that when Debenture Stock was issued it should represent a certain amount of the ordinary and preference shares which had gone before it. If Parliament consented to interfere with those rules, what would be the result? They would inevitably reduce the value of Debenture Stock, and prevent it from having the value it had hitherto invariably possessed with the public of the country. They were calling this Stock by the name of Debenture Stock, whereas it possessed a totally different value from ordinary Debenture Stock. They called it Debenture Stock; but, in reality, it was simply a substitution for Preference stock. He would be one of the last Members of that House to interfere with the decision of a Committee; but he maintained that this question was not intrusted to the Committee, and that they had nothing whatever to do with the suspension of the Standing Orders. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Devonport, that they ought to require the promoters to give very strong reasons indeed before they consented to such extraordinary deviations from the rules which were applied to the construction of railways generally. He had not the smallest interest in this railway, or in any railway remotely connected or concerned in the matter. He looked merely upon the question as one of public policy, and he believed the interests of the public would be best served by protecting them, he would not say from fraud, or fraudulent pretences, but from the issue of Stock under a misleading name, lest it should be accepted by persons too thoughtless to go thoroughly into the matter, but who would find ultimately that what were called Debentures, were only ordinary Preference Stock after all.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he agreed that the matter was one of considerable importance, and that it was one in which the House should not only take interest, but should proceed to legislate upon with caution. He put it to the House whether, in asking the House to deal with hundreds of thousands of pounds, it would not have been only fair and right for the hon. and gallant Member for Wycombe (Colonel Gerard Smith) himself to have explained to the House what the circumstances were under which he came to Parliament for this large sum of money? The hon. and gallant Member was Chairman of the Company. He (Sir Robert Peel) thought it very irregular for the Chairman of a Company to submit the case of the Company to the House. But, in addition to being Chairman of the Company, the hon. and gallant Member was the banker of the Company. Being both Chairman and banker of the Company, he came there in the interests of a particular railway, proposing to deal with hundreds of thousands of pounds, and to ask the House to suspend its Standing Orders, in order that he—independent, of course, and in no way concerned as Chairman and banker—should, at the tail end of the Session, pass this Bill. The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), who spoke from the other side of the House, said that the Committee were unanimous in passing the Preamble of the Bill; but it would not be altogether an unprecedented thing for the House of Commons to reject the unanimous decision of one of their own Committees. There was nothing unusual in such a matter whatever. He recollected himself, many years ago, upsetting the third reading of a Bill which had passed unanimously through Committee, and which had cost £30,000 to the persons promoting the Bill. The hon. Member for Southwark said that the Company, in their original prospectus, had greatly miscalculated the cost of the line. Now, what was the original prospectus? The Hull and Barnsley Railway and Docks Company originally proposed to make a line 50 miles in length. [Colonel GERARD SMITH: 66 miles.] Well, 66 miles. That almost made the case worse. They had not, he believed, completed 55 miles; and the original sum asked for as capital, and which had all been expended, was £4,000,000—£3,000,000 of Stock, and £1,000,000 of Debentures. Now, he did not say there had been any fraud in the matter; but he did say that there had been an attempt to deceive the public, and to induce them to invest in a concern which appeared to him to be rotten at the very core of it. He was speaking from information which had been placed in his hands, and which he had been requested to submit to the House, having no interest himself in the matter. He was told that, in the original prospectus, the capital was fixed at £4,000,000; but that the Company let the works for the construction of 66 miles of line for something like £2,700,000. For that sum, both the railway and the docks were to be completed. It was not intended that the equipment of the line was to be completed for that sum; but £2,700,000 was the amount at which the works were let, and for which they were to be completed. [Colonel GERARD SMITH said, the right hon. Baronet was altogether in error.] He should like to be informed in what way he was in error? There had been no statement from the Chairman and banker of the Company; and, instead of getting up and saying that he (Sir Robert Peel) was completely in error, it would be better for the hon. and gallant Member to rise in his place and state what all the circumstances were. He had seen the original prospectus, and he would defy the hon. and gallant Member to say that the sum of £2,700,000 was not the amount at which the works were let, and for which they were to be completed, except in regard to their equipment. [Colonel GERARD SMITH said, he would only repeat that the right hon. Baronet was in error.] If he was in error on that point, he was not in error in what he was about to say—namely, that this railway never had been completed. It was not completed in January in this year. This same Company tried to raise £3,000,000 at 4 per cent. ostensibly for making a line from Halifax to Huddersfield, but, in reality, as he was informed by those who had invested their money in the Company, to complete the original line and docks. The Company, however, of which the hon. and gallant Member was Chairman and banker, were not to be put aside by one failure. Of course, the banker and Chairman of the Company knew better than that; and, therefore, immediately afterwards the same Company tried to issue Preference Stock to the extent of £1,300,000 at 4 per cent. The shareholders at once said—"That will not do at all;" and, consequently, that scheme of the Chairman and banker was withdrawn. Therefore, there had been two failures in the course of the present year to raise money. But that was not all. In the month of June in this year a third attempt was made by the Company, of which the hon. and gallant Member was Chairman and banker, to raise £1,800,000 at 5 per cent.—at £85. That also failed; and those three attempts to raise money in the present year had been entirely unsuccessful. What would the House suppose was the actual amount subscribed? There was only £75,000 applied for; and in June last the Company issued an announcement that it would require £2,016,000 to complete the original railway of 66 miles between Hull and Barnsley, together with the docks, and yet there was an attempt now to induce the House of Commons to believe that, by the present proposal, £1,500,000 of Debenture Stock would be sufficient to complete and equip the line. At any rate, that was the statement of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers). The hon. Member said that £1,500,000 would be sufficient to complete the railway and docks, and all he (Sir Robert Peel) could say was, that in the announcement made in June last it was clearly stated that £2,016,000 were required to complete it. Of course, he did not say in that House that there was anything underhand, or suspicious, or dishonest in this transaction; but all he would say in the interests of the public—and he had nobody else to consider in the matter—was, that where they were dealing with hundreds of thousands of pounds, where they were asking the public to subscribe to a concern which he maintained, without fear of contradiction, would not bear the light of day, the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who was Chairman and banker of the Company, was bound to get up and state to the House what were the grounds for the extraordinary proceeding he was desirous of inducing the House of Commons to take for the purpose of passing a Bill in which he was himself so directly and primarily interested.

COLONEL GERARD SMITH said, he rose to answer the appeal which had been made to him by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) and the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Peel). The hon. Member for Devonport

(Mr. Puleston) said he thought that he (Colonel Gerard Smith) ought to have given some reason why the Motion had been placed on the Paper. As far as concerned the general course of procedure adopted in regard to the Bill now before the House, he could only say that the promoters of the Bill had, in the first instance, as a matter of course, communicated with the Chairman of Ways and Means. No Motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders could be made without the consent of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, the Chairman of Ways and Means had already given to the House what he (Colonel Gerard Smith) thought were excellent reasons why the Standing Orders should be suspended and facilities given for the introduction and passing of this Bill. The most prominent ground given by the Chairman of Ways and Means was that the state of affairs had become such that, at present, from 5,000 to 6,000 men, either had been, or were about to be, discharged and turned out of employment, thereby creating a considerable amount of distress. The same reasons held good at the present moment. The men had, as a matter of fact, been discharged, and he regretted to say that, unless they could be re-employed, there was every prospect that a considerable amount of distress would be brought about in the locality. He trusted that it would not be of long continuance; but, nevertheless, the fact remained that a very large number of labouring men had actually been discharged. The hon. Member for Devonport asked why the provisions now asked for were not incorporated in the omnibus Bill which the Company had introduced into Parliament at an earlier period of the Session? The reason why they were not so incorporated was that at the time the former Bill was introduced into Parliament and the plans deposited—namely, in the month of November last—the Company were busily engaged in endeavouring to raise money, in the belief that the powers they then possessed were sufficient to enable them to obtain adequate capital for the completion of the works. Under those circumstances, he certainly would not have been a party to putting the provisions, now sought to be obtained, in the omnibus Bill to which reference had been made, because it was perfectly obvious that the Committee which sat on the Bill, and even the House itself, would have declined to sanction such exceptional provisions unless the Company could show that they had exhausted every other means of obtaining the capital which the Legislature had placed at their disposal. Therefore, it had become necessary for the Company, in the first instance, with regard to other and more general arrangements, to deposit a Bill which was nothing more than an omnibus Bill, containing no provision whatever for raising fresh capital. That was his answer to the question the hon. Member for Devonport had put. In regard to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) in reference to the extravagance of the Company, he was, of course, aware that they were open to that charge. He could only say that, in the construction of this great public work, he and his colleagues had turned their constant attention to the most economical mode of proceeding with it. The cost of the work had been very largely increased by expenses which were altogether beyond the control of the Company's engineers. The foundations of the work and the soil that had to be cut through proved harder than they thought even possible, and there were accidents at the docks of a very serious character, involving, in one instance alone, an extra cost of more than £100,000. He could only say that, although, looking back on the matter now, he thought the original estimate adopted was too low, he could not fairly acknowledge any other fault with reference to the price of the work than this—that he and his colleagues had endeavoured to do £5,500,000 worth of work for £4,000,000 of money. He thought that was a great mistake; but he knew that the promoters had cut down the estimates to the lowest possible point, in order that Parliament might not be influenced by any charge of extravagance in the estimates in the consideration of the Bill. In regard to the remarks of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), of course, it was not possible for him (Colonel Gerard Smith) to go into all the provisions of the Company's contracts in that House; but he could assure the right hon. Baronet, in regard to the assertion that the works were let for £2,700,000, without knowing upon what information the right hon. Baronet based his remarks, that they were very wide of the mark. The right hon. Baronet had made some strictures upon his (Colonel Gerard Smith's) position as Chairman and banker of the Company; but he felt certain the House would feel that he and his colleagues had entered into the undertaking solely from a desire to do their best in the interests of the public. The House would remember that they had approached this scheme without any previous experience in railway matters. If they had been, in the outset of the undertaking, able to have obtained the valuable advice they now had, it was probable that many of the errors they had committed would have been avoided, and that they would not have been compelled to ask the House for the assistance they were applying for that day. Perhaps the right hon. Baronet would allow him to assure the House that, owing to the advice and experience which he and his colleagues had now obtained, they would be able to carry on the works with due economy, and to finish them within the sum proposed to be raised by the present Bill. It was also quite true that, some time ago, the estimate for the completion of the works was larger than the sum now asked for. That was because he (Colonel Gerard Smith), with his experience, did not think they could be finished for less; but Mr. Forbes and Mr. Swarbrick, who had now come to the aid of the Directors, and who possessed far more practical knowledge, were of opinion that they could be finished for the sum which had been inserted in the Bill. He was quite content to accept the opinion of those gentlemen upon that point; and he was sure the House would rely, as he himself had relied, upon their judgment and knowledge of railway affairs. He did not suppose that the House would desire that he should detain them any further. He would only add that he trusted, after the Committee had devoted two days to the careful investigation of the Bill, the House itself would not, at the last moment, and upon grounds which had already been fully discussed in the House and adjudicated upon by the Committee, withhold from the Company, whose faults were really due to inexperience, the facilities which were necessary for the completion of the undertaking. He did not ask that those facilities should be given out of sympathy for the Company, but in the interests of the public at large, to whom this work, when completed, would be of the utmost importance.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought the House would be rather struck by the admissions made by the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down (Colonel Gerard Smith); but he thought the House ought not to be allowed to come to a decision upon the matter without some guidance from the Treasury Bench, and especially from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), who was the official guardian not only of the railway interests, but of the public in general. Now, what was the admission of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who was Chairman of the Company? He had said, over and over again, that the difficulties the Directors of the Company had got into were owing to their inexperience in railway matters. "Owing to my inexperience," said the hon. and gallant Gentleman, "I said that certain sums of money were required for the completion of the line, and I found, on experience, that far larger sums were required." Was not that a complete admission on the part of the hon. and gallant Member who represented the Board of Directors, that they had been, up to the present moment, perfectly ignorant of the nature of the duties they had undertaken to discharge in connection with the Company? That was a strong admission; but what were the real facts of the case? This was a very late period of the Session to bring in the Bill; and he thought it was a thousand pities that, if the Company wanted to get the decision of Parliament, they had not come much earlier, when the whole attention of the House might have been given to the question, and not have waited until the House was about to be prorogued.

COLONEL GERARD SMITH said, that not a day had been lost in coming to Parliament the moment the attempt to raise Preference Stock had resulted unfavourably.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought that if the hon. and gallant Member had not been so completely deluded, and devoid of all experience in railway matters, he would have known that the Preference Stock the Company had tried to issue would never be taken by the public, and he would then have come to Parliament much earlier. But what was the state of the case? The Company asked Parliament to grant the issue of £1,500,000 worth of Debenture Stock. Now, Debenture Stock was very peculiar. It was Stock which trustees might invest in, and if the House allowed a Company to issue these Debentures, it would allow them to have command of a source of capital which otherwise they could not attract. He thought the House might judge of the soundness of the concern by the failure of the Company to issue their Preference Stock. They had not been able to do so, although they had offered it to the public on wonderfully favourable terms—£85 for £100 worth of Stock, at 5 per cent. This was the offer they had made to the public—this brilliant and going concern—and the public, instead of subscribing, only took up £75,000. The Company knew well that they were not able to get more money from the ordinary investing public, and they asked the House to allow them to issue this enormous amount of Debenture Stock, so that they might be able to get hold of money now held in trust. That was a matter in regard to which Parliament ought to exercise special and extraordinary precautions. He wished to know if such an offer had ever before been sanctioned? In the first place, the ordinary laws of Parliamentary procedure were against the Company. They had £3,000,000 of original Stock, and £1,000,000 of Debentures, already issued. That was within the ordinary Rules and Standing Orders of Parliament; but now the Company came to Parliament and asked them to suspend the ordinary rules of procedure in the House of Commons in reference to railways, in order to allow the Company to issue £1,500,000 worth more of Debenture Stock, which would bring the Debenture Stock to within £500,000 of the ordinary Stock; and what ground was there for believing that there was any hope of the concern being finished, even if Parliament allowed this sum to be raised? If the hon. and gallant Member was successful in getting Parliament to take this step, he would have to issue his £1,500,000 worth of Debentures at a discount, and, consequently, he would not get the full sum of £1,500,000; and yet he said that he wanted £1,500,000 in order to complete the line. Even if Parliament allowed the issue of these Debentures, they would be obliged to be issued at a discount. The argument was, that if Parliament did not allow the Company to issue this Stock, they would never be able to complete the line; and even if they were permitted to issue it, it appeared to be quite evident that they would have to come again next year, and ask for another £500,000, or £1,000,000, of Debenture Stock for the completion of the work. What would be the position of Parliament then? It seemed to him to be one of the worst cases that could be brought before the House for a relaxation of the ordinary Rules of the House. They had a Company, whose financial management had been an utter failure; and yet an appeal was to be made to the public to place confidence in them again. But the application went still further, because it involved the sanction of Parliament to the withdrawal of trust money, and the Company said—"If you will not allow us to do that, this line will be altogether useless to the public." He maintained that no case as bad as this had ever been presented to Parliament. The promoters had utterly failed to carry out their scheme as it was originally promoted. Then why not follow the ordinary course? Hitherto, when a scheme of this nature had been put forward, and the promoters broke down after having completed a certain portion of the work, somebody else stepped in and wound up the concern; and instead of the money already expended being lost to the public, as the hon. and gallant Member for Wycombe (Colonel Gerard Smith) attempted to make out, the only persons who were lost were the Directors; and he, for one, could not see why Parliament, for the sake of covering and protecting the Directors of this Company, should allow them to make an extraordinary bargain. It was said that the Committee which had investigated the Bill sat for two days. He must say that, considering the peculiar circumstances of the line, its extraordinary history and demands, two days by no means constituted a very long and searching investigation into the financial position of the Company. Everybody knew what happened when it was proposed to appoint a Committee in the last few days of the Session. There was great difficulty in getting a Committee together at all, and as soon as they met, they were desirous of getting away again. He, therefore, did not think that there was anything of importance in the fact that this Committee had come to an unanimous conclusion. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would remember that the interests of the public were to be considered as well as those of the Railway Company. It was not absolutely necessary in the interests of the public that this railway should be completed by the present Board of Directors, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would remember that the source of money which the Directors now proposed to utilize were in all probability of a trust character, in dealing with which Parliament ought to be most chary.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was always somewhat chary in offering advice with regard to Private Bills; but after the appeal which had been made by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), he felt it was only right to say a few words upon the matter. The issue before the House was a very simple one. The facts lay in a nutshell. The Company having expended a large sum—£4,000,000 of money—found that its original estimates were altogether too low, and that it would be impossible to complete works without an additional sum, now calculated at £1,500,000. The noble Lord, who had been very severe upon his (Mr. Chamberlain's) hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wycombe (Colonel Gerard Smith) and the other Directors of the Company, now alleged that they had displayed an utter incapacity of management. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: That was their own admission.] He did not admit the admission. The noble Lord seemed to think that the Directors were convicted of incapacity by their admission that the estimates had been exceeded. All that he (Mr. Chamberlain) could say was, that he had had a good deal of experience as to railway speculations, and he did not know of a single case in which the original estimates had not been exceeded; and if the Directors were to be accused of incapacity because the original estimates had been exceeded, he thought there were very few indeed who would escape condemnation. At all events, a mistake had been made. Nobody would deny that this sum of £1,500,000 was necessary in order that the works might be completed, and nobody denied that the Company had tried, with their existing powers, to raise the money, but had failed to do so; and unless they could create some kind of preference securities, which would stand better in the market than their ordinary Preference Stock, the works would have to be brought to a standstill. The first point he would suggest was that they were not asked to authorize the raising of any additional sum of money, but merely to substitute one form of security for another. The Bill had been sent to a very strong Hybrid Committee, and the proposals contained in the Bill were unanimously adopted by that Committee after careful inquiry, and after taking care to secure the insertion of provisions which should guard the existing interests of the debenture and preference-holders. He was also authorized to say that the matter had been under the consideration of the Chairman of Ways and Means, who had approached the subject originally with something of a hostile prejudice against the proposal; but, after giving to all the bodies concerned his careful consideration, he had arrived at a strong opinion in favour of allowing the Bill to go forward, and had asked him (Mr. Chamberlain) to express that opinion. Now, what were the objections that were urged? In the first place, it would appear to be that the matter almost entirely concerned the existing shareholders, and the preference-holders on the line. The objections came, as far as he understood, from shareholders representing only £30,000 of Stock out of a total capital of £3,000,000. It would therefore be found, practically, that there was a large majority of opinion in favour of the creation of this Preference Stock. He thought nothing of the technical objection which had been taken to the wholesale suspension of the Standing Orders by the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston). There was, he believed, a large number of precedents for a similar suspension of the Standing Orders, and also important precedents for the creation of Preference Stock in the manner contemplated by the present

Bill. He might refer to the case of the East London Railway Bill, which the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin) was successful in inducing the House to pass.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The East London Line never paid any dividend at all.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that might be so; but he was only quoting it as a precedent to show that these powers had already been conceded in another case. When the noble Lord said the East London Railway never paid any dividend, he did not think that there would be very much difference between that case and the present. On the contrary, it was very doubtful whether, in the case of the ordinary Stock of the Hull and Barnsley Railway, any dividend would ever be paid, or, at any rate, within a short period. That, however, was a question which had nothing to do with the creation of this Preference Stock. A more serious objection was one which was taken by the noble Lord opposite when he said that, by this proposal, the quasi-sanction of Parliament was given to a security in which many innocent persons might be induced to invest, but which, at the same time, was one of doubtful value. Against that objection must be put the consideration that, unless the present proposal was sanctioned, the interests of persons who had already invested, both in the original Shares and in the Preference Stock, would be seriously damaged. If the House refused to pass the Bill, and the money was not raised, the first result would be, as the House had already been informed, that 6,000 men would be turned out of employment, which would be a very serious thing at a moment of general depression like the present. What would also happen would be that the works would be rendered practically valueless. All the enormous expenditure already incurred would be thrown away, and it appeared to him possible that this great undertaking, which, after all, was a public work of considerable importance to the district in which it was proposed to be established, would become a prey to any competing line which might have an interest in obtaining possession of it. Therefore, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, as far as his personal vote went, he should certainly support the recommendation of the Committee, and the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Mr. MACFARLANE said, that as one of the Members of the Committee which had investigated the facts of the case, he wished to put before the House the issue which was raised before the Committee. It was, whether the existing undertaking should be practically extinguished by the exhaustion of the money already expended, and the amount of objection referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, consisting of five shareholders who represented £30,000, out of a capital of £3,000,000? The Committee felt that that was a very small minority of the shareholders; and they were, moreover, acquainted with the fact that the objecting persons did not attend the meeting of the Company called for the purpose of approving the Bill, because they knew that they would be swamped. That was a very candid admission that they did not represent the opinion of the shareholders of the Company generally. As to the question of the miscalculation in the original estimates, the right hon. Gentleman had told the House that probably no Directors were ever free from it. The right hon. Gentleman might have added that no private individual was free from it also, for he (Mr. Macfarlane) was quite sure that most people who had ever had anything to do with estimates for building or other purposes, had invariably found that they were wrong to the extent of 50 per cent. Therefore, that argument would have no weight. The issue was a very simple one—namely, whether the House would suspend its Standing Orders? And he maintained that that question was decided when it was agreed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and the Select Committee themselves were unanimous in the decision they had arrived at. But the issue really was, whether this undertaking should be sacrificed? It came out incidentally in the inquiry before the Committee, that the real motive of the opposition was that the undertaking might be strangled, and thus be thrown into the arms of one of the large Companies. He had himself put that question distinctly to one of the witnesses, and had pointed out that unless something of that kind were contemplated, the whole of the money expended so far would be lost. He had no interest whatever in these works; but he was told by this particular witness, that the money expended would not be altogether wasted, because the Midland Railway Company were quite willing to take over the property. That admission let the cat out of the bag. It was an attempt to strangle this small concern—very small as compared with the great lines; and, in the interests of the public, he thought it was desirable that those who were promoting the undertaking should be protected. The country was suffering at this moment from the process of railway strangulation adopted by two or three of the great lines, who thought that the sooner they were allowed to absorb all the smaller ones, the better. He hoped the House would not be induced, on any technical ground whatever in reference to these Standing Orders, to set aside the decision of the Committee, unanimously adopted only a few days ago.

Sir WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that he had mentioned in his remarks the name of Mr. Forbes; and he wished to say that that gentleman had only just joined the Board, and that he had had no connection with the line until two or three months ago.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that he had no personal interest in the matter; but his attention having been called to the character of the Bill, he had examined it carefully. The point to which he wished to call the attention of the House was this. It appeared to him that not only the Committee who sat upon the Bill, but also the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, had missed the real point which ought to be brought under the notice of the House—namely, whether they ought to allow to this Company borrowing powers to the extent now asked for; that was, whether they ought to allow the Company to raise money by borrowing in excess of the powers which Parliament ordinarily allowed? He understood the President of the Board of Trade to say that a similar case had occurred somewhere or other; but, be that as it might, he thought they ought to be most reluctant to allow the borrowing powers of any Railway Company to exceed the due proportion of their share capital. The President of the Board of Trade had described the stock proposed to be issued as Preference Stock. It was nothing of the kind. It was not Preference Stock at all. It was Debenture Stock, constituting part of the loan capital of the Company, and carrying with it the right on the part of the holders to put in a Receiver, if the Company failed to meet the interest as it fell due. He mentioned that to show that it was not in any sense part of the share capital. It was a mortgage on the concern, to a limited extent—namely, for securing the interest on the money raised. The importance of the matter was, that by relaxing the Rules laid down by Parliament in reference to borrowing powers, they were really weakening the value of securities which were open to trustees to invest in, as the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had pointed out. He thought Parliament ought to be most cautious before it did anything to diminish the value of such security in the market, and for that reason he should oppose the Motion.

The House divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 31: Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 196.)

Bill considered.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 207, 223, and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTION.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE HUT AT RATHGORMAC.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a police hut was erected in the parish of Rathgormac, county of Waterford, over three years ago, in a district in which not a single outrage was committed during the whole of the agitation, and which is a most peaceable district; and, if he will state why the hut was erected, why it has been kept up for three years at the expense of the ratepayers, and when will it be removed?

MR. TREVELYAN: A police station was established at Rathgormac a little over two years ago. The men are included in the county force, and are not charged to the district. It was necessary to establish a station in that locality, as there was a large tract of country without a police barrack. I am informed that it is not correct to say that the district was free from outrage, and that a good deal of intimidation was carried on. The formation of this station enabled the Government to do away with two protection posts which it had been necessary to establish in the neighbourhood for the protection of caretakers on evicted farms.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £38,867 (including a Supplementary sum of £30,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for certain Charges connected with the Orange River Territory, the Transvaal, Zululand, the Island of St. Helena, and the High Commissioner for South Africa."

MR. GUY DAWNAY said, that, in rising to move the reduction of the Vote, he must explain that he had no wish to deprive Sir Henry Bulwer of secretarial assistance with regard to his duties in Zululand, if only the Government would give the Committee some assurance that they would take the necessary steps to make that Office something more than the pretence and sham which their policy had made it become during many months past. He moved the reduction of the Vote in order that he might have an opportunity of calling attention to the terrible and disgraceful state of Zululand by the only means in his power—short of availing himself of the Forms of the House, to which hon. Gentlemen on those Benches were always reluctant to have recourse. He thought it had been most unfortunate that, for two successive years, the House had not had an opportunity of expressing its opinion on this question by a Division; and he was anxious that the Committee should not lose this opportunity of recording against the Government, the censure which every impartial Member who had paid the slightest attention to the subject must acknowledge they had most fully and richly deserved. Having obtained an opportunity at last of criticizing the policy of the Government in South Africa, he wished to trespass, as briefly as possible, on the attention of the Committee, and the reason which would induce him to curtail his remarks was not because he failed to realize the immense importance of the subject, but because it seemed to him that the case was so clear, and that the mismanagement of the Government in Zululand so acknowledged, that it would be mere waste of time for him to further prove such well-known facts, or to enter into the details of a story which for months past had been writing itself but too clearly and too plainly in such vivid characters of blood. It was curious that the same policy which had anarchized the Soudan, if he might use the expression, had been tried in South Africa with a precisely similar effect. All the skeletons which were at that moment whitening the sands of Northern Africa, had their counterpart in the Southern hemisphere, in the Golgotha into which Zululand had been converted under the "No Responsibility" policy of Her Majesty's Government. He had no doubt that the Government would find words to defend, if they could not find arguments to justify, that policy, and that they would attempt to do so on religious, moral, and philanthropic grounds. But could they also attempt to defend it as successful—as successful in this, that it had done anything to lessen the sufferings of humanity in Zululand? Could they deny that, from every point of view, the welfare of the Zulus, the security of Natal, the maintenance of the honour of the English name among the Natives of South Africa—from each and every such point of view, the policy of the Government had failed in as complete and ghastly a manner as ever discredited a Government? He must express a hope that, in the interest of honesty and fairplay in politics, no hon. Member would on that occasion, as last year, rise in his place and throw the blame of the present state of anarchy in Zululand on the late Government and the Zulu War. That had been done last year; but he was sure that no hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench could feel it consistent with his own self-respect to again rake up that past history as in the smallest degree offering any justification for another 12 months' continued and even more hopeless anarchy, and for an amount of unceasing inter-tribal slaughter which surpassed anything that Zululand had known since the Zulus first won the dignity of a nation. Last year, that ludicrously inadequate excuse was given, but only because the Government could find no other words to excuse the effects of their policy of restoring Cetewayo. They could not deny that they were warned of the results which would follow that restoration, that they had neglected those warnings, or that those warnings had turned out to be true. He had urged as strongly as he could last year, however little weight his words might carry, that in view of the fatal fiasco in which the restoration policy of the Government had then terminated, the Government should no longer lend an ear to the mistaken voice of unpractical humanitarians in that House or in the country, but that they should rather listen to those whose experience in South Africa, either as English officials or as Native-born dwellers in that land, entitled their opinions to be treated with consideration and their advice to be listened to with respect. He had urged, as earnestly as he could, that, as the only possible solution of the question, the Government should extend the principle of Reserved Territory up to the Black Umvolosi; he pointed out that such a policy would entail no expense upon the country; and he had overwhelming evidence to show that such a plan would have been gladly received and willingly adopted by the majority of the people in Zululand, and that it would have put an end to that anarchy and bloodshed which now for 18 months had disgraced our connection with the land. Sir Henry Bulwer had expressed the opinion that that course was one which ought to be followed as the one most hopeful for the welfare of the Zulus of any course, excluding our actual assumption of the rule of that country. He did not think they could justify their disregard of that advice on the ground of the success of their own policy, and still less could they justify that disregard on humanitarian grounds. Nor did he think that any hon. Members who last year warmly opposed this plan, could now, in the light of the history of the past 12 months, congratulate themselves on the success of that policy of leaving the Zulus to manage their own affairs, which they then advocated, and under which system, as the Bishop of Zululand had pointed out in a letter in The Times at the beginning of the year, "mutual extermination became the only possibility." If it had been the deliberate, the diabolical design of the Government to settle the question on the "Kilkenny cat" principle, they could not have gone to work in a surer manner to effect that end. The country was settling down under the old Settlement of Lord Wolseley; and whether or not that settlement might have been the best possible settlement, still, had that policy been faithfully followed, it would have preserved order there. Hon. Members who differed from him might again talk of the Sitimela fight. What had happened in that case bore out his statement, and was the best proof of the propriety of that policy. That was the case of one Zulu, who, with a considerable following, revolted against his Chief; the Chief called in the help of a neighbouring Chief, and the revolt was put down with one fight. That was the exact reason why Lord Wolseley divided Zululand amongst a number of Chiefs—that if there was a revolt in the territory of one Chief, a majority of the other Chiefs would support the loyal subjects of the Chief. It was, however, absurd to talk now about the Sitimela fighting, or to make much of the Native bloodshed which then took place. Why, all the fighting that took place during the three years after Cetewayo's deposition did not result in as many deaths as took place in one half-hour of one morning within six weeks of his restoration. All the bloodshed during those years were but as a single drop as compared with the ocean of blood which had deluged that land since that unhappy morning when Cetewayo was once more restored to his Chieftainship at Ulundi. The Government first encouraged the agitation of a few malcontents, who pretended to be anxious for Cetewayo's restoration; and having done that, they insisted on forcing back Cetewayo on an alarmed and reluctant people. And in order to do that they broke the solemn engagements made four years ago with the Chieftains. Now, that was a deliberate breach of faith with the Chieftains which he had last year challenged Her Majesty's Government to justify, to defend, or to deny—he challenged them, quoting the Prime Minister's own words spoken in that House in support of the charge he brought against them, and they were dumb. He knew that that engagement was made by the Representative of a Power which boasted that on its Dominions the sun never set, with a party of uneducated and naked Zulus in a Kaffir kraal; but he said that it was as solemn and sacred, and the breach of it as shameful and wrong, as if it had been made with the Representatives of a European Power and signed in a Royal Palace. Her Majesty's Government had set this solemn engagement aside, and had restored Cetewayo; and the firebrand having done its natural work in producing a general conflagration throughout the land—

"The torch being lighted, and the flame being spread,

And carnage smiling on her daily dead"—

the Government had then announced their intention of standing calmly by and waiting till the fire had burnt itself out, only watching to see that the flames did not come into too dangerous proximity with their own immediate Possessions. This was the general result, this was the magnificent outcome of our philanthropy, our humanity, our Christianity, and our statesmanship in the 19th century, under a Liberal Government—

"To make a solitude and call it peace"— or, rather, to encourage the Zulus to make the solitude, and then, on the hustings, to point to it as peace. He did not know of any instance, and he believed no instance existed, of a Government behaving at the same time in worse faith, with more consummate folly and shortsightedness, and with more conspicuous and disastrous unsuccess. With the permission of the Committee, he would read the following extract from a Natal newspaper, which gave an excellent account of the state of Zululand—

"It looks as bad now as can be in all the country between Umhlatuzi and the Umvolosi. The people are leaving their kraals, and they who are there sleep outside, because they are afraid. A great number of Zulus are wavering and afraid, fearing both sides. The people are surprised at the English Government doing nothing; they cannot understand it. They could when a King was alive, because it was a difficult question what to do with him. But now that is taken away, a lot of Chiefs have refused to pay taxes. The Resident went back to his residence the day after the women disturbed him, and the next day he set out to take the taxes, but heard there would be trouble up country, so turned back. He might easily have settled affairs in the Reserve; but I suppose his hands are tied and he can do nothing. The Zulus are thoroughly demoralized, and they have lost all respect for the English. This is annoying when one thinks how easily the English might have managed the country after they conquered it. The Zulus now say, 'We trusted in you, and you do nothing.' They say further that the English only know how to write letters."

The next extract which I will read, is a short one from a letter received a few weeks ago from John Dunn himself. He said—

"Affairs here are in a pretty muddle. The Boers have got possession of the central part of Zululand, and in the Reserve the Resident has been attacked by Dabulamansi at night, but fortunately he was warned and prepared, and beat them off. I have all my men under arms ready, and this is the only part of Zululand up to this where there has been no fighting or bloodshed."

And in one of the letters contained in the last Blue Book which had been issued with reference to Zululand, they had this account sent by Sir Henry Bulwer from Mr. Osborn with regard to the state of things in the Reserve Territory itself—

"The attitude of the Usutus, Mr. Osborn states, is causing great alarm to the loyal people for many miles round the Inkandhla, who are repeatedly insulted and threatened by individuals of the Usutu party, so much so that they and their families dare not sleep at their kraals for fear of being attacked at night, and after dark retire to the hills and donzas; and this is the case even with some of the people residing a long distance from the Inkandhla. The loyal Chiefs and people cannot understand why the lawless and defiant proceedings of the Usutus should be tolerated in the Reserve. They consider they are in danger from the Usutus, and unless he (Mr. Osborn) takes steps to deal with Ictuka, they will take the matter into their own hands."

And now, as a corollary to that, they heard that at the date of a letter received three weeks ago, our Representative in Zululand, Mr. Osborn, had actually been attacked by 10,000 Usutus, under Dabulamansi, the same Chief to whom the Government had been deferring, and coaxing, and patting on the back for two years; the result being that about 200 people had been killed. They found that a large proportion of the Zulu people, not only in the Central and Northern parts, but also in the Reserve Territory, were hiding and starving in the bush; and, finally, they heard that Usibepu, the one gallant, plucky, and loyal Chief, had been routed, not by the Usutus, for he had already defeated them, but by some 500 of those infamous marauding Boers, who were the outcome of another portion of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in South Africa. The Government refused to rule, or to take any part in the ruling, of Zululand, and the result was that carnage, starvation, and desolation reigned triumphant in that country. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) and the Colonial Office, on the brilliant success which had followed from the diplomatic wisdom and the timely courage which they had manifested throughout in dealing with the Zulu question. Now, answerable as they were for this state of things in Zululand, as they must confess they now were, he asked them what they intended to do, or, rather, whether they intended to still pursue the shameful—he might say murderous—policy of doing nothing—that policy of "writing letters," as the Zulus had so graphically described it? Did they still intend to disregard the advice of Sir Henry Bulwer, and every competent authority, recognizing, as they must, that on every previous occasion on which they had disregarded it they had been utterly and fatally wrong? Just to show how consistently wrong they had been, and how persistently they had neglected advice, he would read a telegram from Sir Henry Bulwer, dated the 5th of May last, which ran thus—

"It is reported that the Boers have proclaimed Dinuzulu King of Zululand, and have declared an independent Republic. The report requires confirmation; but there is good information to the effect that a large number from the Transvaal and Pretoria Free State have agreed to the conquest of Zululand for Cetewayo's son in return for territorial cession. It is said that they will join in the united attack on Usibepu. Usibepu is well able to hold his own against the Usutu party, but not against the unjustifiable combination, and he will be destroyed; and Zululand, except the Reserve, will fall under Boer domination, unless we interfere."

Then, 10 days later, he said—

"The action of the Boers is an interference with a Chief made independent of us. It introduces a new element in the Zulu question, and entirely revolutionizes it, destroys balance of power existing in Usibepu, encourages the Usutu party, and intimidates the Natives of the Reserve, who, fearful of the establishment of the Usutu party, powerful under Boer protection and not sure of us, will think how to save themselves. The question of the Boers, therefore, presses for decision. In the meantime, the Reserve is seriously endangered by the Usutu party being able to concentrate against it, and already people are taking refuge in Natal."

On the same page there was another letter, if anything, stronger; but he would not trouble the Committee by reading it. He would only ask if they were to stand still while they saw a new Stellaland arising in South Africa? Were they to remain passive while they saw these rascally filibustering Boers taking possession of the country, and carving it out into farms for themselves? It was curious, and he thought worthy of notice, that the Boers were, with regard to Zululand, occupying very much the same position as the Abyssinians now were to occupy towards the Soudan; and as their civilization was in about the same rudimentary condition, and as their Christianity was in about the same fossilized state, they were equally valuable allies to the Government in carrying out a policy which in both countries appeared to aim at the utter extermination of those Native races, whose struggles for freedom and whose patriotic valour they were once bidden to admire and respect. Was that, he asked, their policy? It was, at least, an intelligible policy, because the extermination of the Zulus would relieve the Government of any further responsibility or troubles in regard to Zululand. [Mr. WARTON: Just what they want.] And while the Government would reap all the advantages of that extermination, all the dirty work—all the direct bloodshed—would be done by the Boers, and the Government would be able to relieve their conscience by a combined Scribe and Pharisee policy of writing letters and publishing Blue Books, deprecating bloodshed and addressing remonstrances to the officials of the South African Republic. He would not, however, seriously charge Her Majesty's Government, or any Member of Her Majesty's Government, with a policy so ineffably mean; but it was a possible policy, and a policy to which there were only two alternatives—one that a Commissioner should be appointed to reside on the frontier to prevent aggression by the Boers, and to allow the Zulus to exterminate themselves without any White man's assistance; the other, that policy which he had already advocated in that House, and which he now again advocated, as warmly as he could—namely, the extension of the Reserve Territory to the Black Umvolosi. It was of no use going again into details; but let it be understood that such extension and its proclamation would mean at once the cessation of bloodshed in Zululand, the future civilization of that country, and the saving from extermination of the finest race of savages which South Africa had produced. Let the Committee understand that, from the midst of the misery and desolation of their land, the cry of the Zulus themselves was for such a settlement of the question, and for such a deliverance for themselves. Now, he said that, at least, if the Government would not consent to extend the Reserve Territory, it was their duty to give some reason for such refusal. What was their reason? Did it rest on the ground of expense? They might almost believe that, for Lord Derby, some few months ago, telegraphed to Sir Henry Bulwer, asking him what would be the expense of extending the Reserve Territory, and the latter replied that, for the first year, it would be about £6,000, and after that there would be no further expense at all. Since that time they had heard nothing more on the subject of the extension. £6,000 for putting an end to all this savagery and bloodshed! Why, it would probably save the country a hundred times the amount in future. £6,000—only three times greater than the amount of expense entailed upon the country by the determination of our æsthetic Government to banish the statue of the Great Duke from Hyde Park Corner to its place of exile at Aldershot. It was true that, at the same time, they got rid of a somewhat unpleasant subject of reflection and comparison. The cost of moving round troops from Cape Town to Natal alone, on account of these disturbances, went far to reach this total of £6,000, which it was said this extension would cost; and Sir Henry Bulwer pointed out in that letter which he had referred to, but not read, that the expense would be just as great, whether the troops were employed to extend the Reserve to protect the Reserve, or to ultimately protect the borders of our own Colonies from the victorious Usutus. In conclusion, he would point out—and it was a lesson which the Government should by this time have learnt by heart—that the longer they delayed, in the folly of their misplaced economy, to take that one step, which sooner or later they would be forced to take, the heavier would be the expense which this “penny-wise and pound-foolish” policy would lay on the British taxpayer, the more prolonged and cruel would be the bloodshed which they would entail on the Zulu people, and the darker and more inexcusable would be the guiltiness for that blood which would lie at the door of the Government, and of the Party which supported them in their misused or wasted power. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £300.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he rose to second the Motion for the reduction of the Vote; but in doing so he wished to explain, as his hon. Friend the Mover of the reduction (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had done, that he did not, of course, desire the reduction itself; but that was the only way left to them to protest against the policy of the Government in Zululand. He would have been glad if the question could have been discussed on the Resolution which he had placed on the Paper, but which he had now been compelled to withdraw, as it would have been discussed in the House, and not in Committee, and would have afforded a larger basis for argument. That Resolution contained the view which he now desired to bring under the consideration of the Committee—namely, that, looking to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and the responsibilities which the country had incurred, owing to that policy, the Government and the country could not get rid of, or properly meet, those responsibilities by merely maintaining, as by the telegram of May 16, 1884, they had decided to do, “the integrity and peace of the Reserve.” He desired to get the Committee practically to affirm that the Government were bound to endeavour to restore some kind of peace and order in the part of Zululand beyond the Reserved Territory. In that way the hands of the Government would be strengthened in any forward action they might take to restore peace in that unfortunate country, to which our interference had been so fatal. It was not necessary for him to go back to the original Zulu War. He would content himself with saying that he had always considered that war to have been unnecessary, and therefore unjust—so unnecessary and so unjust, that he had felt himself compelled both to speak and vote against the late Government, because, though they disapproved of the war, they had not, in his opinion, sufficiently condemned the policy of Sir Bartle Frere. He could not mention the name of Sir Bartle Frere without expressing, however imperfectly, his sense of the loss this country had sustained by the death of so zealous a servant of the Crown. We could never forget his able administration in India; we could never forget the splendid service he rendered in the time of the great Mutiny, in denuding of troops, at considerable personal risk to himself, the Province over which he presided, in order to assist the efforts of Sir John Lawrence. And with regard to his policy in South Africa, those who, like himself (Sir Henry Holland) differed entirely from it, had never doubted but that it was adopted from most conscientious motives, and in the belief that it was necessary to save Natal from a great and impending danger. The argument which he desired to lay before the Committee, and which he would afterwards support by proof, was briefly as follows:—That after the termination of the war, Zululand, its Chiefs, and people, were at our mercy; and that it was our duty, more especially if the war was an unjust one, to endeavour to restore peace and order in that country; that the Settlement of 1879 made by Lord Wolseley, by which the country was divided and placed under 13 appointed Chiefs, was the best that could then have been made; that it was effectual in fairly securing peace and order; not absolute peace and order, for that could not have been secured in a country so lately devastated by war, and with Natives whose feelings had been embittered by the contest, and who were hostile to us, but a fair amount of peace and order; that it was certainly beneficial to the Zulu people, and appreciated by them; that certain defects in the working and administration of that Settlement could have been remedied, he would not say without difficulty, but with the exercise of a little tact and judgment, and by our willingness to take upon ourselves a little more direct and guiding authority; that this could have been done without the employment of British soldiers, and without the expenditure of British money; that the unfortunate and ill-judged restoration of Cetewayo destroyed this Settlement of 1879; and that as that policy proceeded entirely from this country, and was against the wishes of the majority of the Chiefs and Zulu people, as he would prove later on, we were bound morally to protect the Zulu people against any evil consequences resulting from the failure of that policy; that the scheme failed, mainly owing to the conduct of Cetewayo himself; and that, therefore, our responsibility attached, and we were bound to endeavour to restore to the Zulus such peace and order as they enjoyed under the Settlement of 1879, and which they would probably have enjoyed to a still greater extent, if the Settlement, instead of being destroyed, had been confirmed and strengthened in the manner which he had already indicated. He must add, further, that the settlement of the Boers in Zululand, while greatly complicating the case, made it still more necessary for the Government to take some action beyond the Reserved Territory in order to protect the Zulus against the Boers. That was the argument he desired to press upon the Committee, and he would now endeavour to support it, by reference to the evidence contained in the Papers presented to Parliament. For that purpose he had read and re-read those Papers with care; and if he had arrived at a wrong conclusion, he could conscientiously state that it was not from want of study of them. But a difficulty arose from there being so great a mass of Correspondence, and the necessity of dealing with it as a whole, because many stories of misconduct of Chiefs, and acts of cruelty and hardship, and cases of disturbance which were relied upon in the earlier stages of the Correspondence, and which were brought forward as proof against the working of the Settlement of 1879, were contradicted, or explained away, or materially weakened, in a later stage; and he would give an instance of that later on, in connection with complaints brought against Chiefs. His first point was that the Settlement of 1879 was the best that could have been then made; that, on the whole, it had worked well; and that it was beneficial to the Zulus, and appreciated by them. It was the best that could then have been made, because Her Majesty's Government, rightly as he ventured to think, had decided not to annex Zululand, and govern it as a Crown Colony. They had determined, and wisely determined, that the country should be governed by Native Chiefs, under Native laws; but the defect in the scheme was that it did not retain any direct and guiding authority. That it worked well, upon the whole, was shown by the following facts:—In August, 1880—that was something like a year after the making of the Settlement—we find Sir Pomeroy Colley reporting that—and Mr. Brown, the Resident, reports that “order and quiet prevail.” Indeed, as stated by Sir Evelyn Wood, in his address to the Legislative Council of Natal, in October, 1881, peace prevailed in Zululand till July, 1881. The Sitimela outbreak then occurred; but, as shown by his hon. Friend (Mr. Guy Dawnay), Sitimela was an impostor, and he was soon put down—and to this fact he would call the special attention of the Committee, as bearing upon another point in the case—by John Dunn and Native levies. In truth, as Sir Henry Bulwer says, this case of Sitimela “can scarcely be said to bear upon the Settlement.” It was true that, in April, 1881, cases of oppression against two out of the 13 appointed Chiefs were brought forward. But they were brought forward by the ex-Prime Minister of Cetewayo, and by two brothers of Cetewayo, and not sustained by the decision of Sir Evelyn Wood, to whom all the parties agreed to refer their differences. He would venture to call the attention of the Committee to this fact, as showing the readiness of the Chiefs to submit their differences to the decision of the British Governor of Natal. Order was certainly restored before December, 1881, for Mr. Osborn then reports that “the country is at present perfectly quiet in every part.” The Settlement of 1879 worked then, upon the whole, peacefully up to and well into the year 1882. But then came the rumours of Cetewayo's intended visit to England; and thence arose agitation and doubts in the minds of the Natives as to the continuance and permanency of the Settlement. These rumours also afforded a ground to the discontented members of Cetewayo's family to agitate for his restoration. But what he (Sir Henry Holland) wished to impress upon the Committee was, that all this agitation, excitement, and disturbance arose, not from any internal defect in the working of the Settlement; but from causes outside that Settlement; and, indeed, it might be said outside the country itself. That the Settlement worked beneficially for the Zulu people, and was appreciated by them, could hardly be doubted. He would give one very conclusive proof. In the latter years of Cetewayo's reign, hundreds of families fled from Zululand into Natal; fugitives from a cruel despotism, under which no man's life was safe; but, in 1881, permission was given to no less than 1,630 Natives, men, women, and children, to return from Natal into Zululand. Surely this fact showed conclusively two things; first, that Cetewayo's rule was feared; and, secondly, that the change from his rule was acceptable, and that the working of the Settlement was appreciated by the Natives. But there was further proof of this feeling, for Sir Evelyn Wood reports in April, 1881—

"There can be no doubt that the bulk of the nation already appreciate its improved condition ;"

and, again, in September, 1881, after he had traversed a large part of the country, he reports—

"Every Zulu whom I met alone in my ride through Zululand told me, in the course of conversation, that the Zulus would not willingly go back to the old system which obtained under Cetewayo, preferring the present system."

No doubt, there were stories of Chiefs "eating up" and ill-treating their people, and those had been relied on; but, as he had already pointed out, many of these were afterwards proved to be much exaggerated, or without foundation. Some were clearly disposed of by Sir Henry Bulwer, in his Report of August 25, 1882, with which, of course, he would not trouble the Committee; but he would venture to read a few words, in which Sir Henry Bulwer sums up the case. He said—

Sir Henry Holland

"I, at least, must do them justice, and acquit them of the great crime, so wrongfully and unjustly charged against them ;"

and, finally, in his Report of February, 1883, in which he reviewed, after full consideration, the state of Zululand, he wrote—

"The Settlement of 1879 had conferred great benefits upon the Zulu people, benefits which every true friend of the Native races ought to rejoice at."

He (Sir Henry Holland) could have added to those proofs, had there been time; but he trusted that he had established the first point of his argument. Now, as to the second point; he had admitted that during the working of the Settlement certain defects became manifest, and he had indicated the nature of the chief defect—namely, the want of a more direct and guiding authority on the part of the British Government. That defect had early been pointed out by Sir Henry Bulwer and Mr. Osborn; but Her Majesty's Government had declined to exercise it, on the ground that the exercise of it, if it did not amount to annexation, would, of a certainty, lead to annexation. He thought that the Government were wrong in this view, and in their fears. They were exercising this authority through their Resident in Bechuanaland, but they had not annexed that land, nor would they have to do so; they were exercising that authority in the Reserved Territory, and, as yet, they had not had to annex it; and if they had to do so, it would be on account of the Boers, and not on account of any authority exercised over the Natives in that territory. It was very desirable that immediate rule should be carried on by the Native Chiefs over their people, and it would have been unwise to have deprived them of that power; but a direct and guiding authority was necessary to maintain that power to them; to prevent these Chiefs from quarrelling among themselves; and to check in the bud intertribal disputes, before they had attained to such a size as to render it difficult to repress them without bloodshed and expense. There could be no doubt that the Zulu people themselves expected the exercise of such a paramount authority. It was characteristic of all Natives to expect that the victors in a contest would not retreat, but would continue to hold and exercise the power they had won in battle. This authority, he contended, might then have been secured and exercised without fear of annexation, and without the employment of British troops, or British money, by the appointment of Residents and Sub-Residents, exercising certain judicial and quasi-political powers. There was a remarkable consensus of opinion in favour of the appointment of Residents by men most competent to form an opinion. He would cite the names of Sir Henry Bulwer, Sir Theophilus Shepstone, Mr. Osborn, Bishop Douglas, Mr. Robertson, and John Dunn, men of very different views, of very different characters, looking at the question from very different sides, and yet all agreeing upon this point. That the Zulu Chiefs would have been ready to yield to such authority was shown by their readiness to refer their disputes upon the occasion to which he had already alluded. That no British troops would have been required was the opinion of Sir Henry Bulwer in his Report of February 15, 1883; and they could probably have engaged all the Chiefs to assist in putting down quarrels at the request of the British authority. Upon that point he would refer to the telegram of Sir Evelyn Wood of September 2, 1881—

"All Chiefs agree to combine for the repression of rebellion, if advised to do so by the Resident;"

and to the fact, before alluded to by him, that Sitimela was put down by Dunn and Native levies. The Chiefs would have been ready to recognize that the primary obligations of maintenance of territory and maintenance of peace rested upon them and their people, acting in concert with the Residents. Upon that point also, he would add that a Hut Tax, or some other tax or contribution of a like kind, would have covered the expenses. If these steps had been taken in this direction, he believed that the Settlement of 1879 might have been strengthened and continued, and the good effects of its working would have been largely increased. It might be said that this was, after all, a matter of speculation and conjecture; but the view was supported, as he had shown, by the actual working of the Settlement till 1882, and by the opinions of men best acquainted with the state of affairs, and with the wishes and views of the Zulu Chiefs and people. But if this were matter of speculation, there could be no doubt at all as to the absolute failure of the alternative plan adopted by Her Majesty's Government—namely, the restoration of Cetewayo. From that plan he entirely dissented; it put an end to the Settlement; it was a violation of our pledges to the Chiefs and people; and it was, he believed, against the wishes of the great majority of the people themselves. The first unfortunate step was the visit of Cetewayo to England. The announcement of the proposed visit had given rise in Zululand, as he had already pointed out, to agitation, and uncertainty and doubts as to the continuance of the Settlement of 1879, and all the disturbances in 1882 were traceable to this cause. It was clear that Cetewayo himself looked upon this visit as the first step towards his restoration; and no less clear that the Zulus took a like view. And it was to him most extraordinary that Her Majesty's Government did not seem to have foreseen, or suspected, that agitation would arise in Zululand when the reports of the proposed visit reached that country. They seemed to have been taken by surprise when they had temporarily to postpone the visit upon receiving a strongly worded Report from Sir Henry Bulwer in May, 1882, that the intended visit had—

"Led to the report of his restoration, and had been the cause of the recent demonstration of the ex-King's brothers, and was producing uneasiness in Zululand, and interfering with the settlement of that country."

He (Sir Henry Holland) was justified in assuming that Her Majesty's Government were thus wanting in foresight, because no steps were taken in Zululand to explain the state of the case to the Chiefs, and to prevent any uneasiness and agitation, nor were any instructions to that effect given to Sir Henry Bulwer. Well, the restoration was decided upon; it was decided upon against the strongly expressed opinions of hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House, and, if he remembered rightly, on the other side also. He himself had ventured to point out the almost certainty of the failure of such a scheme. It was decided upon against the views of Lord Wolseley, who protested against it on the ground of danger to Natal; of causing serious trouble and bloodshed in Zululand; and as being in direct contravention of the guarantee given to the 13 Chiefs that, under no circumstances, should Cetewayo be allowed to settle again in the territory. It was against the views of Sir Theophilus Shepstone, who thought it would "be certain to produce the most disastrous consequences." It was against the views of Sir Henry Bulwer, who strongly opposed the scheme, and only yielded when he was informed that Her Majesty's Government had decided upon it, and when he was instructed to take the necessary steps to prepare the country for the return of the ex-King. It was against the views of the Colonists of Natal, if we might judge from a protest of the Legislative Council of that Colony, and from resolutions passed at such important places as Durban, Pietermaritzburg, and Newcastle. And, lastly, it was against the wishes of the majority of the 13 appointed Chiefs, and of the bulk of the Zulu people. As regarded the Zulu people, he had shown how entirely satisfied they were with the working of the Settlement of 1879, and there was no reason to suppose that the bulk of the people had altered their views. No doubt a certain number of the people, who had been most intimately connected with Cetewayo and his family, were interested and excited by the prospect of his restoration; but, even when he came back, their number was so limited that he was almost alarmed at the want of enthusiasm. It was true that no direct protest was made by the people against the return; but, at all events, there was no Petition in favour of it; and whatever advances in civilization the Zulus had made it might be admitted that they had not advanced so far as they had in this country in the art of getting up and presenting Petitions. And it must not be forgotten that Natives very readily fell in with the decision of higher Powers, when once made, however much they might dislike it, from fear of opposing it. And when they were considering the feeling of the people, they could not but treat the protests of the Chiefs and Headmen as representing, to a considerable extent, the views and wishes of their followers. Now, how did the case stand as regards the 13 appointed Chiefs? In October, 1882, five only were disposed to acquiesce in the restoration, while eight were opposed to it; and even after the decision was announced, 7 out of 13 expressed dissent. It was to him somewhat surprising that, after the determination of Her Majesty's Government was made known, so many Chiefs were bold enough to protest, because the Chiefs might naturally have feared that further opposition would draw down on them the hostility and vengeance of Cetewayo when he returned to Zululand, backed up by the power of the British Government. And, again, as late as January, 1883, they would find 30 Chiefs and Headmen protesting; and the tone of their complaints was so simple and touching that he would venture to read it to the Committee. They said—

"Is it true that you White people now find that Cetewayo has done no wrong? What wrong have we done that we are to be driven from our homes? We cannot live under Cetewayo again. We look to the Government to protect us, and to allow us to occupy the country to which we belong, and which we must leave if Cetewayo is put over us."

Sir Theophilus Shepstone also reports that—

"All complain bitterly of the changes now made without in any way consulting their feelings."

The restoration was made, as he thought he had shown, against the wishes of the majority of the Chiefs, and, therefore, against the pledges given to them in 1879. It had been urged that, in partial redemption of those pledges, the Reserved Territory had been set aside for such Chiefs as did not wish to serve under Cetewayo. But when one came to look at it, this offer was little better than a mockery. There would be a very natural reluctance on the part of the people to leave their property, and homes, and settle down in a new territory; and, unless the people would move, it was hopeless to suppose that the Chiefs would separate themselves from their people, and power, and property. He believed that, in fact, not a single Chief had up to this time availed himself of the offer, with the exception of Usibepu, who, after his total defeat by Boers and Usututs, had no other place of refuge. The result of the restoration was, as predicted, disastrous. The scheme failed, and mainly owing to the conduct of Cetewayo himself. He returned to his country dissatisfied with the conditions imposed upon him; sore that so large a portion of the country had been separated from his rule; and especially sore that the Chief Usibepu, his "dog," as he called that Chief, had been allowed to retain his separate power and territory. He began at once to assume power over the Chiefs and Natives in the Reserved Territory, in spite of repeated warnings from Sir Henry Bulwer and Mr. Fynn; he soon commenced hostilities against Usibepu—an attack utterly unprovoked, and characterized by Sir Henry Bulwer as "another direct and most serious violation of the conditions." Cetewayo was defeated, and died, and the scheme of the restoration failed, after destroying the Settlement of 1879. He (Sir Henry Holland) believed that he had so far proved his argument that this country had incurred a responsibility to the Zulu people that they should not suffer—he would not put it higher—from the failure of a scheme which they did not desire, and which was forced upon them by the policy of Her Majesty's Government. They should be restored, as far as possible, to the state in which they were under the Settlement, and which they would still have been in had not that Settlement been destroyed. Her Majesty's Government had, however, declared that they would not extend British authority or protection over Zululand, but would only undertake to preserve the peace and integrity of the Reserved Territory. He quite admitted that it was absolutely essential to protect this territory. It was essential in the interest of the Colony of Natal, and it was essential not only in the interest of the Natives within that territory, and who proposed to remain there, but for the interest of those without the territory. The pledge that was given originally, that this territory should be reserved as a place of refuge for those who did not desire to remain under Cetewayo's power, must certainly be held to continue in full force for those who desired to fly from the fighting and bloodshed which had followed upon the failure of the scheme of restoration. It was not easy to know exactly what was going on in the Reserve, and what danger there was of an attack upon it; but as British troops were employed there, he could not conceive that there would be any substantial difficulty in maintaining it. The difficulty—and a very grave and serious difficulty it was—with which we had to deal, arose from the state of things outside the Reserve. Here, again, it was not easy to ascertain what was the exact state of things, as the conditions were constantly changing. We knew that the Chiefs had been fighting amongst themselves; we knew that Usibepu had been attacked and defeated by a united force of Boers and Usutus; but the state of things had been undoubtedly complicated, and the difficulties greatly increased, by the introduction of the Boer element. The Boers were like stormy petrels. They scented storms from afar, and were always to be found East or West of the Transvaal, wherever Native quarrels arose. They combined also the rapacity of vultures, for they always got good pickings from the battlefields where Native quarrels were fought out. Their mode of proceeding was simple enough. They began by settling down in small numbers on the land which they desired to have. They created or fostered tribal disputes, and they took one side or the other in consideration of concession of land; and then, when the time was ripe, and the Natives were sufficiently weakened by fighting each other, they threw off all disguise and annexed the land. That plan had been pursued with great advantage to themselves on the West of the Transvaal, and that plan they were pursuing on the East of the Transvaal; and they would succeed unless we interfered, which, apparently, we were not going to do. We found them negotiating with the Usutus in 1882, and we learnt in 1884 that a large number, from 400 to 800, armed Boers had entered the territory, and had made Dinizulu King, in return for territorial concessions. He would venture to read to the House Sir Henry Bulwer's remarks upon this Boer invasion or settlement, as they seemed to him to carry great weight. Sir Henry Bulwer said—

"The situation is very grave. If we allow the Boers to interfere and make Dinizulu King, it will be a most serious blow to British power in South Africa. They will also become masters of Zululand, to the permanent loss of the Zulu people, and to the great injury of Natal, to which will resort refugees, for whom there is no room and no future outlet. The Native question will be thereby gravely complicated. In the Reserve, also, we should probably have immediate Usutu contests."

Those fears were probably well founded. What, then, had been the result of the policy of the Government in Zulu-land? They had destroyed the power of the Zulu people, and now it was proposed to leave them in the hands of their most hated enemies, whom, in Cetewayo's time, they could easily have conquered, and would have conquered but for our remonstrances with Cetewayo. What policy had been suggested to meet the difficulty of the case? Sir Henry Bulwer had suggested an extension of the Reserved Territory; but this suggestion was made before Usibepu was defeated, and if any extension were now to be made it would have to include all Zululand. He did not know whether Sir Henry Bulwer would recommend such an extension; but Her Majesty's Government had, at all events, declined to be parties to any extension beyond the Reserved Territory, and he was not prepared to find fault with that decision. It was not for hon. Members on that side of the House to state what policy the Government should pursue. They had not the Papers and the confidential information which the Government had, and were not in a position to advise. But he ventured, with very great diffidence, to submit to the Government a course of policy which he thought was worthy of consideration, which was quite distinct from annexation, but which, if practicable and acted upon, might even now restore peace and order in this unfortunate country, and relieve us of much of the danger and difficulty surrounding the present position. He would endeavour to treat the country again as we treated it in 1879; in other words, he would endeavour to revert to the lines of the Settlement of 1879, and to govern the people by Native Chiefs; but, at the same time, to strengthen the authority of those Chiefs by the retention and exercise of a direct and guiding authority through Residents who should have judicial and political powers. It might be asked, how could this plan now be put in operation? He would suggest that Sir Hercules Robinson, or Sir Henry Bulwer, or someone in whom the Chiefs had confidence, should be deputed to summon the Chiefs to meet at some point outside the Reserve Territory. The Chiefs should be asked to appoint, or to allow the British Government to appoint, some single Chief, or as many Chiefs as they desired, under whom they would serve. The Chiefs should be required to agree, as Sir

Evelyn Wood suggested, to combine to put down any fighting or disturbance at the request of the British authority. Residents should be appointed with judicial and political powers. An appeal should lie to the Lieutenant Governor of Natal in all intertribal disputes; and provision should be made against the sale of land to White men. Of course, he did not conceal from himself the difficulty arising from the Boers. A firm hand would have to be kept on the Boers who had settled down in Zululand. They must be called upon either to assent to the authority of the Chiefs and the British authority—and they might be induced to do that if their titles to the lands which they now held were confirmed to them—or to retire. Some might be disposed to take the latter course, if their hopes of further gain, and of establishing a Boer Republic, were thus taken from them; and he would not be disinclined to give them some compensation for the land they gave up. Compensation, he knew, was an ugly word; but he believed any amount of compensation would be well spent if, by giving it, we could once get the Boers out of Zululand, and thus free the Zulus. Then, as regarded the prevention of further encroachments, he did not believe we should have much difficulty if the Government would have the courage to act firmly with the Transvaal Government—a quality in which they had been deficient up to this time. The Government should call upon the Transvaal Government to act upon the Second Article of the recent Convention. By that Article it was provided that—

“The Government of the South African Republic will strictly adhere to the boundaries defined in the First Article of this Convention, and will do its utmost to prevent any of its inhabitants from making any encroachments upon lands beyond the said boundaries. The Government of the South African Republic will appoint Commissioners upon the Eastern and Western borders, whose duty it will be strictly to guard against irregularities and trespassing over the boundaries. Her Majesty's Government will, if necessary, appoint Commissioners in the Native territories outside the Eastern and Western borders of the South African Republic to maintain order and prevent encroachments.”

He had read this Article in full to the Committee, because, a short time ago, in answer to a Question, the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) said that they could not well call upon the South African Republic to appoint a Commissioner until Her Majesty's Government had appointed one themselves, which they had not determined to do; but it was clear from the terms of Article II. that, while the Boers were bound to appoint Commissioners, the British Government were only required to do so if necessary. [Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: The Convention has not been ratified.] That was true; but he (Sir Henry Holland) thought that if this Article could not be legally enforced, a compliance with it might be pressed upon the Boers, or that the Boers might be required to take such a step under the former Convention. We were bound to settle this Boer question; and so important was it to prevent any further trespassing that he would be ready to make further concessions to the Transvaal Government—as, for example, the abandonment of the large debt now due to this country—if he could thereby obtain an honest and bond fide security that the Republic would prevent any further encroachments. He had ventured to suggest some policy of this kind for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but he did not ask the Committee to affirm this or any other special course of action, but only to affirm that, under all the circumstances of the case, this country had incurred obligations and responsibilities to the Zulu people outside as well as inside the Reserved Territory; and that the Government ought to endeavour faithfully to meet those obligations and responsibilities, and to secure some kind of peace and order in this unhappy Zululand. He must apologize to the Committee for having detained them so long, and for having gone so far back into the history and details of this case. His excuse was that he had to contend with the very natural reluctance of this country to engage in further expeditions and further expenditure in Zululand; he had to contend with the still more natural reluctance to engage ourselves in further complications with the Boers; and he had to contend with the desire to limit our responsibilities, instead of extending them, and to content ourselves with maintaining peace in our own Colonies. He had been compelled, therefore, to make it clear that we had, by our policy, incurred duties and responsibilities towards the Zulu people. If he had convinced the Committee that that was the case, he could not doubt that this country, however unpalatable the task might be, or however expensive and difficult, would support the Government if they firmly, manfully, and honestly endeavoured to perform those duties and responsibilities.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £38,567 (including a Supplementary sum of £30,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for certain Charges connected with the Orange River Territory, the Transvaal, Zululand, the Island of St. Helena, and the High Commissioner for South Africa."—(Mr. Guy Dawnay.)

MR. WODEHOUSE said, he did not propose to follow the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland) in his vindication of the Wolseley Settlement, nor in his observations adverse to the restoration of Cetewayo. He would confine himself exclusively to the present state of affairs in Zululand. He never heard the hon. Gentleman the Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay) speak of the affairs of these distant territories, which he knew so well, and on which he was so well entitled to speak, without regretting that the weight and authority which would naturally attach to his words were marred by that exuberant animosity against Her Majesty's Government which seemed to inflame all he uttered. But he fully shared the hon. Member's (Mr. Guy Dawnay's) sense of the gravity of the situation in Zululand, and of the need of prompt and decided action there. It was time for a more direct and determined exercise of authority on the part of Her Majesty's Government. We could not, without discredit, ignore our obligations to the entire Zulu people, whether they were in the Reserve or beyond it. The hon. Member for the North Riding for bade them, if he (Mr. Wodehouse) might say so, to allude to the Zulu War. But they must allude to it, because that war was the origin of our responsibility for the present distracted condition of Zululand. Until that war the Zulus were a strong and compact Native race, more than able to hold their own against the Boers. We shattered their strong cohesion, and left them a prey to the greed of the Boers. He must remind the Committee that when Her Majesty's Government were negotiating the Pretoria Convention, through their Commissioners on the spot, they proposed to sever from the Transvaal a strip of territory on its Eastern border; but the Boers objected, and Her Majesty's Government gave way to them on this point. From this decision, however, one of the Commissioners, Sir Evelyn Wood, dissented, on the ground that the separation of the Transvaal from Zululand was essential for the prevention of intrigues which would be fatal to the peace of Zululand, and might even menace the safety of Natal; and certainly the sequel of events had tended to prove rather than disprove the accuracy of Sir Evelyn Wood's foresight. We must anticipate sustained aggression on the part of the Transvaal Boers, in whatever directions they were free to advance. Some check had been put on their encroachments on the Western side of the Transvaal by the appointment of Mr. Mackenzie as Commissioner in Bechuanaland; and he wished that some similar action were taken to check their advance on the Eastern border. It was vain to suppose that the Transvaal Boers would observe any boundaries fixed by Treaty or Convention. They would violate without scruple the most solemn assurances and the most formal engagements; and they were more than ever likely to do so now. He would tell the Committee why. When the Transvaal deputation were over in this country negotiating the recently-made Convention, their ostensible organ and advocate in the London Press was The Times; and The Times argued throughout that, as we had no intention of undertaking military operations against the Boers in any case, we had better accept at once whatever terms they might be graciously pleased to offer. Now, if the Transvaal deputation had carried back to their countrymen the information that, do what they would, England would never fight them again, why should they observe inconvenient engagements? But that was not all. The Transvaal deputation made a tour on the Continent, and visited some of the principal capitals of Europe. In Paris and Berlin, every newspaper that wished to be spiteful to this country flattered them about their military prowess, which had thrice defeated British arms.

Mr. Wodehouse

In Berlin they were received with effusive honours by the German Emperor and his Chancellor; and they were further gratified by the Imperial patronage of the German settlement at Angra Pequena. Now the reports of all these things had gone out to South Africa, and were circulating through every Dutch farmhouse, inflaming the vanity and self-assertion of the Boers, and giving a fresh impulse to their restless aggression. Again, there was another circumstance which pointed in the same direction. There had recently been a change of Ministry in the Cape Colony, and the new Ministry could not stand without support from the extreme Dutch Party. Moreover, these new Ministers were the very men who forced the Basutos into rebellion by their disarmament policy, and who would have confiscated Basuto territory, if Her Majesty's Government had not intervened. And what was the first declaration of policy made by them after taking Office? Why, that they intended to keep a firmer hand on the Natives than their Predecessors had done. Every Native in South Africa would understand the meaning of that declaration. All these circumstances pointed to the likelihood of self-assertion and increased aggression on the part of the Dutch farmers, and a corresponding increase of alarm and uneasiness on the part of the Natives. Now, whether we had to deal with trouble in Zululand, or Swaziland, or Basutoland, or Bechuanaland, one dominant consideration always lay at the root of the question; and that was, did England intend, or not, to be, in fact, as in name, the paramount controlling and guiding Power throughout South Africa? The Transvaal deputation made no secret of their views as to the proper position of England in South Africa; they would leave to England neither place, nor power, nor duty there, except the single duty of guarding those territories from transmarine invasion. Happily, these pretensions met with no countenance from Her Majesty's Government. They had rescued the trade route through Bechuanaland from the Transvaal Boers; and they had got rid of the Sand River Convention. That Convention being gone, we were free, if we thought proper, to enter into friendly relations, by Treaty or otherwise, with Native Tribes all round the Transvaal, and free also, if ever we found it expedient, to supply the Natives with arms and ammunition. Moreover, Her Majesty's Government had reserved to themselves the right of veto upon all Treaties concluded by the Boers with Foreign States. They had put a British Commissioner in Bechuanaland, and had also resumed Imperial administration in Basutoland. All these acts were clear recognitions of Imperial duties and responsibilities in South Africa. If, then, these duties and responsibilities were recognized—if this line of policy was deliberately chosen, he hoped that whatever was done might not be marred by procrastination and half-heartedness.

Whatever we meant to do let us do it quickly, because every hour of delay raised fresh obstacles in our path. We ought to do our work well, or else we had better leave it alone altogether. He made these observations because he gathered from the language of the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby) that he regarded the resumption of Imperial rule in Basutoland, and the appointment of Mr. Mackenzie in Bechuanaland, as measures of a tentative and experimental character. He (Mr. Wodehouse) strongly deprecated such language. It carried misgiving and uncertainty to the minds of all friends of English policy in South Africa, and was a direct incentive to its enemies to plot and intrigue to make the policy a failure. If these qualifying phrases were intended to diminish Imperial responsibility, or to provide paths of escape from future embarrassments, they were futile; they would not lighten the burden of our responsibility by the weight of a single grain, nor shorten its duration by a single hour. This was not a time to temporize and minimize in South Africa. Things would not settle down, if left to themselves; but they would go from bad to worse. In addition to the aggression of the Transvaal Boers, we had to reckon with the fact that, owing to the discovery of the Diamond Fields, and all the recent wars there had been, South Africa swarmed with adventurers of the worst kinds, who fostered all intertribal quarrels and family feuds of Native Chiefs for their own sordid advantage. He therefore hoped that Her Majesty's Government would grasp the situation in Zululand and elsewhere with vigour and decision, and that they would not shrink from appointing Representatives of Her Majesty, wherever the peace of South Africa demanded the presence of such officers. It would be better for us to make an abrupt and complete repudiation of all our obligations to the Natives, and extricate ourselves by a sudden wrench from every quarter of South Africa, except Simon's Bay and Cape Town, rather than linger on the scene while we suffered the name of the Queen, which had been to the Natives in the past a symbol of fidelity to Imperial obligations and the pledge of national honour, to fade into a mere delusive phantom, and be known to them only as a broken reed to lean on.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he had listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Wodehouse). The hon. Gentleman had given them a very graphic description of the position of things with respect to the Boers at the present moment. With all the remarks of the hon. Member he cordially agreed. He had had an opportunity of speaking on this subject during the present Session, and he did not propose to trouble the Committee at any length. They had listened to a very remarkable speech from his hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), and they knew that everything the hon. Baronet said in that House was always worthy of the utmost attention, and on this question particularly everything which fell from the hon. Baronet deserved the greatest consideration. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) approached the matter, however, from a different point of view to his hon. Friend. The hon. Baronet was a consistent opponent of the restoration of Cetewayo; but, so far as an humble Member like himself could, he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) took the responsibility of having recommended that restoration. His hon. Friend seemed to think that, in 1881, under the Settlement of 1879, the condition of Zululand was as nearly that of a paradise as it could well be. His (Mr. R. N. Fowler's) recollection of the condition of Zululand, so far as he could gather from what he heard when he made a personal visit to the Cape and Natal in November, 1881, was that Zululand was not in the very peaceful, and happy, and Elysian state described by his hon. Friend. At that time many people were recommending that John Dunn should be made King of the Zulus, vice Cetewayo deposed. John Dunn himself was certainly going about recommending that there should be a Paramount Chief, and suggesting that he was the man who would best promote the peace of the country by assuming that position. He rather thought that his hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay), judging from his speeches at the time, was an advocate of that course; at all events, the hon. Gentleman was not very much opposed to it. Well, therefore, they had the evidence of that well-known character, John Dunn, that the state of Zululand at that period was not as peaceable as his hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) had represented. Her Majesty's Government thought it proper to restore Cetewayo. Those of them who recommended that course might be twitted for having given such advice, inasmuch as it had failed; but, in the first place, he ought to say the course the Government took was not altogether the course he and others recommended. The restoration of Cetewayo was done in a half-hearted manner. Cetewayo was only restored to a portion of his Kingdom. Though, no doubt, Her Majesty's Government thought he ought to be very grateful for what they had done, Cetewayo and others thought he had not received full justice; and, therefore, there was a misunderstanding in that respect. Again, although Her Majesty's Government sent back Cetewayo in accordance with their own policy, that policy was very strongly disapproved of by the Government of Natal. The Government of Natal, as a matter of fact, took a very different view to that taken by Her Majesty's Government; and he asked anyone what was the chance of the policy being successful, when it was carried out by an agent who utterly disapproved of the views of his superiors? What chance was there of the success of the policy, when Sir Henry Bulwer, who was the agent appointed to carry it out, disapproved of it? He did not mean to say that that distinguished man would not do his best to carry out the orders of the Government; but still they knew that when a man had to carry out a policy which he considered was foredoomed to failure, that policy was sure to be carried out in a half-hearted sort of way; all sorts of difficulties were sure to be raised; and it seemed to him (Mr. R. N. Fowler) that, under such circumstances, the policy of Her Majesty's Government, which was urged upon them by Members on both sides of the House, never had a chance of success. If the Government wished their policy to succeed, they had only one course to pursue, and that was to promote Sir Henry Bulwer to some other Colony, and place in Natal a Governor who was prepared to carry out their views. He would remind the Committee that the position of things at Natal had altered very considerably of late; there was a great alteration in the condition of things at Natal in the beginning of 1882. Her Majesty's Government at that time proposed to revert to the old system, by which Natal was administered by a Lieutenant Governor, subordinate to the Governor at the Cape. When Lord Kimberley had appointed a gentleman to take the place of Lieutenant Governor, under Sir Hercules Robinson, Natal raised considerable opposition. Her Majesty's Government altered their plans, and appointed Sir Henry Bulwer as full Governor. Whether that proceeding had answered was open to question. A point had been made about the disturbance before Cetewayo's return, and it had also been said that Cetewayo promoted disturbances amongst the other tribes. The Bishop of Natal (the late Dr. Colenso), however, in a letter, had said—

"At the present moment there is no evidence that Cetewayo has had anything to do with these disturbances; they seem to be the outcome of Sir Henry Bulwer's Settlement."

He quoted this extract to show that it was just possible that Cetewayo was not open to the charges brought against him by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland). He did not quite understand what his hon. Friend's (Mr. Guy Dawnay's) view was as to the Motion he submitted to the Committee. He thought it was as well they should have a discussion on this very important question, and for that reason he was glad his hon. Friend had initiated the debate; but, at the same time, he did not quite understand what was the exact question they were to decide by a division. As he had already said, the policy of Her Majesty's Government had failed; and he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) was as much responsible as a private Member could be for the adoption of that policy. If his hon. Friend meant, by proposing to reduce the Vote, to censure the Government for the restoration of Cetewayo, he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) certainly could not support him; but would be obliged to go into the Lobby against him. He did not well see what could be the use of dividing on a question of this kind; certainly, if his hon. Friend did go to a division, he ought to tell the Committee more clearly than he had yet done what his object was.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not propose to follow the Lord Mayor (Mr. R. N. Fowler) into the question of the restoration of Cetewayo, because he thought, in the short space of time they had at their disposal, they ought to direct their attention specially to the future; he did not think they need go at all into the past. If he were to venture upon a discussion of what had taken place, he certainly should condemn the late Government; and he was not quite sure also that he would not have something condemnatory to say about the present Government. But that was not the point. They were placed in circumstances of great difficulty, occasioning great anxiety; and the real question was, what was to be our policy. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse) had made a speech, in which he advocated what might be called the Imperial spread-eagle policy. The hon. Gentleman had said that we must have a substantial and real Suzerain power over the whole of South Africa. What did he mean? Did he consider that two-thirds of the White inhabitants of South Africa were Dutch, and that the remaining population, for the most part, consisted of various African tribes? Did he remember that British Imperialism was represented by a comparatively small number of Colonists, and by the red coats of the British Army; and did he wish the Committee to understand that the policy he was prepared to recommend to Her Majesty's Government was that that small handful of British Colonists should be backed up by all the force of the British Army, in order to compel the Natives to submit to the Imperial Suzerainty of England? Did the hon. Member propose that? because, if so, he was only proposing what had been tried again and again, and the consequence of which had been that we had caused bloodshed and misery over many parts of Africa. We had entailed upon the British taxpayer large burdens, that had gone on increasing from year to year, and for which they had actually nothing to show. He recollected reading, some years ago, a book by Anthony Trollope, in which the writer commented upon the fact that, when he was in Natal, he saw very few Whites who did not wear red coats. It struck Mr. Anthony Trollope that these red coats were doing the work of the Natal Colonists, but were not paid by the Natal Colonists, but by the British taxpayer at home; and he said he could not help fancying that he saw each of these red coats being carried on the back of the struggling operatives of Lancashire. And so it was with these Colonies. He (Mr. Rylands) knew precisely what the motive of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay) and his hon. Friends was. What they wanted was that we should take an active part in Zululand; that we should stand all the burden; and that the Natal Government should have any advantage that might arise from our endeavours and exertions. Were the Natal Government prepared to pay for any operations that might be undertaken? No; they would not pay the miserable amount that was now owing to us, and we had a number of soldiers in Natal, for whom they did not pay anything at all. Why should we protect these Colonies if they would not do anything to protect themselves? Hon. Gentlemen argued that it was important we should take care that all the tribes who were fighting with one another should be bound over to keep the peace. How bound over to keep the peace? Were we to occupy that enormous territory by our soldiery; were we to decide between the tribes; and were we to use our power to crush any portion of the Natives we thought were doing wrong? We had done all that before; and he ventured to say that, whenever we had intervened amongst the Natives—no doubt we had done so with the best motives—we had produced evils that had been absolutely greater than those we sought to suppress. Hon. Gentlemen who had been accustomed to read South African Blue Books, as he had for several years, could not fail to have noticed the sameness in the story. They might take up a Blue Book published 10 years ago, and, while probably they would not be familiar with the names of the Chiefs and, it might be, the districts of South Africa there mentioned, they would find that the course of events was so similar, one time with another, that they might say that the whole history of South Africa ran upon the same line. There were constantly men, on the verge of civilization, who oppressed the Blacks. These men were all of the same character; they had few scruples; they were men, perhaps, of enormous energy, and of little fear; they pressed upon the Blacks, and by-and-bye there was a larger range of the disputes; certain Chiefs took one side, and some the other; the White men allied themselves to some or other of the Chiefs; and so gradually the White men were involved in the conflict. The Chiefs were sometimes loyal, and sometimes not; they were barbarians, and were influenced at the moment by what they thought would promote their special interest. Such was the course of South African events. But of all the schemes he had heard of for the settlement of South African affairs, the scheme of the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) was the most untenable. What was the hon. Baronet's scheme? Why, that we should take possession of Zululand to that extent that we must become actually the Suzerain Power, and get rid of the Boers. But how were we to get rid of the Boers? By buying them off! Now, he thought that was about the most unwise suggestion that could possibly be made. His hon. Friend (Sir Henry Holland) actually said that the British Government were to go to the Boers, who had invaded a certain portion of Zululand, and out of the taxes of this country buy them off. He (Mr. Rylands) thought that that would not only be an unwise policy, but that it would be a policy which would altogether fail. His hon. Friend also suggested that we should go to the Boer Government, and say to them—"We will give up our charge against you—that is, the debt you owe to us—on condition that you pledge yourselves to leave the country." Why, if we did do that, and the Boers consented to those terms, in five years' time there would be a new race of Boers ready to enter the district. It was really no use attempting impossibilities, whether it was from the Imperial sentiments of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bath, or the Natal sentiments of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire, or the philanthropic sentiments of some of his (Mr. Rylands's) Friends; it would be useless to adopt the suggestions which had been made. He feared that hon. Gentlemen would drag us into a policy that past history had proved to be a bloody and wicked policy. It was impossible to interfere in these things from a philanthropic point of view. We could not interfere in these affairs with any good effect; and he would recommend to the Government that they should, as far as possible, narrow their obligations with regard to South Africa. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bath had admitted that the new Ministers at Cape Colony were obliged to rest for a certain amount of support upon the Dutch element. It was an undoubted fact that the Government of the Cape Colony must always rest upon the Dutch element to a great extent. He (Mr. Rylands) well recollected that at the time the question between the Transvaal and ourselves was to the fore, he was told by a very high authority from the Cape whom he happened to meet—it was the Speaker of the House of Assembly of the Cape of Good Hope—that if the Government pressed on their views with regard to the Transvaal, that which appeared so simple a thing in the beginning would develop into a very large and difficult question, and he feared that the Free State would be dragged in in the first place, and that subsequently there would be dragged in the sympathy of the entire Dutch population of the Cape, who would feel it was their duty to prevent any action of the British Government as against their brethren in the Transvaal. He (Mr. Rylands) considered that if the Government of the Cape, representing, as it did, a large Dutch element, chose in any way to sympathize with the action upon its borders, we had no right to step in with our Imperial authority, in order to put a stop to that action. We ought not to allow the Natal Government to drag us, at our own cost, into their quarrels; if we did, the only effect would be that more mischief than good would be done, and many lives sacrificed.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, it was refreshing, in discussing the very thorny and difficult question of South Africa, to encounter a speech like that of his hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay), couched, as it was, in such eloquent terms, and showing that there was, at least, one hon. Gentleman with no doubt or hesitation as to what was the right course to pursue. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) must confess he was not in the happy position of the hon. Gentleman, and he was consoled to see that his hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), tempered as he was by official experience, was more moderate and more hesitating than the Mover of the Amendment. He fully appreciated the earnestness of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the North Riding; but he was bound to say the hon. Gentleman failed to make any practical suggestion for the solution of the difficulty. The hon. Gentleman certainly suggested that we should annex Zululand; but this the present and also the late Government had persistently refused to do. Anybody who took up the map of Zululand would see that if the proposal of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, there would be nothing left of Zululand proper, except a very small strip of territory. Briefly, he would say to the hon. Member that the annexation of Zululand was what Her Majesty's Government had declined, and what they still declined to do. In their opinion, the proposal of the hon. Gentleman would be tantamount to the annexation of Zululand. Let him come to the more detailed, and, he might say, the more plausible suggestion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland); and he must ask the Committee to allow him, very shortly, to follow the hon. Baronet in what he had said. It was necessary to do so, although he respectfully protested against the question being again raised in the House as to the rights or the wrongs of the restoration of Cetewayo. He ventured to submit that that belonged to ancient history, although it was legitimate in the course of argument for the hon. Baronet to point out that that restoration had caused this or that evil, and had involved this or that responsibility. The hon. Baronet had done more than that, for he had discussed at length the advisability or the non-advisability, under the circumstances then existing, of the restoration of Cetewayo. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) was not prepared to follow the hon. Baronet into the details of that question, inasmuch as he did not expect that the question would be started to-day; furthermore, he was not prepared to follow the hon. Baronet in detail as to his statement that, at the time of Cetewayo's restoration, Zululand was in a state of tranquillity and quiet. He could have armed himself with passages from the Blue Books to prove the contrary if he had expected that the hon. Baronet would have raised the point.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he was sure the hon. Gentleman did not wish to misrepresent what he had said. He did not say that Zululand was in a state of tranquillity and quiet at the time of Cetewayo's restoration; but that it was in a fairly peaceful condition until it was rumoured in the country that there was a probability of Cetewayo being restored.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he thoroughly understood the hon. Baronet to mean that the rumours of Cetewayo's restoration, which were subsequently fulfilled, were the cause of the disturbances that existed in Zululand. As he had said, he was not prepared to answer the hon. Baronet's allegations in detail, although he was sure he could have brought sufficient evidence to show that his assertions were not correct, had he known that the question would be raised. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler), who took considerable interest in the restoration of Cetewayo at the time, had told them that, in his opinion, Zululand was in a very unsatisfactory state at the time the King was restored; and the hon. Baronet himself delivered a speech in the House in April, 1882, in which he said—

"He would admit it to be probable that the arrangement made at the conclusion of the war had not worked in an altogether satisfactory manner, and that acts of bloodshed and cruelty had been perpetrated."—(3 Hansard, [268] 778.)

He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet, who, in the passage quoted, acknowledged that Zululand was not in a satisfactory condition at that time. It was not in open revolt, because of the very uncertainty as to whether Cetewayo would return or not; but if it had become certain that Cetewayo would not be restored, it was very probable that the people would have broken out very much in the same way as they had done at present. Her Majesty's Government finding it was universally acknowledged that the Settlement was an unsatisfactory one, there were only two alternatives before them; and if the hon. Baronet would look at the Papers, and the information laid before the House at the time, he would easily see what those alternatives were. One alternative was the restoration of Cetewayo; and the other alternative was annexation. The hon. Baronet said just now, very accurately, that the fault of Sir Garnet Wolseley's Settlement was the want of a paramount authority. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) quite agreed with the hon. Baronet; but how was that paramount authority to be supplied? It could only be supplied by the restoration of Cetewayo, or by the substitution of the paramount authority of this country. The hon. Baronet, speaking in the House of Commons in 1882, said—

"If the state of things described continued, it would undoubtedly be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to interfere and put an end to it—by deposing those Chiefs who behaved in this outrageous manner; by strengthening the hands of the British Resident; and by appointing, if necessary, more Residents and Magistrates."—(Ibid.)

But to appoint more Residents and magistrates was virtually to annex the country; and he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) would, in a short time, when they approached the question as to the present condition of the Reserve, show that we were, in spite of ourselves, approaching very rapidly the condition where its annexation might become necessary. Well, then, as he had said before, the Government had before them, by universal consent, only two alternatives, and they chose the alternative which he believed the nation thought the wiser—namely, that of restoring Cetewayo, and creating a permanent Native power, in preference to annexing Zululand and making British rule permanent. It was said that the restoration of Cetewayo was a mistake, and he did not deny that it had failed to restore peace and order to Zululand; but he confessed, at the same time, that it was a far happier solution of the question that Cetewayo should have returned to his own country and fallen, as he had done, a victim to his own impetuosity, than that he should have died a captive in our hands. We had, at all events, escaped the obloquy that would have attached to his dying in captivity. But had the Settlement failed by any fault of the English Government, or was it a Settlement manifestly foredoomed to failure, and a Settlement that no set of reasonably wise men would have proposed? He maintained that it was not a Settlement that had failed owing to the action of the British Government, and that it was not an experiment absolutely foredoomed to fail. The hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst told them that he condemned the Zulu War, and always had done so; and in his speech on the 17th of April he said that Cetewayo never broke his pledges, but constantly sought the assistance and advice of the Lieutenant Governor of Natal and of Sir Theophilus Shepstone, and almost always acted upon the advice they gave. [Sir HENRY HOLLAND: That was before he was deposed.] Yes; but they should judge of a man's character by his antecedents. Such was the character given Cetewayo by the hon. Baronet himself. It was naturally supposed that his captivity, instead of destroying those good qualities, would have strengthened them. It was the belief of the Government that Cetewayo was capable of taking the good advice offered to him; and he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) asserted that Cetewayo would have succeeded after his restoration, if it was not that he took the advice of people who pretended to be his friends, but who were not so far-seeing as they ought to have been. He spoke of people whom he would not name, both in this country and in Natal, who seemed, in the case of Cetewayo, to have raked up the old doctrine of the divine right of Kings, and who thought that Cetewayo had a right to rule over Zululand, the whole of Zululand, and nothing but Zululand. They told Cetewayo that he ought to be restored to the whole of his territory, that its reduction was wrong, that the establishment of the Reserve was unjust, and that if he only exerted himself sufficiently many friends in this country and elsewhere would assist him in regaining the whole of his old Kingdom. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) maintained that it was this advice which led Cetewayo astray. If it had not been for these voices, which Cetewayo mistook for the voices of more important people, he would have been content with the territory over which he was placed. But while he said that the Government had no reason to suppose that the experiment they were going to make was foredoomed to failure, he owned it did fail; it failed entirely by the spontaneous action of Cetewayo himself. Usibebu was left in the North-Eastern corner of Zululand, for a very good and practical reason, and people dealing with public affairs must take a practical view of them. The practical reason in this case was, that Usibebu had so esconced himself in his position, that he could not be removed without the use of considerable force. The Government, therefore, recognized Usibebu. But the fact was, that Cetewayo was not only misled by officious friends and others; the savage nature of the Zulus also came to the fore, and the people were bent upon revenge. It was a most singular thing that not one of the speakers that day, who had dealt with the question of the invasion of the freebooters, had pointed out what was the turning point of the matter, when it was considered from the Government's point of view. The turning point really was that the Boers had come there at the pressing invitation of the inhabitants of Zululand themselves. It was not an invasion, in the strict sense of the term, although he very much believed that the Zulu people would suffer just as much as if it had been an invasion. The Boers received a deliberate invitation, and the majority of the Zulu people living in the centre of Zululand distinctly made up their minds that revenge was sweeter than land, and that they would part with their land, in order to buy the assistance of those who would revenge them on their enemy Usibebu. That was the secret of the whole matter. It was perfectly true that a Government like that of the Transvaal was responsible, to a great extent, for what happened on its frontier; but let him remind hon. Members what were the qualities of the people who engaged in these feuds. We talked about the frontier, but there was no frontier to them; they were a floating population, and were on one side of the frontier on one day, and on the other side the next day, ready to fight wherever profit led the way. What he wanted to point out to hon. Gentleman was, that though we had called on the Transvaal Government to use their authority to prevent the violation of their frontier, and the Transvaal Government had acknowledged their duty in that respect, and had put out proclamations strongly forbidding any violation of the frontier, it must be remembered that the freebooters were not a class of men over whom a Government like the Transvaal Government, which was not well established, and had no abundant means of repressing disorder, could exercise any great control. Well, then, he maintained that the Zulus had, by reason of their own spontaneous action, caused the incursion of Boers. We were, therefore, to a very great extent, absolved from protecting them in any way from the evils which they had so deliberately brought upon themselves. It had been said by some hon. Members to-night that when the death of Cetewayo occurred, we ought to have put the Natives in the position in which Cetewayo's restoration found them—that was to say, that upon the death of Cetewayo, we ought to have endeavoured to re-establish the Settlement of Sir Garnet Wolseley. Whether we ought to have done so or not he would not delay the Committee by arguing; but he would point out that the Government had very little time allowed them by the Zulus to exercise any moral influence, or any guidance, or give any advice, or send any messenger or Commissioner, if they had been disposed to do so. The moment the breath was out of Cetewayo's body, preparations were made to declare his successor. While these preparations were going on, the Usutus proceeded to perform certain rites of burial over Cetewayo, and then proceeded to attack Usibebu without any delay, calling on the Boers to assist them in their attack. There was an account given by Mr. Grant, who was the spokesman of the Usutu Party, which, if he could only lay his hands on it, he should be very glad to read to the Committee, because, on many occasions, the matter had been dealt with as a case in which this country was coercing the Usutus, in consequence of their presence in the Reserve, and most abominably injuring a lamb-like and civilized race. Mr. Grant was himself an advocate of the Usutu Party. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) could not lay his hand on Mr. Grant's statement; but he could recollect what it was. It would be included in the Papers which would be laid on the Table of the House in the course of a few days. Mr. Grant described the funeral rites of the Zulus, and said it was their habit, directly their King was buried, to go and "wash their spears," as a religious rite, in the blood, usually, of some neighbouring and defenceless tribe; but, as there was no defenceless tribe in this case, they performed the rite by attacking Usibebu. So that the attack by the Usutus was a part of the burial ceremonial of Cetewayo. He did not wish to delay the Committee by going at any greater length into this matter. He had brought the case down to this point—that Cetewayo having died, Her Majesty's Government were allowed no time to exercise any moral influence, or give any advice for the settlement of Zulu affairs, for the reason that the Usutus, who were the majority of the Zulu race, at once, contemporaneously with the death of Cetewayo, plunged into an attack upon Usibebu, and called upon the Boers to assist them. This was all very deplorable, and he regretted it in the extreme; and he should like to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to say at what point they would have had the British Government interfere? Did they mean to say that the British Government should have sent a body of troops to take the side of Usibebu? He admitted that his sympathies were on the side of Usibebu, who had shown himself a good tactician and a gallant man, and had proved himself the friend of England; but why were they to send troops to attack him, and to take part in a civil war taking place in Zululand? He could not follow that; and, short of annexation, he did not see that the Government could have done anything to prevent the state of things brought about by the ferocious spirit and general lack of civilization of the Zulu people, coupled with what the defects in the character of Cetewayo had brought into existence. The question now was, what were the Government to do in the future; and, what had the Government announced as their policy? Well, they had, first of all, declared that the Reserve Territory should be defended and maintained in good order; and he might tell the Committee that there was at that moment a very considerable body of British troops in the Reserve, ready to guard it against attacks from outside. In the Papers which would be laid on the Table of the House in the course of a few days, hon. Members would find recorded the attacks which had been made by the Usutu Party upon certain loyal Chiefs in the Reserve. They would see the means taken by the British Resident to put a stop to these attacks and violations of peace; and they would see that at present, owing to the energetic steps which had been taken, matters wore a much more peaceful and orderly aspect than they had some time ago. The hon. Member who had opened the discussion had made some reference to the defeat of Mr. Osborn, the British Resident. [Mr. GUY DAWNAY: No; to the attack on him.] He thought the hon. Member had implied that Mr. Osborn had been defeated; but, at any rate, the matter was not very important. He did not know what were the arguments which the hon. Member drew from the attack, except that the Reserve was not maintained in that state of order in which it ought to be. He could only say that the attack was made upon Mr. Osborn most unexpectedly, and was the first sign of the real activity of the rebellious element in the Reserve. When Mr. Osborn knew that this rebellious spirit existed he retired some distance, and communicated with the Governor of Natal and the Officer in command of the Forces, who took such steps as succeeded in absolutely coercing and overcoming the disturbing elements in the Reserve. The hon. Member, therefore, might take it for granted that when the House had these things brought before it, it would see that nothing had been wanting on the part of the Government to vindicate the position and authority of England within the Reserve. That policy would be continued in the future. But he would point out to those hon. Members who talked about extending the Reserve, that the question would become one of incorporating surrounding land. We had a considerable body of troops in the Reserve, and very likely they would have to be retained for some time; and he demurred entirely to the statement of the hon. Member for Midhurst, that if the principle of the Reserve had been extended over a very large part of Zululand, they could have acted without any large body of troops.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he had not advocated the extension of the Reserve, but a development of the system of Residents, as advocated by Sir Henry Bulwer—the substitution of the guiding authority of Residents for the present system.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that would have involved much larger measures, both civil and military, than the Government had thought it expedient to adopt. The Papers which would be laid on the Table of the House very shortly would, he believed, show that as far as the Reserve was concerned the Government had done what they ought to do. As to the Transvaal Border, the Government were still considering whether, under the provisions of the Convention, they should appoint a Resident on the Border or not. Of course, the matter was more difficult and complicated now than it was a short time ago, owing to the action of the Zulus. ["Oh, oh!"] No less an authority than Sir Hercules Robinson had told them that, in the present state of things, the matter was much more difficult to deal with than it was a short time ago. With regard to what was said a little earlier as to calling on the Transvaal Government to appoint a Resident, what he had stated the other day was, that it would be premature to do that at the present moment, for the reason that the Convention had not been ratified by the Volksraad. It would be better to wait to see if the Convention was ratified. When he said that things were now more complicated than they were a short time ago, some hon. Gentlemen opposite had chuckled. His point was, that what had complicated matters during the last three or four months was the action of the Zulus themselves. The Zulus would have followed the same line of conduct, whether a Resident had been on the Transvaal Border or not. They would have sacrificed everything to their desire for revenge against Usibebu. He wished, before concluding, to allude to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse). That hon. Member, in very eloquent language and largely-extended views, had told them that they must everywhere, and at once, assert the Suzerainty of England in South Africa, if they wanted to maintain the supremacy of this country in that quarter of the globe. He would only say one word on the point, and that was, that the future of British rule and influence in South Africa depended a great deal more, in his humble opinion, upon the action of the Anglo-Saxons, as individuals and communities, than on the action of the Imperial Government. They must remember the very curious circumstances of the South African Colonies. They could not have it repeated too often—because it was the key to the whole of our difficulties in that part of the world—that though, in common language, these Colonies were called "British," yet the British-speaking and British-educated Colonists were in a distinct minority. Not only at the Cape, but in Natal itself, at least half, or more, were Dutch. But he would point out something still more peculiar—namely, that this distinction of race and language was coincident with the distinct condition and pursuits, and, therefore, with the aims and aspirations, of the Colonists, because the British-speaking part of the population would be found almost entirely in the towns, carrying on trades; whilst the Dutch and Africander races would be found in the country districts, carrying on the pursuit of farming. All the crucial, perpetual difficulties in South Africa were owing to the coming together of these different races, holding diametrically opposite views, not only from their habits, but also from their interests. They had, on the one hand, the British element, desiring to see the Native races prosper, and increase, and live in safety, in order that they might carry on trade with them; and, on the other hand, they had the Dutch element, the land seekers and landowners, desiring to see the Native races more or less swept out of the way, in order that they might enter into possession of their land. They had these two elements constantly at variance. Which of the two was to succeed in the long run? He ventured to say that the future of that country must depend upon the British people, quite apart from the Imperial Government. He confessed he deprecated any rivalry of races; but the facts were there, and were not to be got rid of by simply ignoring them. If the emigration from these shores to the shores of South Africa was large, and if the enterprise and perseverance of the Anglo-Saxon race continued to be what it was, then the future was with us; and, in that case, he ventured to prophesy that the Mother Country, whatever Government might be in power, would not be backward in protecting and maintaining the elements of British influence there. But if emigration from the Mother Country was small, if enterprise fell off, and if the Colonists in South Africa were disposed to look too much—as they were very often—not to their own exertions for the prosperity of the Colony, but to the expenditure of Imperial money, to deliver them from the stagnation of trade; if the men of the Afrikaner and Dutch races increased in numbers and power, while the others remained stationary or declining, it would only be a mistake on the part of the Imperial Government to try to bolster up what would be a dying interest. He was only speaking his own opinion in these matters; but it seemed to him that to engage in such expeditions as had often been advocated by hon. Members of the House into countries which had not yet been occupied by a civilized race, which were far removed from the centres of population—partly abandoning countries not yet peopled for the purpose—expeditions, whether over the Zulu border, the Zwasib border, or the Amatonga border, would entail unfortunate and useless responsibilities, and would not really and truly tend to what hon. Members desired, and what he himself certainly desired—namely, the extension and maintenance of the British name in South Africa. No; let them consolidate what they had got. Let them consider every question put before them which required the acceptance of new responsibilities in South Africa as forming a part of a whole question, and not as new and separate questions. He had no doubt it was perfectly easy to prove that if Zululand were the only place in which we had responsibilities, actual or accruing, it would be an infinitely better thing for Zululand, for Natal, and for this country, that Zululand should be annexed. But that was not the fact. It was necessary to convince men who were responsible for the whole of the Empire, and who had the same call coming from a thousand different places—from New Guinea, Basutoland, Walvisch Bay, Bechuanaland, and elsewhere—that the responsibility ought to be assumed. He ventured to submit that Her Majesty's Government were, no doubt, as Successors of a former Government, responsible for the disturbed state of Zululand; and, before he sat down, he would just answer what had fallen from the hon. Member who made the Motion they were discussing with regard to their saying nothing more as to the heritage of the Zulu War. He could only answer the hon. Member as he had answered a Conservative Friend of his, who had said—"I am sick of hearing you all talk of the heritage left by the late Government." He had replied—"My dear Sir, you are not half so sick of hearing of it as I am of dealing with it." That was the feeling of the Colonial Office on this matter. There was a responsibility imposed on Her Majesty's Government by the heritage of the Zulu War, and the affairs of Cetewayo and the Zulu people; and, he imagined, they had done the best they could, short of taking the step they had declined to take in the past, and must still decline to take in the future—namely, the annexation of Zululand to the Empire.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: We have been told, from authoritative sources, that the policy of the Tory Party, at the present moment, is to force an appeal to the people. Certainly, no stronger argument in favour of such an appeal could have been well adduced than the appearance of the House of Commons ever since half-past 12 this afternoon; because, although this is a matter of first-class Imperial importance, as everyone will admit, and although it is a question in which the Liberal Party are supposed, as a whole, to be animated by the strongest and most ardent views—they, in particular, posing as the champions of aboriginal races, and as the friends of nationality—there has not, to my knowledge, since the debate began, been an attendance of 20 Liberal Members in the House. I think if that is the state of the House, at a period of the Session not too far advanced for an important discussion on a matter of Imperial concern—if you cannot get 20 Liberal Members to give the Government the assistance of their counsels—it is not a bad argument in favour of the construction of a new House of Commons, and an appeal to the people. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) has made a speech of some length and immense pretensions. He appeared to me to imagine that he was, for the moment, filling the place of the Prime Minister, and to be making as good an imitation as he could of the manner, the great eloquence, and the variety of expression which that right hon. Gentleman usually exhibits. The object of the hon. Gentleman was excellent, but the performance fell very short of the object. His whole tone appeared to be extremely didactic, but the substance of the speech was extremely feeble. The hon. Gentleman seemed to me to have been studying recently some child's "Guide to South Africa," and to have detailed from it some elementary information about the geography of that country to the House of Commons. There were one or two points in his address which deserve brief notice. In the first place, he freely admitted the total failure of the policy of the Government with regard to Cetewayo. Well, Sir, I do not know what state of mind other hon. Members may be in, but, for my own part, I am getting extremely tired of these confessions of total failure. We have never yet discussed the question of South Africa without the Government admitting that their policy has been "a total failure." Their policy with respect to the Transvaal, Bechuanaland, Basutoland, and now Zululand, has been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies to be a total failure. Five or six times in succession—as regularly as these subjects come before us—it is notified by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies or by the President of the Board of Trade, at the Table, that the policy of the Government has totally failed. But it is not only on these subjects that the House has had to listen to these confessions of failure. The House has listened to the confession of the total failure of the Government's Irish land legislation, and of their Egyptian policy, before now. For the sake of variety, to say nothing of the credit of the Government, if only once in a way, I could wish they had been able to announce some slight success. The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies was extremely frank, and said—"I admit that our policy with regard to the restoration of Cetewayo was a total failure; but it was not a failure which was foredoomed, or which any reasonable man could anticipate. The failure was entirely owing to the Liberal Party, and," he said, "especially the advanced wing of the Liberal Party." ["No, no!"] Yes; those were his words, and that was the only interpretation any man of sense could place upon his observations. The hon. Gentleman said the restoration of Cetewayo would have been gloriously successful, and that Cetewayo would have been at this moment King of Zululand, if it had not been for the bad advice given to him by the Liberal Party, especially the advanced wing of the Liberal Party. So far, indeed, is this a cause of failure, that it seems to me to be one—to use a French expression—which "jumps to the eye." You might be certain that the advice given from such a quarter to the King of a historic race would be one that would necessarily lead him to his ruin. The hon. Gentleman used the words—"The policy of restoring Cetewayo was, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, inaugurating a reign of peace;" but, a little farther on, he proceeded to say—"I do not deny that the present condition of Zululand is wretched in the extreme." Now, when we have Ministers getting up at the Table and making statements of that kind, what are we to conclude, except that the whole Colonial policy of Her Majesty's Government is defective, from beginning to end? The restoration of Cetewayo was the subject of a debate in this House some two years ago, and, fortunately, by the kindness of some unknown friend, I have come across an article on Zululand in a highly respectable journal—a journal whose views, I think, on ecclesiastical doctrines, will recommend themselves to the Prime Minister—I mean The Guardian. In this article an expression used by the Prime Minister was quoted—an expression of immense value at this moment. When the policy of Her Majesty's Government in restoring Cetewayo was under consideration, it was said—

"The subject was brought forward two years ago, and the Prime Minister was kind enough to express sympathy with the Monarch in his adversity; but he said that it must be remembered that the peace and welfare of the country ought to be the dominant consideration; and he went on to remark that Cetewayo's release, unless desired by the great body of the Zulu people, would be a new cause of political disturbance and of the extensive shedding of blood. And he said, further, that a restoration bereft of such result would be no relief to the responsibility we had already incurred ; on the contrary, he thought there would be a very serious addition to that responsibility."

Well, Sir, the Prime Minister, having stated that Cetewayo's release would be likely to produce extensive shedding of blood, shortly after consented to that restoration, and we are now told by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies that that was a policy which no reasonable man could see was foredoomed to fail. Then the Prime Minister states that the restoration of Cetewayo, if effected, would greatly increase the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Unless desired.] The article says—

"And he said, further, that a restoration bereft of such result would be no relief to the responsibility we had already incurred ; on the contrary, he thought there would be very serious addition to that responsibility."

How do they meet that responsibility ? The condition of Zululand is wretched in the extreme, and the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies gets up and states that the policy of Her Majesty's Government will never, under any circumstances and conditions, be a policy which can lead to any extension of British authority in Zululand. I submit to the House that there is a total, obvious, and complete contradiction between what the Prime Minister said two years ago, and what the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies has said to-night. I do not think it at all possible to acquit Her Majesty's Government of carelessness in respect to the carrying out of their policy, because how was Cetewayo restored ? He was restored to a small and most barren and unproductive portion of his territory. The British Government took away from him an enormous slice of Zululand, which they called "the Reserve," and gave another slice to Usibebu, and then they expected that this Monarch, who had been dethroned, and had lost his prestige beforehand by being defeated by the British Forces, would be able to assert himself as King of Zululand. They expected this of him, although they had sent him back in that degraded and humiliated and diminished way. I venture to say that if the restoration had been carried out in a larger and broader manner, there is no reason to suppose it would have failed ; but the means the Government took to carry out their policy were the means that foredoomed it to fail.

Lord Randolph Churchill

Before I leave the speech of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies I should like to notice one more argument. He said, in the lengthy peroration with which he concluded his remarks, that he regretted to say there were some hon. Members on his own side who were anxious that British Sovereignty should be asserted in South Africa. We know that there are opinions of that kind—heretical, sadly heretical opinions—amongst some Members of the Liberal Party. Only yesterday, some Members of the Liberal Party, under the presidency of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), met for the purpose of advocating a very large extension of British Sovereignty and Imperial rule, and I imagine the Under Secretary of State must have had that meeting in his mind when he spoke so bitterly of people who wished British Sovereignty to be asserted in South Africa. But what was the reason he gave against British Sovereignty being asserted in South Africa ? Why, it was that the British Colonists were in a minority. That was the convincing reason why British Sovereignty, instead of being asserted, should rather be withdrawn. Apply that argument to India. How would your British Sovereignty succeed in India if, because you are in a minority, it must not be asserted ? Apply the argument, again, to Ireland. How many "British-speaking" and "British-educated" subjects are there in Ireland who are in favour of British Sovereignty ? They are in a minority ; and I think, therefore, that the great theory of Colonial and Imperial policy, which the Under Secretary of State has laid down, though it may be accepted in his own Department, is one which it will be very useful and advantageous for us, his political opponents, to develop before the enlightened constituencies of the country. I venture to think that in all these matters there are two things which Her Majesty's Government ought to consider, and one thing that they ought not to consider ; and the one thing they ought not to consider they have considered, while the two things they ought to have considered they have not given a thought to. In the first place, they ought to consider the interests of the Colony of Natal ; and, secondly—and only secondary to that—they ought to consider the interests of Zululand. What they need not consider—the parties whose interests they need not consider are the Boers. Those who have absolutely no claim or title for one moment to their consideration are the Boers and the Boer Republic, for whom they have, up to now, sacrificed almost every shred of their dignity. The whole of our difficulties in South Africa—our modern difficulties, for I decline altogether to go back to what occurred under the late Government, that being, if you like, ancient history—the whole of the difficulties which the Committee is considering, spring from the surrender to the Transvaal Boers which took place in 1881—that utterly disgraceful and cowardly surrender of a British Army, nearly 10,000 strong, admirably equipped, with one of our best Generals at its head, before a parcel of undrilled, plundering, freebooting Boers, whom they could easily have swept from off the face of the earth. That is the origin of all these difficulties. All along the Government has been frightened of these Transvaal Boers. I took down the expression of the Under Secretary of State—"Under the last Convention the Government have a right to appoint a Commissioner-Resident upon the frontier of Zululand and Boerland. But," says the hon. Gentleman, "we cannot appoint a Resident now, because the Zulus"—he ought to have said the Uxutue—"have invited the Boers into Zululand; and, that being the case, we can no longer proceed—in fact, we dare not proceed—to put in force an important Article of the Convention just concluded." Therefore, I am right in my statement that, in all these matters, the Government are actuated by fear of the Boers. It seems ridiculous to say it; but you can hardly doubt the truth of it when Her Majesty's Government, with a great Army in the field which could, by no possibility, have been checked, first of all begged for a Convention, and concluded one which was repudiated and broken in every Article by the Boers, then begged for another, and concluded that also—the Boers sending over Ambassadors to negotiate it—and when you find the Under Secretary of State now getting up and saying—"We dare not, under the circumstances, appoint a Resident to carry out the Article of the Convention." What is the state of things existing in Zululand? Why the same state of things which existed in Bechuanaland. You have the freebooting Boers there, and you know that the result of their operations in Bechuanaland was that a large part of the country was cut off and handed to them, and that there existed there any amount of slaughter, disturbance, and disorder, and plundering, cruelty, and misery of every kind. The same condition of things is coming about in Zululand, under the eyes of the House of Commons. The Boers, in spite of their Treaty with you, invade the country. How can it be expected that the quibble, the colourable statement, by the Under Secretary of State, that they were invited there, will satisfy the House of Commons? The Guardian says—

"By the help of some hundreds of these Boers the loyal Chief Uaibebu, made independent by us, has been attacked with great slaughter and driven from his territory."

And it goes on to say that hundreds of thousands of acres have been taken, and are in process of being taken away, from the Native races who are ruined. I do not think that is a bit too strong. What I want to point out to the House of Commons is this—that the same state of things, which the House of Commons felt so deeply about Bechuanaland last year—and which, but for their great respect for the Prime Minister and the great hold he, personally, had upon them, his own Party would have censured—is coming about in Zululand. It is absolutely impossible that the statement of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies can satisfy this House. You said you would not undertake the protection of Basutoland. You have been obliged to protect it. You said you would not undertake the protection of Bechuanaland; but that is now under the protection of the British Crown; and so it will be with Zululand. At least, if Her Majesty's Government will not recognize their responsibilities in South Africa, the country will place other persons in their place who will do so.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I will only detain the Committee a short time; and I should not rise at all to take part in the debate, if I did not feel that the speeches we have heard to-day have regard quite as much to the principle on which the action of Her Ma-jeesty's Government should be based as to the actual measures which have been proposed, and that some remarks have been made which I could hardly hear without rising to protest against. My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse) made a speech, which I was very sorry there were not more hon. Members present to hear—a speech evidently of great thought, and, as it seemed to me, of remarkable ability, as well as power. He was followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who attributed to him and his speech views which he entirely disowned. The hon. Gentleman attributed to the hon. Member for Bath the advocacy of spread-eagle Imperialism. I cannot accept that definition of my hon. Friend's speech; for what I understood my hon. Friend to be advocating was, that where we incurred responsibilities, we should fulfil them; and if we were not prepared to take that line, I understood him to say we had better creep out of the country as soon as possible; and I think he is quite right. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley evidently thinks it due to the taxpayers of this country, that matters in Zululand should be left alone, and left to take care of themselves, and that we should see that no money is spent on the place, and that no troops, under any circumstances, are sent out there. Well, the whole meaning of that policy is, that we should withdraw from South Africa altogether. If we are to remain in Zululand at all, we must bear in mind the responsibilities we have undertaken. It is said that it is a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence. If that is the case, we may meet our difficulties there at the present moment by a comparatively small expenditure; whereas, if we wait until these difficulties have increased, we shall have to incur a great and an unknown expenditure. Let us keep to the particular matter before us. I am not going to say a word about past history, or, as my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) calls it, the ancient history of the subject, except in so far as it bears upon our actual position in Zululand at the present moment, and upon the responsibilities which we have undertaken there. I, like many others, was opposed to the original Zulu War, but it was undertaken. The Zulus were defeated, and the King of Zululand was deposed. We did not feel at that time that, in destroying the only recognized Government of that country, we had divested ourselves of all responsibility for the future of the country; and certainly the English Government did not then attempt to take that line, and, had they done so, the people of England would have protested against their action. Whether wisely or unwisely, an arrangement was then entered into with 12 or 13 of the Native Chiefs. The arrangement was open to a great deal of objection. There were grave doubts as to how far peace and order could be maintained; but the arrangement, upon the whole, worked quite as well as could have been expected, and, perhaps, rather better. Then came the restoration of Cetewayo, and that was a matter upon which I do not agree with many of my hon. Friends with whom I generally act in these matters. I agreed with what fell upon the subject from the Prime Minister—as quoted by the noble Lord—"that we had to consider the peace and welfare of the country." I had grave doubts whether any Chief—above all, any savage Chief—who had been deposed, could be sent back to rule the country with any great chance of peace, especially after the English Government had entered into an arrangement with these 13 Kinglets, under which they had parcelled out the country among them, but which was set aside on the restoration of Cetewayo. It was impossible for Cetewayo to be restored, without infringing on this arrangement. Therefore, I think the arrangement was foredoomed to great difficulty, though, perhaps, not necessarily to failure. It could not be expected that these 13 Kinglets, or any number of them, would willingly subject themselves to the rule of this man whom we sent out. What has been the result of such a policy? I do not want to throw blame upon either the present or the past Government. The Zulu question is difficult and complicated beyond measure, and I think anyone would be most unreasonable who complained of the present or even the past Government, and did not sympathize with their difficulties. What are the actual circumstances of the case? We have to deal with this country, which is in a state of disturbance and disorder owing to our action—a state of disorder for which we are responsible. In consequence of our having set aside our own arrangement, the country is in a state of warfare and bloodshed, and for that state of things we are in some measure, certainly, responsible. It has been remarked that the Zulus have dreadful customs, such as washing their spears in each other's blood. So they have, undoubtedly; but they appear to have washed their spears in rather a more bloody manner within the last two or three years than they did before. How can we regard such a state of things, which has been brought about by our own action, and say, with any degree of self-respect or without shame, that, having got the Zulus into this state, we will leave them to kill one another off in order to save ourselves from further trouble? I do not think that we can safely leave matters there. When the hon. Member spoke about the future of Zululand, I confess, if he will allow me, good-naturedly, to say so, what he told us about the future was very little indeed. His plan for the future appeared to be limited to the protection of the Reserve Territory—which is absolutely necessary. No one would think for a moment about not protecting it. His plan, however, appears to be limited to the protection of the Reserve, and the production of some fresh Papers. I do not think he gives us an idea as to how we are to deal with these difficult circumstances. Difficult, however, as they are, the Government will have to deal with them, and to feel that they have some responsibility for the warfare that is going on in Zululand, and that it is their duty to try and see how it can be stopped. I believe it will be found, in the long run, that duty and expediency go together, and that the fulfilment of our responsibilities is, after all, the most economical course. As regards the actual matter, what is likely to happen? In consequence of having left this country entirely to itself, after having, by our arms and by our arrangements, utterly disorganized it, freebooting adventurers are coming over from both borders—not only from the Transvaal, but also from Natal—and fermenting disorders, and the opinion of those in South Africa best fitted to judge is that the danger will not be confined to Zululand, but will spread to Natal itself. The instant that danger is realized, economy will be no longer considered, and we shall send over a Force which will probably cost 10 or 100 times the sum for which Lord Derby is informed the whole difficulty can now be settled. I must acknowledge that I am not sufficiently acquainted with the subject to take upon myself to recommend to Her Majesty's Government the adoption of any particular course; but I am convinced of this, that, whatever be the difficulties, the Government cannot rest contented with merely protecting the Reserve Territory, but must feel that it is their duty to try and restore that peace and order which we, by our arms first, and then by our diplomacy, and next, and lastly, by our change in that diplomacy, disturbed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: 'I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster), in the speech that he has just made, and to which we have attentively listened, has merely emphasized the difficulties which have been brought into view in the course of this debate; and his observations go to show that there are only two alternative policies which can be adopted by this country in reference to Zululand. In the first place, there is the policy which has been adopted and defended by Her Majesty's Government—that of interfering as little as possible with the internal affairs of Zululand. We have come to the decision to abstain from all such interferences, and to accept the policy of our Predecessors, so far as to refuse any proposal in any shape or form for the annexation of the country. That policy has been condemned as strongly as possible by the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay). The hon. Member made us a very eloquent and very interesting speech at the commencement of this discussion, and the only criticism that I shall make upon it is to say that it was too emphatic, and rather too full of superlatives. The hon. Member described our policy as "ghastly," "vile," "infamous," "consummate folly," "murderous," and as "dictated by fear of the scoundrelly and infamous Boers." I admire very much his command of invective and adjectives; but I followed with still greater interest his subsequent remarks, in which he proposed an alternative policy for our acceptance. I find that the hon. Member was in favour of what is called

"expansion of the Empire." He was in favour of a policy which practically would amount to the annexation of the whole of Zululand—of a policy which would have entailed the annexation of the Transvaal. If I were to imitate the style of the hon. Member, I should be entitled to say that that would be a blundering policy, a plundering policy, a policy of pick-pockets, filibusters, and brigands. At all events, without developing the argument any further in the style of the hon. Member, I would say that, while I am prepared to accept the statement just made by my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), that this country is bound to fulfil the responsibilities which it has undertaken, I am also of opinion that it is bound to look all round to see whether it has not responsibilities at home as well as in these distant places, and to inquire whether it would be wise and judicious to undertake new responsibilities from which so little advantage can possibly be expected to result to anyone. Well, Sir, I think the House listened with some amusement to the rather extraordinary speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). The noble Lord commenced his observations by referring to the state of the House when he was addressing it, as a proof of the lack of interest taken in the question. I do not think there is any lack of interest in it, either on the Liberal or Conservative side; but I think, perhaps, it is rather natural, at this late period of the Session, and when the House has been sitting until 3, 4, or 5 o'clock in the morning on previous nights, that no very large attendance should be brought down on a Wednesday afternoon to listen to a discussion that is understood to be somewhat hollow in its character, and, above all, to listen to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, when—to use an expression of his own—"career[ing]" about a subject with which he has the smallest possible amount of practical acquaintance. The noble Lord says that I and my hon. Friend (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) on this and on previous occasions have admitted the failure of their policy. I confess I do not plead guilty to ever having made any such admission, and I certainly have not heard such admission made by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. What my hon. Friend really did say was, that the state of Zululand was not, at the present time, entirely satisfactory. It would hardly be expected that the policy of the Government, or of anyone else, could secure a perfectly satisfactory state of Zululand in the course of a few months. The state of Zululand is now very much what it has been ever since the country was disturbed by the policy of the late Government, and by the policy of the Zulu War. From that time down to the present day, the state of Zululand has been unsatisfactory. All that can be said of us is, that our policy of non-intervention has not resulted in a satisfactory state of things. The noble Lord went on to say that the condition of affairs in Zululand was owing to Cetewayo having been left with a miserably small portion of territory when he was restored. The noble Lord is perfectly aware that two-thirds of the whole territory ruled over by Cetewayo was restored to him. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No, no!] That is perfectly true, as the noble Lord will see if he will study the map on a large scale. The fact is, that if the whole of the country was not restored to him, it was because we took the view which has been put before the Committee by the right hon. Member for Bradford, that having come under obligations to the Kinglets, by reason of Sir Garnet Wolseley's Settlement, we did not think it right to hand them over, against their will, to the restored Chief. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford made a statement, in which he followed, I think, the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland). He said that, after all, the arrangement with Sir Garnet Wolseley for setting up these Chieftians was working satisfactorily, when the restoration of Cetewayo was contemplated by the Government. Nothing could be further from the truth than that statement. In this House, on the occasion of the last debate, there was not a single Member who did not admit that the state of the country was wholly unsatisfactory; that the Settlement made by the late Government, or by Sir Garnet Wolseley, under their instructions, had absolutely and entirely failed. In order to be quite certain about this, let me ask the Committee to listen to two quotations giving an account of the state of the country before the restoration of Cetewayo. The first, which I take from the Blue Books, is this—

"The relations between Ohamu and his too powerful subject Umnyamana, which were, from the first, unfriendly, became this year strained almost to the point of war. Ohamu was also defied by the tribe of the Amaquili, living in the north of his territory, who, no doubt, acted under the influence of Umnyamana. The authority of Usibebu, another of our 13 nominees, was persistently resisted by Undabuku and Uswetu, two of Cetewayo's brothers. Umlandela, another of our nominees, was driven out of his territory by Sitimela, a grandson of Dingewayo, Chaka's Predecessor; and Sitimela, who perhaps aspired to reunite Zululand under his own rule, was joined by Somkeli, himself one of the nominated Chiefs. Three other selected Chiefs, Ohingwayo, Seketwayo, and Unfanawenhlela, reported at different times that they were being opposed by their people, whom they could not control—the reason being apparently in some cases that they had been inciting the tyrannies which popular belief ascribes to Cetewayo."

In fact, according to this statement, and to other statements which will be found in the Blue Books, there was hardly a single portion of the territory that was not, at the time of the restoration of Cetewayo, the scene of tumult, disorder, and massacre. In April, 1882, speaking in the debate on Zululand in this House, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), I think, quoted a passage from a letter dated October 27th, written by the Rev. R. Robertson, in Zululand. The hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Darnay) has told us that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had led to inter-tribal slaughter, which exceeded anything ever known since Zululand was annexed. I beg to call attention to this statement by Mr. Robertson, who is one of the missionaries in Zululand—

"You have heard, no doubt, of the recent slaughter of the Abagulusi. I am told it was greater than that of Isandlana. I fear there will be more yet. In fact, I am expecting every day to hear that the Usutu (Cetewayo's own tribe) have broken out. Their patience has been severely tried, and it needs just a little more provocation to bring about another crash. Maduna is strong enough to make mincemeat of Hamu and Zibebu any day. What he will end in doing, I know not." — (3 Hansard, [268] 766.)

MR. GUY DARNAY: What is the date of the letter?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: October 27th, 1881.

MR. GUY DARNAY: What I said was, that the greatest slaughter ever known in Zululand had been during the last 18 months.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: My object is absolutely to deny the statement of the hon. Member. I say that the disturbances previous to the restoration of Cetewayo were quite as serious as any that have since occurred. And let me say that, although Sir Henry Bulwer has been referred to several times as being opposed to the restoration of Cetewayo, his opposition was based, as his despatches show, entirely on the fear that, if Cetewayo was restored, the military power of the Zulus would be recreated, and great danger would arise in consequence to Natal. He admitted that the state of Zululand could not continue as it was previous to the restoration of Cetewayo, and he put before the Government in effect two alternatives. He said—

"Either you must consent to exercise paramount authority over the thirteen Chiefs, or you must endeavour to carry out the policy you prefer and restore some kind of Native authority."

Her Majesty's Government declined, without due consideration, to accept the suggestion of Sir Henry Bulwer to assume paramount British authority in Zululand, because they were convinced by all past experience—and subsequent experience has shown that they were right—that the creation of this British authority in Zululand would necessarily result in the practical annexation of the country. But having decided against that policy, then I think it was impossible to avoid the conclusion that, at all events, the restoration of Cetewayo was an experiment that ought to be tried. If the Zulu War was, as is admitted by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Holland), so unjust and so unnecessary, then common justice required that Cetewayo should be restored, as far, at least, as was consistent with the engagements into which we had entered with the other Chiefs. But there is another reason—the reason of policy. Cetewayo's name, was, at all events, the most powerful name in Zululand, and the probabilities were more in favour of a peaceful settlement of the country under his leadership, than under the leadership of any other single Chief; and I entirely agree in what has been said by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), that if he had been well advised, in all probability that Settlement might have been a lasting and satisfactory one. The proposals now made to us vary very much. The proposal of the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire is that we should extend the Reserve Territory to the Black Umvolosi. That would practically be to assume absolute control over two-thirds of Zululand. The proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst, although a little more specious, comes to practically the same result—that is, that we should exercise paramount authority over the country by means of British Residents and Magistrates. But who is to enforce that authority? It is absurd to tell us that the Zulu people would welcome these gentlemen among them. We know, from all past experience, that friction would inevitably arise, and then we should be called upon to defend the authority of the servants of the Crown by a British Army, and when we heard of bloodshed, we should be told that we were responsible for it. But suppose we adopted the plan of establishing authority on the Black Umvolosi, or extended the Reserve up to that line, there would still be Natives beyond that frontier, and Boers outside it. There would still be freebooters, and all the difficulties we have had we should be called upon to encounter still further away. What we have done has been to reserve the least possible amount of territory under our control which, in our opinion, was consistent with our obligations to those Chiefs who were unwilling to accept the rule of Cetewayo. We have reserved the territory of John Dunn, and have allowed fugitives from other parts of the country to come in and find security within that Reserve. The formation of this Reserve border is a protection to Natal. Either the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) declared that the result of the Government policy had been to create danger to the Colony of Natal; but, as a matter of fact, on the contrary, a band of neutral and protected territory has been interposed between Natal and the country of the Zulus. Then there only remains the question of what responsibility falls upon this Bench with reference to the territory which is beyond the Reserve—the territory inhabited by the Basutos. The position there is truly and entirely due to those from whom we have inherited it. I agree with the opinion expressed by Sir Hercules Robinson, the High Commissioner. He is the best authority on such a subject; and while, as he says, he is reluctant to offer advice upon a matter which is not within his High Commissionership, he gives this opinion—

“I think it right to say that, in my opinion, we shall be spared future complications and questions if we define without further delay the precise limits of our obligations in relation to the Reserve Territory. Nothing short of a Protectorate over the whole of Zululand, supported by force, can prevent the eventual occupation by the Boers of a large portion North of the Reserve. I confess I do not see that we are bound to incur grave trouble and expense to save those outside the Reserve from the consequences of their own folly and misconduct.”

Now, that is exactly the state of the case. The condition of affairs North of the Reserve is due to the folly and misconduct of the Chiefs in that part of the country. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) says it was a rotten pretext to pretend that an invitation was sent by the Basutos to the Boers; but there is most distinct evidence of invitations addressed to the Boers, probably by both parties, and certainly by the Basuto Party, and there is no doubt that portions of land have been awarded to these fortune-hunters. That is the commonest thing in South Africa. There is never a tribal conflict in which the Chiefs do not get the Whites in their neighbourhood on their side. Usibebu himself, who is now suffering from the interference of the Whites, had previously received assistance from the Whites against Cetewayo. Under these circumstances, it would be monstrous that we should involve the English taxpayer and the English people in responsibilities in order to prevent a state of things brought about by no fault of our own, and for which we are not in the slightest degree responsible. I will go further, and say that I am certain that we could not bring about a state of things which would offer a better chance of the settlement of this matter than the present system. Disturbances there must be, after such a war as that which destroyed and broke the power of the Zulu Chiefs; but it is absolutely untrue to say, as the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire said, that the rule of the Boers over the Natives has been brutal and tyrannical. The proof is, that the Native population in the Transvaal has increased enormously and multiplied many-fold by the voluntary migration of the Natives into the Transvaal.

MR. GUY DAWNAY: I never said anything of the sort.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I should be sorry to misrepresent the hon. Member; but when he comes to read the report of his speech, he will find it was one of his contentions that we ought not to leave the country to the incursions of the Boer freebooters, because they were people of a low and barbarous civilization who had brutally ill-treated the Natives.

MR. GUY DAWNAY: I entirely agree in that; but I never said it to-day. The right hon. Gentleman is putting into my mouth words which I never used.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am sorry to misrepresent the hon. Member. Will he state what he did say?

MR. GUY DAWNAY: The only expressions I used in reference to the Boers were applied to the Boer freebooters; those I called "infamous" and "scandalous." I never said a word about their ill-treating the Natives in the Transvaal.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I can assure the hon. Member that he does injustice to his own graces of oratory. He used, I think, many words equally abusive, and I am certain he will find that he did accuse the Boers of having ill-treated the population under their rule. But it is not necessary that I should say more about that, because I understand that the hon. Member admits that, if he did not say that to-day, he did say it on a previous occasion. Whenever he did say that, he was entirely mistaken as to the facts of the case. So far from the rule of the Boers being brutal and barbarous towards the Natives, it must be a very much better rule than the Natives have been accustomed to; otherwise, they would not have migrated in these enormous numbers into the Transvaal Territory. Although I do not pretend to say that the government of the Transvaal State is to be compared with the European civilization, I have no doubt it is an immense improvement on anything to which the Natives have been accustomed; and even if the result of this should be that the Boers acquire some footing in Zululand, I am not certain that that will constitute any disadvantage to the Natives, and certainly it will not cause any danger to British rule in South Africa. At any rate, it is a problem much too doubtful for us to undertake the responsibility urged upon us by the hon. Member; and, under no circumstances at present, can we indefinitely extend British rule in this part of South Africa, for such an extension would involve enormous additional responsibilities, and entail very serious fresh demands on the treasure and resources of this country.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOOTE: Sir, I do not feel myself competent to decide the question between the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Chamberlain) and my hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay). Although I heard a considerable part of my hon. Friend's very spirited speech, I did not happen to hear the portion which has given rise to so much controversy. It is quite clear, at all events, that between the opinion which my hon. Friend entertains of the Boers, and that which Her Majesty's Government, as represented by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, hold, there is a very considerable difference, and a large amount of latitude. I am not going to trouble the Committee with a discussion of the question as to the precise mode in which the Boers have been in the habit of treating the Natives of this country. If they really deserve all the commendations which have been bestowed upon them by the right hon. Gentleman, I must say our position is very much more simple, and much less difficult, than I supposed; but I fear the general impression under which we have laboured for a long time is very different from that rather rose-coloured view which the right hon. Gentleman has taken. What I wish to call attention to is the barrenness and meagreness of the statements on the part of the Government with regard to the policy they have pursued. Whatever may be said about the past history of the Zulu question, and whatever charges may be made on the one side or the other with regard to particular events, there is no doubt that the matter has now come to that position in which we are, as a nation, deeply responsible for the condition of that country; and it is important that we should really have some assurance on the part of the Government that they are pursuing a policy which is likely to be for the benefit and safety both of our own Colony of Natal and of the Zulu people, in whom we have, or ought to have, great interest, and for whom we ought to entertain a sense of responsibility to a great extent. As far as I can gather, the policy of Her Majesty's Government was summed up by the right hon. Gentleman when he said it was their intention to interfere as little as possible with the internal affairs of the country. Accepting those words literally, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we ought to interfere as little as possible with the internal affairs of Zululand; but we have to take into consideration, and in connection with those affairs, the admission of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) that we have responsibilities which we cannot get rid of, and that it is our duty, and part of the policy of the Government, to protect the Reserve Territory. If you have to protect the Reserve Territory, then you have to consider in what manner that it is to be done. It is all very well to say, as the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said, that these are matters which will involve great questions and very great responsibilities on the part of this country. If you are to accept the view of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade in regard to the character of the Boers, and if you are to carry out the views of the hon. Member for Burnley, I suppose we might solve the whole question by retiring from the country and leaving everything to take its chance. But if we are not to leave things to take their chance, if we are to recognize certain responsibilities, and if we are to make ourselves responsible for the protection of the Reserve Territory, then it becomes a serious question whether we have such a policy as will reduce this responsibility to a minimum, and enable us to discharge the duties which devolve upon us in a manner which shall be the simplest, the easiest, and the best; and, therefore, it is a question, not whether we ought to interfere, but on what lines we ought to fulfil the duties which we acknowledge. My hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), in the very temperate and able speech which he made this afternoon, and which I am sorry there were so few Members present to hear, laid down on broad lines, and, of course, avoiding questions of detail, what he considered to be the right policy to pursue—and that was to the effect that we ought to fall back on the lines of the Settlement of 1879; that we ought to take that for our main guidance, but in connection with that we ought to establish a Resident and Sub-Residents who should have certain powers with regard to the affairs of the Transvaal. But my hon. Friend said he would not interfere with the details of local government, and that his view was that we should hold a meeting of Chiefs; that those Chiefs should be in communication with us, and should establish the lines of a home policy which they would pursue, and to them should be left the administration of the country which belongs to them. It was not my hon. Friend's proposal—it was, as far as possible, from his intention—that we should accept or claim for ourselves anything approaching to annexation or a Protectorate. His object was that we should insure and guarantee to those Chiefs the right to administer their own affairs, and that we should maintain ourselves in a position which would give us authority, and enable us to settle questions that might arise. These questions are of two classes—questions which will arise among the Zulus themselves—quarrels among themselves, and disputes between the tribes; and then you have the difficulties that may arise between the tribes of the Zulus as a whole, and the Boers, their neighbours. Now, with respect to both the one and the other of these classes, I do not venture so much as to give my own opinion; I am rather speaking of what I understand to be the opinion of my hon. Friend, who is so well qualified to speak on these matters; and his opinion is, that you would prevent a great deal of difficulty from arising—which difficulty, if you do not prevent it, will arise sooner or later, and put you to much greater expense than you would otherwise incur—by being wise and firm in time. That is really the whole of the contention between, I will not say the two sides of the House, because there are several hon. Gentlemen on that—the opposite—side of the House, who take the same view, and who have expressed it extremely well, such as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse) and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who have indicated that these are their opinions. Those are the two views of the subject, and I venture to think the experience we have had so far is decidedly in favour of that general policy advocated by my hon. Friend behind me (Sir Henry Holland), rather than that which is now indicated by Her Majesty's Government; and when we talk about these questions of the restoration of Cetewayo and other matters, we talk about them in order to show that, in the policy which Her Majesty's Government have carried out since they have had charge of this business, they have not been successful. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was very angry with my noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) for saying that their policy had failed, or that they had admitted that it had failed. The right hon. Gentleman said he had never said that it had failed; only that it had not succeeded. That, of course, is a distinction, and, no doubt, it is one satisfactory to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman; but what we want to point out is, that this policy which has not succeeded was a policy which was not very likely to succeed. At all events, it was undertaken only, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, as an experiment. It was an experiment which the Government may have been justified in trying; but it was an experiment which, when they tried it, certainly ended with a considerable amount of non-success; and it is to be remembered that when that policy was under the consideration of the Government, and before it was adopted, the Prime Minister himself pointed out to the House, as a reason for being slow in adopting such a suggestion, that if we did so, and the policy was not successful, the Government and the country would have incurred a large addition to their responsibilities. That is so. They adopted that policy, and they have incurred that additional responsibility, I will not say through any blameable motives, they were doing that which they considered was, on the whole, the best thing to do; but, undoubtedly; they did incur that additional responsibility; they did disturb and destroy the system which had been established but a very short time before, and which there was every prospect they might have maintained and improved. ["No, no!"] We say that this is the view we take, and my hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst brings forward the evidence upon which he supports his contention. I am not saying that everything before was perfect, or that when you began to talk of the restoration of Cetewayo, and of unsettling all that had been settled before, that then disturbances would arise; but I am speaking of a time when it was thought that that Settlement was to be maintained; and I think the evidence which my hon. Friend brings forward, as to the numbers of people returning to the country which they had left, seems to me to show very strongly that you were disturbing that which had considerable elements of hope in it, and that you were disturbing that new state of things, the result of which must have been felt to be very doubtful. That was the result at the time; but now we have very clear before us that the result was bad, and no longer doubtful. The result was the introduction of more troubles, more quarrels, and more bloodshed; and all that must be borne in mind in the presence of a further element in the question—namely, the settlement of the question with the Boers. It was not only the question of inter-tribal disturbances in Zululand; it was the encouragement given thereby to the Boer population in the neighbourhood to advance themselves into that country, to disturb the position of the inhabitants, and no doubt to cause a great deal of mischief which we, in our position, had no longer the means to stop or nip in the bud. My hon. Friend (Sir Henry Holland) sees the weakness of the position, as it stood under Sir Garnet Wolseley's Settlement. He sees that something more was required, and he suggested that that something might have been supplied in a manner which would not have involved annexation or a Protectorate, but would have put us in a position which would have enabled us to deal quickly and firmly with the domestic inter-tribal difficulties, and at the same time give us a position in which we could check the incursions and the depredations of the Boers. That is, I take it, the position of the case, and this discussion has been raised for the purpose of expressing dissatisfaction on the part of my hon. Friend (Sir Henry Holland) and others, with the course which matters have taken under the recent administration of the Government—of expressing our dissatisfaction and our uneasiness at the position of affairs there, and to endeavour to obtain, what I am afraid we have not yet obtained from the Government—namely, some more satisfactory statement of the policy which it is their intention to pursue than we have yet been favoured with.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not feel in all respects dissatisfied with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Sir Stafford Northcote). I own myself to have been very considerably alarmed by the high-sounding doctrines of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill); but nothing could be more remarkable, and nothing could offer a more glaring contrast, than the difference between his opinions on this subject, and those of the right hon. Baronet opposite who has just spoken. The whole sense of the noble Lord's speech was annexation and more annexation.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No; I beg pardon, it was not.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord says "No." Very well; then I will go a little further into detail. I am not speaking of the noble Lord's words; but I am putting my own construction upon his speech, and as he questions my construction, I want to know what he meant when he said that the restoration of Cetewayo would have succeeded if it had been undertaken on a larger basis, and in a bolder manner?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I meant if you had given back the whole of the country.

MR. GLADSTONE: Exactly so; so much for the basis; and now what is the bolder manner? To support Cetewayo by force, no doubt. To give him back the whole country—that is the cool recommendation of the noble Lord; but what had happened? We had made a Settlement in 1879. We had set up 13 Kinglets in Zululand. None of those men, so far as I recollect, had been guilty of any breach of faith to us. We had established them, and put authority into their hands. A large number of the people were I think, as was clearly shown to our satisfaction at the time, desirous of the return of Cetewayo; but a portion of them were determinedly opposed to the restoration; and these were the Kinglets whom we had set up, and who had committed no fault against us. The noble Lord says we ought to have deposed them, putting back Cetewayo in their place. That is the manner in which the noble Lord thinks a peaceable restoration might have taken place. That would have been a most gross breach of faith, which it was impossible for us to entertain for a moment, on the part of the Government. The noble Lord adopts a method of proceeding which really involves an assumption by us of authority over Zululand, and, if I understand him rightly, of authority over South Africa in general. That is what I understand the noble Lord to intend.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did not say so.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am aware of that, and I am not using the noble Lord's own words; I am simply using every effort to construe what the noble Lord said; and, as I understood his high-sounding words as to the extension of British authority, I understood him to mean that the extension of British authority ought to be exercised over the Orange Free State and the Transvaal, in one form or another. It is in that view that I say the noble Lord is in glaring contrast to the right hon. Baronet. Now, I wish to come to the closing remarks of the right hon. Baronet. He says this debate has been raised for a certain purpose; and I agree with him that it has been raised for a very proper purpose. It was quite right that, in a matter of this kind, an opportunity should be taken before the close of the Session to discuss the difficulties of our position in Zululand; but the right hon. Gentleman says that the Settlement which was set up in 1879 was working in a tolerable manner; that there was something to be desired which ought to be supplied; but that, on the whole, the Settlement was not unsatisfactory, and our fault was that we did not endeavour to improve it. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, I conclude, was not present in this House on April 17th, 1882, when that subject was discussed for a whole evening; for if he had been present, or if he had read that debate, he would have been aware of that which is evidently at present totally unknown to him—namely, that while we debated that subject through an entire evening, while the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) made a very able speech, exhibiting the deplorable condition of, and the almost prevalence of bloodshed and anarchy in Zululand, not only did the Government find themselves obliged to concur substantially with his statements, but there was not a single speaker that evening—I believe I am correct in saying that—who rose while the subject was fully discussed, from all quarters of the House, to maintain that the Settlement of 1879 was in any degree tolerable. That was the state of things in 1882; and permit me to say that when the subject has been debated in that way, as it was in this House—not as a Party question, but with great ability and impartiality from all quarters of the House—it is idle in 1884 to overlook and ignore entirely what was then admitted and demonstrated, and to speak of that state of things as a state of things upon which we ought to have fallen back. I am not prepared to agree to that. The right hon. Gentleman thinks matters are worse now than they were then. That is not my opinion, for what have we to consider? We have to consider two things—first of all, the anarchy and bloodshed in Zululand; and, secondly, the question of danger to the Colony of Natal. With regard to the latter point, I am prepared to contend that that danger has been wholly removed, because a neutral fringe of territory has been interposed between Natal and the disturbed parts of Zululand, where British authority is effectively maintained, where peace prevails, and which serves to hold off Natal from the different parts of Zululand. Therefore, as to that important part of the case, and as to the fact that a large piece of Zululand—about one-fourth or one-third, I believe—is in a peaceful condition, much has been attained, though certainly with an increase—I do not deny it—of British responsibility, an increase which it was absolutely necessary for us in honour to agree to, because we could not for a moment think of the restoration of Cetewayo to the prejudice of those Chiefs who objected to the restoration, and for whom we were bound to find a refuge in what is now known as the Reserve Territory. We adopted the restoration of Cetewayo, not as a measure that was certain to succeed, but as a measure the most hopeful of any before us. In the state of things then existing, it was absolutely necessary for us to find a remedy; and that was the remedy which appeared to offer the least amount of responsibility with the greatest amount of compromise. I am not prepared to admit that a great addition of responsibility has fallen upon us in consequence of the failure of that plan as a remedy. What we said in 1882 was, that if we restored Cetewayo without obtaining, in the first place, competent and sufficient evidence that his return was desired by a large proportion of the masses of the people, then, indeed, we should incur a great responsibility; but that evidence we did obtain; and I have no reason to believe that even now there was an untrue impression of the state of things then conveyed to our minds. I will not now go back to that part of the matter, because the important part of the question is that which is before us. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) has, with great prudence, stated that he holds that we ought to discharge all the responsibilities we have undertaken, and that no benefit is to be gained by shrinking from that duty. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman in that view; but our responsibilities, although they should be acknowledged, ought not to be exaggerated, and, above all things, new responsibilities ought not to be assumed in a hurry, and without sufficient consideration. What, then, is the question before us, as defined by the right hon. Baronet? He says there are two plans. I say there are three, because, unquestionably, a large and distinct portion of the debate has tended in the direction of annexation of territory not now ours; but that is put aside so far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned. He condemns that policy, as we did; but he says that the hon. Baronet behind him (Sir Henry Holland) has recommended a return to the system of 1879; but the system of 1879, if I remember rightly, was a system under which no authority was assumed over the Chiefs. They were entirely independent; whereas, as I understand the recommendation of the right hon. Baronet it is that some authority should be assumed over the Chiefs in the Settlement which he recommends. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) has contended—and we contend—that if you assume partial authority over these Chiefs, that can only end in becoming a complete authority, and, consequently, in amounting to an equivalent of the annexation which has been recommended as the measure to be at once adopted. At any rate, that is not a return to the system of 1879. There is in that no recommendation of a return to the system of 1879. The system of 1879 was essentially different, inasmuch as it fully recognized the independence of the Chiefs, and only offered them any friendly aid, in the way of good offices, that our Resident might be able to give them.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: I did not suggest that. I suggested, very diffidently, a return to the system of 1879—that is to say, the government of the Natives by the Native Chiefs, under Native laws; but that the system of 1879 should be so extended that we should exercise a more direct and guiding authority by Residents and Deputy Residents.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Baronet spoke in subdued tones; but how that is to be done is a most important part of the plan. The hon. Baronet says he made the suggestion diffidently. I have no doubt—nay, I am sure he did, because he is a man of sense and experience; and all those who know South Africa will be apt to make recommendations with considerable diffidence; but one point is this. We do not see how the assertion of authority by us over these Chiefs can possibly end in anything except the establishment of a virtual supremacy. You were very liberal in your system. I do not question that. I am sure that was the intention of the hon. Baronet; but we are not prepared to establish in these portions of Zululand beyond the Reserve a British supremacy, which we feel must amount virtually to that annexation which is disclaimed by us, disclaimed by the late Government, and disclaimed by the hon. Baronet in his speech to-day. I do not, on the other hand, say we wash our hands of all duty whatever with regard to Zululand beyond the Reserve. A friendly interest we should, in any case, feel towards it. The circumstances—the unhappy circumstances—under which it was broken up at a former time undoubtedly leave us in a condition in which it is impossible to say we look upon that land as if it were a mere portion of Central Africa; but, at the same time, we are not in a position in which we have any other duty towards that country than this—of doing so far as we can what is best for that country. Now, we are not prepared to say that it is best for that country, or best for South Africa generally, that we should assume authority over it. If the time comes—and it may come—when we can be useful in promoting its peaceful settlement, I think it will be our duty to avail ourselves of such an opportunity; but what we disclaim, under all the circumstances now before us, or which we can anticipate, is the desire to establish British supremacy over that country. The noble Lord used, I think, strong language in his description of the inhabitants of the Transvaal; and the hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay) does not disclaim having used language which I think would have been exceedingly strong, even if applied to some country with which we were at war, and which I must take the liberty of saying was a great deal too strong for the present occasion. It was described by the right hon. Baronet as interesting; but, in my opinion, it was too strong, especially having regard to the fact that it was applied to people with whom we profess to be on friendly terms; and it is also unjust, in face of the fact that enormous multitudes of the Natives are living under the dominion and auspices of the Transvaal; and in face of the fact that we were content to go to the Cape of Good Hope, where these people had prior possession, and make it so uncomfortable for them that they migrated in large numbers. In face of the fact that we have had indisputable evidence that the Natives have migrated into the Transvaal, on account of the peace and good government they can enjoy there, I must say it is imprudent, impolitic, and hardly consistent with those terms of comity and decency which ought to prevail between people of one State and another, to describe these people in the superlative language used by the hon. Member for the North Riding. I feel that the time is exhausted, and that it would be wrong in me to enter into the details of the question, which have been so fully stated by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain), and my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley). With their statements I am perfectly content. I am further contented and satisfied with the limited and cautious terms in which the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) has expressed himself. I may point out to him that our object has been gained by the establishment of the Reserve; and as to the maintenance of British authority, he must be aware that it will be maintained there by the same means as those adopted in other places in case of need, and that there are, I believe, a force of nearly 1,000 men in the Reserve for that purpose. With regard to what is beyond it, I by no means say that that is a country which does not excite our interest; but we see no reason for violent interference in that country. In fact, the people themselves have chosen to invite Natives into the Transvaal to settle there in a peaceful manner, totally different from the proceedings of Bechuanaland; and we decline to be bound by a scheme of policy which we believe to be dangerous, impolitic, and not in conformity with any sound principle, even of morality, by extending British authority over that country.

MR. GUY DAWNAY said, the Prime Minister had rebuked him for having used strong terms with regard to people with whom we were on friendly terms. He denied that we were on friendly terms with these filibustering Boers; and it was to these filibustering Boers, and not to the inhabitants of the Transvaal, that he had referred. He had compared the action of the Boers in Zululand with the action which, so far as he could understand, the Government were allowing the Abyssinians to take with regard to the Soudan, and had said that their civilization was in the same rudimentary condition, and their Christianity in the same fossilized state. He denied that he had advocated a policy of annexation—unless the Government considered—which they said they did not—that the Reserve had been annexed—for he only desired an extension of the principle which applied to the Reserve to other parts of Zululand.

The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) had declared that a policy of annexation was, to use the term borrowed from his (Mr. Guy Dawnay's) vocabulary, a policy of filibusters, brigands, and pick-pockets; but if he (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had wished to brand such policy in the strongest term, he should not have employed any such feeble words from his own vocabulary, but should have denounced it instead in the right hon. Gentleman's own language as a policy of shipowners. He should ask the Committee to divide, and to express their opinion that the responsibility which the House and the country had incurred owing to the reversal of the policy of the late Government, and owing to the Convention with the Boers, especially with regard to the Articles in relation to the Border Tribes, would not be fulfilled merely by protecting the Zulus in the Reserved Territory in the future, after failing to do so in the past.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY AND MR. GLADSTONE.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish, before the Business of the House commences, to refer to a statement the Prime Minister made in "another place" with respect to some observations of mine. The Prime Minister was pleased to quote, and, as I think, misconceived the meaning of some observations which I made at the Cannon Street Hotel on Monday. The Prime Minister is reported to have said this—

"I find that in a speech ascribed to Lord Salisbury—I rather think in the papers of to-day—there is the following passage:—'The House of Lords has a right to say—'We do not approve of the measure you bring forward. If you like to accept its rejection, well and good; if you object to its rejection, your remedy is to go to the people.''" That I take to imply that the Bill has been rejected."

That seems to be a very captious criticism; and although I do not ordinarily take any notice of misconstruction of things that I say, I think that, if the Prime Minister condescends to misunderstand you, you are bound, as a matter of respect, to correct him. What I wish to point out is that I was speaking when I used those words—as anyone who will consult the speech will see—of the general Constitutional rule affecting the action of the House of Lords upon the question of Dissolution, and it was impossible for me to state it in more limited terms than I did. As a general rule, it is perfectly true that the House of Lords has a right to say—"We do not approve the measure you bring forward; if you like to accept its rejection, well and good; if you object to its rejection, your remedy is to go to the people." But in saying that I did not mean, nor does it necessarily follow, that in every particular case coming under that general rule the statement would require to be in equally large terms. The general rule is necessarily larger than the particular instance. What happened in this particular instance was, that we did not reject the measure, but that we rejected a Motion in respect of that measure, which rejection had for its effect that the Bill could not pass until certain necessary and supplementary legislation had been added to it. But what I wish to point out is that I was discussing the general rule, and that I did not in any way impugn the fact that our rejection of the Motion in respect to the measure had not involved the rejection of the measure, if Her Majesty's Government had been pleased to take the steps which we thought necessary to its passing. The matter is only of importance, as I say, because the Prime Minister is pleased to misunderstand me. He himself is perfectly aware of what really took place, for he goes on to say that, in strictness, the measure had not been rejected as regards the Forms of the House of Lords. But he goes on to make one further observation, which, I think, in the interest of this House, I ought to notice. He says that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville)—

"Has no intention of making any further Motion on the Bill as at present advised; and our reason is, that, without insuring any important public advantage, it would give trouble to the House of Lords, which ought not to have any trouble of that kind put upon it, and would only result in the production of some third by-Motion. If we could have some direct issue taken on the Bill itself, I think that it would be very desirable; but I do not think it would be in our power to procure it."

Now, when a man offers me wine and water and leaves out the wine, it seems to me that I am taking a very direct issue with him in declining to drink the water by itself.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish to ask the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), Whether he can now give the House any information with respect to the progress of the Conference?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am afraid my answer will appear somewhat unsatisfactory, and, indeed, monotonous; but it will not surprise the noble Marquess, who has had the experience of more than one Conference. He is aware how unavoidable delays are at meetings of the Representatives of all Europe, who have to refer to their respective Governments. The Conference met this morning, when the French Ambassador expressed his regret that he had not yet sufficient instructions to answer questions which had been raised. He requested—and was supported by other Plenipotentiaries in the request—that we should meet again on Saturday morning.

SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

(NO. 109.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I rise to move the second reading of the Bill on Smoke Abatement, although, during this Session, I do not wish it to go further than the stage in question. If it is once read a second time, the subject will be ripe for Governments to deal with. If it does not reach that point, much toil of many persons will be wasted. Since it was presented at the end of May, it has been supported by a public meeting under the Lord Mayor in the City; by the Westminster District Board of Works; by the Parish of St. Martin's; by the Hampstead Vestry; by the Council for the Institute of Architects; by the Association under the noble Duke the Master of the Horse (the Duke of Westminster); while it has also had a favourable echo in the Provinces. At the same time, I do not ask your Lordships to accede to it, even to the qualified extent I have described, unless a proper case can be submitted in its favour. Instead of going through all the clauses in detail, which anyone can look at, I will explain at once, if it should become law, the course of operation to be anticipated from it. A number of Local Bodies would find themselves invested with a discretionary power of restraining smoke in houses, under bye-laws which must have the previous sanction of the Home Office. The City would be, probably, at first, the only Local Body to apply it, in consequence of the greater public spirit which prevails there, of the municipal authority which is strong enough to urge it into action; of the desire to vindicate itself against powers which are hostile to it; of the readiness to lead the way which becomes an ancient Corporation; and of the superior facility for restraining smoke in offices and warehouses, which make up that part of London far more than domiciles and residences. The last advantage is a most important one belonging to the City, and should not be forgotten by your Lordships. If the result was good, other Local Bodies would exert themselves, and the whole of London would be gradually purified, at least of the carbonic matter which oppresses it. If the result was bad, nothing more would follow, except a better heating apparatus in new buildings, which the Bill provides for. More I should scarcely add to justify my limited demand upon the House, if it were not that the Vestry of St. James's, under great misapprehension, as I shall soon point out, have petitioned against the measure being adopted. The Vestry of St. James's, whose Petition I have carefully examined, quite forget that, as regards themselves, there is nothing compulsory or threatening. If they do not like the power, they need not exercise it. The force will only be a latent one. It cannot injure or embarrass them. Indeed, their modesty is singular. It is a proclamation of unfitness to be invested with a right to act in a given manner, which, as they think, may lead to inconvenience. But if it leads to inconvenience in their eyes, of course it cannot be exerted. They cannot mean that the temptation will be so great that, against their better judgment, they will use it. They can hardly urge either that, because they are not prepared to exercise the right, no other Local Body should possess it. Although they represent a celebrated parish, are they the only Local Body to whom prudence has been granted? The Petition is not so much unfounded as irrelevant. If the inhabitants of St. James's united to petition against imparting a new power to the Vestry, which might be dangerously resorted to, their language would be perfectly intelligible. But nothing of the kind has happened. The inhabitants regard the Vestry with confidence, which has not been diminished, but which the Vestry blushes to enjoy, awakened to a sudden consciousness of dangerous fallibility. It is true the Vestry urge that science has not gone far enough to make the object of the Bill attainable. That point might be insisted on in their proceedings, as a reason for not exercising the new authority conferred; but it is not a reason for withholding it. It might be shown, with ease, that a Bill of this kind is certain to advance the science of mechanical invention, which they think defective, if enacted. But on the question of mechanical invention being inadequate I join issue with the Vestry altogether. I am prepared to show that great facilities exist for averting smoke in houses at this moment. It may be prudent to remark at first that I have for years attended to this point, in concert with a scientific engineer, whose mind has been directed to all the intricacies of the problem. We have made various experiments together. We recently inspected all the fireplaces the Health Exhibition furnishes, and he is thoroughly conversant with everything which appeared before in the same line at the South Kensington Museum. These are the leading methods by which smoke may be prevented. You might attempt the Russian system of central furnaces in houses, by which hot air or hot water is distributed to rooms in flues or pipes respectively. You might make that central furnace smokeless, on the principle by which Lord Palmerston's enactments are carried out, wherever they are operative. Such a change would be too violent, although the merit of the system in diffusing equal warmth is undeniable. In this way, St. Petersburg becomes almost a winter quarter. To pass on to another, a mechanical inventor came to me the other day, and explained his mode of introducing orifices at the top of chimneys, by which the draught is so augmented that it becomes easy to burn coke or anthracite in ordinary fireplaces. They may be burnt in ordinary fireplaces if there is sufficient draught, and they are smokeless. Next, I may touch upon the principle of Arnott, by which coals are constantly moved upwards, instead of added to the surface, and thus ignition forwarded while smoke is overcome, since, when ignition is complete, smoke naturally vanishes. Some years ago, a gentleman in Stratford Place, who is not living now, resorted to this method over nearly all his house, which I have visited, and deemed it thoroughly successful. Asbestos is a good expedient, and, lighted up by gas, presents a cheap and unobjectionable fuel. Gas stoves may be employed, and are now much more attractive than they used to be. Oil stoves may be substituted where gas is not laid on; but, unless of excellent construction, do not recommend themselves. The best invention we have reached as yet, if I am not deceived, is that of the late Sir William Siemens. It consists in the union of coke and gas, so that heat is thrown out, combustion is promoted, and flame is never wanting. The outlay would be soon recovered in the economy of chimney sweeping. In answer to the Vestry of St. James's, I have now enumerated seven modes among which the householder would choose, as soon as the Local Body of his district brought the law to bear upon him. Leaving behind these technical researches, there is a wide consideration which might recommend the second reading to your Lordships. This Bill is the best security against too rapidly erecting a vast and central Body for the government of London. A vast and central Body of that kind is incompetent to deal with smoke, because it must bring its restrictive effort to bear upon the whole circumference or none of it. It has no locus standi for a partial operation. It could not fix upon one district; it could not venture to control the aggregate of districts. It would be disabled as the Legislature is disabled—except through intermediate agency—by the necessity of acting on too large a surface of resistance. To conquer smoke, you must uphold a distribution of municipal authority. But it by no means follows that the existing Vestries ought to be perpetuated. Under this Bill, they may appear still more inadequate than they are felt to be already. A Bill of this kind points rather to the control of London by a group of Corporations, with a well-poised authority to lead them—such as the late Sir George Cornwall Lewis, such as the late John Stuart Mill, such as the lamented politician, Mr. Buxton, recommended; such as every inquiry has proposed; such as the experience of the present Session powerfully urges. Her Majesty's Government ought not to be alienated from the present Bill by the expressions I have hazarded, and that when the noble Duke the Master of the Horse is known to be in favour of it. It really offers them a good retreat from an untenable position. But those who are resolved at any hazard to form a large and central power for directing the Metropolis are bound to legislate effectually against smoke before they plunge into that system. It might uphold restraints upon the evil; it cannot possibly initiate them. My Lords, if I detain the House, it is only to secure the Bill, as I am bound, against any dangerous opposition. It is well known that many noble Lords have leagued themselves into the defence of liberty and property, and that, intent upon that aim, they view all legislation with considerable jealousy. If, however, they oppose every project which involves restraint with undistinguishing severity, their cause will suffer, their end will be defeated, and they will come to be regarded as the blind and zealous scourges of improvement. If you condemn all interference, you condemn all sanitary benefits. I share the doctrine of these noble Lords; but it ought not to be exaggerated. In fact, it is a question of degree. They ought in every case to ask, is the object great, and is the interference moderate and limited? The object in the present case is to retain London as a capital, elevate its architecture, purify its atmosphere, correct its fogs, and check the inconveniences, the depression, the disorders, the mortality they generate. The interference is most guarded. It depends upon a Local Body which the householder can influence. No course of action is dictated to him; no right is overthrown. On general and abstract grounds the householder is no more entitled to pour smoke out of a chimney than on such grounds he is entitled to fling sewage from a garret. It may be said that long custom has sheltered one of these proceedings in our capital. No doubt it is so. But I have often been informed that in the old town of Edinburgh long custom authorized the other. When it was first restrained the friends of liberty and property may have been exceedingly dissatisfied. But, if I understand the noble Lords who form this League, they are not indifferent to architectural improvement. They would willingly raise London to a higher level than it has yet attained in everything which relates to beauty, order, and magnificence. The Council of Architecture have furnished me with the best authority for the position that, until smoke is overcome, these ends will be frustrated. It is that of the late Mr. Street, in his Presidential Address of 1881. In substance, he affirmed that new modes of heating were essential; that there could be no excellence in his (Mr. Street's) vocation, however just the plan, however accurate the workmanship, if, in a short time, the colours and materials employed were certain to degenerate. I have heard from a considerable quarter, well entitled to attention, that the restraint of smoke is inexpedient; that it is not without an hygienic influence; that it dries the air, and ought, for some complaints, to be perpetuated. A theory of this kind was once advanced by Horace Walpole. But there is a fallacy involved in the opinion. The atmosphere is dried not by smoke, but by ignition. It is quite true that, if you put out all the fires of London, more humidity would follow; but, by removing the carbonic particles, an opposite result is forwarded. These carbonic particles attract and fix the moisture, which would otherwise be volatile, which would otherwise ascend, and thus they render London damper than it would be. As it enters the domain of science, I have brought this point under the notice of a medical authority. Of all the grounds which recommend the Bill, those which relate to atmospheric influence appear to me the strongest. At present, in November and December the most important public questions are resolved by Cabinets in London, under conditions which must often depress the mind beneath its normal level, whether of invention, enterprise, or firmness. But I will not pursue so large a topic at this moment, or one which noble Lords on either side are so well qualified for judging. My Lords, although, even if the Bill was negative to-day, I should feel no doubt of legislation on its principle eventually arriving, the result would be in a high degree unfavourable to its object. It would discourage unexpectedly and harshly the current of mechanical invention which exists, and which is still desirable to give perfection to the various contrivances I have referred to. It would be taken as an indication that your Lordships are not disposed at any time to go beyond the statutes of Lord Palmerston. It would prevent those statutes from being more rigorously executed. It would proclaim distrust of Local Bodies with the City at the head of them. It would furnish Governments, whoever may compose, whoever may direct them, with a pretext for avoiding or abandoning the subject as a hopeless one. There is a further consequence to mention. At a time when the name of this House is about, or has begun already, to be driven to and fro between the battledores of faction, it would be said that no social measure can be originated in it with any prospect of succeeding. If, on the contrary, the second reading is accepted, there will be a guarantee that the House is not indifferent to the welfare of the capital, however slow to try political experiments. If the second reading is accepted there will be a guarantee that the House has taken for its motto words of which I cannot find an adequate translation, or else I would not mention them in the original—in order that new triumphs may occur in architectural as well as sanitary progress. I move that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that the Government could not accede to the second reading of the Bill, because it was still their intention, at some time or another, to pass a Bill for the Municipal Government of London; and in spite of what his noble Friend (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) had said, this was a subject which must be dealt with by a Municipal Council of the whole Metropolis. Moreover, there was no chance of the Bill passing into law at that period of the Session. He desired, however, to give emphasis to the first reason, as the principal one, why the Government abstained from supporting this measure. He must also add that there did not appear to be any strong feeling in its favour on the part of those most concerned in it.

Lord Stratheden and Campbell

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not wish to challenge the decision of the Government, since it was obvious that if the Bill were to go any further the House would have to deal with it at an earlier period of the Session. He wished, however, to protest against the remark of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Dalhousie), that they must wait for legislation in regard to the government of London before any of those questions affecting the Metropolis were taken in hand. He thought that that was a practical arrest of all legislation of that kind for a considerable time to come.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought that this was a matter in which they might exercise some individual influence. Many of their Lordships were influential members of the committees of clubs, who were, in his opinion, among the greatest offenders in this respect. They were, no doubt, most hospitable institutions; but every day they poured forth immense volumes of smoke, to the great detriment of the surrounding atmosphere. Another new offender he had noticed was the great hotel in Trafalgar Square, where, no doubt, without any idea of the consequences, a huge volume of smoke was now poured out. All this showed that this was a question by which they might with advantage use their individual exertions.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he thought that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) deserved very great credit for this attempt to deal with a great evil; and he should be sorry if the Bill was dealt with by their Lordships in a manner which showed a want of sympathy in the subject. There was nothing more depressing to the poor of the Metropolis than the dark canopy of smoke which enveloped the town, and the dust and soot which covered everything in their houses, and amidst which they lived. He could only hope that when the House came to deal with the matter, they would do so in a manner which showed that they were conscious of the magnitude of the evil.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE said, he considered that the question was too large to be dealt with by a private Member, though, in common with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Harrowby), he must acknowledge the obligations under which they lay to his noble Friend (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) for having called attention to the subject. While he (Lord Mount-Temple) was in favour of some general measure to apply to the whole Metropolis, it should be kept in mind that the Local Authorities had the best chance of knowing the exact desires of the district which they administered. It would be useful, therefore, if they were allowed powers of adapting a general measure to the particular wants of their district.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, that he would look with very great jealousy upon the granting of these powers to the Local Authorities. The matter was one which required very great attention to details. If powers were given to Local Authorities, and if two neighbouring parishes were to differ, it would lead to considerable difficulties. Not only that, but it would be objectionable to have a set of bye-laws adopted by one Vestry on the subject, while no similar restrictions were in force under adjacent Vestries. He thought it would be necessary to have some general scheme, and not leave too much to the Local Bodies. He, therefore, hoped the matter would be taken up by the Government.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he deeply regretted that the Government had wished to deprive them of the opportunity of recording their opinion on the principle of the Bill, with which he cordially sympathized; and that they must, so to speak, hold their admiration of the principle in reserve until the passing of some gigantic scheme for subjecting all the 4,000,000 of people in London to one centralized authority.

LORD TRURO said, he thought it was due to the noble Lord who had moved the second reading of the Bill (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) to acknowledge the good intentions evinced in the effort he was making to deal with this subject; but, in his (Lord Truro's) view, it was just one of those questions which must be dealt with rather by the Government than by a private Member. He considered, however, that it would be extremely difficult, owing to the varying structure of houses in London and other circumstances, to carry out legislation on that subject with any degree of uniformity.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I am compelled to make a few remarks before this question is disposed of. It seems to me the House can hardly be directed by Her Majesty's Government on this occasion, as they have heard one speech against the Bill from the Treasury Bench, and another in its favour. The speech against it from the noble Earl who followed me (the Earl of Dalhousie) was based a good deal on an extraordinary statement that the Bill had gained no countenance in London. I feel entitled to protest against that statement, having already mentioned that, on the 10th of July, it won the sanction of a public meeting in the City under its first magistrate, and I also enumerated other quarters where it is approved. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) has not attempted, nor do I believe he wished, to overthrow a single proposition by which it was maintained, that the second reading ought to be adopted. Whatever falls from the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees deserves and gains consideration from your Lordships. But there is no ground for apprehending in the Local Bodies too much impatience to exert the discretionary power when they have it. In St. James's it is clear that they are not at all disposed to use it. As it is only proposed to read the Bill a second time this Session, it is not necessary to defend it as if it was on the border of the Statute Book. The noble Earl beneath (Earl Fortescue), and the noble Lord upon the left (Lord Mount-Temple), have given it support so perfectly unanswered, that I am bound to ask your Lordships to divide upon it. I am bound still more by my own language, in the sense that the defeat of such a Bill at such a time would add something to the elements of obloquy accumulating out-of-doors against the House and its decisions. I may incur defeat; but it is better than the discredit which would justly fall upon me, if, without a plea of any kind, I withdrew a Bill, on which even Her Majesty's Government are free to vote according to their judgment. I ask the House at once to go to a division.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:

CANAL BOATS ACT (1877) AMENDMENT
BILL.—No. (198.)
(The Lord Carrington.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That this House do now resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill."—(The Lord Carrington.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he wished to say a few words in reference to this Bill, which he looked upon, to a great extent, as a piece of superfluous legislation. The Canal Boats Act of 1877 provided that boats which were inhabited during the day or night were to be reckoned as dwellings, and treated accordingly. They had to be registered by the registration authorities—namely, the Sanitary Authorities having districts abutting on the canal where the boats plied. A registration fee had to be paid, and the Local Government Board had the power to regulate those fees, and for the lettering, marking, and numbering of the boats, &c. The Local Government Board had also the power, under the existing Act, to fix the number, age, and sex of the persons to be allowed to dwell in a canal boat, the power to regulate the cubic space of air and ventilation, the separation of the sexes, the general healthiness and convenience of accommodation, and the removal of persons affected with infectious disease, and might detain the boats for the purposes of disinfection. It was also provided that officials of registration or Sanitary Authorities might enter a canal boat by day for purposes of inspection, and that a fine of £2 would be incurred for obstructing the officials in their examination. Children on registered canal boats were brought under the Elementary Education Acts, and provision was made for the continuous instruction of a child in the several school districts through which the boat to which he belonged successively passed. Their Lordships, he thought, would see that these provisions were already very stringent, stronger and more stringent provisions by far than any which were applied to houses in any towns on shore, or in ships afloat. He contended that the Report of the Registrar General did not bear out altogether the statements of

Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, to whose efforts this legislation was due; and he ventured to think that if any attempt were made to apply to working men's houses in the Metropolis, or in any other of our large towns, the powers given under the Act of 1877 as regarded canal boats, it would not be listened to for a moment, and would not be sanctioned by the other House of Parliament. It appeared to him, therefore, that it was not desirable to extend this kind of legislation. He desired to point out that the present Bill sought to draw tighter the restrictions placed upon the inhabitants of the canal boats by the Act of 1877. The main provision of the measure was one to which he wished to draw their Lordships' particular attention. It was to the effect that the Local Government Board had to appoint a special staff of Inspectors for the purpose of inspecting the work of the Inspectors of the local registration or Sanitary Authorities. He might say—he thought with justice—that the Inspector in this country was becoming a public nuisance. Here, for example, it was provided that Inspectors were to be appointed to inspect—for what purpose?—Inspectors. There were already Inspectors, sanitary and educational, working under the Local Government Board; and because Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, was not satisfied, it was asked that more should be appointed. Speaking on this question of Inspectors last year, he had said that an Englishman, instead of having no shadow like Peter Schlemil, would soon have two—his own shadow and the shadow of the Government Inspector; but if this Bill passed he would have three—his own shadow, the Inspector's shadow, and the shadow of the Inspector's Inspector. He thought this was a superfluous measure, and in it philanthropists showed that their zeal outran their discretion. In the case of a philanthropist like Mr. George Smith, it was well that their Lordships should know what was before them in the matter of legislation on social lines. Mr. Smith was not only anxious for legislation dealing with canal boats, but for travelling vans throughout the country. He was also anxious that the gipsies should become settled members of society; but how did he propose to convert them into such? In a Memorandum which

Mr. Smith handed in to the Select Committee last year, he showed how he would deal with the gipsies, and mentioned his plans for putting them under State inspection in the same way as the canal population. He said—

“I would grant to each (gipsy) family of man, wife, and two children four acres. . . . The Government should grant small sums of money to the tenants by way of loan, at a small interest, to enable them to erect a hut, and to provide food for the first year. I should think £100 for each family would be amply sufficient to tide them over the first year, and to be spent as follows:—£30 for the hut, £40 for one year's keep, £17 for a little Welsh cow, £3 for a pig and fowls, and £10 for tools and implements.”

This was the sort of legislation they were threatened with from philanthropists in these Socialistic days; and he could not help thinking that, in the case of all Bills of this kind, it would be well to call them in future “little Welsh cows.”

LORD CARRINGTON said, he did not complain of the speech of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Wemyss); but he must take exception to one remark which he had made. That remark was to the effect that this Bill was superfluous. He (Lord Carrington) maintained that it was not superfluous. If the Act of 1877 had been beneficial in its effect, it had also been found to have some defects as well. Those defects were remedied in the Bill now before their Lordships, which consisted of additions and explanations. He believed it was Clause 4, dealing with the Inspectors, which the noble Earl opposite proposed to cut out of the Bill; he hoped to be able to show, when they went into Committee, that it would be inadvisable to do so. He also hoped their Lordships would support him.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Inquiries and report by Local Government Board).

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in moving the omission of the clause, said, it proposed to appoint additional Inspectors. He thought they were quite unnecessary, and should, therefore, move its rejection.

Moved, “That the Clause be omitted from the Bill.”—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

LORD CARRINGTON, in supporting the retention of the clause, said, that the duty of enforcing the Act remained with the Local Authorities, many of whom had acted uncommonly well. There were instances, however, in which it could not be denied that they had rather failed in their duty; and the object was that the Inspector, by visiting the canal boats in the different districts, should ascertain how the Local Authorities were doing their work.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that, in his opinion, the provisions of the Bill were in exact accordance with the policy which had been usually pursued by Parliament in legislation of this kind. It was the ordinary practice, and a necessary one, when they gave such powers to Local Authorities, for the Central Authority to appoint Inspectors to see that they did their duty efficiently.

EARL FORTESCUE, in supporting the Amendment, said, he considered so many Inspectors superfluous. They did not require the agency of a steam-engine to draw a cork.

On Question, “That the Clause stand part of the Bill?”

There being no Second Teller for the Not-Contents, Amendment disagreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

On the Motion of The Lord CARRINGTON, the following new Clause inserted after Clause 5:—

“The Education Department shall every year report to Parliament as to the manner in which the Elementary Education Acts, 1870 and 1873, 1876 and 1880, are enforced with respect to children in canal boats, and shall for that purpose direct Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools to communicate with the School Boards and School Attendance Committees in their district.”

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 228.)

CHOLERA HOSPITALS (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 204.)

(The Lord Keane.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, “That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill.”—(The Lord Keane.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he thought their Lordships were entitled to some explanation in regard to the provisions of the Bill, and the source whence it came. It was hardly respectful to their Lordships to propose to go into Committee upon the Bill without some such explanation. He had looked at the Bill, and he found that it was a measure of very considerable stringency and scope, giving Sanitary Authorities in Ireland power to take possession of land for the purpose of erecting cholera hospitals, and also providing for the infliction of very severe penalties on persons interfering with the officers of the Sanitary Authorities, or persons deputed by them to carry out the provisions of the Act. One of the provisions was, that any person so interfering might be summarily convicted by two Justices, or one stipendiary magistrate, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months, apparently without the alternative of a fine. The Bill might be a necessary one; but he thought they were entitled to some light as to where it came from. He knew, of course, that it came from the House of Commons; but he was not aware who had charge of it there. They were all the more entitled to hear something about it, inasmuch as the wording of the Bill was very remarkable. Clause 2 provided that certain notices should be posted on the "walls of the Union." What did the drafter of the Bill think a "Union" was? Did he imagine it to be a room, or a park? Then, the last clause was one the meaning of which utterly puzzled him; for it said that "when the Sanitary Authorities of any Maritime Union"—what on earth was a Maritime Union?—

"That when the Sanitary Authorities of a Maritime Union had been directed by order of the Local Government Board to exercise jurisdiction for the prevention or suppression of cholera over any port which included portions of any other Union or Unions, then the words 'sanitary district' in this Act shall be construed to include such portions of the lands comprised within the limits of the said port as lie within one mile of high-water mark."

He fairly failed to comprehend what this meant.

After a pause,

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked whether Her Majesty's Government had any information to give the House respecting the Bill? Had they taken charge, or in any way made themselves responsible for it?

EARL GRANVILLE: Certainly not. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Keane) is in charge of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that, while agreeing that some explanation was certainly required respecting the Bill, he thought it would be a great pity if it were lost. Cholera was too evidently approaching our shores, and although some Amendments were required, the Bill was very useful. He thought the House ought to go into Committee, and consider the clauses.

After a further pause,

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was surprised that Her Majesty's Government had expressed no opinion with reference to the measure. The matter was one in regard to which they were entitled to ask for their advice. He, also, should be sorry if it were lost, and once more invited the opinion of the Government upon it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that as his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (Lord Carlingford) was unavoidably absent, and as he (Earl Granville) was not present when the Bill was introduced, it would, perhaps, be better to go into Committee, and then, if thought desirable, report Progress upon the Bill, in order to afford noble Lords on both sides of the House an opportunity for forming a judgment with regard to the measure.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that he had carefully considered the Bill, and had given Notice of several Amendments in it with the view of making it safe, and of preventing it from being abused. If those Amendments were inserted, he believed they would carry out that purpose. The Bill provided for a passing emergency, being intended to be in operation only till May 1, 1885; and it was almost identical with one that had been passed last year for a temporary purpose. In point of fact, it was simply a renewal of that measure. It would enable the inhabitants of a district, on the certificate of the medical officers of the Union of the existence of Indian cholera in the district, to take immediate steps for the erection of a cholera hospital in the district. He recommended the House to go into Committee upon the Bill.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, that, in view of the announcement of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Fitzgerald), he would not persist in his opposition to the Bill. He must, however, at the same time, protest against Her Majesty's Government taking no part in the decision of the question.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, that the author of the Bill in the other House might have supplied a translation of the phrases used.

Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 229.)

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

(The Earl of Northbrook.)

(No. 212.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to extend, in the main, the principle of the Act passed last year dealing with corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections, not only to municipal elections proper, but elections for Boards of Guardians, Local Government Boards, Town Improvement Commissioners, and School Boards. It was a purely English measure, applying to neither Scotland nor Ireland. It was to provide against illegal practices and illegal payments. The Bill had been before the Standing Committee on Law in the other House, and had passed through that House with very general assent, and it was hoped that it would prevent corrupt practices at elections. He moved the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Northbrook.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he felt great regret and surprise that Ireland had been omitted from the Bill. Why that had been done perhaps the noble Earl, or some of his Colleagues, would explain, as Ireland was included in the Bill up to the last moment, and, indeed, passed through the Standing Committee with "Ireland" in it. He did not know that there were any corrupt practices at Irish elections; but there certainly was terrorism, and that might be the reason why some Members in the other House objected to the application of the Bill to Ireland. He asked, why had Ireland been omitted? Unless a satisfactory reason were given for it, he should move to re-insert the word "Ireland."

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, his answer to the question was a very simple one. It was, that great objection was taken by Irish Members to the Bill being applied to Ireland, and that the objection was of such a nature that, if Ireland had not been excepted, the Bill would probably not have been passed this Session, and it was thought better to retain it so far as it related to England.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he wished to point out that the limitation of expense as fixed in the Bill was placed at a very low figure, and he had heard complaints that it would be impossible to work the scheme. Although it might suffice in some places, it would be found, on inquiry, utterly insufficient in others. He thought that was a point which ought to be carefully considered, more especially as the figures now in the Bill were not those which were in it when it first appeared. He desired also to suggest the Bill should be made uniform as to duration with the Act of last year. That Act was limited to a certain period, whereas this Bill was permanent.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown) that the Bill might properly be applied to Ireland. Practices amounting to terrorism were resorted to there, to deter intending candidates from coming forward, so that apparently there were few contests.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TRADE AND COMMERCE — COMMERCIAL AGREEMENTS WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the present position of the negotiations with Spain, Turkey, and Japan for fresh commercial agreements, which were mentioned in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne? said, he should not have thought of raising this question at a time when his noble Friend must be overwhelmed with a very important work, but for the urgent necessity of the case. He hoped his noble Friend, if not then, would, at all events, soon be able to give them the information he asked for. It was grievously needed by many persons of influence and consideration in the country. He would only say that, from his long connection with these matters in the House of Commons, he watched them with great interest and anxiety, and also any announcements with respect to commercial affairs. Unfortunately, as he had heard from all quarters, the state of their commerce was such as to cause the greatest anxiety among men of the greatest experience; and he thought they were bound to take every opportunity of impressing on Her Majesty's Government the great desirability of doing everything that was possible to push on whatever negotiations they might be engaged in with foreign countries in regard to new tariffs and other similar matters, to open up fresh outlets for commerce. During his absence abroad for the benefit of his health, he saw with the greatest possible satisfaction that the Government had announced in the Queen's Speech that they were proceeding to take steps with regard to Spain, Turkey, and Japan, with the object of securing enlarged commercial intercourse with those countries. From his connection with Liverpool and other circumstances, he knew that commercial circles were largely interested in the countries mentioned in the question, especially with Spain. In trade matters, Turkey had always been more liberal in her treatment than almost any other country in Europe; and he hoped the noble Earl would be able to assure them that, if they did not get better treatment, they should, at all events, fare as well in the future as they had done in the past. As to Japan, he would point out that the tendency of the whole people was for larger and more extended commercial intercourse with Europe. Before sitting down, he could not help remarking that the prolonged depression of trade in this country had not, up to the present, shown any satisfactory signs of righting itself; and to whatever commercial authority they addressed themselves they would find that they all spoke with great alarm of the want of elasticity and the want of power of recovery which almost every trade in the country showed. Formerly periods of depression were succeeded by periods of prosperity; but the outlook now was as depressing as ever. When they spoke of commercial depression, they sometimes forgot what a terrible meaning those words had for the working population. They saw something to-day in the Bankruptcy Returns and something in the number of unused houses; they also saw a diminishing demand among the population for fresh meat. This, again, re-acted on the price of stock, butchers being unable to dispose of so much as they used. He had recently visited a leading county town, and, on asking how the farmers in the district were getting on, he had been told that they were doing very badly, because there was no active demand for stock. One butcher in the town, who had formerly killed 14 sheep a-week, now killed only 10; and he (the Earl of Harrowby) thought that was a proof that working people could not afford to buy so much butcher's meat as formerly on account of the depression of trade. He trusted the noble Earl would be able to supply a satisfactory answer to his Question, and to assure them that these Treaties, which promised to give increased openings to our commerce, were, if not concluded, at any rate in a fair way of being concluded.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am aware that my noble Friend and Relative (the Earl of Harrowby) has, for many years, taken a great interest in all commercial questions; and, therefore, I am not surprised that he has put this Question to me, which relates to three very important points. With regard to Japan, our new Minister has been for some time there, and he has been constantly in communication with the Japanese Government on commercial matters; but this simply illustrates what I mentioned before—that the revision of the Treaties have not been begun yet in consequence of some of the European Representatives not having received their instructions. With regard to Spain, Her Majesty's Government attach the greatest importance to the Protocol signed by the Spanish Minister and the English Representative in December of last year. The reasons why we deferred that Protocol are stated in a Parliamentary Paper which has been presented to the House. They are shortly these—It was found, in April last, that in consequence of the then coming elections the Sitting of the Cortes would be so short that it would be impossible for the Spanish Government to press upon the Cortes the consideration of a question of that sort; and it was, therefore, quite necessary to defer to the December Session both the question of the English Protocol and the question of the Treaties and Conventions which had been signed by the Spanish Government and by other European Powers. That being the case, it was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to make a corresponding proposal to Parliament in regard to that Protocol, and it was necessary to postpone it till next Session. It can only then be done if the Cortes approve of the Protocol. Our Minister in Spain is still in communication with the Spanish Government on the subject, and he is under instructions to press it on most urgently. With regard to Turkey, the position is somewhat different. Delegates have been appointed, and they are at this moment considering the new Tariff; but they have not yet arrived at a conclusion which will enable me to state anything to the House. I do not wish to say one word on the general subject of depression which the noble Earl has introduced, or as to the character, the causes, or even the extent of it; but what I feel perfectly certain about is that, both with regard to agricultural depression and as to the question of prices as they affect our industrial population, we are certainly not in a worse, and I believe we are in a better, position than any other country in the world.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, the expectations which had been raised by the Liberal Party, prior to their coming into power in 1880, with respect to a return of commercial prosperity, had not been realized. At the last General Election, he remembered having seen a placard at Oxford with these words—"Vote for Harcourt, Chitty, and Prosperity."

EARL GRANVILLE: I cannot answer for all the election placards put up in different boroughs by respective candidates.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to the Marquess of LOTHIAN, THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, there was no chance of the Bill reaching their Lordships' House. In fact, he believed its withdrawal had been announced "elsewhere."

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SERGEANT CORBETT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that Sergeant Corbett, of Stradbally, is in the habit of firing shots out of the barrack door and on the barrack premises, killing birds and crows, the barrack being beside the public street, or if it is a breach of the regulations to have a gun other than the one served out to him; and, whether the sergeant has an excise licence?

MR. TREVELYAN: The District Inspector reports that Sergeant Corbett is not in the habit of firing shots as stated. But on the morning of the 3rd of July he fired two shots with a borrowed fowling piece, at the back of the barrack premises, for the purpose of frightening away birds which were injuring crops in the garden. He was more than 60 feet from the public street at the time. The sergeant has not an Excise licence, nor was one required, as he had the gun within the curtilage of the barrack.

INDIA (MADRAS)—THE LAND QUESTION IN MALABAR.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the complaints of certain tenants in the district of Malabar that they are being evicted from their holdings for giving evidence before the Special Commissioner, Mr. Logan, against their landlords; and, whether affairs in that province are not in a most critical state?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Government of Madras deputed, in 1881, a Special Commissioner to inquire into the Land Question in Malabar, which, from the complexity of the tenures, the density of the population, and the keen competition for land, is a difficult one. They are now considering Mr. Logan's Report; and, pending a decision, they have appealed to the loyalty and good sense of all classes to disturb as little as possible the existing state of the relations between all parties interested in the soil.

INDIA (MADRAS)—FOREST LEGISLATION—ACT 5, 1882.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether attention will be paid to the increasing number of complaints of ryots at the vexatious nature of the recent legislation in Madras, Act 5, of 1882, Forests; and, whether it is true that section 56 declares that all wood timber, produce, &c., &c., shall be presumed to be Government's, and that, in consequence, such enormous powers are placed in the hands of low paid officials, that most serious discontent is spreading over the Madras Presidency?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Act 5 of 1882 did not come into force until the 1st of January, 1883, and no Report on its working has yet reached this country. Neither have any complaints been received, so far as is known, of the vexatious nature of its clauses. Section 56 provides that when a question arises under the Act whether forest produce is the property of Government, such produce shall be presumed to be the property of the Government till the contrary is proved. The powers reserved to the District Forest Officers are, in many instances, not capable of being delegated to subordinates; and, in any case, there is no reason to suppose that "enormous powers are placed in the hands of low-paid officials," or that serious discontent has arisen therefrom.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, CARLOW UNION.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that there were twelve contested divisions at the late election of Poor Law Guardians for the Carlow Union; were the Nationalist Guardians defeated in eight of them; were the elections of three of these eight set aside, on the ground that the returning officer (Mr. E. L. Jameson), who is also clerk of the Union and sub-sheriff of the county, received informal claims to vote, and allowed votes thereon to the Conservative candidates; is it a fact that in the other five divisions investigations have been made and numerous similar informal and improper claims discovered as having been received by the same returning officer, and votes improperly allowed by him on said claims for the Conservative candidates; if these matters were brought before the Local Government Board by resolutions and statements of the Carlow Board of Guardians, and by petitions of the defeated candidates several weeks ago, and has any answer since been given by the Board, and what is the cause of the delay; will the defective claims be permitted to be amended before the new elections; if the said Local Government Board, in the case of the Rathanna Division of the above Union, received two resolutions of the Guardians calling for a sworn investigation on numerous grounds; did the Board disallow eight votes recorded for the Conservative candidate (his majority being nine), but refuse to grant the sworn investigation, although the Guardians by resolutions objected to over 20 more votes that were counted for the successful candidate; did the Guardians of the Carlow Union, by resolution of the 26th of June, call on the Local Government Board to discontinue Mr. Jameson as such returning officer, as they had no confidence in him; did the people of the county of Carlow (in public meeting assembled) protest against the conduct of Mr. Jameson, and have copies of such resolutions been sent to the Local Government Board, and has the Board taken any, and what, steps in the matter; and, will the Board continue Mr. Jameson as clerk of the Carlow Union, he being sub-sheriff of the county?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board inform me that 12 elections were contested in the Carlow Union; but they have no record of the politics of the candidates. The returns in three districts were set aside, on the ground that the persons returned did not obtain a majority of valid votes—some votes having been allowed in respect of informal claims. Statements of objections to the validity of elections have also been received with regard to several other districts; and the Local Government Board, having obtained the explanation of the Returning Officer, have communicated with the Guardians, and await any further observations they may wish to offer. It is competent to have the defective statements of claim amended, so that they will contain all the particulars required, and thus be available at subsequent elections. In the Rathanna Division, which is named in the Question, the Board disallowed eight votes which were given on invalid claims; but the disallowance of these votes does not affect the result of the election. The Local Government Board have communicated to the Guardians their views respecting each of the other cases to which objection was raised, and have stated that from the information then before them they were not prepared to accede to the request for a sworn inquiry. The Board have received applications for the discontinuance of Mr. Jameson as Returning Officer; and have informed the applicants that they do not feel called upon to comply with that proposal. There is nothing to show partiality towards any particular candidate on the part of the Returning Officer; and the errors he committed were made apparently in ignorance of the law. They have been pointed out to him, and he has been warned that he will be held strictly responsible for the proper discharge of his duties.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask if that is the first occasion on which there was a complaint against this Returning Officer?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not ready to state at this moment.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—TEELIN PIER, CO. DONEGAL.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the so-called "soft" foundation, for 20 feet in front of Teelin Pier, county Donegal, is not the same or nearly the same nature as that upon which the pier has been built; whether the 20 feet which has been cut off from the most important part of the pier-head was not part of the work contracted for with the contractor, and paid for as if same had been duly executed; whether the nature of the foundations, upon which the Board of Works were going to erect so important and expensive a structure, were correctly ascertained in the first instance, and not when too late; whether a strong representation has been forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant by or on behalf of the Grand Jury of the County of Donegal, at this Assizes, protesting against the mismanagement and waste, by the Board of Works, upon numerous fishery piers around that county, and complaining of the ruinous state of some of the very newest piers on the Coast, and calling for an investigation; and, whether the supervision of these important works at Teelin was left to a young and inexperienced man, son of a clerk in the office of the Board of Works, and whether his name and previous qualifications will be given?

MR. COURTNEY: It is not the fact that the completed part of Teelin Pier rests on a soft foundation, nearly the same as that which had to be abandoned, as the former is built on rock or other hard material. The 20 feet length cut off was originally contracted for; but as it appeared that the contractor was entitled to extra payment for unforeseen work, no deduction was made from the total amount paid him. No doubt, it was unfortunate that the existence of this soft bed was not discovered at first; but it should be remembered that the arrangements for this pier were not made by the Board of Works, but by the special Relief Committee of 1880, and so were probably more hurried than they would otherwise have been. The county surveyor of Donegal has complained of the condition of four piers in that county, though nothing has yet reached the Lord Lieutenant on the subject, and a special inquiry will be made into the matter; but I must observe that it is the duty of the Grand Jury to maintain these piers, and the Board of Works have nothing to do with it. The Clerk of the Works at Teelin was named Latimer; he is a regularly trained engineer and member of the Irish Institute of Civil Engineers, besides which he had three years' practical experience before he was employed by the Board. I am told he is the son of a clerk in the Board of Works.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR suggested that the Treasury should order an altogether independent inquiry into the matter.

MR. HEALY said, that he could not catch what the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had just said; but he would ask if the Government would kindly send some gentlemen from England who would be competent to find out whether the Board of Works had done the work satisfactorily or not?

MR. COURTNEY said, he was not prepared to take that step; but he would take care that a full inquiry was made.

MR. HEALY said, he would renew this subject on the Vote.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—IRREGULARITIES IN SOUTH UIST.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE (for Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH) asked the Postmaster-General, Whether, in reference to the grave irregularities in certain Post Offices in South Uist, recently brought to his notice, and made the subject of Question in this House, it is the fact that William Mearns, Sub-Postmaster of Loch Boisdale Pier, one of the persons implicated, was formerly a domestic in the service of the proprietors of South Uist; and, whether, in view of the Report (page 65) of the Crofters' Commissioners—

Mr. Courtney

"In the remoter parts of the Highlands and Islands it is considered specially desirable that, in the nomination of Postmasters and telegraphic officials, persons be selected who are altogether independent of local or political authority or influence," he will take care, in future appointments in these localities, that discrimination be exercised on the lines indicated in the Report?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he was not aware whether the Sub-Postmaster to whom his hon. Friend referred was formerly in the service of the proprietors of South Uist. He was appointed on the recommendation of the surveyor that he was the most suitable person in the locality. He thought there would be great difficulty in carrying out the suggestion of the Crofters' Commission; because if no one in the locality could be appointed to these offices, it would be necessary largely to increase the salary of the offices, in order to induce persons to come from a distance to hold them. Moreover, he thought it would hardly be just to act on the principle that no one in the locality was fit to be trusted with the charge of a Post Office. He might add that in The Post Office Circular of that week a special notice had been issued to Postmasters and Sub-Postmasters in Scotland which would, he hoped, prevent any further irregularities of the kind alluded to.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—LAND VALUATION—COUNTIES CAVAN AND LEITRIM.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Bell, the Court Valuer to the County Court Judge for Cavan and Leitrim, gave a report as to the value of land in Nedd, near Killeshandra, county Cavan, also in Annagh, Curraghboy, Corglass, and Dumbriek townlands, parish of Carrigallen, county Leitrim, without having gone on the farms; and, if so, will he appoint a more careful valuer?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Bell emphatically denies that he gave reports of such valuations without visiting the lands.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—
MAIMING HORSES—CARRICKMACROSS PRESENTMENT SESSIONS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the action of the Monaglen Grand Jury in granting £50 compensation to Messrs. Tenison and Porter for alleged malicious injury to horses, although the presentment had been rejected as bogus by the cesspayers, and the police, according to The Belfast Morning News of 10th instant, made the following depositions, showing that the injuries had been deliberately inflicted on the animals by the Emergency men, Nelson and Weir, paid by the landlords to take care of them:—

“Sergeant McDonnell stated that he was stationed at Carrickmacross, and no complaint had been made to him by either Nelson or Weir up to the 7th January. He had gone to every person who could throw any light on the subject, and, up to the present time, he had never met a man who could corroborate the statements made by Nelson and Weir. He had deposed, at the Presentment Sessions at Carrickmacross, that he believed this outrage had been committed by the wife of Nelson, and he still held that opinion. Mrs. Nelson seemed to be the prime mover in the whole matter:

“Constable Farrell corroborated, and added that he believed the statements of Nelson and Weir to be a fabrication, and their statements were conflicting. He was further of opinion that there was collusion between Nelson and Weir with regard to the stabbing of these horses:

will the Government assist the ratepayers to get the presentment traversed before the Assize Judge; and, can he hold out any hope that the Law will be so amended as to place the taxes of the people beyond the control of irresponsible magistrates?

MR. TREVELYAN: This outrage was not considered by the police to be of an agrarian character, and it was not recorded as such; but that circumstance did not preclude the owners of the horses from a right to seek compensation for the injury to the horses, which there can be no doubt was inflicted, whether by the person in charge of them or not. The opinion of the police as to their suspicions on that point is accurately quoted in the Question; but no conclusive evidence could be obtained. It is true that the claim for compensation was thrown out by the Presentment Sessions;

but the Grand Jury, after a long inquiry, found that the injury was malicious, and made a Presentment for compensation. This has already been traversed at the Assizes; but the Judge stated that the ratepayers who opposed “had no case, as malice was clearly proved,” and he fiatd the presentment.

CROWN MINING LEASES—THE COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS AND FORESTS.

MR. ROLLS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether holders of mineral leases under the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, more especially in the counties of Cardigan and Merioneth, are required to pay higher rents and royalties than those asked by the adjoining landowners; whether clauses are inserted in the leases from the Commissioners of Woods and Forests not known of in any private mineral leases; whether, in some cases, the lessees have been threatened with forfeiture of their leases for not working the mines, although their doing so, in the face of the present price of minerals, would entail a serious loss, and although all rents have been paid up; whether he would grant, as an unopposed Return, a statement of the number of acres belonging to the Crown in the counties of Cardigan and Merioneth, and how many acres of the same are at present let under mineral leases; and, whether he is aware that the conditions imposed by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests in these two counties are such as to practically prohibit searches for minerals therein?

MR. COURTNEY: I have no reason to think that Crown mining leases are more onerous in respect of royalty or other conditions than those given by other Welsh landowners. The only special provision in the former, known as “the one-fourth clause,” is now no longer inserted. In no recent case has forfeiture been threatened because the mines were not worked. I will obtain for the hon. Member the acreages for which he asks; but I do not think there would be any use in laying them before Parliament. I have seen no evidence to show that the terms required by the Crown injure mining enterprise; on the contrary, the Commissioners of Woods are especially anxious to develop their mining properties in every proper manner.

LAW AND POLICE—THE DYNAMITE EXPLOSIONS AT WESTMINSTER —COMPENSATION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If application has been made to the Government on behalf of inhabitants of Westminster who have suffered by the explosions caused by the criminal acts of persons known to the police, but who have not yet been apprehended; and, if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any compensation for the losses and sufferings resulting from these acts?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have received various applications on this subject, and I need not say that Her Majesty's Government have the greatest possible sympathy with the persons who have suffered by the explosions; but it is necessary to consider on what principle compensation could be awarded to them. Many people, unfortunately, suffer every day from crimes of violence, such as burglary, highway robbery, and arson, in which property of value is destroyed and injured; and the State never makes any compensation in these cases, nor would it be expedient or safe to do so. I have not been able to discover any distinction between these ordinary crimes and the crimes referred to in the Question; and, therefore, I have not felt myself justified in applying to the Treasury on the subject.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE RELIQUARY OF ST.
LACHTEEN.

MR. DAWSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the willingness of the Science and Art Department to hand over the reliquary of St. Lachteen to the Royal Irish Academy, where similar objects of interest are collected, he would be willing to recoup the Science and Art Department in Dublin the sum of £450 paid for the reliquary out of their annual grant?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): No, Sir; the reliquary will go to the Royal Irish Academy, and a Vote will be asked for.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—THE RAJPOO-TANA RAILWAY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

Whether it is the case that the working of the Rajpootana State Line of Railway is about to be made over to the Bombay and Baroda Railway; and, if so, whether, in addition to other "precautions for the benefit of the public, the Government have reserved a complete control over the rates charged, and have not, as in the case of the East Indian Line, handed the Railway over to a private Company, with certain prescribed maximum rates, which the Government has no power to vary or decrease from time to time in the interest of the public without the consent of the Company?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The working of the Rajpootana Railway is about to be made over to the Bombay and Baroda Company; and the Government has reserved the power of fixing and varying from time to time both maximum and minimum rates.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CIRCUIT EX-PENSES OF JUDGES.

MR. RYLANDS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Treasury Minute of 16th June, as to the payment of the Circuit expenses of the Judges and their suites, is to be treated as temporary only, so that, if the Order in Council is amended and the Chancery Judges and the Admiralty Judge are hereafter required to go on Circuit, it will be competent for the Crown to require them to do so without increase of salary?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to add the further Question, whether the Judges had the right to roam about the country abusing Her Majesty's Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I cannot answer the second Question. The Treasury Minute provides that, if the ordinary Circuit business of the country is performed by the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division, the Judges who go on Circuit will be allowed £7 10s. a-day during their absence from London, and per contra one of their two clerks will, as vacancies occur, be discontinued. This is part of, and dependent upon, the arrangements as to Circuit business which have been agreed to by the Judges generally; and if these arrangements should fail in their object of relieving, as far as possible, the Court of Appeal, and the Probate and Admiralty and Chancery Divisions, they would be open to reconsideration. While stating this as a matter of right, I must not be understood as having arrived at any conclusion with respect to the best arrangements for the discharge of Circuit business.

In reply to Mr. HEALY,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that the salaries of the Judges were fixed by the law, and the expenses did not form any part of their salaries; therefore, their expenses must be submitted as Votes in Supply.

ARMY—DIRECT COMMISSIONS IN THE ROYAL ARTILLERY.

MR. GIBSON asked the Secretary of State for War, How many officers obtained direct commissions in the Royal Artillery between 1852 and 1857; how many of those officers are still in the service; was the average age of those officers three or four years higher than that of officers who did not obtain direct commissions; had some of those officers been recently superseded by a large number of Indian Majors, gazetted in May last to the Royal Artillery; and, is it intended to now compulsorily retire some of those officers who so entered the service at the aforesaid age, and thus deprive them of the advantages which were within their contemplation when they entered the service at the invitation of the Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Direct commissions in the Royal Artillery were obtained between 1852 and 1857 by 46 officers, of whom 14 are still serving in the Corps. Their average age exceeded the average age of those otherwise appointed to the Corps during the same period by three-and-a-quarter years. In May last, in consequence of vacancies among the lieutenant-colonels of the Indian cadres, Indian majors junior not only to some of these direct commission majors, but also to those commissioned at the same time from the Royal Military Academy, were promoted to be lieutenant-colonels in their own cadres. It is expected that three majors who entered by direct competition will be compulsorily retired during the next three months on attaining the age of 50 years. The promotion of the majors in the Indian cadres has had no bearing on the compulsory retirement of the other officers referred to in the Question.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY (IRELAND)—THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What proportion of the funds voted for the Royal University is spent, first, on rewards for the Students; second, for the payment of Fellows and Examiners; third, on the Sustentation Fund of the Senators; do the Senators of the Royal University, in addition to their travelling expenses, usually allowed to members of public Boards, also get Sustentation money; is this a usual practice; on what scale is the Sustentation allowance to the Senators calculated; do they send in their hotel bills to the secretaries of the Royal University; is the benefit of the Sustentation Fund extended to the families of the Senators; do the Senators draw any Sustentation money when under no expense; and, will he consent to grant a Return of the names of the Senators who have availed of the Sustentation Fund, with the amount drawn in each instance?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, the accounts of the Royal University, which were annually certified by the Auditor General and presented to Parliament, would afford the hon. Member the first portion of the information he required. It was in Paper No. 289. The expenses and allowances to Senators comprised their actual travelling expenses, together with one guinea for each night necessarily spent away from home on the business of the University. No payment whatever was made to members who could attend without travelling for the purpose. All members of the Senate necessarily away from home were entitled to the subsistence allowance, although they did not all claim it. They were not required to send their hotel bills to the secretary. There was no ground for suggesting that any expenses or allowances were paid for in respect of any member's or Senator's families. He was not prepared to consent to such a Return as the hon. Member suggested. It would be regarded as invidious and of an inquisitorial character, and it might imply that those Senators who asked to be paid the allowance did so improperly. Similar Returns in regard to the Commissioners of National Education were recently objected to on the same ground.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (IRELAND)
—CASE OF MRS. CRAIG — SLIGO MODEL SCHOOLS.

MR. WARTON (for Colonel KING-HARMAN) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mrs. Craig, who was head teacher of the Sligo Model Schools, was obliged to resign her situation, owing to ill-health, after fourteen years' meritorious service, and was granted by the Commissioners of Education the sum of £78, to which she was entitled; whether Mrs. Craig died before the cheque was drawn, and if it is true that the authorities have refused to give the money, or any portion of it, to her aged mother; and, whether he will consider whether the whole or, at any rate, a portion of the money fairly earned by Mrs. Craig may not be given to the mother, who nursed her in her illness, and who is in straitened circumstances?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mrs. Craig held the appointment stated, and resigned on the ground of ill-health. She signed a claim for gratuity on the 1st of December, and after the usual investigations the Treasury approved the award; but it subsequently transpired that in the meantime Mrs. Craig had died, and no payment under the award could legally be made to her representatives.

MR. HARRINGTON asked, whether, having regard to the repeated delays in these matters on the part of the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman would make such representations as would expedite the grants?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would get a list of cases and see how long the delays were. This class of applications ought to be dealt with promptly.

ARMY—THE GARRISON OF DUBLIN.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there are now six battalions of Infantry, forming the Dublin Garrison, having a paper effective strength of 3,859 of all ranks, according to the latest Returns, and whether this is not in excess of the usual number; if he will state what number of this total are available for garrison duty; and, why it has been found necessary to supplement this large force by additional detachments of other Regiments from the Curragh to assist in furnishing the duties?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The garrison of Dublin consists nominally of about 3,600 of all ranks, which is not in excess of the usual number; but about 450 are on detachment duty. It is the practice at this time of the year to detach two companies per battalion for musketry and special drill; and after deducting these, the necessary duty men, and the sick, there scarcely remains enough privates, considering the heavy garrison duties, to allow the men four nights in bed. When, from time to time, the strength has fallen too low for this purpose, detachments from the Curragh have been made available.

EGYPT (RE-ORGANIZATION)—AUTONOMOUS INSTITUTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, considering the great stress laid by Her Majesty's Government on the experiment of autonomous institutions in Egypt formally instituted last year, he is yet able to lay upon the Table any Reports on their working, and to explain the circumstances of the difference between Mr. Clifford Lloyd and the Legislative Council in connection with the proposed Municipality Bill; if he will state generally whether the provisions of the Decree of 1st May 1883 have been complied with; whether the Legislative Council have met on the dates appointed by Article 26; whether they have been consulted regarding every Law and every Decree regulating the public administrations, as required by Article 18; whether, in accordance with the same Article, the reasons have been communicated to them for any decisions contrary to their advice; whether the Budget has been submitted to and discussed by them in accordance with Article 22; and, whether, in accordance with Article 35, the General Assembly has been consulted regarding all loans raised, and will be consulted on any fresh loans which may be raised?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: As I have already informed the House, Sir Evelyn Baring, on his return to Egypt, will forward to Her Majesty's Government a Report on the working of the autonomous institutions, which will be laid before Parliament. I am not aware of any differences between Mr. Clifford Lloyd and the Legislative Council on the subject of the Municipality Bill. The provisions of the Decree of May 1, 1883, appear to have been complied with. I am unable to say whether the Legislative Council have always met on the days appointed. I understand that they have been consulted respecting Administrative Laws and Decrees; but I cannot say whether, in case of dissent from their views, the reasons have been communicated to them. Owing to the uncertainty of the finances, the Budget has not as yet been submitted, and Decrees have from time to time been issued postponing the date of its presentation. One of these Decrees is given at page 57 of "Egypt," No. 12, 1884. No loan having been raised, it has not been necessary to consult the Assembly.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: May I ask if the noble Lord can tell us if the Legislative Council is still in existence; and whether it will meet to-morrow, the 1st of August, under Article 26?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Legislative Council is still in existence; and if my hon. Friend will refer to a very interesting letter by Mr. Sheldon Amos in The Times of to-day, he will find some information in regard to it.

LUNACY LAWS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will call for Reports from the Secretaries of the different Embassies as to the working of the Lunacy Laws on the Continent, and in the United States, and especially as to the following points:—Whether there are private as well as public asylums; what are the checks against improper admission or detention of persons in an asylum; what supervision and inspection, if any, is exercised by any public and recognized authority; and, the nature and powers of such authority; and, whether he will present such Reports to Parliament?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think my hon. Friend will find most of the information he asks for in a collected form in a work privately printed in Philadelphia by Dr. Harrison, Legislation on Insanity, which I shall be happy to show him; but any further information he may require will be at once procured.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, what he wished to do was to get the information placed in the hands of Members of the House before the Session of next year.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

MR. DAWSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether it is a fact that, owing to the very easy compliance with the Fourth Standard, the number of children under fourteen years, who never return to school, is largely increasing; whether he will make any change in the Code to insure longer attendance and more extended knowledge; whether, in view of this extremely early abandonment of ordinary schools, he will take any steps to provide night schools for the classes affected; and, whether the Education Department will purchase, for the use of industrial exhibitions in the United Kingdom, the exhibits of technical teaching and its results in Foreign Countries, and now on view at the International Health Exhibition?

MR. MUNDELLA: It is true that children pass the Fourth Standard at an earlier age than heretofore, owing to better attendance and better teaching. The Standard of exemption, however, cannot be raised by the Code, which merely deals with the curriculum, and has nothing whatever to do with the Standard prescribed by the bye-laws, the raising of which without the consent of the Local Authorities can only be effected by legislation. Very considerable changes have been made in the new Code with a view to the encouragement of night schools. The purchase of some of the most desirable exhibits is at present under the consideration of the Science and Art Department.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—CO. WATERFORD.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that, while three Catholic magistrates of the district of Kilmacthomas, county Waterford, have died within the last seven or eight years, only one gentleman, a non-Catholic and a land agent, has been appointed to the magistracy in that district during that time; whether it is the fact that there is not at present a single justice resident in Kilmacthomas Petty Sessions district; whether the Kilmacthomas Board of Guardians, in April last, forwarded a Memorial to the Lord Chancellor, setting forth these facts, and asking him to appoint Dr. Walsh, of Kilmacthomas, and Mr. Brian Finn, of Carigmorna; whether a similar Memorial was forwarded by the priests of the parish; and, whether the Lord Chancellor has received these Memorials; and, if so, whether he intends to act upon them?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Lord Chancellor informs me that, in consequence of a want of magistrates in the Kilmacthomas district, he appointed two gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace last month, on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the county. One of them is a Roman Catholic and a farmer; the other is believed to be a Dissenting Protestant—neither of them is a land agent. They will be immediately available for the Kilmacthomas Bench. The Memorials on behalf of the two gentlemen named in the Question have been received; and the Lord Chancellor is at present in correspondence with the Lord Lieutenant of the county on the subject.

MR. LEAMY: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the names of the two magistrates who have been appointed?

MR. TREVELYAN: No, Sir. The names are not given in the Minute of the Lord Chancellor.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL (WEST FRONT).

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, having regard to the important effects which the proposed works on the west side of Westminster Hall will have on the architectural character of the group of buildings of which the Hall forms part, and to the insufficiency of the opportunities which have been given for consideration of the designs, he will postpone till next Session submitting an estimate for the works, and will agree to the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of the best mode of dealing with the west side of the Hall?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: When I laid Mr. Pearson's plans before the House, about three weeks ago, I stated that if I found that there was likely to be serious opposition to them on behalf of Members, I would refer the subject to a Select Committee. Since then I have been in communication with a large number of Members in all parts of the House, and I find that there is a general concurrence of opinion favourable to these plans. There are some few exceptions, but that must be expected to any scheme; the general verdict, however, is certainly favourable. Under these circumstances, I do not think it necessary to refer the question to a Committee, and I shall ask for a Vote during the present Session to commence the work during the Autumn. This is the more necessary, as the walls of the Hall were much injured during the past Winter, and I am unwilling to expose them to the injury of another Winter. There is, however, one part of the work which cannot be commenced at present—namely, the raising of the towers at the north end of the Hall. The Vote I shall ask for will not include any money for this purpose. This part of the work will stand over, and hon. Members who object to it will have an opportunity of raising the question next year.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that all the architectural journals had written strongly in disapproval of the designs; and whether he had not received from the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings a very urgent request to postpone the matter until next year, in order that the public, as well as the Members of the House, might have an opportunity of considering it?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was aware that two of the architectural papers had commented unfavourably on the designs; but he had observed that they commented unfavourably upon anything he proposed. So far as he had observed, papers of that kind were nothing if they were not critical. The Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings had pressed him to postpone the question; but he did not understand that they were unfavourable to the scheme; they only criticized some of the points. He should consult the architect as to details, and later on he should be able to tell the House whether any modifications were thought desirable.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE "CONSO- LATION."

SIR HENRY HOLLAND (for Lord CLAUD HAMILTON) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in face of the statement of facts relative to the case of the Consolation contained in the letter of the Directors of the Clyde Steam and Sailing Shipowners' Association, dated July 26, and addressed to him, he still adheres to his declaration publicly made that—

"The case of the Consolation was one in which no lives were lost; that the vessel was insured for £17,000; that her original cost was £17,000; that she was ten years old, and valued at £11,600?"

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have not seen the statement in the letter referred to in the noble Lord's Question; but I have been in correspondence with the owners of the Consolation, and I very readily accepted the statement from them to the effect that the sum I stated as the original cost of the vessel was considerably understated. This, however, does not affect the other statements in my speech upon which my argument was founded. It is the fact that that vessel was insured for £17,000, and she was valued by my orders by those independent valuers. The highest of these valuations was the sum I quoted—namely, £11,000, and I have since applied to the valuers, Messrs. Bayley and Ridley, and they adhere to their original valuation. I ought to add, although I do not think this is a matter of complaint against me, that when I referred to this case I was under the impression that no lives had been lost in connection with this ship, and I thought it fair to the owners to state that; but I have since learnt that, unfortunately, two sailors were drowned when the ship was lost.

MR. WHITLEY: Had the valuers seen the vessel?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No; they could not, as she was lost. They valued it, after it was lost, in the usual way in which such valuations are made.

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1883—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. WAUGH asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, as compared with the charge of £34,677 for Bankruptcy last year, the following represents the total charge this year, viz. :—

Inspector General, &c.	£ 78,377
Transferred to Supreme Court, &c.	15,360

whether any other sums are charged in the Estimates in respect of Bankruptcy for the year 1884-5; why are the particulars of the gross sum of £23,514 charged in Class 6, for abolishing officers and compensation in the Court of Bankruptcy, not given in this year as usual; and, whether such sum has been added to by further abolitions under the Act of 1883, or whether the charge has been diminished by the appointment out of officers on the abolished list to new offices under the Act of 1883; and, if not, why have none of such persons been appointed?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The charge of £34,677 in the Estimates for 1883-4 was the charge for bankruptcy in the Supreme Court only. In addition, the sum of £40,000 was charged for Registrars in Bankruptcy in County Courts, making a total of £74,677. The charge for bankruptcy in the Estimates for 1884-5 consists not only of the sum of £78,000 on the Board of Trade Vote, but also of the sum of £14,000 for Registrars, &c., in the Supreme Court; £36,000 for Registrars in County Courts, and minor charges for rents, furniture, &c., amounting to about £5,000. This gives a total of £133,000. The additional income is estimated by the Board of Trade at £76,300. As to the third Question, I must refer my hon. Friend to the Treasury. With regard to the last Question, I may say there are very few abolitions under the new Act of 1883; and at present the greater part of the increased work has been performed by old officers. All the changes made will be fully detailed in the next Report on Bankruptcy.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Is the increased charge in consequence of the expenses of the Act?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not anticipate any increased charge at all.

ARMY (INDIA)—THE NORTH-WEST FRONTIER—QUETTA.

MR. SLAGG asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the case that certain regiments of Cavalry have been added to the Indian Forces in connection with the frontier exploits in the district of Quetta?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: I do not understand what my hon. Friend means when he speaks of frontier exploits in the district of Quetta; but there has been no increase in the Indian Cavalry.

CIVIL SERVANTS OF THE CROWN—SIR WILLIAM GURDON.

Mr. TOMLINSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Sir William Brampton Gurdon, K.C.B., who is an accepted candidate for the representation of West Norfolk, is still a first-class clerk in the Treasury, in receipt of a salary of £1,000 a-year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I have to say that Sir William Brampton Gurdon is a principal clerk in the Treasury, receiving £1,000 a-year. I have received from him no intimation that he intends to become a candidate for a seat in Parliament.

PARLIAMENT—DISTRIBUTION OF THE STATUTES TO MEMBERS.

Mr. TOMLINSON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that, notwithstanding his promise to direct that the Acts passed this Session shall be issued as they are passed to those Members who require them, no orders to that effect have been given at the Vote Office; and, whether he will at once inquire into the cause of the failure to carry out his promise?

Mr. COURTNEY: I have no control over this matter, which rests with the authorities of the House. But, on inquiry at the Vote Office, I learn that no application for loose copies of the statutes has been made there. They will, however, be supplied to any hon. Members who require them and give Notice to that effect.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN DUBLIN AND CORK.

Mr. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, If the mail train under the new service from Dublin to Cork could not, without slackening speed, slip a carriage containing passengers and mails for Waterford at Maryborough; and, if so, whether, considering the desire of the people of Kilkenny and Waterford that this should be done, and the willingness of the Waterford and Central Ireland Railway Company to send a special train to meet the mail at Maryborough, he will, in the contract about to be entered into between the Post Office and the Great Western Railway Company, make an arrangement for the slipping of a carriage at Maryborough?

Mr. FAWCETT: So far as I have been able to ascertain, no postal advantage would be likely to result from sending the Kilkenny and Waterford mails by way of Maryborough. If the Great Southern and Western Company wish to slip a carriage at Maryborough for the convenience of passengers, I certainly should offer no opposition, provided the mail train was not delayed.

Mr. LEAMY: No; but will the right hon. Gentleman, in the interest of the public, require it to be done by the contract he is about entering into with the Company?

Mr. FAWCETT: If there are no postal advantages, I do not think I could. I do not know what my legal powers are; but if, for the convenience of passengers, the Company would like to do it, I would not offer opposition, unless it would interfere with the Postal Service.

PARLIAMENT—"REMINGTON PER-FECTED TYPE-WRITERS."

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he would have any objection to place in one of the rooms of the Library of the House of Commons, or in some other room set apart for the purpose, a small number of "Remington Perfected Type-Writers," for the convenience of the Members of the House?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he could not recommend what the hon. Member proposed.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND)—MULLIN-GAR GUARDIANS.

Mr. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Guardians of the Mullingar Union agreed to delegate their duties, as a Sanitary Authority of that town, to the Town Commissioners as a Sub-Committee; whether the Local Government Board refused to agree to this arrangement; and, whether, having regard to the necessity for prompt action on the part of the Sanitary Authorities, owing to the danger of a spread of cholera, the Local Government Board will reconsider their decision?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, it was the case that the Guardians of the Mullingar Union, being the Rural Sanitary Authority, desired to appoint a Sanitary Committee for Mullingar; and the Local Government Board were obliged to point out to them that they could not legally carry out such an arrangement, as the power to appoint Committees under the 5th section of the Public Health Act was limited to Urban Sanitary Authorities. The danger of a spread of cholera would not enable the Local Government Board to authorize the appointment of such a Committee by the Board of Guardians.

POST OFFICE—SORTERS AND LETTER CARRIERS—THE PARCEL POST.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether any step has yet been taken to remedy the complaints of sorters in connection with mail trains, or to give additional remuneration to letter carriers in connection with the increased duty under the parcel post?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to a Question put to me a few months ago by the hon. Member for Mallow, I stated that in the matter of Sunday duty arrangements were being made to place the Irish mail sorters, as far as possible, on an equality with those employed in England. Assuming that to be the matter to which the hon. Member refers in the first part of his Question, I beg to state that to those arrangements effect is now being given. In reply to the second part of the Question, there is no intention of entering upon another general revision of letter-carriers' wages, which was completed only two years ago; but where information reaches me of the need of revision in any particular case, the circumstances are carefully considered.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — LETTER CARRIERS—THE PORTUMNA LETTER CARRIER.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is a fact that the rural postman has to carry the mails between Portumna and Power's Cross, county Galway, a distance of twelve Irish miles, for six days of the week; whether, in order to accomplish this task, the postman has to leave at six in the morning; and, whether the remuneration given for this work is eight shillings per week?

MR. FAWCETT: The facts appear to be substantially as stated in the Question of the hon. Member, the distance mentioned being, of course, understood to be the total distance travelled by the postman there and back. The postman does not hold a regular appointment, but is one employed by the local Postmaster, who receives an allowance to provide for the performance of the duty. I will, however, make further inquiry, with a view to revising the allowance if necessary.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—FAIR RENTS—GLEBE LANDS OF DRUMCREE, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. WARTON (for Colonel KING-HARMAN) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the Land Commissioners have, in the case of the Glebe Lands of Drumcree, county Armagh, reduced, by 18 per cent., rents proved to have been unchanged since 1827, and, subject to which, tenants were proved to have, even so lately as 1880, given £12 10s. per acre for the tenant-right; whether said lands were purchased from the Church Commissioners by the present owner, Mr. Law; whether the rental furnished by them showed the old rents; and whether the valuation made by the Commissioners' valuator, Mr. M. O'Brien, to give the tenants the benefit of the clause in the Church Act in their favour, placed nearly twenty-four years' purchase on said rents, and thus represented them as moderate rents; and, whether the Government are prepared, out of the Irish Church surplus, which got the benefit of the price produced by the Commissioners' representations, to refund Mr. Law the proportion of the purchase money so obtained from him by such representations?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that the Land Commission reported that in the case referred to the rents were reduced, on the whole, by a little more than 18 per cent. Evidence was given that the rents were not changed since 1837; that in some cases a considerable sum was paid for tenant-right; and that

Mr. Law paid 30 years' purchase for the land at the old rents, that being the just value, according to Mr. O'Brien's valuation. No evidence as to value was given by the landlord at the re-hearing of the appeal, and the Commissioners came to a conclusion on the whole evidence laid before them. He could not hold out any hope that he would make the representations to the Treasury suggested in the last paragraph of the Question.

SWITZERLAND—THE "SALVATIONISTS."

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any more Papers, in continuation of "Switzerland, No. 1, 1884," manifestly incomplete, will be laid upon the Table; and, what information he can supply respecting the recent renewal of outrages, and of religious persecutions on British subjects and others, of a most serious description in the town of Bienne, on which occasion a house occupied by British subjects was attacked with the utmost violence and completely gutted; the local police being overpowered by the mob, so that it was deemed necessary by the Cantonal authorities, at the instance of the Federal Government, to call out the Military?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Further Papers will be prepared and laid. The Cantonal authorities of Neuchâtel, Vaud, and Berne recently agreed that private meetings of Salvationists were to be allowed in those Cantons under certain conditions. The Salvationists commenced to hold private meetings in a building at Bienne, which they had hired for the purpose; a mob attacked the building, and serious disorder ensued. The Council of State of the Canton of Berne have, in consequence, and in order to keep the peace and preserve public order, prohibited the holding of Salvationist meetings in Bienne and its neighbourhood.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE CONGO RIVER.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the right of pre-emption of certain territory on the Congo, occupied by the International Association, has been obtained by the French Government; and, whether this right had been previously offered to Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: From an agreement between the French Prime Minister and the President of the Belgian Association, which has appeared in the public Press, it would appear that the right of pre-emption, to which the hon. Baronet refers, has been obtained by the French Government; but Her Majesty's Government have no official cognizance of this agreement. This right had not previously been offered to Her Majesty's Government.

THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS—CONDUCT OF A COLONIAL OFFICIAL.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has received any information as to the conduct of a high Colonial official, in consequence of which he was placed in irons on board the Royal Mail Steamer Don, which left Barbadoes on the 30th of May of the present year; and, whether any steps will be taken in consequence?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: We have received a newspaper containing an anonymous statement of that sort; but we have given no credence to it. We do not think it necessary to take any steps at present.

MR. O'DONNELL: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that what he calls an anonymous statement is a leading article in the newspaper which charges this official with crime? Will the Under Secretary make any inquiries from the authorities of the steamship Don, on board which such crimes are said to have taken place? If the Under Secretary cannot answer now I will postpone the Question.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I can answer now. We believe the charges to have no foundation; and until we have something more substantial to go upon we cannot make any inquiries.

MR. O'DONNELL: Will the Government require this official to bring an action for libel against the newspaper which charges him with crime?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I cannot answer that Question without Notice.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—SALE OF GLEBE LANDS, CO. KERRY.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the following letter addressed to tenants in Kerry who have purchased Glebelands:—

“ Irish Land Commission, “ Church Property Department.

“ You are hereby informed that, unless the amount claimed in the inclosed receivable form is paid within the time specified therein, the Commissioners will direct their solicitors to take legal proceedings to recover the amount due without any further notice.

“ By Order,

“ ———, Secretary.”

Whether this notice only allowed a month after date for the payment of the instalment, though in every other year since the purchase of their farms they were not called upon until the end of September to pay the instalment falling due on July 1st; and, whether it is true that, in the lands adjoining these farms in Kerry, the Sub-Commissioners have fixed judicial rents at 25 per cent under the amount of such annual instalment?

MR. TREVELYAN (who replied to the Question) said: I find, on inquiry from the Land Commissioners, that the receivable orders, issued to persons owing one instalment, due on 1st of July, allow in all cases three months (to the 30th of September) for payment. If two or more instalments are due one month only is given, and in such cases the notice referred to in the Question accompanies the receivable order. These regulations have been in force for 14 years, and legal proceedings are not taken unless it is found impossible to recover the instalments in any other way. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question, it appeared that there are about 38 persons scattered throughout different parts of the county of Kerry whose holdings were purchased from the Church Temporalities Commissioners—the purchase moneys being still outstanding on mortgage; and, unless further particulars be given, it is impossible to say what reductions, if any, have been made in the rents of tenants whose farms adjoin the properties of these persons.

POST OFFICE—THE GALWAY MAILS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will consider the necessity of accelerating the arrival of the English and other mails in Galway; whether such an acceleration could not be carried out by the starting at eight o'clock from the Broadstone Terminus of the train that now leaves at nine, by the reduction of the number of stoppages, and by the increase of the speed from 24 to 34 miles an hour; and, whether the Chairman of the Midland Great Western Railway Company has not declared his readiness to supply an accelerated mail service in the case the Post Office offer sufficiently remunerative terms?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member, I beg to say that an acceleration of the mails to Galway (such as that suggested in the Question) is quite feasible, but would involve the running of an additional train, and is, largely, a question of expense. I am in correspondence with the Midland Great Western Railway, and will come to a decision on the subject as quickly as possible.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Am I right in saying that for mail services, while the Great Southern and Western Railway Company receives £70 a-mile, and the Great Northern £90, the Midland Company receives only £40 a-mile?

MR. FAWCETT: It is impossible to draw any comparison between the mail service to Cork, which carries all the American mails, and the mail service to Galway and Sligo, which is comparatively light. The Companies are also paid in proportion to the pace of the trains.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any essential difference between the Great Northern Railway Company in this matter and the Midland Company; and has the right hon. Gentleman, in his communications with the Midland Company, offered them any improvement whatever on the present terms?

MR. FAWCETT: The Great Northern Company is going to start from Dublin at an earlier hour, and will arrive at Belfast earlier than now. The whole subject of the acceleration of the mails throughout Ireland generally is now being considered. It is a very complicated subject; but I am pushing it on as quickly as possible.

MR. SEXTON: Has the right hon. Gentleman offered any improvement in the terms to the Midland Company?

MR. FAWCETT: I find it rather difficult to answer that Question without notice. I have so many offers made to carry them in mind; but if the hon. Member will write to me I shall be happy to give him information.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—CASE OF FRANK STOCKWELL—SENTENCE ON A CHILD.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state the reason for remitting any portion of the sentence on a boy named Frank Stockwell, sentenced by Baron Pollock, at Reading, to a month's imprisonment, without hard labour, for setting fire to hay ricks?

SIR WILLIAM HAROOURT: As soon as I was aware that a child of seven years old had been imprisoned for a month, I wrote to the learned Judge, a most humane man, on the subject, and he said, in reply—"I shall feel very much pleased if you can do better for him than I could." Subsequently, I wrote to the Governor and the Chaplain of the prison to report to me specially upon the case. The Chaplain's Report has been received. He says—

"According to the Prison Rules, the boy was allowed one hour's school with other juveniles, if any; but there were none in the prison when Stockwell arrived. Subsequently, a boy of 14 years of age was sentenced to a month's imprisonment, so that the present class of juveniles consisted of two. But for the one hour's instruction the child has the rest of 24 hours in solitary confinement, except for most casual interruption. I am very decidedly of opinion that this is not morally healthy for the child. I gather from my own observation, and from the schoolmaster, that Stockwell is not sharp, but rather idle, and without any show of application, and, if anything, dull, and even apparently sullen, which, I take it, means that he feels strange in a strange place. He is not quick of speech, and also seems as if he knew what it was to be in fear of a scolding. I find nothing artful or vicious about him, I have studied him much, owing to the bad opinion held of him by the Vicar of the parish. I have talked to him quietly, and he has admitted he was sorry for what he did, and that he would be a better boy. I am quite sure the boy lighted the hay-rick to see how it would burn, but never dreamt of the probable consequence, and ran away frightened. I have a very strong opinion of the unsuitability of the prison for such a child, and I should greatly rejoice if it were thought better to give the boy a second birching and discharge him. Such a case as this is for home treatment."

Before this communication was received the child had been in prison—practically in solitary confinement—for nearly three weeks; and I do not think that anybody in this House will condemn my conduct when I decided that the best thing to do was to discharge the child. I wish those who pass sentences of this kind would remember what solitary confinement is as applied to a child of tender years. It is a most terrible—I think improper—punishment. I have known a case in which a child suffered so dreadfully from solitary confinement that the warder took him into his own house—a breach of prison discipline—which I had not the heart to condemn.

POOR LAW (METROPOLIS)—POLAND STREET WORKHOUSE—MR. BLISS.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Guardians of the Poland Street Workhouse of the Westminster Union have unanimously decided to suspend Mr. W. J. D. Bliss from the office of master of that workhouse; whether the Local Government Board have confirmed, or propose to confirm, that suspension; and, how soon their decision will be made known?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: It is true that the Guardians of the Westminster Union unanimously suspended Mr. Bliss from the office of Master of the Poland Street Workhouse. We have since communicated with Mr. Bliss and the Guardians on the subject; and on the 26th of this month we received from the Guardians their reply to the explanation which had been furnished by Mr. Bliss. That letter is now under our consideration, and we will very shortly inform the Guardians of our decision.

INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX—ASSESSMENTS UNDER SCHEDULE D.

MR. LEAHY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he is aware that it is the practice of Mr. Turner, surveyor of taxes at Tralee, and other surveyors in Ireland, to increase, year after year, the assessment for income tax on traders under Schedule D, without assigning any reason for so doing until appealed against, at very considerable trouble and expense to the trader; and, whether, when the assessment is once fixed, it can be so arbitrarily increased by those officers?

MR. COURTNEY: This Question only appeared on the Paper to-day. Assessments under Schedule D are only fixed for one year, and it is the duty of the surveyors to increase them if they appear to be insufficient, ample opportunity of appeal against such increase being given by law. If the hon. Member will communicate to me the particulars of any case of apparently arbitrary assessment at Tralee it shall be at once inquired into.

IRELAND—THE MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART, DUBLIN.

MR. MAURICE BROOKS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can say if some one of the architectural plans for the Science and Art Museum, Dublin, will be adopted before the Pro-rogation of Parliament?

MR. COURTNEY: I hope it may be possible to decide this matter before the House rises; but I can give no promise, as the decision depends, in part at least, on the result of certain valuations now being made.

MR. DAWSON: Seeing the great delay there is in getting a building up in Dublin, and seeing the promptness with which the First Commissioner of Works is going to proceed with the works at Westminster Hall, I would ask him whether he would not take the Irish Museum into his hands also?

EGYPT—THE MUDIR HUSSEIN WASIF.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has noticed the following statement, in a Despatch from Mr. Clifford Lloyd to Mr. Egerton, dated 11th May 1884:—

"In the early days of September 1883 a serious robbery had been committed in the Province of Garbieh. The mudir accordingly arrested about seventy persons of the locality, including many sheiks and other respectable persons. They were all put in prison, and tortured in the most barbarous manner. They were thumbscrewed, tied up to beams by their feet and by their fingers, and were kourbaished to such an extent that two unfortunate men were said to have died under the operation. It was with great difficulty that I succeeded in getting an English Officer, attached to the Ministry of the Interior, sent down to assist the mudir in the inquiry he was making. The result of this inquiry proved that there was no evidence of any description against any of the accused, but that many of them had been forced, under torture by the mudir's subordinates, to sign prepared confessions, implicating themselves and other prisoners in the robbery. I have but to add that it was only by calling for the support of our Government that I was able to obtain the removal of this mudir, who was

whether, in the original Despatch, the name of this mudir was suppressed; and, if not, why it is in the published Document; and, whether he can give the House some assurance that this official is no longer employed by the Egyptian Government either as a governor or as a mudir, or in any other capacity?

MR. HEALY, before this Question was answered, said, he would like to ask the noble Lord whether he was aware that there was no essential difference between the conduct of the Mudir and Mr. Clifford Lloyd's own conduct in Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not a proper Question to be asked.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The name of the Mudir referred to is not given in the original despatch; but the evidence shows him to have been Hussein Wasif Pasha, who, as I have already informed the House, is no longer in the employment of the Egyptian Government.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— ARREST OF MR. CHANCE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is he aware that Mr. Chance wholly denies the allegations of the policeman who arrested him, and declared that, on seeing Alice Carroll, he at once told her he was solicitor for Mr. O'Brien, M.P., and that he wanted her evidence about Bolton, and that he denies the statement about being sent by Mallon; and, will the Government grant an inquiry, sworn or otherwise, into the arrest, or rely solely on the policeman's version of the matter?

MR. TREVELYAN: This Question, the hon. Member knows, only appeared this morning; but I think I have an adequate answer to it. There are two ways in which a person in the position of a constable acting wrongly may be dealt with. He may be dealt with criminally, if the case comes within the law; or he may be dealt with by the Head of the Department by way of punishment or dismissal. In the present case, I am advised that the constable cannot be proceeded against criminally, and the other branch of the case is to be dealt with by the Chief Commissioner. Assuming that the constable was told by the Carrolls what he says he was told, I see no reason for holding that he acted otherwise than he ought. He had a most responsible duty to discharge, and I think he acted as he was in duty bound to act. If the arrest was unwarranted, and if Mr. Chance feels aggrieved, as I hear he does, he may take an action against the constable for unwarranted arrest, and so elicit the facts on oath.

MR. HEALY: If he takes such an action, will the Government defend him and pay his damages?

ITALY—CONFISCATION OF THE PROPAGANDA PROPERTY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has been informed of the resolutions of the Irish Catholic Hierarchy, against the confiscation of the Propaganda property in Italy; and, whether any communications, in reference to the Propaganda property, have been addressed by the British Government to the Government of Italy since questions on the subject were asked in this House three months ago?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not any particular cognizance of the resolutions to which the hon. Member refers; but I am aware that the Roman Catholic Hierarchy consider themselves and their Church materially aggrieved. That is the substantial part of the Question. With respect to the latter part of it, I have to say that the British Ambassador in Rome was directed, some time back, to make any representations to the Government of Italy which he could make with propriety and which might appear to be useful. He was also instructed to have some regard to what was done by the Representatives of the other Powers. The Ambassador has not seen any such opportunity; and I am informed that no Power has been in a position to make representations to the Italian Government on the subject.

MR. HEALY: May I ask whether the United States Congress did not pass Resolutions on the subject, and has not the Ambassador of the United States taken action, if no other Power has?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am really not aware what Resolutions the United States Congress passed; but if they did pass such a Resolution, it would not in any degree modify the statement I have made, which was with regard to representations of the Powers to the Italian Government.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice that on the Diplomatic Vote the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) will call further attention to this subject.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will now state to the House the nature of the financial proposals made by Her Majesty's Ministers to the Conference in order to pay the costs of the bombardment of Alexandria and the evacuation of the Soudan, and restore equilibrium to the Egyptian Budget?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has on this occasion done what he has done on some other occasions—he compels me to repeat an answer which I have given him formerly, and in regard to which I have no option. It would be a breach of understanding and a breach of faith with the Conference, independently of anything else, if any communication with regard to the proceedings within it were made during the time that Conference has its sitting. But I may take the opportunity which the Question of the hon. Gentleman affords me to say with much regret, and to my own disappointment and to that of the House, that the Conference which met to-day was informed by the French Ambassador that he was not in possession of sufficient instructions, and that he had to request a further adjournment until Saturday. To that request, under the circumstances, there could be but one answer; and perhaps I may say this—though I have no doubt it is a disappointment to the House to receive the intelligence—yet those who have paid attention to what has been passing in France within the last few days will be prepared for it—it will be seen that the French Cabinet has been placed in a peculiar position with regard to domestic concerns.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: In consequence of that answer I am obliged to ask the right hon. Gentleman what course he proposes to take with a view of giving the House an opportunity, before the Prorogation, of pronouncing an opinion on the proceedings of the Conference?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid, Sir, it would be premature if I were to endeavour to explain precisely the course of the proceedings we should adopt until the Conference shall arrive at a decision. We shall not lose a moment after that; but I am in the confident hope that the House will not be put to any practical inconvenience. We shall not lose a moment in telling the House both what the Conference has done, and likewise what we intend to do, with a view to redeeming the pledge which I gave the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Is the right hon. Gentleman in a position to say whether it is probable that he will have to submit a proposal to the House upon which its judgment will have to be taken?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I think it would not be advantageous to state what is probable or what is improbable, for it would probably be the cause of further disappointment.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: With regard to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that the reason for declining to answer my Question as to the financial proposals was that it would be a breach of faith with the Conference, I beg to ask him whether it is not the fact that out of the four main heads of the proposals now before the Powers, three—namely, that with regard to the evacuation by the British troops; that of the extra powers proposed to be given to the Debt Commissioners; and that with regard to the neutralization of Egypt and the Canal—have already been before this House; and whether he will explain what reasons exist for considering that the communication of the financial proposals to the House would be a greater breach of faith than the communication of the other proposals?

MR. GLADSTONE: The other proposals are not before the Conference. The financial proposals are.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I would ask the Prime Minister whether the House is to understand that the statement made by him, I think on the 23rd of June, that the proposals of the Government would be laid before the Powers, has not been carried out?

MR. GLADSTONE: Certainly they have been communicated to the Powers; but they have not been brought before the Conference, because the Conference is limited to the object which was described in the invitation.

MR. BOURKE: I should like to know whether any Papers will be laid on the Table at the same time as the right hon. Gentleman makes his Statement; because it would be perfectly impossible for the House to gain even a slight notion of the case from the statements of the right hon. Gentleman, however clear they may be. The right hon. Gentleman said the other day that by far the most important part of these negotiations had taken place in the Commission; and I think the right hon. Gentleman used the expression—"The chief labour with respect to this business has been performed by the Commission." Of course, the Papers with respect to the Commission are now ready. At any rate, they might be presented at a few days' notice; and I hope, therefore, the Foreign Office will be prepared with them at a very short Notice.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Can the right hon. Gentleman say that after the meeting on Saturday—that is to say, on Monday—he will be in a position to make a statement?

MR. GLADSTONE: All I can say is, that I hope it, and I expect it. I cannot go beyond that. With reference to what I said of the Commission, I did not say that the most important part of the labours was performed by the Commission—I think I said it was the most laborious, requiring time, and a great deal of hard work. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that any statement would be inadequate to the object in view that did not deal with the operations of the Commission. I cannot undertake to say what Papers will be presented; but, undoubtedly, Papers giving what Her Majesty's Government may think a full view of the case will be in readiness, and will be presented at once.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—MR. W. H. SMITH'S WATCH.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Sir, I do not see the Home Secretary in his place; but, as I see the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, perhaps he will be able to answer my Question. It is, Whether he has observed in the public Press to-day that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster lost his watch at a Conservative meeting last night; and, whether the Home Secretary will do his best to induce the police to take measures to prevent such an occurrence taking place again?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I did not suppose the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton would have thought it necessary to bring any question affecting myself personally before the House. If I had had any complaint to make against the police, or any application to make to the Government, I should have made it myself. But I wish to say that the circumstance to which the hon. Gentleman alludes did not occur at the meeting, but outside the meeting, where the hon. Gentleman's friends objected to my entering the meeting.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR.
CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government have come to any decision as to the future employment of Mr. Clifford Lloyd?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must appeal to the hon. Member to postpone this Question until Monday. I have only seen it this morning, and Lord Spencer is not in town.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY—
STANDING ORDER 425A.

MR. GLADSTONE, in whose name the following Notices of Motion stood on the Paper:—

"That, for the remainder of the Session, the Standing Order of the 27th November, 1882, relating to Notices on going into Committee of Supply on Monday and Thursday, be extended to Friday and Saturday," said: I wish to postpone my Motion until to-morrow, in order that we may acquaint ourselves more fully with the desire of the House upon the subject.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can say when the Diplomatic Vote will be taken; and, whether he will undertake that when it is taken it will be with Notice? It would be an immense convenience to a number of hon. Members if he could do so.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid that until I am able to make the communication to the House about the Conference, on which the course of Business will somewhat depend, it would be idle to give any undertaking about the date of taking the Diplomatic Vote.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I cannot see what connection there is between the Conference and the Diplomatic Vote.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Conference may lead to a statement, and a statement to a debate; for a Notice of Motion might be given asking the Government for the redemption of the pledge they have already made, and that might render it necessary to interrupt the course of Business.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The Prime Minister will not take the Diplomatic Vote without Notice?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir.

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS—VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

MR. BORLASE: I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the horrible smells in the "Aye" Lobby of this House to-day, and to the danger that must accrue to the Party therefrom?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The matter has nothing whatever to do with me. I understood, however, that the First Commissioner of Works had appointed a Committee to inquire into the subject, and I have not yet seen the Report of that Committee.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps I may be allowed to say, as Chairman of that Committee, that the Committee sat on two occasions and took evidence; but were not able to trace the cause of the nuisance. They have, however, requested further assistance to be given them in the Recess in order to trace the origin of these smells.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I may say that, although I have not seen the Report of the Committee, I have already instructed the Local Government Board to place Inspectors at the service of the Committee.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND)
BILL.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: In the absence of the hon. and learned Member for Stafford (Mr. M'Laren), I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he intends to proceed further this Session with the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Having regard to what passed in the discussion on Tuesday night, we could not hope, in the short period of this Session which remains, to pass this Bill through both Houses of Parliament; and, therefore, we are reluctantly obliged to abandon the intention of proceeding further with it now. [Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!]

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— MAJOR KITCHENER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the friendly tribes near Agig on the Red Sea have been massacred by Osman Digna's followers; and, whether Major Kitchener has gone to Dongola?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; it is not true that the friendly tribes have been massacred. Major Kitchener has gone to Dongola in order to open communications with the Kababish Arabs. If the hon. Member will refer to "Egypt, No. 25, 1884," page 113, he will find Papers on the subject.

INDIA — REVENUE SETTLEMENT DEPARTMENT—NATIVE APPOINTMENTS.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can inform the House what the answer was which was given to a Memorial or Letter forwarded by Mr. Rungiah Naider Garu in reference to the appointment of Messrs. Tarrant and Thornhill to offices in the Revenue Settlement Department, which offices the writer of the Memorial is said to contend are by the terms of the Royal Proclamation confined to Indian Natives; and, whether it is the case that the noble Lord, the former Secretary of State for India, desired that such infractions of the Proclamation should be pointed out to him?

MR. J. K. CROSS: On the 9th of June I informed the hon. Member for Cavan County (Mr. Biggar) that Mr. Garu's letter had been returned to him for submission through the Government of Madras, in accordance with fixed rules. The Secretary of State in Council has disallowed the appointments of Messrs. Tarrant and Thornhill, which were made by the Madras Government, subject to the sanction of the Secretary of State. Natives of India have no exclusive right to such appointments in the Revenue Settlement Department, nor is there any Royal Proclamation to that effect.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. SEXTON said, he wished, in a few words, to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to a case which had been under the notice of the Irish Executive Government for the last six months, but in regard to which it had been found impossible to extract from them, up to the present moment, any other than a formal answer. He referred to the case of a man called Brian Kilmartin, who was now undergoing penal servitude for life at Chatham. The facts of the case were these. On the 5th of April, 1882, a land bailiff, named Kernaghan, was shot at, at 10 o'clock at night, on the Island of Arran, in the county of Galway. The year previously the same bailiff had been shot at, and a man named Varney was accused of the crime, and put on his trial; but, although the bailiff Kernaghan positively swore that Varney committed the offence, the jury acquitted him. On the 5th of April, 1882, this bailiff was shot at a second time, and, on his information, Brian Kilmartin was arrested, and lodged in gaol. He had been placed upon his trial in the month of December at the Winter Assizes at Sligo, and, on the unsupported evidence of Kernaghan, he was found guilty, and sentenced to penal servitude for life. He must go back now to what happened in the month of May, 1882. A young man named Thomas Gauly, between whom and Kilmartin there was a strong personal resemblance, and who resided on the Island of Arran with his mother, was evicted by Kernaghan. He suddenly fled from the Island and went to America, without telling his friends anything of his intention. He lived at Boston for a year, at the end of which time he died. On his death-bed he sent for a Roman Catholic clergyman, the Rev. Father Curran; and a little before his death, under the tremendous sanction of the last Sacrament, he confessed that he was the man who shot the bailiff Kernaghan, and that he was the man who had committed the crime for which Brian Kilmartin was now undergoing his sentence of penal servitude for life. Father Curran reported the matter to his ecclesiastical Chief, the Archbishop of Boston, at whose recommendation Father Curran lodged an affidavit, embodying the facts, with the British Vice Consul. The Committee had, therefore, these three facts—first, the statement of the doctor who attended the young man Gauly; secondly, a certificate of his death and burial; and, thirdly, the affidavit from the Rev. Father Curran that a man, in confession, had made a statement that he was the person who had fired the shot. There was also a certificate from the Archbishop of Boston that Father Curran was duly ordained, and that any statement he made was worthy of complete belief. These documents fully established the guilt of Gauly, and the innocence of Kilmartin. Several months ago he (Mr. Sexton) had called attention to the case at the instance of the Rev. Father O'Donoghue, the parish priest of the Island of Arran, who was thoroughly convinced that Gauly was the man who fired the shot; that the man now undergoing penal servitude had nothing to do with the matter; but that it was a clear case of mistaken identity. He had frequently applied to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to know what was to be done; but, up to the present, he had failed to receive anything beyond a formal answer. He thought that was a favourable opportunity for extracting from the Government a statement of their intentions; and he would impress upon the Committee that there were two points which went a long way towards establishing Kilmartin's innocence. In the first place, the bailiff Kernaghan must have been a person with a very defective power of identification; because, having been fired at on a previous occasion, he fully identified a particular person as the man who fired at him; but the man was unanimously acquitted by the jury. The time at which the shot was fired was 10 o'clock on a very dark night, when the identification of the assailant must have been a matter of difficulty, if not of impossibility. There was a further fact, that the man Gauly fled from the Island soon after the arrest of Kilmartin; that he was a man who, in his personal appearance, strongly resembled Kilmartin; and that he, together with his wife and mother, had been evicted from their farm by this very bailiff. Further, there was conclusive evidence that he had confessed his guilt to the Roman Catholic clergyman who attended him, and who administered to him the last rites of the Church. He (Mr. Sexton) had never heard a more conclusive case; and he asked the right hon. Gentleman to inform the Committee what he proposed to do with regard to it.

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) has given an account of the additional documents with perfect accuracy, so far as Gauly's confession, which was made some little time before his death, is concerned; and I am also ready to admit that the hon. Member has not spoken too highly of the character of the Rev. Father Curran, who is a gentleman beyond all suspicion; but I am, nevertheless, obliged to give an unfavourable answer to the appeal which has been made to me. The case has been very carefully gone through, as is necessary when the only fresh element in the matter is a declaration of guilt, unsupported by other circumstances on the part of a person who has not been tried. It must be quite clear to hon. Members that the mere fact of the confession is not sufficient to absolve a person who has had a regular trial, because it is a very common thing for persons to charge themselves with crime. [Mr. SEXTON: On their death bed?] Such a thing is not unknown at all. Persons have been known to charge themselves with crimes even upon their death bed, especially in cases where it is possible that the person who made the declaration may not have regarded the act as highly criminal, and where his feeling for the person who had been condemned on account of such act was a feeling of genuine sympathy and pity, and not impossibility of admiration. That being so, it was necessary to go into the case very carefully, and to see what bearing this declaration of Gauly's had on the evidence. The case was carefully gone into by the Judge who tried it. All the papers were sent to the Chief Secretary, whose sole function it is to represent the mercy of the Crown, and the power which the Crown has of re-trying the case. [Mr. SEXTON: Who was the Judge who tried it?] Judge Lawson. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Irish Members.] Yes; Judge Lawson, than whom, I must say, there is no abler nor juster Judge. The Lord Lieutenant went carefully into the case himself; and as an application had been made to me in this House, and as it was not improbable that the question would come before the House upon the Estimates, His Excellency submitted the papers to me, and I studied them with great care. I may say that I entirely concur with the judgment of His Excellency and of Judge Lawson that the case stands quite complete, and separate from the confession of Gauly, and that that confession does not shake the case as it stands in the very least particular. I regret very much that this decision has been come to; but we have felt ourselves bound to arrive at it; and I do not consider that the House of Commons is a place where cases can be tried over again. I cannot, in the least, concur in the opinion of the hon. Member that the evidence of the bailiff was unsupported. I think it was supported by very material testimony indeed. I repeat that I am sorry His Excellency had to arrive at this decision; but I believe he could arrive at no other.

Mr. SEXTON was bound to say that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was very different from that which he had a right to expect. It was extremely disappointing in its result, and very extraordinary in its substance; and if the right hon. Gentleman had given such careful and exhaustive study to the case, he might have spoken for five minutes longer at the Table for the purpose of informing the Committee what the points were which had induced the Government to arrive at that decision. The right hon. Gentleman said that the identification of this unfortunate man by Kernaghan, the bailiff, was not unsupported; but he had not told the Committee how it was supported. His (Mr. Sexton's) opinion was that in the essential facts of the identification the evidence of the bailiff, Kernaghan, stood alone. On a previous occasion, the same man, having been shot at, fully identified a man named Varney as his assailant; but the identification was so weak, and so little worthy of credence, that, although the bailiff swore positively, and the jury had both men before them, one in the dock and the other in the witness-box, they unanimously gave a verdict of acquittal. How did the right hon. Gentleman explain that fact? There was another fact; this youth Gauly, who died in Boston, had been evicted from his farm, together with his mother, a few months before the bailiff was fired at, and evicted, too, at the hands of this very individual. There they had evidence of motive in regard to the man who confessed his guilt. It was not asserted that Kilmartin, or any member of his family, ever suffered any wrong at the hands of Kernaghan; whereas, on the other hand, the man Gauly had sustained a grievous wrong at the hands of the bailiff. How did the right hon. Gentleman deal with the sudden flight of Gauly? There was no doubt that Gauly had suddenly fled from the country, without informing his family or his friends where he was going. Then, again, was it denied that there was a strong physical resemblance between the youth Gauly, who fled to America, and the man Kilmartin, now lying in Chatham Gaol? Was it denied that the attack took place at 10 o'clock on a dark night, when even the sharpest man might very well have been mistaken? The right hon. Gentleman had said that it was common for persons, who were ill or dying, from motives of sympathy, or admiration for prisoners who were found guilty of crime, to make statements which were untrue. He thought that such a case would be heard of very rarely indeed; and would anybody who was acquainted with the Catholic religion, who knew that a man on the point of death, confessing to his priest under the sacred seal of the Sacrament, the most solemn and awful ceremony known to persons who professed the Roman Catholic faith—would anybody tell him that a man, under such circumstances, would be prepared to enter eternity, and appear before his Maker with a falsehood upon his lips, or that he would accuse himself of a crime which he had not committed, necessarily believing that such an accusation would condemn him to eternal damnation? Any man who was acquainted with the forms of the Catholic religion must be of opinion that the confession made to Father Curran was a sincere and honest confession of guilt, and must be driven to the conclusion that the youth Gauly, who died in Boston, was the man who fired the shot, and not the unfortunate man who was now undergoing penal servitude for life. On considering the whole of the evidence, documentary and otherwise, only one conclusion could be arrived at.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT confessed that he had heard the reply of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary with regret. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to imply that there could be any doubt as to the facts. This was the first he had heard of the case; but, from the statements which had been made, it certainly appeared to him far more probable that the man Kilmartin was not guilty of the crime. The probability was extremely strong that a confession made upon a death-bed was a true confession; and he therefore hoped that the case might not be ended in that House, but that there might yet be some fresh inquiry. It was not very long ago that in England a man imprisoned for murder was released from imprisonment upon the confession of a man named Peace, who was himself of notoriously bad character and a convicted murderer. The case was inquired into, and Peace's confession was accepted. In this case the doubt was in favour of the prisoner; and if there were to be an error at all, it was far better that it should not be on the side of keeping an innocent man in prison.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he hoped that the Government would take up the matter seriously. He had no doubt in his own mind that the man now in prison under a sentence of penal servitude for life was as innocent of firing at, and attempting to murder the bailiff, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary himself. He had not the slightest hesitation in saying that all the circumstances, apart from any case of proof accepted at the trial, showed that the man who had since then accused himself must probably have been guilty of the crime which he confessed; whereas there was no evidence whatever, except the identification by the bailiff, to criminate the man who had been convicted. There was prima facie evidence that the man who made the confession was guilty, and not the man who was in gaol. He had had a good deal of experience from time to time in regard to this class of confession—statements made to priests and others by persons on the point of death. He knew perfectly well that the greatest solemnity prevailed on such occasions, and it was absurd to present to him the idea that a Catholic would have confessed to his priest that he had been guilty of an attempt to murder an individual, for which another person was suffering at the time, if he was altogether innocent, or that he would have died leaving his spiritual adviser under that impression. The impression conveyed to his mind was that it was much more likely the jury and Judge Lawson were wrong. To ask him to believe that a true case had been put forward on the trial of Kilmartin, or that the verdict of the jury was right, when upon his death-bed, or immediately before it, the man Gauly had confessed to his priest and spiritual adviser, under the seal of the Sacrament, that he was the guilty person, was perfectly absurd. He ventured to say that there was no place outside the House of Commons where a confession, under such circumstances, would not be received as the truth. He hoped the matter would not be lost sight of for a moment by Her Majesty's Government. He was not in the habit of mixing in disputes of this kind, or even of speaking in the House on subjects upon which he had no strong feeling; but he was prepared to say deliberately—although, of course, his assertion might be taken for what it was worth—that having had great experience in cases of this kind, he was as convinced as he was of his own existence that the individual now under sentence of penal servitude for life was a perfectly innocent man, and that the man who had accused himself was the only guilty man in the matter.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to express all possible respect for the religious feelings of hon. Members who professed the Roman Catholic faith. It was well known that he was opposed to the policy of the Church of Rome; but no man ever heard him express any disrespect for the religious feelings of hon. Members belonging to that Church. But, as an English Member—the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright)—had taken the same view as hon. Members from Ireland who had spoken, he (Mr. Newdegate) wished, as an English Member, to express his sincere hope that the House would not attempt to arrogate to itself the privilege of pardon which was vested in the Crown. Let the Minister of the Crown exercise that privilege, and be responsible to the country for the exercise of it; but he deprecated most sincerely the idea of the House arrogating to itself functions superior to those of a Court of Law. He had himself, under the Act of 1866, been subjected to pecuniary penalties for prosecuting a person who arrogated to himself the right to sit in that House until he had gone through the forms prescribed by law. He lamented that circumstance, and, perhaps, it had no bearing upon the present case. This was a case in which the Crown had exercised an undoubted discretion vested in itself, and in its immediate advisers; and that which he deprecated was that the House should attempt to constitute itself a superior tribunal, not only to the Courts of Law, but superior to the Crown, so far as the privileges of the Crown were concerned. He maintained that if the House of Commons was to lend itself to either of those courses it would be distinctly violating the fundamental terms of the Constitution, and it was upon that ground, and because he held that the Minister of the Crown was sufficiently responsible, that he could see no reason why the House should incur the danger of a just imputation of transgressing and invading the functions and the duties of another Estate of the Realm.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the position taken by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was not that which was taken up by the Chief Secretary. On the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman went into the merits of the case. He would further remind the hon. Member that the Irish Members were not attempting to interfere with the exercise of the mercy of the Crown. They had no power to do so, even if they felt inclined, and they were only calling upon the Crown to exercise that mercy. With regard to the general principle, it was one of the platitudes of Parliament that Parliament was not a Court of Appeal. It was a platitude which had no meaning except in the mind of the hon. Member. It was one of the highest functions of that House to represent every grievance of every subject of Her Majesty throughout the Realm, and it was the right of every Member to ventilate those grievances and see them redressed. If any hon. Member was conscious of any injustice done by a Court of Law, it was his duty to bring it before Parliament as a high Court of Appeal. The platitudes of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had now been as often repeated as the celebrated illustration of King Charles's head by Mr. Dick, which was so familiar to everybody. Parliament was the highest Court of Appeal in the Realm, and every Member had a right to bring any case of grievance into that Court of Appeal. He had been much surprised at the answer of the Chief Secretary, and his surprise was not unmixed with indignation, although the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was characteristic of the whole attitude of the Government with regard to the administration of justice in Ireland. It was a mistake to substitute the blind fury of revenge for the calm strength of men who were anxious to govern in accordance with justice. The Chief Secretary, as a literary man, and accustomed to write about various matters, might be supposed to have something of a sympathetic nature; but he had noticed that whenever the Chief Secretary spoke about the religious feelings of the Irish people he invariably introduced something that was absurdly and grotesquely wrong. There was not a man who had any knowledge of the feeling of the Irish people who did not know that a man on the brink of the grave, receiving the last Sacrament, and being on the point of death, would not be prepared to perjure himself. He maintained that such an assertion was so grotesque as to be almost beyond the bounds of imagination. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would pay attention to these remarks. [Mr. TREVELYAN: I am doing so.] The right hon. Gentleman must be even an abler man than he gave him credit for if he was able to pay attention to the debate and carry on a conversation at the same time. What he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) asserted was, that anybody who had any acquaintance with the feelings of the Irish Catholics would be prepared to say that it was not within the bounds of reason and probability that a man who was receiving the last Sacrament would be guilty of an atrocious lie, and perjure himself by confessing a crime of which he was innocent. He challenged the hon. and learned Solicitor General, now seated beside the right hon. Gentleman, who, although not a Catholic, knew something about Ireland and Irish Catholics—he challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to get up and say he agreed with the Chief Secretary that it was at all probable an Irish Catholic, receiving the last Sacrament, and within a few hours of his death, would pledge himself to what he knew to be a wilful lie. That was a deliberate challenge. Such an assumption could only show the grotesque ignorance of the man who made it in regard to the feelings of the Irish people. If the right hon. Gentleman were speaking of the religious feelings or sentiments of the Hindoos or Mahomedans of India, among whom he had spent some years of his life, he would not have been guilty of so great a misrepresentation. He saw another right hon. Gentleman upon the Front Opposition Bench, who was in Ireland once as Chief Secretary (Sir Robert Peel). He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to get up and say whether he agreed with the Chief Secretary that an Irish Catholic, within a few minutes of his death, would receive the Sacrament of penance and forgiveness for all his sins, and then would add to his soul the sin of a lie on his death bed? Would the hon. and learned Solicitor General, or the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), deny that they had in this case, besides a confession made under solemn and convincing surroundings, a motive on the part of the man who confessed the crime. In the second place, there was the case of the man, which went to prove the truth of his story as well as his own confession. He had absconded from the Island almost immediately after the crime was committed, and there was evidence that before doing so he made no communication with his relatives or friends. In the third place, there was the fact that, in addition to the confession, the man who was convicted bore a strong resemblance to the man who confessed, and the fact that Gaully ran away in the interval between the arrest of Kilmartin and the trial was a strong additional testimony of the consciousness in his mind that he was guilty. They had the fact that the men resembled each other, the further fact that the crime was committed in a dark hour of the night, that the identification was confined to one witness, and that he was a witness so weak on the question of identification that on a previous occasion his evidence against the person whom he accused of a similar crime was disbelieved by the jury. He would venture to say that there was not a single Member of that House who had listened to the case who did not consider that the Chief Secretary's attitude in this matter was shameful to the Administration of which he was a Member. He knew that a great deal of crime had been committed in Ireland between the years 1882 and 1883. He deplored the fever of crime which had taken place; but it ought to be remembered that, as had happened in France, the red terror had been succeeded by a white terror equally terrible, so in Ireland the red terror had been succeeded by a white terror, and there was not a man who did not believe that Her Majesty's Government were now retaining in penal servitude a man who was wholly innocent of the crime imputed to him.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: In dealing with a matter of this kind, it certainly requires the calmest exercise of judicial faculties, and I hope that it will not be approached in the spirit of the speech to which we have just listened. We are, however, used to the violent and abusive language in which the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has indulged.

Mr. HEALY: Sir Arthur Otway, I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the expression which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has used is in Order? The right hon. and learned Gentleman has spoken of the violent and abusive language of my hon. Friend.

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say that the words used by the right hon. and learned Gentleman are out of Order. I have often heard language to the same effect used in this House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I should like to know what hon. Members opposite would say if I applied the epithet "shameful" to them, as the hon. Member has applied to the conduct of my right hon. Friend? He has distinctly charged my right hon. Friend and the Government of Ireland with exercising a white terror. Probably the hon. Member does not consider that violent and abusive language. I do; and I say that habitually the language used by the hon. Member, and by hon. Members sitting by him, towards my right hon. Friend is violent, abusive, and most unjustifiable. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Irish Members.] Well, that is my opinion. I dare say that hon. Members opposite do not share it. I am quite as much against white terror as hon. Members opposite; and I am glad to hear, for the first time, that they do not approve of red terror. At the same time, I must say that I have heard very little from those hon. Gentlemen in denouncing red terror since I have been in Office. I can only say that this is not the spirit in which a question of this kind is to be approached. It is a very serious thing to reconsider, in a matter of this description, the deliberate decision of a Judicial Tribunal. I say, in spite of what has been affirmed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, whether it be the Irish Government, or whether it be the English Government, there is no duty they undertake with a graver sense of responsibility than that of revising or inquiring into the sentences passed by the Judges. Although, of course, I do not deny for a moment the right of any Member of Parliament to bring forward a matter of this kind, still I assert that it is most inconvenient, and almost impossible, for this House, upon ex parte statements, or even upon an argument upon the case, to arrive at any proper decision upon the matter. Now, I have every day to deal with such matters, and I can assure hon. Gentlemen that if they were to attempt to discuss the questions I have every day to deal with, days would not suffice for discussing and arguing, in a public Assembly, the various points which are raised in a string of questions of this kind. What is the present case? As I understand it, a man has been convicted upon evidence which, apart from this confession, has never been challenged. Nobody says that the evidence given at the trial was not such as might well have satisfied the jury; and if it satisfied the jury, then the sentence was justified.

Mr. SEXTON: We impeach the evidence of the bailiff, which was the sole evidence in the case, on the ground that his previously sworn evidence, in identification of a man alleged to have committed a similar crime, was not believed by the jury, and the prisoner was acquitted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member may impeach the evidence; but surely, in such a case, the evidence of the man who was shot at was very strong evidence. What is now wanted is to get in the confession of another person, who says that he committed the crime. It is supposed, apparently, that the confession of this man is an unexamined and conclusive case. Now, instances of confessions of this character, entirely unfounded, are very numerous.

Mr. SEXTON: No.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member chooses to say "No." I, who have to deal with these matters, say "Yes."

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN: Were they dying declarations?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: On the whole, I should say that dying declarations are a great deal more suspicious than other confessions. ["Oh!"] Really, if hon. Members opposite will only be calm and patient, and hear what I have to say, they will have ample opportunity by-and-bye of replying to me. The man who is dying has nothing to suffer in this world, at all events. ["Oh!"] If hon. Members opposite wish the matter to be discussed, they are pursuing a very improper method of disposing of a question of this kind. I am only endeavouring to say what my experience of cases of this kind—cases in which there has been no question of Party sentiment, or religious prejudice—has been. It would, however, be entirely ridiculous to discuss the question on the basis on which the hon. Gentleman has put it—that the declarations of Irish Catholics are to be treated otherwise than those of English Protestants. I regard the one with neither more nor less favour than the other; but we are bound to pay respect to all the circumstances which surround it. In the first place, the confession of a man that he has committed a crime, for which another man has been convicted and punished, is a very serious matter indeed. No doubt, such a confession throws a grave prima facie doubt upon the conviction. But it is not, and ought not to be, regarded as conclusive. It is nothing of the kind. There are great temptations, under certain circumstances, to make a confession of that character. I have known several cases of confessions made by men under such circumstances.

MR. SEXTON: Dying confessions?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have answered the word "dying" already. I say that dying confessions are not to be regarded differently from a confession made by a man who is not dying, because the man who is dying has nothing to fear, so far, at least, as this world is concerned. Dying confessions are most of all suspicious on occasions of this kind. I have known how confessions have sometimes been made. It may have been that the man who confessed had already received penal servitude for life, and he would know that he had no more favour to expect; but he thinks that he can benefit a friend by making a confession of this kind. Such declarations have been made from time to time, and I have had to examine them, and I have found them totally unfounded. Hon. Members would be astonished if they knew, as well as I do, the circumstances under which confessions of this kind have been made. The motive is not difficult to conjecture. The man knows that he has nothing to suffer in making such a confession. He is already beyond the reach of justice; and if under a sentence, for instance, of death, he knows that he has nothing more to fear. He wants no protection against the consequence of making a false confession. Therefore, I say, having had a considerable amount of experience in matters of this kind, that they must all of them be carefully examined. No doubt a confession arouses a strong presumption, in the first instance, against the sentence. It, therefore, becomes necessary to inquire into the whole facts of the case, and see whether the circumstances of the case itself corroborate the confession. I have had to consider cases in which the surrounding circumstances have corroborated the confession, and the man who has been innocently convicted has been pardoned. But there have been cases of true confession, and cases of false confession; and it has required the most careful judgment and the most anxious exercise of the judicial faculty to determine to which of the two classes of cases the confession belongs. It can only be done by a very careful and impartial examination, and by considering the confession together with all the facts which led to the conviction. If it were once assumed that those charged with the duty did not bring to the performance of the task those qualities which are necessary to its performance, the assumption would condemn the system of administering the prerogative of mercy. It has been found that the administration of the prerogative of mercy can only be effectually discharged by leaving it in a very few hands. We cannot dispose of matters of this kind by a debate—even if it be most calmly and carefully conducted—in a popular Assembly. We could not hope to arrive at a fair and just conclusion upon it without a most laborious comparison of particulars in each individual case. I believe Earl Spencer will not deliberately refuse to give weight to the important circumstances of a confession of this character. Indeed, if it were believed that Earl Spencer would not examine into the surrounding circumstances of the case, there would be no use in arguing the matter further. If, on the other hand, hon. Members opposite are disposed, as I believe the majority of this House will be disposed, to entrust the Executive Government with the discharge of this duty, and to leave the matter within their responsibility, then I believe the House will be of opinion that, however right it may have been to call attention to such a case, the ultimate judgment must rest with those who alone are capable of forming a judgment upon it.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that as the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had referred to him he should like to say a word upon the subject. The Home Secretary had commenced his remarks by saying that it was necessary to approach the subject in a calm and judicial spirit, and then he proceeded to point out that his experience upon the subject gave him a vast superiority over any other man in the House. From that point the right hon. and learned Gentleman, instead of approaching the question in the calm and judicial spirit he had suggested, proceeded to use language towards the Irish Members, which, if it had been used against the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Government, would have been received with a torrent of disapprobation. Now, any hon. Member who had sat in the House during the last three months must have heard cases submitted to the House which had certainly startled English Members. He did not shrink from that declaration. The hon. Gentleman had talked about white terror. There could be no doubt whatever that the system of Government in Ireland at this moment, and during the last three years, had been most repugnant to English feeling; and what must it be to the Irish people? [A laugh.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary sneered and laughed at his remark; he was in the habit of doing so; but it would not have the least effect upon him (Sir Robert Peel), nor would it prevent him from saying what he was entitled to say in that House. He would only take this one case which had been brought under the attention of the House of Commons. He knew the difficulties which his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary had to contend against. No doubt he had to deal with difficult cases day by day, and he admired the admirable way in which the right hon. Gentleman had dealt with them, and the tact and temper which he had displayed. He had told the right hon. Gentleman so himself on more than one occasion; but here was a case where the hon.

Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) told them that a person whom he believed to have been really guilty, on escaping to America and dying abroad, confessed that he was guilty of the commission of a particular crime. Upon his death bed, in the presence of a Roman Catholic priest, this man declared that he was the person who committed the crime, and that it was not the person who had been convicted in Ireland. His right hon. Friend, nevertheless, said that he attached no weight or trust to such a death-bed confession. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said that in regard to death-bed confessions he would have attached just as much weight to that of a Protestant as that of a Catholic. Now, he (Sir Robert Peel) had had some experience of Ireland and the Irish people many years ago; and he was bound to say that in his humble judgment, if a Roman Catholic upon his death bed, and in the presence of his priest, were to make a declaration that he himself had unhappily committed a crime for which another had been convicted, he (Sir Robert Peel) would be far more inclined—and he said it as a Protestant—to place weight and confidence in the statement of that man, than he would be in a similar declaration made by a Protestant. He had lived for years in Catholic countries, and he firmly believed, if this man Gauly made the statement in question to a priest in the hope of receiving absolution after having escaped from Ireland in consequence of an attempt to commit murder, that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, would do well to consider whether it might not be necessary, not, as his hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) said, to refrain from interference, but for the House of Commons to take the matter into their own hands. They did not seek to take from the Government the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, nor the faculty which rested in the Crown of granting pardon. This was the case of a man sentenced to penal servitude for life, and he thought the House of Commons might well express an opinion upon the subject. He hoped the hon. and learned Solicitor General would address the Committee in a very different spirit from that in which the Home Secretary, who always had his sneers and his flouts whenever anybody differed from him, had addressed it, and that he would address himself to the point which had been submitted from the Irish Benches—namely, that the Government should exercise the power they had of inducing the Sovereign of the country to consider a question which in the Irish mind was entitled to consideration, and grant to this unhappy man a pardon.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that a case had occurred not long ago in Manchester in which an Irishman was convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for life on a charge of murder—namely, shooting a policeman. Afterwards, a man named Peace was tried for another murder, condemned, and subsequently hung for it; and that man confessed that he had committed the murder for which the Irishman had been sentenced to penal servitude. Upon that confession, of which there was no corroboration or anything else, the Government pardoned the man under sentence of penal servitude, and even compensated him for the sufferings he had undergone. Surely this was a similar case, if it was anything at all, of mistaken identity. Did anybody in that House mean to say for a moment that the identification by the bailiff who had sworn to the man was so undoubted that it might not be a case of mistaken identity? It was not a case of political dispute, but something more—namely, of human life; because the case of a human being kept during the whole period of his life in slavery—for penal servitude was slavery—was surely worthy of something more than an answer stating that there had been a comparison of papers by lawyers, and a balance of probability without any evidence whatever. Would it be too much for a rich country like this to send over to the priest at Boston, to the doctor who attended Gaully, and to the others who were acquainted with the facts of the case? It would be remembered that for the murder of a policeman in the attack on a police van at Manchester, several persons were convicted, including a man named Maguire, who was found guilty and sentenced to be hung. It happened that he (Sir Edward Watkin) was on intimate terms with one of the Judges who tried the case, and he saw that Judge off from the Manchester railway station on his way to London. He remarked to the learned Judge, having heard the evidence in Court, that he did not believe the man Maguire was guilty. The Judge—it was Sir John Mellor—said that he himself had the gravest doubt upon the subject, and that he would require more conclusive evidence than had yet been given to convince him that Maguire was one of the persons who had murdered the policeman. The learned Judge further said that he intended to write to the Home Secretary upon the subject. By following up all the circumstances, it was afterwards proved to absolute demonstration that it was impossible for the man Maguire to have been in the Manchester Road on the day the policeman was murdered; and on the Report of the Judge that he had grave doubts in his own mind, and on the new evidence obtained, the man was ultimately pardoned, and through the kindness of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then Secretary to the Admiralty, was reinstated in the ranks of the Marines, to which he had formerly belonged, and, he believed, had been compensated for the sufferings he had undergone. He mentioned that as a case which had occurred within his own knowledge; and he would ask, in the present case, was it too much for this country, instead of balancing probabilities on documentary evidence, to send to the priest and the doctor in Boston in justice to a man who would otherwise be doomed to a life of slavery?

MR. TREVELYAN: I think the very few observations which I made early in the debate have been quite justified by what has occurred since. The discussion has shown how inconvenient it is to try a case of this kind over again in the House of Commons; for the hon. Member who has just spoken practically tried this case over again, not from any new evidence he has brought forward in regard to the case itself, but upon an argument in connection with a case that occurred in Manchester some years ago, in which it was shown that there had been a case of mistaken identity. He, therefore, contends that there may have been a similar case of mistaken identity here. That only shows how extremely inconvenient it is to argue a case of this sort in a popular Assembly, and, above all, to argue it without Notice of the intention to discuss it. In a matter of this extreme importance, it certainly would have been well if the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), being determined to take a course which I must say I deprecate, had given Notice of his intention.

Mr. SEXTON: The case has only just been brought before me; but I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that he has had six months to give an answer to the representations made to him.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I do not know what the date was when the case was first brought to my notice; and as a matter of fact, in answering the appeal of the hon. Member for Sligo, I purposely abstained from entering into the facts of the case, because I think we should, as far as possible, recognize the principle that the question of dispensing the mercy of the Crown should not become a matter of debate in this House. But this debate has now gone on for some time, and statements have been made by hon. Members opposite, on the full faith that they are correct, which have been accepted by other hon. Members chiefly sitting on this side of the House, and by the right hon. Baronet opposite the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel). Those statements have been accepted as premises from which to argue the case; and, therefore, I may say that when I remarked that this bald statement on the part of the poor man Gauly that he had committed the crime—a statement made without any circumstances whatsoever, that had any bearing on the trial, I spoke with a full knowledge of what the circumstances of the trial were. Now, the hon. Member for Sligo says that the case rests upon the unsupported evidence of the bailiff who identified Kilmartin as the man who fired at him. In the first place, the identification of a person who has attempted to commit a murder, or has committed a murder, is not in itself necessary. Frequently a man has been punished for committing a murder who has not been actually seen in the act of committing it. But here you have, at any rate, the man who was fired at stating that he did identify his assailant. Nor is it the case, as the hon. Member for Sligo has been informed, that Kilmartin is a man who might easily be confused with Gauly. Kilmartin, judging from the evidence in the papers, and I am not going to put forward any point which I have not absolutely ascertained—Kilmartin was a very remarkable looking man indeed, and that fact strongly weighed upon the mind of Judge Lawson in coming to his decision, and also upon Earl Spencer in accepting Judge Lawson's decision. In the next place, besides the direct identification, there was a considerable amount of strong corroborative evidence. A perfectly reliable witness had seen Kilmartin in what he called his stocking feet or "pouchette," which meant that he had no boots on. Now, the marks of stockinged feet answering to those which would have been made by Kilmartin were traced from the scene of the murder to Kilmartin's house. That is a piece of evidence of which I have a clear recollection, although there is a great deal more, of an important nature, which I do not remember. Then, again, Kilmartin's house was searched, and some extremely suspicious things were found there, or on the immediate premises. I remember that, among other things, a cartridge and a mask were found. Recollect that I am not trying the case; but I am merely giving a few of the strong points which remain in my mind to show that there was a great deal of corroborative testimony. Against this evidence there is the single statement of the man Gauly that he committed the murder, and nothing else.

Mr. SEXTON: It was not a murder, only an attempted murder.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I mean the attempted murder. The only corroboration of that statement is that Gauly had fled from the country, and might have had a motive for committing the crime. It is very difficult to unravel these crimes; but to say the least it was possible, when we remember what the machinery of crime has been in Ireland, that there may have been men who have been selected as the instruments of crime, and it may have been the case, in this as in other crimes in Ireland, that a man had been selected who may have had no special quarrel with the person sought to be injured. With regard to the declaration made by Gauly, I must say that I do not think it showed any ignorance of Ireland on my part to have said, or now to repeat the observation, that there are men there, perhaps many men, who would regard a person who committed a crime that would be called a political crime, as, indeed, I have heard crimes called in this House—who would regard a person of that sort with sympathy, with pity, and even with admiration, and would feel that he was doing a justifiable act in accusing himself in order to get that person off. I hope hon. Members will not jump at the conclusion that I am saying anything offensive. I state it as a matter of fact, quite apart from the religious question. Putting the religious question aside, I believe that a man who, like Gauly, is said by hon. Members opposite to be a murderer in intention would be capable, from motives of sympathy and admiration for a man accused of a crime of this description, of making a false statement that he had committed the crime. The Irish Government, by the light thrown upon the evidence by the confession of Gauly, on considering Gauly's declaration, have come to the conclusion that it does not in the least degree shake the evidence that whatever knowledge Gauly might have had of the crime, Kilmartin committed it, or took part in it. I may say, however, if it will be satisfactory to hon. Members opposite, that the Government have no objection to send an adept to the spot in order to make special inquiries about Gauly; but I am satisfied that anyone who is accustomed to investigate criminal charges upon similar evidence to that on which Kilmartin was convicted, and who afterwards saw Gauly's confession, would come to the conclusion that Gauly's confession has not in one whit shaken the strength of the evidence which convicted Kilmartin. I purposely abstain from answering further the observations of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor).

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the suggestion which the Chief Secretary had thrown out was a most remarkable one. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that a man, on his death bed, just before going into the presence of his Maker, at the moment of accomplishing the most solemn act of the Roman Catholic religion—more solemn, perhaps, than a Protestant could realize—had, for what might be called the sake of glorification, accused himself of a crime of which he was entirely guiltless.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. TREVELYAN: I did not say it was for the purpose of glorification; but I said that perhaps the confession was made out of sympathy or admiration for another person whom he was anxious to save from a terrible fate.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the explanation of the Chief Secretary did not, in his mind, alter the case at all. That a man under such circumstances, just before his death, in the presence of his priest, should deliberately accuse himself of a fearful crime of which he was guiltless, knowing that his name would be handed down with infamy to his family and in the locality in which he had lived as that of a man who had committed a fearful crime, was a proposition which he ventured to say might be submitted to the right hon. Gentleman himself, from Dublin Castle, for the purposes of Irish justice, but would not convince one single independent person in the House of Commons. He did not wish to say a word against the Home Secretary, for it would be difficult for any impartial person to find fault with the present administration of the Home Office. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had on more than one occasion proved that he possessed a generous and merciful disposition, and he was always desirous to lean to the side of mercy, and give a convicted person the benefit of a doubt. But in reply to the evidence given at the trial, which the Chief Secretary had just quoted, as to the remark about the appearance of Kilmartin, the absence of his boots, and other details, the Home Secretary must know perfectly well that cases were constantly arising where there was apparently the most crushing circumstantial evidence, and yet that evidence was absolutely compatible with the complete innocence of the prisoner. A case occurred the other day which he wished to call to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman—the recent case of a man named Siddell, which occurred somewhere in the North, at Newcastle or Durham. He was a man who was charged with being concerned in a murder with another man, and against him the evidence was perfectly crushing. The jury found him guilty, the Judge sentenced him to death, and, as far as he (Lord Randolph Churchill) remembered, the Judge concurred in the verdict; and yet, within a very few days after that trial, the Home Secretary accidentally discovered that Siddell was absolutely innocent, and in the interests of justice he was given a free pardon, the pardoned man having only a few days before been convicted of wilful murder and sentenced to be hanged. When an astonishing case of that kind could occur, it showed the importance of thoroughly investigating such cases, and ought to put them on their guard as to the nature of some of the verdicts that might be found. Although there might be strong corroborative testimony in Kilmartin's case, he fairly thought the confession of the man Gauly ought to be investigated with special care by the Home Office. No doubt, there were death-bed confessions of persons who were about to undergo a capital sentence to which it would be almost impossible for the Executive Government to attach any value. It was not, however, necessary to go into that point—namely, that when a man was convicted, and about to be executed, he might make a statement of the innocence of someone else in the nature of a death-bed confession which it would be impossible for the Government to act upon. But this declaration was not a death-bed confession of that character; it was one of a person who had escaped from all the consequences of his act, who could not be got hold of by the police, and who had not been suspected of committing the crime; and, moreover, it was made when the man was lying upon his death bed from natural causes. It was made in the presence of a Roman Catholic priest, whose respectability was vouched for, not only by the Archbishop of the Diocese, but by the British Vice Consul. He dared say that the Roman Catholic priest, Father Curran, had never heard of this man before; but he had published the story told by Gauly because he felt it to be true. He maintained, therefore, that when they had a deliberate statement of that kind made in the presence of a priest, and without fear of arrest, it threw the gravest doubt upon the corroborative evidence on the other side; and he thought the Government were bound to investigate the matter thoroughly, especially when a man had been condemned to the awful penalty of penal servitude for life. Even if it were necessary to send out a special Commission to Boston to make a further investigation he was certain the House would not grudge the expense. The Chief Secretary, to a certain extent, had acceded to the demand, because he had stated that he was going to send down an adept to the locality where the attempted murder was committed to inquire into the facts of the case; but he was sure the House of Commons on both sides would support the right hon. Gentleman in sanctioning an extension of the inquiry if there was any possibility of relieving a man who had been unjustly condemned to a most fearful punishment.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) and the noble Lord who had just addressed the Committee had quoted the fact of the confession having been made before a priest, as if it added to the importance of the man's declaration. In the name of religious equality he asked the Committee to discard that fact from their minds in any decision at which they might arrive. He claimed, in the name of religious equality, that the case should be judged by Her Majesty's Government as if the man were a Protestant, and that no weight whatever should be attached to the fact of his having been a Roman Catholic, or having confessed to a priest. He would make no observation upon the possible conduct of a Roman Catholic priest; he would not enter into that subject. But this he did claim—that in the name of religious equality there should be no favour shown in this case on account of a confession having been made to a priest; and he trusted that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) would not be deaf to that appeal. Both of their speeches attached to this confession a peculiar gravity, because it was made before a Roman Catholic priest. That was distinctly inviting the Committee to depart from the principle of religious equality, because if a confession was to have an extraneous weight given to it from the fact that it was made to a priest, there would at once be established a violation of the principle of religious equality as between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant. Hon. Members, no doubt, knew that. [Mr. SEXTON: Hear, hear!] Would not a Protestant who had not confessed to a priest have been under a disadvantage under similar circumstances? [Mr. SEXTON: No.] If the hon. Member denied that, he clearly attached no weight to the fact of the confession having been made before a priest. Two speeches, however, had been made by English Members, in which peculiar emphasis was given to the confession of a Catholic as distinguished from the confession of a Protestant, and because it was made before a priest. Therefore, he claimed that the fact of this confession having been made to a priest should be discarded from the mind of Her Majesty's Ministers, and from the mind of the Committee, or otherwise they would attach to a Roman Catholic confession a peculiar virtue which would not be coincident to the confession of a Protestant. He thought he had made that position perfectly clear, and he further maintained that since the Long Parliament no House of Commons without evidence had ever entered into questions which had been decided by the Courts of Law, in minute detail. Perhaps the Long Parliament might have appointed a Committee to try this case over again; and what he deprecated was, either the notion that the Committee should follow the precedent of the Long Parliament, or, without a tribunal, should presume to decide upon the case.

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears to be the general feeling of the Committee that this is a case which could only be properly discussed in the House upon exceptional grounds—the grounds of necessity. The discussion, however, ought not to take place on the grounds of necessity. A very strong feeling has been manifested with regard to the possibility of an error, which is inherent in all human affairs, having occurred; but I wish to remind the Committee that my right hon. Friend has, in deference to that feeling, undertaken to adopt a step which is not usual, and which is of great importance. We all admit that in a case of this kind, where a doubt is raised as to a question of identity, there ought to be an exhaustive inquiry, and that nothing which applies to the case ought to be left uninvestigated. On that ground my right hon. Friend has stated that he will undertake to send a competent and suitable person to the spot where Gauly lived, to institute an examination into all the circumstances relating to Gauly which may have any bearing on the commission of the crime. It was quite a mistake—an unintentional mistake I am sure—on the part of my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), when he said that the Home Secretary had treated the matter as one of minor importance.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of Gauly's confession as a bald statement.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was a bald statement of course. It was a statement put forward without corroboration or collateral evidence. What my right hon. and learned Friend said, was that a statement of that kind did not constitute a strong presumption, or provide strong prima facie evidence, and, therefore, that it ought not to be absolutely received; but it ought to be made the subject of careful examination. What I wish to point out to the Committee is that the pledge which has been given by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will embrace that careful examination. The noble Lord says that my right hon. Friend ought not to grudge even the expense of sending a person to Boston if that would tend to elucidate the truth. I quite agree with that, and if it should be found that the sending of a person to Boston would tend to elucidate the truth, it shall be done. But my right hon. Friend has pointed out that the measure which is evidently the best measure to be taken, and he has engaged that the matter shall be fully inquired into, and that, so far as human means can go, there shall not be left an element of uncertainty in the case; because, on the one hand, there is this prima facie presumption which the Home Secretary frankly admits, and, on the other hand, there is a great mass of corroborative evidence which, in the view of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and the Lord Lieutenant, and the Judge who tried the case, has not been met by the examination they have made. A thorough examination will be made, whether it involves sending to one place or another. What I hope is that under these circumstances, and with that admission, it will be felt that no advantage would arise from pursuing the subject further, for the Committee may confidently rely on the engagement of my right hon. Friend.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had considerably altered the complexion of affairs. With regard to the pledge given by the right hon. Gentleman, both as to the nature of its details and its extent, it was very different from anything they could extract from the doubtful language of the Chief Secretary. He hailed the pledge with satisfaction, and he would express a hope that, in sending an expert to the spot, the Government would select some person of known and unimpeachable character. He was himself proceeding to Boston shortly; he would see Father Curran and the Archbishop, and he should be happy to do what he could to have all the facts placed at the service of the gentleman who might be sent by the Government to make the inquiry.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he was obliged to his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) for having brought the matter under the notice of the Committee. His hon. Friend had not done so until all other means had been exhausted. He had himself forwarded a Memorial to the Chief Secretary some months ago, and he did not think that the Irish Members could, for a moment, be accused of a desire to try the case in the House of Commons until they had exhausted every other means. There was one circumstance connected with the case which he had been told not to bring forward unless it was absolutely necessary; but he thought it was absolutely necessary, after some of the remarks which had been made by the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary. The circumstance in question had reference to the manner in which this confession came to the knowledge of the near relatives of Gauly, who had accused himself on his death-bed of having committed this crime. His relatives were in a highly respectable position, and the papers were forwarded to them—if necessary, he would give the Government the name; but naturally they had no desire to be mixed up with the case. It was painful for them that such a thing should have occurred; but they had thought it their duty, and a matter of conscience, to forward the papers to their parish priest, who had since taken great interest in the case.

He really believed that when the Government fairly inquired into the matter, they would arrive at the conclusion that the confession was an honest and sincere one. It was the very last thing the family of Gauly would desire, that his name should be connected with a crime of this kind; but, however painful it was to them personally to stir up the matter, they had considered that they had no alternative but to place the papers in the hands of their parish priest in Ireland. He must say that the Irish Members were under many obligations to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) for the great assistance they had afforded in the matter. That assistance was of the utmost importance to the Irish people, because there was a general impression in that country that justice to Ireland was not generally conceded in that House.

Question put, and negatived.

(2.) £7,561, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, he thought the time had now arrived when the Committee should hear some statement from the Government in regard to the course they proposed to take with reference to Mr. George Bolton. That gentleman had just obtained a verdict against his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) from an Orange jury at Belfast for certain alleged charges of libel. That, however, did not in the slightest degree change the position Mr. Bolton occupied in that House. Neither the charges made against Bolton at Belfast, nor the verdict of the Orange jury of that town, had in the slightest degree altered the position of Bolton so far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned. Two days had now elapsed since the verdict, and, of course, Her Majesty's Government had had ample time to communicate with their Legal Advisers, all of whom were Members of that House with the exception of Mr. Naish. He would, therefore, ask them if they would state what course was proposed to be taken in reference to Mr. Bolton?

MR. TREVELYAN: I suppose that the affairs of any person who is in the Bankruptcy Court may be said to come under this Vote. I will only, therefore, remind the hon. Member of one or two facts in order to show him that he is premature in his application. Wednesday was the first day on which my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Naish) and myself could take action in this matter. The debate upon Mr. Bolton's affairs lasted until long after post time on the Tuesday, and I remember distinctly stating that the comparative leisure which Wednesday would give us would enable us to approach the question. That letter, written on Wednesday, would obviously only reach Dublin on Thursday for the consideration of the Attorney General, who, of course, would approach the matter from a legal point of view, and the Under Secretary, who would approach it from an administrative point of view. The matter has been discussed both by letter and by telegram, and it is maturing towards a decision. But it would be wrong altogether to hurry it on. Undoubtedly, and above all, it would be extremely wrong to come to a decision until the views of the Irish Government have been ascertained in the matter. We fully agree that it is a matter in which the views of the Government should be clearly ascertained with the utmost expedition, because the decision to be adopted is one of the premises which are already before us. At all events, before the Report is taken of the last Vote, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has promised that the decision of the Irish Government on the question of Mr. Bolton's suspension shall be announced. The statement of the Prime Minister appeared to be received with satisfaction by hon. Members opposite, and it may be regarded as a binding bargain on both sides. From that bargain I do not suppose that any hon. Member would for a moment insult the Prime Minister, by saying that he had any intention of receding.

MR. HEALY ROSE.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Gentleman; but I wish to point out to him that the person in reference to whom he has made this inquiry is not an officer of the Bankruptcy Court, and it would be necessary, in discussing the Vote, to connect the discussion with some member of the Bankruptcy Court. The hon. Member has now asked a question; the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has replied to it, and it will not be in Order to continue the discussion in reference to the affairs of this gentleman upon this Vote. The fact that a person has presented a Petition in Bankruptcy does not give a right to any hon. Member to discuss the question of that bankruptcy in connection with the present Vote.

MR. HEALY said he did not intend to continue the discussion; but he would submit that the conduct of Judge Walsh would regularly come under the Vote. Time after time Judge Walsh had made statements in regard to Bolton, and, therefore, it would be in Order to call attention to the conduct of Judge Walsh. He had risen, however, merely to express a hope that after the statement of the Chief Secretary, no further postponement by Judge Walsh would be allowed to affect the decision of the Government. It must be borne in mind that Judge Walsh, who had already granted two postponements of 10 days in succession, might be prepared to propose another.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. FINDLATER said, he desired on this Vote, to call attention to the case of a very hard-working, intelligent, and deserving class of men—the clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office in Ireland. They complained that in regard to their position they were not well treated as compared with that of other public servants in Ireland. Their principal and most pressing complaint had reference to classification. They had minor grievances as to the maximum salaries of the first class clerks, and the annual increment being less than in other Offices; but he would pass those minor grievances by. In 1874 a reorganization of several Public Offices in Ireland took place, including the Registry of Deeds. As regarded other Offices, this reorganization was not final. Subsequently, a further change was made in their favour by the abolition of the third class of clerks, and the limitation of classes to two. It was not necessary to point out to the Committee how very beneficial this reduction of classification was to the men in whose favour the change was made. By it promotion was stimulated, and a man of merit saw his way within a reasonable number of years to attain to the first class. He did not know for what reason the Registry of Deeds clerks were omitted from the reorganization. In this Department the three classes still existed; and the result was, that while in the other Offices a salary of £300 was attainable in 16 years, in the Registry of Deeds it would take some of the second, and all of the third class, from 31 to 38 years to attain it—more than double the service in other Departments. On this point he begged to refer to the evidence of the Registrar given before the Royal Commission in 1878, of which he had had the honour to be a Member. The Committee consisted of eminent legal authorities, and, among others, of Vice Chancellor Chatterton, who, in examining Mr. M. F. Dwyer, asked—

‘According to the present system it would appear that it would take a man 22 years in the Department, as I make it out, before he reaches the maximum of £300 a-year. Supposing there was no distinction between the second and third classes, and that they were to go on up to the maximum of the second class, that is, to £300 a-year by £10 annual increments from £90, before he could attain the maximum of £300 a-year, I think he would be 21 or 22 years in the Department? Answer: I think you are correct in that.—1413. And that is, supposing he went on without any stop? Yes.—1414. Would it be an unreasonable thing to say that a man at the end of 21 or 22 years’ service should be entitled to a salary of £300 a-year? I do not think it would.—1415. Considering the duties to be discharged by these men? I do not think it would, and it is very painful to me to see a number of meritorious officers at the small salary of £200 a-year doing first class duties without even any approximate prospect of improvement in their position.’

Now, as the Office was at present constituted, there was a very slender prospect of promotion for many members of the third, even to the second class, and none to the first class. In one group there were several clerks of nearly the same age, whose service did not vary to the extent of five years. Of this group the senior reached the second class after a service of 10½ years; the 11th in number, and the last promoted, reached it after 20 years and 10 months. At that rate, it would require a service of 28 years to enable the last of the group to reach the second class. He had already a service of over 17½ years. On referring to the Report of the Royal Commission, he found this passage—

“It is a Department which requires to be officered by a superior class of clerks who should have every fair inducement to make it their permanent employment, and to look to promotion in it as their only reward for long and efficient service. The entire landed property of Ireland is dependent upon this Department for the security of its titles, and the services to be performed in this respect are of high importance to all who have any dealings with land. It takes many years of training to fit a clerk to discharge the higher duties of the Office. We have had statements from the different classes of clerks employed in the Office laid before us, and have also examined representatives of these classes, selected by themselves. They all complain of the slowness of promotion in this Office in comparison with other Departments of the Civil Service, and they attribute this slowness to the division of the clerks into three classes, and to the small number of first class clerks. We have inquired into the necessity for the present classification, and find that there is no distinction in the nature of the business performed by these different classes. The only use, then, of the division into three classes is that it may afford a check upon the advancement of persons not entitled to promotion, and may enable promotion to be awarded to men of special merit. We do not attach much weight to these reasons as regards the division between the second and third classes; and we think that they are more than counterbalanced by the delay it causes in the increase of the pay of deserving officers and the discontent thereby produced. We, therefore, recommend that the present second and third classes be united as a second class, the salaries to commence, as at present, at £90, and to advance by yearly increments of £10 to £300, the present maximum of the second class.”

Would the Committee believe that that Report was issued in 1880, and that, notwithstanding repeated applications, not one single step had been taken to improve the position of these gentlemen occupying posts of responsibility and discharging these very onerous duties? There could be no doubt that an Office of this importance, through which the whole land of Ireland might be said to pass, required the fullest consideration on the part of Her Majesty’s Government, and he could not conceive why its claims should remain in abeyance, while the claims of other Departments of the Civil Service, which certainly discharged duties by no means so responsible nor fraught with such consequences, were attended to. For his own part, he considered that the Office demanded the fullest attention on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He might mention that the search given in the Registry of Deeds negatived the existence of any encumbrance not appearing on its returns. And then with regard to the accuracy of the work, purchasers and lenders had the security of a £10,000 bond given by the Registrar, and two bonds of £2,000 each given by the two Assistant Registrars, while the personal monetary responsibility of the clerks was secured by Statute 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 87, s. 8. There was no other Office with such responsibility. The importance and magnitude of the work done in the Registry of Deeds Office might be judged of from the fact that in 1880 there were registered 18,414 deeds, representing the consideration of £15,000,000 sterling. In 1881 there had been a diminution of the amount of work, but it had since then increased. Again, had the Purchase Clauses of the Irish Land Act of 1881 been in operation the work would still farther have been increased, because it would have been necessary to register two documents in each of the 600,000 tenures. As a further illustration of the magnitude of the transactions of this Department, he could inform the Committee that property had passed on the security of its searches and certificates to the extent of many hundreds of millions sterling in value. Now, he wished to point out to the Committee and to Her Majesty's Government that the relief sought in this case would cost but little to the country; and at this point he would ask permission to refer to the second Report of the Royal Commission, page 24, which stated that the entire income would be sufficient to counterbalance the expenditure. The words of the Report were these—

"But the entire revenue of the Office derived from duty stamps, seals, and fee stamps, appears from the evidence before us to have been at all times sufficient to counterbalance the expenditure; and inasmuch as we are of opinion that the revenue derived from duty stamps, seals, and fee stamps should be expended exclusively on the maintenance of the Office, we do not consider that the deficiency of revenue from 1864 to the present time, made out by taking fee stamps alone into consideration, could be relied upon by the Treasury as affording any answer to the claim of the Office against the surplus fees realized before 1864."

Mr. Findlater

Now, in addition to these there was the sum of £40,000 from fees earned, and now in the Consolidated Fund, by Statute 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 87, s. 35, expressly permitted to be expended in maintenance and improvement. This money was ordered to be invested in the name of the Office, which it would be perceived stood in an entirely different position from other Offices seeking improvement, inasmuch it was able to pay its way, and had funds available to meet the expenditure necessary. Those funds were invested in Government securities. From what he had said he thought it was clearly established that the character of the Office entitled it to improvement; and as he had shown that it required improvement, and that its financial position permitted the carrying out of such improvement without expense to the State, he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would consider the case of these gentlemen. He had himself very large and constant dealings with the Office, and he was bound to say that in the whole course of his practice he had never met with a more efficient, intelligent, and hard-working class of men. They devoted the whole of their time to the duties of the Office, they were always at their post, and he never heard against them a single charge of neglect, which, he thought, could hardly be said of any other Public Office.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, he was very glad his hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) had called attention to what had been for years justly the subject of complaint on the part of the clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin. He desired to supplement what had been stated in respect to the unfair scale of remuneration given in the Registry of Deeds Office, and the gross act of injustice on the part of the Treasury in withholding and applying, in contravention of statutory provisions, the surplus of £42,000, of which they had obtained possession. It should be borne in mind that so far back as 1880 a Royal Commission had investigated these complaints, and suggested that the Treasury should grant the trifling addition of pay which was asked for by the copyists and other clerks in the Office. He used the word "copyists" advisedly, because the hon. Member for Monaghan, in calling attention to the case, did not dwell on the grievances of a body of clerks in the Office, who were specially pointed out in the Report of the Commission. These unfortunate men were mere copyists, receiving 1½d. per folio of 72 words transcribed. They were paid no salary, like the copyists of the Courts of Justice; they received no compensation for the other work they might do in the Office; but, in addition to that, the Treasury required them to transcribe the heads of Memorials, which often amounted to two folios, and for that they were not paid a single farthing. Again, these transcribers had, as the Committee would be aware, to do their work on parchment which they had to prepare at a considerable expenditure of time, and for that preparation they were not allowed any payment whatever. Now, the Commissioners had alluded to this matter most forcibly in their Report; they pointed out that it was not fitting that men should do work for which they were not paid, and that the grievance was one which demanded early consideration. That Report had been sent into the Treasury as far back as the year 1881; but nothing whatever had been done to remedy the existing state of things, and the copyists were left at the miserable pay of 1½d. per folio. The Commissioners also suggested the mode in which the management of the Office might be improved, and the unnecessary loss of time and money to which those transacting business at the Office had been and were still subjected, might be saved. Yet nothing had been done. The Committee ought not to pass this Vote until they had a clear and satisfactory explanation of this culpable neglect. It would not do for the Secretary of the Treasury to say there were no available funds. The sum of £42,000, with its accumulations, thus wrongfully received by the Treasury, was, as a matter of right, specially intended to be applied in aid of the suggested improvements. Let him remind the Committee that, under the 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 87, s. 35, it was provided that no greater sum should be charged in fees than would amount annually to a sum of money sufficient for the current expenses of the Establishment. But there had been an excess over the expenditure of the Office, and the Treasury had taken that excess, and, instead of applying it to the bettering of the arrangements of the Office, and for the use of the Office, they had put it into their own pockets, so to speak, and applied it to their own purposes, contrary to the statutory provisions. He asked what was the meaning and object of appointing Royal Commissions, if their recommendations when printed were to remain on the shelves of the Treasury covered with dust and without the slightest attention being paid to them by Her Majesty's Government? He trusted that some satisfactory answer would now at last be forthcoming from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury in respect of this matter, which, as he had said already, vitally concerned every person having dealings with land in Ireland. Registration was a matter made compulsory in that country to give validity. It never was intended, indeed it was expressly provided, that the duties levied in respect of this compulsory registration from the public should not be applied otherwise than in the proper maintenance of the Registry Office, or for the benefit of those dealing with land in Ireland. The conduct of the Treasury in the matter might, if a private individual had so acted, been fairly characterized as a fraudulent breach of trust.

Mr. GRAY said it appeared to him that the claim of the clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office was almost, if not absolutely, irresistible; it appeared to him that the charge against the Treasury in relation to these matters was two-fold. First, it was that they did not fairly remunerate the officials of the Office, whereas the recommendation of the Commissioners was that the remuneration of the officials in the various Departments in Ireland should be made to correspond as far as possible. The second charge appeared to be that while they underpaid the officials they overcharged the public in respect of fees. It appeared that the Treasury had accumulated a sum of more than £40,000, which they had put into the Consolidated Fund, and which they had used for Imperial purposes, contrary to the intention of the Act of Parliament, and that while doing so the officials of the Department were left in a position very much inferior to that of the officials of other Irish Offices—that was to say, the officials of the Local Government Board, the Board of Works, the Paymaster's General's Office, the National Education Office, and others. Now, the Commission which sat in 1850 recommended that the third class clerks in the Office should be merged with the clerks in the second class, and thus afford relief to the inferior clerks. But there were three classes of clerks in the Deeds Office, the result of which was that promotion was very much retarded, and he understood that some of the clerks had worked for 20 years without getting anything like adequate pay. If the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury could plead that the revenues of the Office were insufficient, if he could plead that the cost of increasing the salaries of the clerks in this Office would constitute an additional public burden, why, then, he might have the sympathy of the Committee. But he could scarcely say anything of that kind in this case, because the question would then be asked, "Where is this £40,000?" If the Treasury did not intend to give any part of that sum for the equalization of the salaries of the clerks in the Deeds Office with the salaries of the clerks in other Departments in Ireland—why, then, if they insisted on paying the money into the Exchequer, and not acting up to the spirit of the Statute, Irish Members were perfectly justified in the charge they made. The revenue from the registration of deeds was sufficient for the maintenance of the Office. No one would contend that the Treasury ought to make a profit out of this transaction, and therefore he hoped that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) would follow up his observations by a Motion, and that he would have the courage to carry it to a Division, because it was of no use raising questions of this kind unless the opinion of the Committee was taken, and unless something was done. But when the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury rose to speak on this Vote, he should be glad if he would give the Committee some information as to the mechanical improvement some time since proposed to be introduced into the Office. He understood that an instrument was being introduced for the purpose of mechanically registering all the deeds in the Office, and doing away with the services of clerks altogether. That, as far as he could remember, was the object of the patent. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman had himself investigated this marvellous mechanical contrivance, and could state to the Committee whether the public were to have the advantage of it? He would be glad to know whether the Treasury had completely abandoned this scheme, or whether they were still considering it? He trusted the hon. Gentleman would consider the appeal which had been made to him on behalf of the clerks in the Office in a favourable spirit, and that he would carry out the recommendation of the Commission, which, as he understood it, was that the clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office should be placed on an equality with the clerks in the other Departments.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he had not heard lately much about the ingenious invention to which the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had referred. His impression was that, although the ingenuity of the plan was well recognized and admired, it was practically unworkable, and would not be introduced. With regard to the clerks in this Office, the change would be analogous to that adopted in all the other branches of the Civil Service—namely, there would be a large introduction of the lower division of clerks. He would point out that the figures before the Committee showed that the expenses of this Office, having regard only to the effective charge, was something between £18,000 and £19,000 a-year, and that there was a non-effective charge of between £2,000 and £3,000 a-year, so that the whole charge of the Office was £21,000 a-year. Against that charge of £21,000 a-year, the receipts for fees for the last year amounted to £12,000, so that there was absolutely an excess of expenditure over revenue of something like £9,000. He admitted that last year was a bad year as regarded the Revenue. It was true that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) attempted to bring in aid of the deficiency the duties charged; but they were no part of the fees of the Office any more than the stamps in Chancery would be part of the fees of that Office. The duties were part of the general Revenue of the country. The fees for work done were those which strictly related to the Office. The duties had to be paid when the deeds were registered; but they formed no part of the income of the Office, and if the Office were abolished to-morrow, the duties on Memorials would still have to go to the Revenue. With respect to the £40,000, that was a very old story, and dated as far back as 1864, and with regard to which he might say that the Treasury had acted perfectly within their rights. With regard to the complaints that had been made respecting the position of the clerks, he had to say that the Government would wish to remove the obstacles which existed in the way of their receiving some advance and promotion; but that could not be done without removing some of the superior clerks, and the superior clerks resisted their removal as much as the lower clerks desired it. Many of those clerks had served for a considerable number of years, and he, at one time, believed it quite possible that some of them might be willing to retire on superannuation terms, and communications were accordingly made to the Office with that object. But it was found that the proposal could not be carried out; that the clerks had no desire to retire; and, consequently, the Treasury were not justified, at all events for the present, in compelling them to do so. They were efficient servants of the public; they were doing their duty well; and, therefore, for the time, they would be left in their present position. He thought, however, that something might be done hereafter in the direction indicated. With regard to the position of the transcribing clerks, it was, no doubt, extremely deplorable that persons of education and trustworthiness should labour at the low rate of 10d. an hour; but all he could say was that whenever a vacancy occurred there were always two or three applications for it. There was, in fact, a full supply of such men ready to work on those terms both in England and Ireland. It was natural that copyists who entered the Service on these conditions should, after a few years, ask for an improvement of their position; but the fact was that the work of transcribing was purely a mechanical operation, and however much the Government desired to see persons of this respectable and intelligent class adequately remunerated for their work, they were quite unable to add to their pay in the interests of the public.

port of the Royal Commission. If he had, he would have found a full and detailed answer to those arguments on which he rested his defence. What answer did he give to the complaint of the copyists? Their case was that they were obliged to write that for which they were not paid. In point of fact, under the Treasury Regulations, there were deducted from the folios written by the clerks the headings to the Memorials, which formed a considerable portion of the clerks' work. The Irish transcribers, who were, according to the Secretary to the Treasury, gentlemen of character and position, were, under the Treasury Regulations, forced to do work at the rate of 94 words to the folio. He (Mr. P. Martin) denied that that was the case in England. In England, the transcribing clerks were paid at the rate of 1½d. for 72 words, and the headings of the Memorials were not deducted. He certainly was astonished to hear the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury gravely stating that the duties and fees specially paid for registration formed no part of the fees of the Office, but were a portion of Imperial Revenue. Forsyth, said he, if this Office was abolished the fees would remain. Evidently, the Chief Secretary did not understand on and in respect of what those duties and fees were levied and paid. He appeared to consider them as ordinary stamp duties. A deed was stamped according to its value in both countries, under the same Act of Parliament; but in Ireland, in addition to that, it was insisted that there should be a Memorial of a deed prepared, and on that Memorial another duty stamp should be affixed; it was not a stamp duty on the deed, but a stamp duty on the Memorial. In addition to all this, in Ireland, the poorer country, a duty must be paid on the demand for a search. There were also fees on affidavits charged. If these special fees and duties were accounted for, this Office, instead of showing a deficiency, would really show a surplus. He was rather surprised at the Secretary to the Treasury falling into these extraordinary and confusing blunders, because, if the hon. Gentleman had paid the slightest attention to the Report which he received from the Royal Commissioners, he would have found the matter very plainly set forth. As he (Mr. P. Martin) endeavvoured to point out a moment ago, the hon. Gentleman would have found, if he had carefully studied the Report in question, that the charges imposed on the public in respect of the Registry Office consisted of two classes—firstly, the fees taken in the Office; and, secondly, the stamp duties payable to the Crown in respect of Memorials such as he had described, and in respect of register searches. They did not appear in the account; if they did, so far from the balance being against the Registry Office, the balance would be in its favour. He maintained that the Treasury at the present moment were wrongfully withholding from the Irish public £42,000, of which mention had been made. It was a most singular thing that the Treasury officials, in withholding money of this description from the public, should have had recourse to a statement such as the Committee had listened to, because, in the very Report to which reference had been made, it was held that the fees and duties received ought to go towards the maintenance of the Office. The Royal Commissioners said that—

“It is plain from the language of the deputation that the Office fees of the Registry of Deeds were never intended to form a source of Imperial revenue, but were intended to be applied for the benefit of persons dealing with lands in Ireland, and the proper maintenance of the Office; but, notwithstanding the provisions of the section, we have evidence that sums amounting to upwards of £42,000 have been received by the Treasury on account of these excess of fees.”

Under these circumstances, he contended that it was trifling with the common sense and judgment of the Committee for the Secretary to the Treasury to tell them that the expenditure of the Office had been in excess of the receipts. Up to 1881, £42,000 received in emoluments was invested and applied to Imperial sources; and he asked the Secretary to the Treasury to give the Committee the accounts since 1881. He believed, that if those accounts were given, they would show that, even in the recent bad years, there had been an excess of receipts over the expenditure in the Office in question; and he certainly trusted that his hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) would move to reduce the Vote.

MR. GRAY said, the Secretary to the Treasury had argued that certain fees could not be taken into account or placed to the credit of the revenue of the Office; and he had said that, if the Office were abolished to-morrow, the duties payable to the Crown would remain the same. Was that the fact? If the Office were abolished to-morrow, the stamp duties would, no doubt, remain the same; but what would become of the duties now charged upon Memorials? As he understood it, no such thing as a Memorial existed in England, except in connection with particular legal arrangements for the registry of deeds in Yorkshire and Middlesex. [MR. COURTNEY: There are many Memorials.] He was not talking of the deeds registered in the Court of Chancery; but he was talking of the register kept in Dublin of all transactions in relation to land. What he wanted to fix the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury upon was this particular point. If the Office were abolished, would these payments still come to the Crown? If they would not, was it not manifest that they should be credited to the Office, and not to the general Imperial Revenue? He asked the hon. Gentleman to explain the positive statement he made that, if the Office were abolished, these fees—by these fees he meant the Office fees payable on Memorials, and payable for searches in the Office—would still be payable to the Crown. What right would the Crown have to receive the fees if the Office were abolished? If they were only fees payable in connection with the Office, and not general fees chargeable and payable for Imperial purposes, how could the Secretary to the Treasury contend that they ought not to be paid to the Office? If the hon. Gentleman's contention be wrong, a grave question of principle was involved in the withholding of the sum of £42,000. Of course, if there was a deficit, the public would have to meet it; but if, on the contrary, there was a surplus, the Office ought to be credited with it. He imagined that the Secretary to the Treasury would admit that if his (Mr. Gray's) contention were right, and the stamp duties on Memorials and the fees of 21s. for searches were put down to the Office, the revenue of the Office would show a surplus, and not a deficit. If it be the fact that, if these sums were credited to the Office, there would be a surplus, that surplus should, according to the whole argument of the hon. Gentleman, be devoted to the Office. He (Mr. Gray) imagined that the hon. Gentleman would not consent to that; therefore, it became a matter of extreme importance to decide the question whether these particular sums should or should not be credited to the local Office, and not to Imperial purposes. He contended that the fees should be credited to the Office; and he wanted the Secretary to the Treasury to tell him whether he would have any objection to give the House a Return showing the revenue in connection with the fees—that was to say, the amounts which he acknowledged should be credited to the Office, and the amounts payable in stamp duties on Memorials, and for searches which some people thought ought to be credited to the Office, so that they would know exactly how this Office account stood, and whether they had good ground to make good their contention that the Treasury ought to refund the £42,000, and whatever other accumulations might have taken place since 1881? If, after crediting the fees to the Office, the account still showed a deficit, his (Mr. Gray's) argument, of course, went by the board. [Mr. COURTNEY: I have no objection.] Then he would move for the Return. He did not think the hon. Gentleman had sufficiently recognized the difference between the stamp duty on a deed, which, of course, went to the Consolidated Fund, and the stamp duty in connection with a particular local Office procedure. Where they had a local Office exacting stamp duties which were not generally charged elsewhere, it was manifest that those charges ought to be credited to the Office.

MR. WARTON said, the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Gray) had said so well a good deal of what he was about to say that it was not necessary he should occupy the Committee at any great length. He would not accuse the Secretary to the Treasury of deliberately trying to confuse their minds; but the hon. Gentleman certainly appeared to wish to confuse their minds by stating that the stamp duties on conveyances would not, of course, be paid to the Office. They were all agreed about the stamp duties on conveyances; but, apart from that altogether, it seemed to him that the stamp duty on Memorials could not exist unless Memorials were registered. It seemed to him that no payment for a search could be made unless there was a registry in which that search could take place; therefore, they ought to have a complete and honest statement—not a vague statement about £12,000 or £14,000—of what was received in every kind of way. They would then know what was the income of this Registry Office, and be able to make up their minds as to the future arrangement that ought to be made. The Secretary to the Treasury never shrank from what he said, and the objection he had taken to the proposal which had been made by hon. Members was, that if all the payments made in the Office were credited to the Office, there would still be a deficit. If there would be a deficit, how was it there was a surplus of £42,000; how had that money been accumulated? He (Mr. Warton) thought there might also be given an account of what had become of the £42,000. He supposed it was absorbed in the general Revenue of the country. Well, now, a point with regard to the remuneration of clerks had been raised. There was no doubt that whenever a post was vacant there was always a large number of applications for it, and he thought it would be throwing away the money of the country if they were to make extravagant payments for very humble services; but it was one of the elementary evils of the social condition of the present day that there were so many hundreds of thousands of persons who wished to be writers and clerks. The fact was, that there was a sort of contempt thrown on the handicraftsman, and therefore it was that so many people were found to refuse to work with their hands. Discontent came, and that discontent did not fail to find expression. He sympathized with the argument of the Secretary to the Treasury as regarded the remuneration of clerks, subject, however, to one exception. The Secretary to the Treasury compared the payment of 1½d. a folio with the payment of 10d. an hour. He (Mr. Warton) was not going to say how many folios a scribe could write in an hour; but there was this difference between the two systems of payment—that a man who was paid 10d. an hour, wrote accordingly; but if they told a man that he was to be paid at the rate of 1½d. per folio, and then gave him a number of words to write for which he was not paid, that was a distinct breach of faith. It would be well to remedy such a little matter, because, when men received such very small salaries, every penny or half-penny was of importance to them, and if any emoluments were deducted, the employés became dissatisfied. It was not fair that, if men were paid 1½d. for every folio, that they should write a single word that did not form part of the total. If men were paid upon the piece system, they ought to receive payment for every bit of work they did. It was only natural if, upon the piece system, a man ought to receive 1s., but as a matter of fact only received 4d., that he should become discontented. Honesty was the better policy, as far as the Government were concerned, and it was far better that they should say that 1½d. a folio would not be paid when they really did not give it. A little justice in that respect would be a good thing, and the Secretary to the Treasury ought to take good care that men in the service of the Crown were not defrauded out of anything which was their due.

Mr. SMALL confessed that he heard with great surprise and dissatisfaction the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, especially that portion of it which related to the clerks of the Registry Office. The hon. Gentleman had said that the clerks were not men of very superior intelligence. That was quite true; but, at the same time, there was no Public Department in Ireland which was so satisfactorily worked as the Registry of Deeds. He (Mr. Small) had been acquainted with the working of the Office for many years, and he was hardly aware of any mistake made by the clerks. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) had not as yet explained to the Committee why it was that in almost every other Public Office in Ireland—the Local Government Board Office, the Office of the Board of Works, the Paymaster General's Office, the National Education Office—there were first and second class clerks, while there were only third class clerks in the Office of the Registry of Deeds. He certainly did not think that the clerks in the other Offices required any greater intelligence than those in the Office of the Registry of Deeds. As a matter of fact, the Office of the Board of Works was unsatisfactory and inefficient, whereas the Registry of Deeds Office did its work very satisfactorily. The Local Government Board was distinguished for doing nothing that they could possibly avoid doing. The Paymaster General's Office and the National Education Office were Offices with which he was not well acquainted. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury said that in a very short time he thought the Office of the Registry of Deeds could be worked by one or two Registrars who would supervise a number of clerks of the same standing as those now employed. [Mr. COURTNEY: No.] He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that one or two Registrars and an Assistant Registrar with a number of clerks, would be sufficient to do the work of the Office; but perhaps the hon. Gentleman would kindly state what he did say?

Mr. COURTNEY said, he would be glad to do so. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Small) asked him why it was that third class clerks were employed in the Registry of Deeds Office, whilst first and second class clerks were employed in other Public Offices in Ireland? He had previously stated that the Government wished to remove the obstacles that existed in the way of the clerks receiving some advance; but they could not do anything without taking steps at the same time for the removal of the superior clerks. Great responsibility was thrown upon the Registrar, and it was thought that if an Assistant Registrar and a limited number of first and second class clerks were appointed, the work of the Office might be performed very satisfactorily.

Mr. SMALL said, he could not see very much difference between what the hon. Gentleman had now said, and the observations he (Mr. Small) thought he had made originally. The hon. Gentleman spoke of a limited number of first and second class clerks, together with an Assistant Registrar, being drafted into the Office; but why should not the superior clerks in the Office be made first class clerks, and the clerks of an inferior grade be made second class clerks? He failed to understand whether the mode of admission to the Office of the Registry of Deeds was different to the mode of admission in any other Office he had mentioned. He was aware that the admission into the Registry of Deeds Office was by a very open system of competition; but he was not aware whether that was so with regard to any other Office. If there was not the same open competition in the Board of Works and the Local Government Board Offices, and so on, he could easily understand how it was there were so many third class clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office, and none in the other Offices. The Registry of Deeds Office, as a matter of fact, was a popular Office, and that, no doubt, was the reason why the clerks discharged their duties so extremely well.

MR. FINDLATER said, he thought that the stamp duties would at all times be sufficient to counterbalance the expenditure of the Office; indeed, the Royal Commissioners were of opinion that they would, if all the Duty and Office fees went towards the expenses of the Office. He admitted the courtesy of the Secretary to the Treasury; but he could not allow that the hon. Gentleman had at all satisfactorily answered the different points which had been raised. He, therefore, moved to reduce the Vote by £1,000, in order to test the feeling of the Committee by a Division.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he was surprised to find that Irish Members should expect, after what took place with regard to the Register House, Edinburgh, that the Secretary to the Treasury would listen to their case. He entirely sympathized with the case put forward on behalf of the clerks in Dublin; but their case was very much less strong than the case of the clerks in Edinburgh. The third class clerks in Dublin began at £90 a-year, rising by £10 a-year to £200; but the unfortunate third class clerks in Edinburgh, though beginning at £90, only rose by £5 a-year to £160. At the same time, the latter did more important work than the clerks in Dublin, not only doing all the work the clerks in Dublin did, but also preparing all the minutes of the deeds sent in for registration, which was not done by the clerks in Dublin, but by solicitors who charged largely for the work. The clerks in Edinburgh received a less income and a less yearly increment than the Dublin clerks, and they could not expect promotion in less than 25 or 30 years. Still, he did not think that because the Edinburgh clerks were badly treated it would be right to treat the Dublin clerks badly, and, therefore, he should support the Motion for reducing the Vote. He thought the Irish case was one which the Secretary to the Treasury should carefully consider; and he hoped that by helping to vindicate the case of the Dublin clerks, he might do something to induce the hon. Gentleman next year to look with a more favourable eye on the claims of those unhappy clerks who did the national work in Edinburgh, and were worse paid than they would be in any private office in the country.

MR. HEALY observed, that the hon. Member (Mr. Dick-Peddle) had several times taunted the Irish Members upon their action with regard to Scotch Votes; but he would remind the hon. Member that the Irish Members had all voted with him, except the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who was well-known to be a rigid teetotaler in respect to financial matters. They had voted in favour of the Scotch clerks; but he did not at all agree with the hon. Member, on the merits of the case, that the Dublin case was not so strong as that of Edinburgh, because the clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office in Dublin performed duties to which there was no parallel in England or Scotland. The Office in Dublin was recognized as one of the most important and most valuable Offices in the country, in which no mistakes were made, and in which the clerks performed duties of a most laborious and important character, but were worse treated than the clerks in any other Office. A Bill had been passed some time ago, to give them some additional remuneration, on the representation of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Findlater); and the very fact that a Bill had to be passed showed how these clerks had been treated. If this was an Office of the Board of Works, or some other routine Office, there would be no difficulty whatever in giving the clerks what they wanted. The Board of Works did nothing; it was hated by everybody, and got everything it wanted; while a body like the clerks of the Registry of Deeds Office, who were admitted to be efficient, against whom he had never heard a breath of complaint, and with regard to whom, on the contrary, solicitors and suitors were loud in eulogium, were refused by the Government what they had asked for with great moderation. He did not wish to disparage the Scotch clerks. He had voted in their favour; but, at the same time, he certainly thought the clerks in the Dublin Office occupied a peculiar position, and ought to be treated with regard to that fact. In comparison with the duties they discharged they had not been fairly treated by the Government, and if they looked at the onerous and responsible duties cast upon them, he certainly thought there was no body of men in the country who more deserved the consideration of the House and the Treasury.

MR. COURTNEY pointed out that the Bill to which the hon. Member had referred was necessary because of an Act of Parliament. These clerks were paid according to commercial principles, having regard to what they would receive for similar duties in a private office, and the question was, whether that plan should be adhered to, or whether an appeal should be made to Parliament for a special and a compassionate allowance? The receipts of the Registry of Deeds in Dublin did not at present pay the expenses of the Office; but there were accumulations from the time when the Office was remunerative. With regard to what the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had said, the rate of pay was $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ a folio, and the clerks had accepted their position with a full knowledge of what the remuneration would be.

MR. WARTON agreed with the hon. Gentleman as to the proper principle of paying these clerks, though he did not much like the commercial principle. He considered $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ a folio a low rate of pay. The Attorney General charged for bills of costs at the rate of $4d.$ a folio, and, of course, he got a good profit.

MR. FINDLATER asked whether the Secretary to the Treasury would produce a Return, if moved for, showing a statement of the revenue derived from duty stamps, seals, and fee stamps on all the documents, so that they might test the question whether they were applicable to the expenses of the Office?

MR. COURTNEY said, he would be willing to give these particulars, without prejudice.

MR. GRAY said, the issue was not, as the Secretary to the Treasury supposed, whether these clerks should be paid on commercial principles or not. That was only a very small portion of the total issue. The issue, as it appeared to him, was whether, considering the nature of their duties, these clerks should be given advantages equal to those given to clerks in other Departments. That was a very different thing from whether they should be paid only upon commercial principles, or receive a compassionate allowance. He was not at all in favour of that course; but he was in favour of paying what was fair, judging by the current rate of pay. The question at issue was whether these clerks should be paid adequately, and he contended that they should be, but were not. An important point was whether the revenues of this Office were dealt with in consonance with the spirit of the express words of the Act of Parliament. The Secretary to the Treasury had not explained how he maintained his assertion that the special duties charged in this Office in connection with the services of the Office should not be credited to the Office, and that if the Office did not exist the fees would still have to be paid. That was what the hon. Gentleman had specifically stated. Then as to the commercial principle, that was, no doubt, a very admirable sentiment, and came very well from the hon. Gentleman. Was the hon. Gentleman ready to abide by that principle generally, or did he only apply it to these poor scriveners—these animated machines? How about the Head of the Office? Who was the Head of the Office, and was he appointed by the late Government on commercial principles? He was a broken-down editor, and he was appointed solely because he had for years and years constituted his paper the tool and organ of the Whig official class in Dublin. When, in consequence of public opinion deserting him, his paper was reduced to a worthless condition, and practically to bankruptcy, the Government rewarded this gentleman, on commercial principles, of course, by giving him the Headship of an Office of which he knew nothing at all, and a salary of £1,000 or £1,200 a-year. He was certain that when that gentleman entered the Office he had not the most remote notion of how a deed was registered, and his sole claim to the office was that he had been the proprietor of a paper in Dublin which he had made the tool of the Government, and which became no longer useful for that purpose, because the people would have nothing more to do with it. In saying that he was not animated by any personal feeling, for the paper had disappeared for 10 or 15 years, deserted by the people. He held that the commercial principle should be applied to the entire Office, if applied at all, and he contended that any man who had served for a long time in any Public Department should be allowed an opportunity of becoming a permanent official and of rising to other posts when they became vacant. It was most discouraging and demoralizing to such men to find persons from outside put over their heads, not on commercial, but on political principles.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 45: Majority 17. — (Div. List, No. 198.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. HEALY said, that it was an unfortunate thing to have to rise to speak on this matter, when there was no one connected with the Irish Office on the Treasury Bench; but he wished to draw attention to two or three matters in connection with this Vote, in regard to which he had already given Notice to the House. He observed, in the first place, that there was a very large decrease in the Vote this year of nearly £70,000, the amount last year having been £157,381, while this year it was £88,090. That decrease was, of course, due in a large degree to the fact that the fair rent cases appeared, judging from the statistics, to be in a fair way to being all settled. He noticed that, according to a Return dated June 30th, of 114,544 cases, the Land Commission claimed to have disposed of 105,058 cases, leaving about 9,000 cases still to be disposed of. In reality, of course, they had only disposed of about 74,000 cases, as over 30,000 had been either withdrawn or dismissed. His complaint that night was that the Committee were asked to discuss this Vote without having any information as to the character of the Sub-Commissioners, except a simple statement by the Chief Secretary, that certain gentlemen would no longer continue Sub-Commissioners. There was no printed document to which they could refer, giving the names of the gentlemen who were to continue and those who were not to remain. That was not a proper way in which to discuss this Vote, and he must complain of those who were responsible in this matter for not having provided the House of Commons with information of a precise and adequate character respecting the gentlemen who were charged with the responsible duties of fixing fair rents. It was true the Chief Secretary had stated that certain gentlemen were to be dismissed; but they were left to work out piecemeal and by subtraction those who were to remain.

Mr. TREVELYAN said, he had given the names of the gentlemen who were not to be continued; but there was no occasion to give those who were to remain.

Mr. HEALY said, his impression was the other way; but, at all events, his point was, that merely giving a statement in the House which no one could carry away in his head was no way in which to deal with this matter. The Government were at no loss for funds, and to print a small slip or document giving the names of those who were remaining or leaving could not have been too much even for the intelligence of the Irish Office. He had been at some pains to find out which gentlemen were to be continued—without reference that was to the seven years' men—and he must say that anything more calculated to infuse distrust into the minds of the Irish tenants he had never imagined. With regard to the Commissioners, it was most extraordinary that the Government had dismissed everyone whose term would elapse on the 31st of August, who was trusted by the tenants, and had kept on everybody who had been the subject of complaint on the part of the tenants. All whom the Tory Members had assailed had gone down before the landlords' advocates; whereas men like Mr. Grey, Mr. Meek, Mr. Davidson, and others of that stamp, who had given satisfaction, to a large extent, to the Irish tenants, had gone "where the woodbine twineth." Everyone attacked by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) and the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) had gone, while those Commissioners, whom he (Mr. Healy) and his Friends had assailed, remained in office. Who had been left at that moment. Let them consider the residuum. He proposed to give a biographical account of the gentlemen who were to be retained. There was, first of all, Mr. Burke, a Protestant gentleman, son of an Inspector of the Local Government Board—that in itself being, of course, a recommendation for him to be appointed to fix rents—a Conservative and a strong landlord partizan. The very fact that he was the son of a Local Government Board Inspector made him almost a man sent from Heaven with a stamp of extra fitness to discharge the duties of the office. Mr. Burke was a barrister. Hon. Members would not be able to discover that fact from having seen his name in the papers, because he (Mr. Healy) could not find that he ever held a brief, but they would discover it if they put themselves to the trouble of looking over The Law List. Well, Mr. Burke was, of course, a Conservative in politics—a strong Tory partizan—and what could be a higher qualification for any man to fix rents in Ireland? Well, Mr. Burke was No. 1. Then he came to the name of Mr. M'Devitt. Now, if there was any person in Ireland in whom the people of that country had no confidence, it was Mr. M'Devitt. He was the son of a tenant farmer; but he had discarded that position in life, and he was now imbibed with the worst prejudices of the class in whose ranks he aspired to enter, and whose favour, to a certain extent, he appeared to have obtained. At any rate, he had the confidence of Her Majesty's Government, and they had continued him in the service of the Crown as a fit and proper person to fix rents. He had already described Mr. M'Devitt's visit to Ulster; and when he considered the letters that had been written to the newspapers, and the hue and cry raised in the country about Mr. M'Devitt, he was certainly amazed to find that Earl Spencer should fly in the teeth of the opinion of the people of Ireland by continuing this man in office. Of course, Mr. M'Devitt had a conscience, but it was a landlord's conscience, and whenever the interests of the tenant had to be balanced against those of the landlord, Mr. M'Devitt's qualms of conscience always weighed him down upon the landlord's side. While they dismissed men like Wild, Meek, Davidson, and Grey, they continued to employ men like M'Devitt. If they desired to employ certain officials, who were notorious landlords' men, why did they not mix up half-a-dozen of them with half-a-dozen tenants' men, so as to do the thing with some appearance of fairness and decency? Mr. M'Devitt, like Mr. Burke, had been called to the Bar; but he was a barrister under false pretences. He had made a representation to the Benchers that he had no intention of practising in Ireland; but as soon as he had succeeded in getting called to the Bar by the Benchers, Mr. M'Devitt practised at the Bar like any other Irish gentleman. The North-West Bar, which Mr. M'Devitt had joined, had marked their disapproval of his breach of faith by having "blackbeamed" him, and therefore he had been appointed a Sub-Commissioner. Those were his credentials; but he believed that Mr. M'Devitt had a further claim in the assistance he had given at a recent Tyrone election on behalf of the Liberal candidate. His claims to the confidence of the tenants were absolutely nil, although he professed to have worked in their behalf prior to the passing of the Prevention of Crime Act of 1881. At the outset of his career, no doubt, Mr. M'Devitt declared himself the friend of the tenant; but at the moment it became necessary to obtain a position as a friend of the landlords, Mr. M'Devitt was not ashamed to wheel entirely round. He passed on now to the next gentleman, also a barrister, Mr. Reardon. Mr. Reardon, like Mr. Burke and Mr. M'Devitt, never had any practice at the Bar, and, of course, as the Government were at great straits to get gentlemen to act as Legal Commissioners, they had been obliged to fall back on the brigade of big game barristers who hung about Dublin, and to shove them anyhow into the position of Legal Commissioners. Mr. Reardon's principal claim to office was that, on several occasions, as representing the Commission on which he had served, he had been burnt in effigy by the tenants. Mr. Reardon had, accordingly, been appointed a Sub-Commissioner. Now, a gentleman who had been burnt in effigy should, undoubtedly, enjoy the confidence of Her Majesty's Ministers. Certainly the fact ought to increase his credit with Earl Spencer at Dublin Castle, because that noble Earl had over and over again been burnt in effigy; and it ought to require no other credentials whatever to entitle a man to an appointment as Legal Commissioner. Then he came to the next gentleman, Mr. Doyle. Mr. Doyle happened to belong to the county, the borough of which he (Mr. Healy) had represented for some time—namely, Wexford. Mr. Doyle was also a Legal Commissioner, and he was a Legal Commissioner because he had never had a brief in his life. That fact, of course, gave him unquestionable claim upon Her Majesty's Government. The mere fact that a man was required for the office of Legal Commissioner, and that persons could be found who never held a brief, undoubtedly constituted at once a very strong reason why Earl Spencer should employ them. Mr. Doyle further had the influence of his Conservative friends who were very powerful in Dublin Castle, and Mr. Doyle had very little difficulty in retaining his position. Mr. Doyle's legal light was, in the first instance, not recognized, and his original appointment was that of Agricultural Commissioner; but having gained experience as a fixer of rents, from a landlord's point of view, Mr. Doyle suddenly blossomed out as a Legal Commissioner, and was now continued in that capacity. He now came to the gentlemen who were appointed to act as Lay Commissioners. First, there was Mr. Walpole. Of Mr. Walpole he would only say that if the voice of his own tenants could penetrate into that House, Mr. Walpole would never have been heard of as a Sub-Commissioner. He was a Tory in politics, and a notoriously bad landlord, distrusted by every man who had been brought in contact with him. His decisions were appealed against and dismissed. But it would be found that Mr. Walpole possessed everything that ought to constitute a Landlord Commissioner. Then came Mr. Barry. Mr. Barry was a Catholic gentleman; but it was remarkable in Ireland how the Government picked out all the "Shanneen" Catholics they could find if they desired to appoint any man to any office of profit. Mr. Barry was a Catholic landlord, and he had shown himself, throughout his judgments, one of the greatest and bitterest enemies of the tenant farmer. It seemed as though the Government, having exhausted all the bigoted Protestants they could find, fell back upon the rotten Catholics; and he must say that this system of governing a people by men whom the people themselves detested and despised was a remarkable feature of the Government of Ireland. Her Majesty's Ministers appeared to have employed a microscope in order to discover and drag out their agents by that means from utter obscurity. As long as there was an objectionable man left in Ireland, Earl Spencer would get hold of him and utilize him in building up the foundation of peace and order and security in Ireland, at any rate, for the next 15 years. The next man was Mr. Bamford. Mr. Bamford was a land agent, and a detested land agent, and, therefore, as a matter of course, he had been appointed by Her Majesty's Government; and Mr. Bamford had been sent round upon estates, in which he was himself personally interested, in order to fix rents upon his own relatives. The manner in which he had fixed those rents upon tenants, who were his own relatives, had already been brought under the notice of the House. Of course, a man of such a character was bound to be employed as a Sub-Commissioner. Mr. Mowbray, another Sub-Commissioner, was, as far as he recollected, a Scotchman. Of course, in dealing with Irish rents, they must naturally have a Scotchman. The first thing to do in Ireland was to subject the Irish people to the judicial influences of a Scotchman; that appeared to be one of the great principles of Her Majesty's Government. Even the Chief Secretary represented a Scotch borough; but whether he was a Scotchman himself, he (Mr. Healy) was unable to say. Of course, that fact might have had nothing to do with the appointment of Mr. Mowbray. Mr. Mowbray's first claim to the appointment was that he was a Scotchman; secondly, that he was a Tory; and, thirdly, that he was Secretary to the Agricultural Society of Ireland, which was a Landlords' Association. Mr. Mowbray's conduct on the Bench had been of such a character that the tenants regarded him as their worst enemy; and, therefore, Mr. Mowbray had been continued in his position as Commissioner, while such men as Meek, Davison, Crane, and Grey had been got rid of. There was still another—namely, Mr. Lynch—who, strange to say, although a barrister, had not been appointed a Legal Commissioner. He could not understand why Mr. Lynch had been appointed a Lay Commissioner, because Mr. Lynch, like all the other gentlemen to whom he had referred, had never held a brief. He, therefore, failed to see why he should not have been appointed a Legal Commissioner. By some strange freak the Government had only appointed Mr. Lynch a Lay Commissioner. He (Mr. Healy) thought it was a great mistake. He did not know whether Legal Commissioners drew higher salaries than the rest; but the fact that Mr. Lynch had never held a brief had not been sufficient to insure his promotion. He certainly saw no reason in the world why Mr. Lynch should be allowed to remain among the common herd of Lay Commissioners. What Mr. Lynch did not know about land would fill a library. Mr. Lynch, being an extremely young man, had had no real agricultural experience whatever, and, having had none, he was considered fit to adorn the position of Lay Commissioner. He had now gone through the list of the gentlemen Her Majesty's Government proposed to continue in the office of Sub-Commissioner; but he would ask why, in the name of common sense, gentlemen of this kind had been continued, and why other gentlemen had been dismissed? The inference was plain. Why had Mr. Meek been dismissed? Why had Mr. Wild gone? Why should they never hear again of Mr. Davidson, of Mr. Grey, of Mr. Crane, and others? It was because the Government had found it inconvenient, in view of the Tory attacks upon them, and especially of the attacks in "another place," to continue them; and the Commissioners who were dismissed were those who had acted with the greatest fairness towards the tenants. The conduct of the House of Lords in this matter had been the curse of the Land Act. In the House of Commons the friends of the tenants had never been able to bring forward their grievances, because the Rules of the House, and the time which was at the disposal of private Members, were such that even with constant attempts it was impossible to bring the grievances of the people before the House. But noble Lords, who were themselves interested in land in Ireland, when they found the Land Commissioners acting improperly, from a landlord's point of view, had only to put down a Motion on the Books in order to bring on a discussion. Everybody who knew him knew that he had never had, nor was ever likely to have, an acre of land in his life. He had, therefore, no more interest in this matter, from a personal point of view, than the first man they might meet in the street; but Members of the House of Commons could not bring their grievances fairly forward, and speak on behalf of those they represented, while noble Lords in "another place," the moment they found that things were going in a way they considered improper, as landlords, had only to put down a Motion on the Books of the House, and in a jiffy apologetic speeches came from Lord Oarlingford and other noble Lords who represented the Government, but who were totally unfitted to speak on Irish subjects. The consequence was that the attacks on the Commissioners conducted in the House of Lords had been sufficient to intimidate the Sub-Commissioners who had been endeavouring to do their duty. Their decisions had been distinctly attacked in that House. Motions had been put down which enabled certain noble Lords to bring the question forward; and the result was that every Sub-Commissioner who had acted with any approach to fairness had been dismissed. They might call it dismissal, discontinuance, or suspension, or anything else they liked in the vocabulary of official phrases; but he called it dismissal, and dismissal because they were attacked in "another place" by noble Lords who belonged to the Tory Party. In the House of Commons, the only facility they had for attacking the Commission or the agents of the Government was once a-year, when the Vote for the Land Commission was brought forward. He ventured to assert that if the Government had been willing to pay attention to the complaints and demands of the Irish people, instead of pinning their faith on the complaints of noble Lords, that very few of the gentlemen who had been continued in office would have been acting now as Sub-Commissioners. This was the state of affairs. They had created a gangrene in the minds of the tenants of Ireland. They thought they were settling the Land Question. Aye, they were settling it with sticking-plaster—underneath the old sore was running; and, although it might be that by their Prevention of Crime Act, for a time, they might be keeping down the real public sentiment upon the abortive work of the last few years, these sticking-plaster remedies would yet be found to be utterly futile. They could not keep the country in its present position, straight-waistcoated as it was. He would like to call the attention of the Committee to what happened the other day at the Limerick Convention. At that Convention the question of the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners was considered by a representative body in the most calm and moderate manner. It was an expression of opinion by tenant farmers; and what was the opinion expressed by the delegates? The County of Limerick was one of the most prosperous and comfortable in the whole of Ireland, enjoying as rich a soil as any county in the country. But at that Convention the delegates expressed their opinion by resolution that sooner or later a strike would come against the judicial rents imposed upon them by the Sub-Commissioners. Of course, having passed that resolution, no notice was taken of it. The Government might treat the matter lightly, because anyone could govern in a state of siege; but they would find in the end that it was deserving of their serious consideration. Nobody admired more than he did the straight up-and-down way in which the Chief Secretary endeavoured to address himself to his duties. He had never attempted to depreciate his uniform courtesy to the Irish Members; they were treated by him at all times with fairness, as far as fairness could be exhibited by the partizan of one side towards the partizan of another; but, at the same time, while he admired the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, and believed that he endeavoured to discharge his work with official conscientiousness, as far as his mind would enable him to address himself to the work, from every practical point of view the right hon. Gentleman was just about as fit for the position he occupied as he (Mr. Healy) would be to govern the entire world. There was a total want of sympathy on his part with the Irish people; a failure to appreciate and to understand what it was they wanted. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Gentleman was altogether in the hands of a few first-class clerks in Ireland, and if he wanted to carry on any new idea, he dared not initiate it or take it in hand. It was impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to say—"I will have this or that done." He was immediately put off by some first-class clerk in Dublin, with a salary of £750 a-year, who said—"You cannot do that; that would be altogether against the rules. You must continue Mr. M'Devitt, but we cannot have Mr. Meek or Mr. Grey; because in Dublin Castle we understand all these things, and you do not. You may understand something about India and a little about Devonshire, or the Border Burghs; but you do not know anything about Ireland." The result was that the right hon. Gentleman followed humbly in the track into which he was directed. Now, he (Mr. Healy) wished to know whether this was a Land Act passed for the people or not, or were the Government prepared to depend upon the Land Act when they had got the Prevention of Crime Act no longer in operation? That was the point to which hon. Gentlemen opposite and the Radicals of England must address themselves. They could not coerce the people of Ireland for ever, and sooner or later they must give up their coercive régime. Next year they would have the Representation of the People Bill to consider, and they knew, from the Prime Minister, that it was impossible to pass a Redistribution Bill in the same year; but surely it would be harder to pass a Prevention of Crime Act. Already hon. Members were beginning to appeal to their constituents. The hon. and learned Member opposite the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth), who had voted steadily all through for the Prevention of Crime Act—

Mr. FIRTH said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Member; but it was quite a mistake to represent him as having steadily voted all through for the Prevention of Crime Act.

Mr. HEALY said, he accepted the statement of the hon. and learned Member; but, nevertheless, he had the impression that the hon. and learned Gentleman, and a good many of his Friends, had voted steadily for the Prevention of Crime Act. They now found that it was necessary to go to their constituents, and it was wonderful how they were beginning to appreciate the statistics of Ireland in regard to the decrease of crime. As their only reliance must be the Irish Land Act, why on earth could not they see that it was necessary to have it carried out honestly and fairly? He had never been an advocate of the justice of fixing rents; he believed they could not do it. He had never voted for the Land Act, because he believed that it was an impossible settlement of the Land Question; but he had endeavoured to improve the Act as much as possible. But the fact that it was an impossible settlement of the Land Question was no reason why its administration should be given into the hands of landlord partizans. If there were to be partizans of the landlords, let them act in a straight up-and-down manner, and have partizans appointed on the side of the tenants. If they were to have 40 partizans of the landlords, let them have 40 partizans of the tenants. He ventured to think that out of the 70 or 80 men the Government had appointed, they had not appointed more than a dozen who represented the tenants' side of the question; and the moment any one of them gave a decision against the landlord, he was instantly dismissed at the instance of some noble Lord in "another place." The landlords did not know what a deep debt of gratitude they owed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). He ventured to think that by the action of the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the Land Act alone he had saved the landlords, at least, £1,000,000 a-year, and by his constant and untiring efforts on their behalf he had saved them hundreds and thousands of pounds in the shape of an adequate reduction of rents. The landlords did not realize the service of their best friends; but the unwearied patience of the right hon. and learned Gentleman on their behalf had simply astonished him (Mr. Healy). The tenants had arraigned against them the Whigs and the Tories combined, and, with the exception of a dozen or a score of the people's advocates in that House, there was no one to present their cause to the country. With the House of Lords closed against them; with all the entire hierarchy opposed to them; with Earl Spencer a landlord, Mr. Vernon a landlord, and Mr. Justice O'Hagan an invertebrate Whig, the entire body of the Land Court were in favour of the landlord and against the tenant. He believed the Government had never made a greater mistake than they had in their conduct in regard to this Commission. He ventured to think that, before many years were over, the whole of this business would have to be done over again. At the end of 15 years the rents fixed for the first general term would come to a close; but he was of opinion that long before 15 years there would be a revision of rents, and, if that were so, the landlords would only have themselves to thank for it. They had appointed a set of gentlemen upon the Land Commission, in whom nobody had confidence except the landlords. Every man who had evinced a disposition to befriend the tenants had been chased, while every man who was necessarily a friend of the landlords had been continued in his post. At the present moment they had 17,000 appeals lodged for hearing, and out of them only 6,000 had been disposed of. When they had only been able to dispose of 6,000 appeals in the course of three years, and when they had 11,000 left, he left it to the calculations of any statistician in that House to say what would be likely to be the state of things. Out of the decisions which as yet had been taken to the Court of Appeal, how many had been confirmed before Mr. Justice O'Hagan or Mr. Vernon? About one in 20. How many were altered? All the other 19. And how were they altered? By the rents being raised in almost every single instance. Landlord appeals had been increased by the system of rent-raising initiated by Mr. Justice O'Hagan. When an appeal was made, in almost every case the old rent had been imposed. The real rent reducers, the real Sub-Commissioners, were the gentlemen who signed the "No Rent" Manifesto. The tenants were buoyed up with the false hope of their rent being reduced 10, 15, or 18 per cent; but by the present system of rent-raising the old rent, or very nearly so, was reverted to in the Appeal Court. The Prime Minister had admitted that he would run the Land Act against the Land League, and so the right hon. Gentleman ran the Act against the Land League. The bayonet, false alarms, the gibbet, the cell, and exile reduced the Land League to comparative quiescence, and from that moment the rent regulation fell from 28 to 24 per cent, until at last in the Appeal Court they were left at 15 and 10, and even 5 per cent. In certain instances, as he had noticed the other day, they had stood higher than they had ever been before. Landlords like the Marquess of Waterford and Mr. Blennerhassett, the Member for Kerry, had sent in applications to have their rents raised. He should like to have seen them send in such applications when the "No Rent" Manifesto was in force. These things would not have been done "in the brave days of old." The Government Sub-Commissioners would have looked twice at these petty little mountain grazing plots before they attempted to raise the rents of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Waterford). What was the conclusion drawn from all this experience? It was this. As long as the tenants of Ireland depended on the sense of justice of the British Government, so long would they be baffled, beaten, and defeated; but whenever they attempted to raise an agitation, whenever they showed themselves desperate and determined, then, and then only, would their claims receive attention.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE said, the Land Commission arrangement was a sham from beginning to end, the supposed valuation of land which was going on being a pure pretence. It could not be anything else, looking at the work the Commissioners had to do, therefore this Vote was a pure waste of money. Only the other day he saw a statement in a newspaper to the effect that 197 Irish estates had been, in one place, valued in four hours, the Commissioners having had a drive of six miles out and six miles back again for the purpose. How was it possible that such an extent of land could be valued in so short a time and under such circumstances? It was simply impossible. He had heard, also, that as much as 600 acres of grazing land in Tipperary had been valued in a space of two or three hours—nearly a square mile. How was such a thing possible? It was not to be done—the whole thing was the merest farce. Seeing what the Judge of the Appellate Court had been able to say before the House of Lords Committee, he (Colonel O'Beirne) could not think that this was a Court which valued land as carefully as it should. When the Prime Minister was introducing his Bill, he stated that the Court which was to fix the rents was to be a Judicial Court; but that statement had not been verified. They knew what had happened since 1881. A number of Commissioners had been appointed for political reasons—it was quite true, as the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had stated, that this was much more of a Political Court than a Land Court, and that "Political Court" ought to be its proper name. He protested most emphatically against this waste of money; and, if anyone would support him in moving a reduction of the Vote by £5,000, he should only be too happy to propose it. There was one observation made by the hon. Member for Monaghan with regard to the Appellate Court, which had struck him (Colonel O'Beirne) as unfair. The hon. Member had said the Court was more an institution for raising rents than anything else; but the fact was that by far the larger proportion of the rents submitted to the Court had been confirmed or lowered. That was the case in the Province of Connaught, at any rate, whatever it might be in the rest of Ireland. He had it from persons connected with the land in that Province. He did not wish to say more on the subject than that—he was satisfied with entering a protest against what appeared to him to be nothing more or less than a sham.

MR. LEA said, he did not how far it was desirable to raise a discussion as to the working of the Land Commission on this Vote; but his object in rising was to take exception to some observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) with regard to one of the Sub-Commissioners, Mr. M'Devitt. He did not know much about the working of the Commission; but he was sure that Mr. M'Devitt was an honest, conscientious man, who might be depended upon to do his best as between landlord and tenant. The hon. Member for Monaghan had also said that the House of Lords had been averse to the Land Act. To a certain extent he (Mr. Lea) was bound to agree with the hon. Member, because, no doubt, whilst the Act was passing through the House of Lords it was altered to an appreciable extent; and, further, there could be no question that the discussions which had taken place in that Chamber from time to time had had the effect of intimidating the Land Commission. He had been sorry to see discussions taking place in this House regarding the operations of the Commissioners. Mr. Grey—to whose conduct reference had several times been made by Questions in the House—had been dismissed in consequence of his working of the Act in Donegal; and the result was that nothing would ever drive out of the minds of the tenants that Mr. Grey was in favour of them, and that he had been sent away because his decisions had been favourable to them. They would never be able to wean the tenants from the belief that Mr. Grey was dismissed, not because he was less capable than the other Commissioners, but because he was supposed to be just in his dealings with the peasantry. This gentleman had been engaged in deciding cases in the West of Donegal, one of the poorest districts in the whole of Ireland. Since his removal another Commissioner had heard cases there, and had given valuations of a very similar kind; and, strange to say, a second Commissioner had given decisions there of a somewhat different character. The public had been made acquainted with this difference. He did not know under what procedure it had taken place; but, of course, it had given rise to the opinion that the Chief Commissioners had been influenced not to permit gentlemen of Mr. Grey's views to try the cases of the tenants. He (Mr. Lea) could not believe that the Chief Secretary was responsible; but probably the right hon. Gentleman dealt too much with the head Commission, in Dublin, who saw the Questions put to him in the House from time to time, and were, to a certain extent, intimidated. He believed the system of intimidation had done very much to prejudice the fair working of the Land Act.

Mr. DAWSON wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether it was convenient that acting land agents like Mr. James Green Barry—the land agent of Lord Emly—paid as servants by landowners, should have to do with the consideration of tenants' applications? Was it possible that men receiving salaries could properly sit as Land Commissioners to adjudicate between landlords and tenants? He must press for an answer to that, because, if the facts were as he stated, it must be apparent to the Committee that no system of Land Commission carried on in such a way could have the confidence of the country. The right hon. Gentleman might tell him that Mr. Barry did not sit to adjudicate rents in the district in which Lord Emly owned land; but, in whatever part of Ireland he sat, unless he (Mr. Dawson) was misinformed, he was the agent, and the paid agent, of Lord Emly and other landlords; and it was utterly impossible that a man who was receiving a portion of his daily bread—a large portion of his daily bread—from landlords who derived their livelihood from largely-increased rents, could do justice when he came to adjudicate on these matters. When a man was made a Land Commissioner, he ought to give up other occupations—certainly those connected with land. If a man took an ordinary public office, he was obliged to give up other occupations. An ordinary official could not even receive a salary from the Government, and come here and perform the duties of a legislator. The two things were incompatible; how, then, could a man receive a salary from a landlord, and then go and adjudicate, as a servant of the Government, between landlords and tenants? He could not do it; the position of such a man was absolutely untenable. If he were as snow or ice, he could not escape calumny. And yet the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had shown that several of the Commissioners were circumstanced in this way. Mr. Vernon himself was agent to Lord Pembroke—the richly-paid agent of the largest landlord, and bound to him by more or greater monetary ties than he was to the Land Commission. How could a man like this adjudicate fairly between landlord and tenant, when his first duty, his first love, was to the landlords who paid him? Would the right hon. Gentleman answer this simple question—was it possible that paid land agents could adjudicate fairly between landlords and tenants?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) has made a speech to which I listened with interest and considerable admiration of the great fertility of criticism which it displayed in regard to gentlemen who had been retained as Sub-Commissioners in Ireland. But I do not propose to follow the hon. Member into the details of his criticisms, in the first place, because I consider it would be extremely unfortunate that we should discuss—at any rate, that I should discuss—in this House the fairness or unfairness of people who hold a judicial position. It was another matter when there were 70 or 80 gentlemen who had to be taken out of the ranks of private persons in Ireland, and taken on very short notice — [Mr. HEALY: Hear, hear!] Obviously, on very short notice. How could it be otherwise when 70 or 80 men had to be appointed as Judges who had never been Judges before? It was very possible that out of this number—nay, it was almost certain—that there must be many who would not possess a judicial temperament. But it was a very different matter when, after two or three years' experience, three gentlemen of the very considerable qualities of the Land Commissioners in Ireland, having watched the proceedings of these gentlemen, have picked out from among them, for recommendation to the Lord Lieutenant, those whom they consider to possess judicial faculties. The hon. Member uses the word "dismissed" in connection with the Sub-Commissioners, and says that it will be impossible to invent any words which will veil the fact that the 50 or so gentlemen whose appointments had been discontinued were practically dismissed and discredited because of the decisions they had given. Sir, the position of the Irish Government was this—the work which this large number of Sub-Commissioners was appointed to perform had been nearly accomplished. It was absolutely necessary, in the interests of public economy, that the Commission should be largely reduced in numbers—should, in fact, be reduced to less than half its size—and, under these circumstances, it was absolutely impossible that the whole number of the Sub-Commissioners could be retained. It was absolutely necessary to select from the total number about a third. That is the state of the case, and I think that, under these circumstances, I have been quite justified in deprecating the use of the word "dismissal." The Chief Commissioners inform me, in view of this debate, that what has most struck them, in the enormous majority of the decisions that have been given by the Sub-Commissioners, is the absence of any trace of partizanship; and they are very anxious that from this Bench, at any rate, there should not be said one disparaging word of the gentlemen whose appointments have not been continued. It was necessary that out of a large number a few should be selected; and the Lord Lieutenant, who was charged with the function of making the selection, made it after most careful consultation with the Commissioners, and, for the main part, I may say pretty well entirely on their advice. Now, perhaps the most eloquent—certainly the most pointed—sentence of the hon. Member's speech was that in which he described the Land Commission. His description is still in the memory of the Committee, or of such part of the Committee as heard it; and I must say that I think that, pointed as it was, the hon. Member did not convince the Committee that such men as Mr. Litton, Mr. Vernon, and Mr. Justice O'Hagan can be called a Board who are in the interest of the landlords as against the tenants. I believe these three gentlemen may be thoroughly trusted to make suggestions which can be relied upon by the Irish Government; and, carefully as I listened to the criticism of the hon. Gentleman, I cannot say that my confidence in their recommendations was at all shaken. I will take, for instance, the case of Mr. M'Devitt, who was referred to as a man whom the tenants could not trust. Now, Mr. M'Devitt was a gentleman who was thoroughly conversant with the Land Act to begin with. He wrote an exposition of it in the early part of the history of this question which, in a very short time, ran through four editions.

He was recommended by the Bishop of Raphoe.

MR. HEALY: He is the Bishop's brother.

MR. TREVELYAN: No.

MR. HEALY: Then he is a Bishop's brother.

MR. TREVELYAN: That is no disqualification for the Land Commission. The Bishop said that, in addition to his legal qualification, he had an intimate knowledge of the land tenure of Ulster, and possesses one quality that is sure to win the confidence of all—

MR. HEALY: Why do not you send him to Ulster, then?

MR. TREVELYAN: Really, I must ask to be permitted to go through my task without interruption. The Bishop said—

"He possesses one quality that is sure to win the confidence of all—that is, scrupulous honesty of purpose. From what I know of him, I believe it would be difficult to find any one who would take greater pains to discharge conscientiously any duty entrusted to him."

The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) objected to the re-appointment of Mr. Barry, and described him as a pure landlord's man, who could not be trusted to do justice between landlord and tenant.

MR. DAWSON: I beg pardon. I mentioned him as a typical case, describing him as an agent. He is a personal friend of mine, and I certainly was not objecting to him as an individual. What I desired to point out was, that a land agent, whoever he may be, is hardly the person calculated to be a disinterested adjuster of rents.

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member states it as a fact that Mr. Barry holds an appointment as land agent. I should be sorry to say, in the face of that, that Mr. Barry has given up his agency; but I certainly understood that he had.

MR. DAWSON: I am under correction—I may be wrong.

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not say that this gentleman is not an agent. The subject is one on which I should like to inform myself before making a statement; but my impression is certainly not the same as that of the hon. Member. I should be very glad to abandon my opinion if it turns out that the hon. Member is right and I am wrong. It is difficult to imagine a person who has a more intimate knowledge of matters affecting Irish land than Mr. Barry. So far back as 1869 he was an advocate of the reform of the system of land tenure as it then existed; and I am told that when he was acting as land agent the property under his management was one that was singularly, if not entirely, free from eviction. When I consider these things, and when I look at the Gentlemen who recommended him—whether they are Members of Parliament or Members of the House of Lords—and when I remember also that the Archbishop of Cashel, Dr. Croke, recommended him, I must say that the retention of Mr. Barry as a Sub-Commissioner can in no sense imply that the Land Commissioners, in their recommendation, or the Lord Lieutenant in his acceptance of that recommendation, has done anything which ought to induce the tenants to look with suspicion on the Sub-Commissioners. Then, as to Mr. Vernon himself, whom the hon. Member describes as a land agent, it is very true that he is still an agent, but he is the agent of Lord Pembroke, and the property with which he has to do is in the nature of ground rents. I do not know that it would be too much to say that Lord Pembroke had no agricultural tenants on the property over which Mr. Vernon is agent; but, as a broad assertion, it may be stated that Mr. Vernon, when appointed as Land Commissioner, gave up the agricultural agency of the Marquess of Bath, and, I believe, several other agencies. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) remarked that the noble Lords have very great advantages for starting questions connected with the Land Commission. Now, with that part of his speech I must own I have sympathy. I do not quite know what one may say about what passes in "another place." Remarks are made in "another place" as to what passes here with very great freedom; but we, I suppose, are bound by much stricter Rules than prevail there. In so far as advantage has been taken of facilities afforded for debate in "another place" for throwing discredit upon the Sub-Commissioners, who are, as I think, doing their duty in Ireland, it has been excessive and very unfortunate. Noble Lords have taken advantage of their privileges much too frequently, and I have no doubt that their conduct in that respect has had a disturbing influence, so far as it has gone, upon the minds of the Sub-Commissioners. It is because I do not wish to lay myself open to similar charges that I do not propose to speak in detail of the Sub-Commissioners who have been re-appointed. I conceive that the effect of a hot discussion on the proclivities of any given Judge has always a tendency—human nature being the same on the Bench as off it—to disturb the balance of that Judge's mind. But the hon. Member says that those Sub-Commissioners who have been attacked in the House of Lords have been removed. Well, Sir, on that point, again, I do not wish to enter; but this I will say—that if all the Sub-Commissioners who have been attacked in this House and in the House of Lords, from one side or the other, had been removed, we should have had no Sub-Commissioners at all. [Mr. HEALY: Oh, oh!] Yes; I think that is hardly too broad an assertion to make. During the past year, no doubt, owing to my earnest expostulations, there has been a happy suspension of those attacks on the Sub-Commissioners, which used to be made from more than one quarter in this House at Question time. Months and months may be said to have passed with scarcely a complaint of the conduct of the Sub-Commissioners; but it was not so in the early days of the Commission. Then, scarcely a day passed without some remonstrance as to the course taken by these officials. The hon. Member made some remarks, which, I must say, did not meet with the general approbation of the Committee, as to the Appeal Court. I do not refer to his remarks as to the number of appeals. That is a matter of statistics, and has attracted the observation of everyone interested in Ireland. The number is to be regretted, and it would have gratified the Government very much if they had been able to establish two Courts to get on with the appeals more quickly than they have been doing. But, when you pass on to the procedure of the Court and the character of its decisions, I do not think the hon. Member at all carried with him the unanimous adhesion of the Committee. He described the Appeal Court as a "rent-raising" Court. He stated that in one case out of 20 the rent remained as it was, and that in 19 cases out of 20 they were altered. Well, on that point I have not by me accurate statistics; but, as it is a question of assertion against assertion, I would venture to say that he has been misled, and greatly misled, by the feelings with which he regards the decisions of the Appeal Court. As a matter of fact, the Court is far from being a rent-raising Court. The amount to which it has raised rents is quite as likely to be counted by hundreds as by tens of thousands. Taking Ireland through, I think that, so far from 19 rents out of 20 having been altered, it will be found that decidedly those which have been confirmed are a large proportion of the total number of cases. On that point, however, I speak more from general observation than from statistics. I will try and ascertain exactly how the case stands; but I do not hesitate to say that the sweeping condemnation the hon. Member passed on the Appeal Court was one which did not meet with the adhesion of the Committee. The hon. Member speaks of the real effective Land Commission being the body which issued the "No Rent" Manifesto. He says that Manifesto had great influence; that soon after its issue large reductions were made, and that the reductions have now come down to a very small figure. Sir, it is quite true that during the very first months the reductions were distinctly larger than they have been at any other period; but I believe the reason of that was a very simple one—namely, that the worst cases, to a very large extent, came into Court first. There was a fall very soon, but that fall, after the very first period, has been extremely slow; and I have no reason to think that at this moment there is any fall at all. I believe that at present the reductions of rent are on an average of 18 or 19 per cent, and that is very little below the figure at which they have stood during almost all the period the Sub-Commissioners have been sitting, with the exception of the very first months. The hon. Member says that certain noblemen and gentlemen have lately contrived to get their rents raised. Well, I must say that considering the enormous number of cases that have been brought into Court, and considering that on some estates in Ireland the tenants were very lightly rented, that it would be a very serious imputation against the Sub-Commissioners if the rents were not occasionally raised. I think that to make a general observation to the effect that rents have been raised, and that, therefore, the decisions have been unjust, is to make a charge against a Judicial Body which should not be made. The hon. Member says that in these matters I am in the hands of first class clerks who are paid £750 a-year. In this case, at any rate, it is not so. I do not deny that I am in the hands of certain gentlemen who understand these matters better than I do; but they are not first class clerks with salaries of £750 a-year—they are the Land Commissioners who are paid £3,000 a-year. I trust to these gentlemen, and if it be possible to get three persons who represent the average opinion and the average judgment of Ireland as between landlord and tenant, they are the persons, and it is upon their recommendation that the appointments have been made. There is not one appointment with regard to which our hands have been forced. The original recommendations may have been modified—no doubt they have been modified by discussion—but the 10 or 15 gentlemen who have been selected out of the entire body of Sub-Commissioners are those who have acquired the confidence of the three Land Commissioners. The hon. Member says that the Act of 1881 was passed in order to pacify Ireland, and he asks me whether I think that it has done so. I do not know, but at any rate I should be right in saying this—that the work which has been done by the Land Commission is a gigantic work. It has been probably in amount in excess of that which was expected even by those who took a favourable view of the operations that might be anticipated from the Land Commission. In the course of two years no less than 105,000 cases of fair rents have been disposed of. Some 74,000 have been actually fixed, and 70,000 agreements have been arrived at under the auspices of the Court—that was to say, that in 144,000 cases a lease of 15 years and a judicial rent has been given to the tenants, with a reduction on the previous rents of £540,000 a-year. That represents only the direct work of the Commissioners. The indirect work is recorded nowhere except in the rent books of the various estates where arrangements have been made between landlord and tenant under the knowledge that, if arrangements are not made in an amicable manner, they must be made under litigation. The Land Act has proved so far a real land settlement for Ireland. If that be so—and I believe it is—the effect which it must have on the country will be a pacifying effect. I do not know what result it may have upon the political movement in which the hon. Member and his friends take so much interest; but I know that the Irish tenant farmers now entertain a sense of security such as they have ardently wished to enjoy, and such as they have never enjoyed before, and that, at the same time, even on the very worst estates in Ireland, they have been able to obtain that reduction of rent which the English and Scotch tenants have obtained by economical causes. These are propositions which can hardly be denied. As I have before stated, I am unwilling to enter into any discussion on the personal merits of the gentlemen who have been selected for appointment; but I believe they represent the result of the most careful observation on the part of the Land Commissioners during the last two years, and I am certain that the Commissioners themselves, who have been the advisers of the Government in this matter, have been actuated alone by the love of justice towards Ireland.

Mr. GIBSON said, that this Motion was one of such extreme importance that he did not like to allow the opportunity to pass without making a few brief observations upon it. The Land Act was now the law of the land, and the position which he had always taken up in reference to it had been uniform and consistent—namely, that since it had been placed on the Statute Book it was entitled to be regarded fairly and reasonably by all members of the community, and that it was bound to be administered by those who were responsible for its administration impartially, temperately, and fairly, not in the interest of one class, but in the legitimate interests of all parties concerned. He had never swerved from that attitude towards the Land Act since it became law, and it was not his intention to do so now. But he thought it should not be open to objection if he were to point out where the administration of the Act had failed to substantiate the statements of its authors. When it was passing through Parliament, they were told it would only apply to exceptional, few, and rare cases in Ireland; that was stated in speech after speech by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench; but, as a matter of fact, they found that the Act had been applied to almost all classes of estates in Ireland; that no class of property and no class of rent had been in the slightest degree exempt from the operation of the Act. They had been told over and over again by the Prime Minister and others that the old properties were safe, and that it was only the new proprietors who had abused their rights who would be called into question under this Act. But that was not their experience of its administration. Some old proprietors had been brought into the Land Court, and they could undoubtedly point to substantial reductions made in their rentals. It would appear, without going into details, that those who had been rack-renters got off best, and that the man who had not raised his rents at all, inasmuch as it was thought wise and politic to have reductions, had his rent reduced; and if a man had raised his rent to a rack-renting level, his rents were, of course, reduced too, but rarely had he been reduced below the level from which he had succeeded in raising them for himself. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Lea) had mentioned what was at that moment a rather prevalent theory on the other side of the House. The hon. Member had had a fling at the action of the House of Lords. He did so most temperately, as if he were not standing upon strong ground; he alluded to the changes made in the Act when it was passing through the other House of Parliament. He need not go into the details of those changes; but he presumed that the hon. Member had some belief in Earl Granville and in Lord Carlingford. Now, those eminent statesmen had pointed out that when the Land Bill was emerging from the House of Lords, it was emerging with distinct improvements effected by the changes made in it by the other House. That was the statement made by responsible Members of the Government with reference to the few and limited alterations to which the House of Lords had subjected the measure. If the Prime Minister, in the progress of the discussion on the Land Act, with his boundless resources of language and his absolutely illimitable ingenuity, had foreshadowed what would be its actual working, as they now knew it by experience, he had a strong suspicion that the right hon. Gentleman would have had considerable difficulty in making a statement which would be acceptable to the House. With respect to the gentlemen who had been appointed as Sub-Commissioners—a very important and serious appointment—he was bound to say that the system of having temporary Judges without stability in their appointments, and without any guarantee whatever for their independence, appeared to him to be radically unsound. It was, in his opinion, quite absurd to have men, invested with the most tremendous judicial discretion, hanging upon the breath of the Government for the bread they ate day by day and month by month; and it was a perfect miracle to him that the administration of the Act had not utterly broken down under the logic of facts. He declined to go in detail into the very disagreeable task of canvassing the particular merits of the Sub-Commissioners. He presumed that the Government had proceeded upon some system of selection, and that they had acted, as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Trevelyan), on the recommendation of the Land Commissioners. If that were so, he supposed they had tried to discharge this most difficult and delicate function in the best way they could. He did not mean to say that if other people had had the selection of these gentlemen, that the very same names would have been found on the list. But he declined to go into that question. He had now come to that point of experience with regard to the Land Act that he preferred not to indulge in prophecy, but to wait for further experience of its operation. He found that some of those Sub-Commissioners, whom he believed would turn out fairly good, had not come up to that very moderate expectation, and that those from whom he expected nothing had not proved to be quite so deficient. No one could say that he was using the language of exaggeration. He had not used words of great eulogy on the one side or severe condemnation on the other—he simply said he had been somewhat disappointed in the expectations he had formed. He did not like to ask any questions on one subject of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It seemed to him, however, that Lord Monck occupied a very curious position; and he inferred from the fact that a Bill was to be introduced that he was within the last days of his judicial career. He did not know the position in reference to the new Bill for the appointment of a new Land Commissioner; but he supposed that some information on that subject would one day be forthcoming. He did not like to go beyond negatives on that occasion; but he supposed they would be told in due time who was the remarkable person pointed at. He should be glad to know when they might look for a reduction of the enormous expense of the administration of the Land Commission. He had always understood that there would, in a year or two, be a considerable reduction of expense, and that at the end of seven years there would be a still further reduction, and that it might be assumed that then the matter would settle down to something like a normal state. There was one figure quoted by the right hon. Gentleman which ought not to be forgotten. It was stated that the Land Act had done very little; but it had had one tremendous effect—namely, that of reducing the rents by over £500,000 a-year. That was a great fact which should not be forgotten in considering this question. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned—he did not know whether he intended to make any charge against the Irish landlords—that the English tenants had gained their reduction of rents by the operation of economic laws; and he seemed to point out that the Irish tenants were gaining a similar reduction by the operation of the Land Act. But he (Mr. Gibson) would make this remark—that the English tenants had gained a reduction of rent by the application of economic laws which could not be resisted or controlled, while the Irish landlords had had to submit to a reduction by putting aside economic laws. There had been in England nothing like the demand for land which existed in Ireland; the Irish landlords, therefore, were compelled to submit to the reduction of their rents in the face of that demand, whereas the question of rent in England had been simply settled by the operation of the law of supply and demand. At that period of the Session he did not propose to discuss the Rent

Mr. Gibson

Purchase Clauses, which were, of course, a very tempting subject; but he was bound to say that the Bill dealing with those clauses might, as to several of its clauses at least, very well have been kept alive. Upon that subject there was no considerable difference of opinion; and while he believed that the Guarantee Clause had not many friends in any part of the House, he thought there was a substantial agreement of opinion upon other parts of the Bill. He thought it was a matter for regret that some efforts had not been made to get rid of the controversial matter, and to adhere to those parts of the measure in regard to which but little controversy was likely to arise. If the Guarantee Clause had been dropped, no doubt many other things might have gone with it; but there were other portions of the Bill which might have done something substantial to remove friction in the working of the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act, and which might have tended to modify the present deadlock in the land market. Even at that late period of the Session he should be glad to welcome any effort that could be made, or any suggestion that could be offered, for the removal, or the modification at all events, of the present dead-lock in the Irish land market, which everyone must deplore, and the modification or removal of which would be well worth a substantial expenditure of Imperial funds.

Mr. SYNAN said, there were some observations in the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down to which he desired to reply briefly. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had told them that the Prime Minister, when he introduced the Bill, had held out a promise which induced the House to pass that measure, and that that promise had never been fulfilled. But there was nothing very extraordinary in that. It was the business of everyone who introduced a Bill to the House of Commons to hold out hopes that the Bill would not be so bad as certain persons thought it would be; and the Prime Minister had, in order to tempt the Irish landlord to swallow the pill, to make certain promises which had not been realized, and which could not be realized. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had told the Committee that the reduction of rents, brought about as between England and Ireland, had been effected by different means. The argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that the demand for land in Ireland was so much greater than in England. But that was the argument on which the Land Act of 1870 was founded, and on which the Act of 1881 was also founded; it was that the demand for land had raised the rent above its ordinary price and produced rack-rentals. The consequence was that the Irish landlords had had to yield to Acts of Parliament when they would not yield to the force of economic laws. Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman had gone into the question of property, and had concluded his remarks upon that subject by saying that he would not prophesy; he had, in fact, adopted the maxim—"Do not prophesy before you know." That was the principle upon which the right hon. and learned Gentleman acted, and he had very prudently done so on the present occasion. Then he said that £500,000 a-year of reduction in Irish rents had been made; but he did not tell the Committee what proportion that amount bore to the amount of the reduction of rents in England, and whether that proportion was more or less than the proportion which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland stated had been brought about by economic laws in England; so that he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had left that part of the case in the same position in which he found it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had addressed himself to the Motion before the House in a general sense; and he did not think he had produced the case of any landlord to show that the landlords had been greatly injured. But he had not said one word as to whether the tenants had been injured, or whether they were satisfied with the working of the Act. Now, that brought him to the statement—perhaps the cardinal statement made that evening by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—that the Land Commission was a representative body of the tenants of Ireland, as well as of the landlords of Ireland. But where, he asked, did the right hon. Gentleman discover that? Would he give the Committee the name of one Land Commissioner who was the representative of the tenants of Ireland? There was the first Commissioner, whom he knew to be a distinguished man in every sense, as a lawyer, a man of letters, and, as the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had called him, a poet. He did not wish to say one word derogatory of that gentleman; but he himself had stated that he did not know much about the value of land in Ireland, and that he was simply the administrator of the law; he knew nothing as to whether rents ought to be raised or reduced; all he had to do was to consider the evidence laid before him. But he was bound to express the opinion in his behalf that his sympathies were as much for the tenants as for the landlords; and that when he (Mr. Synan) was personally acquainted with him, that, perhaps, they were more with the tenants than with the landlords. But how could anyone in the position which he now occupied be said to be a representative of the tenants? Surely that could not be maintained, because he was a Judge to administer the law, and he would perform his office without sympathy either for one class or the other, simply carrying out the law upon the evidence before him. The second Commissioner was a lawyer, a mediocre lawyer, bearing no proportion in respect of abilities or attainments to those exhibited by the Chief Commissioner. Could the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland tell the Committee that he was a representative of the tenants of Ireland? This gentleman sprung from the landlords. He did not know whether his sympathies were with the landlords or with the tenants; but he had spent a few months in that House, and certainly had shown himself to be conversant with the Act of 1881. But what evidence had he given in that House, or what evidence had he given since his appointment, of his being the representative of the tenants of Ireland? Surely, then, it was absurd to say that either the first or second Commissioners were representatives of the Irish tenants. Now with regard to the third Commissioner. He had been an agent for the collection of ground rents; there was a good deal of agricultural land in his district; but, surely, from his whole life and associations, Mr. Vernon must be rather a representative of the landlords than of the tenants of Ireland.

Indeed, when there was a difference of opinion between the Commissioners, he had almost always sided with the landlords as against the tenants, and he had succeeded to this extent—that he always managed to get the Court of Appeal to decide in his favour. Now, he had gone through the qualifications of the Commissioners one by one, and he trusted that he should never hear again that they constituted a Body representative of the tenants of Ireland.

What was the opinion of the tenants themselves? Did they think that the Land Commission was representative of their interests? He was not going into any cases; but he could say that the Irish tenants certainly did not regard the Land Commission in that light. And now he came to the question of appeal, on which subject he could not go to the same length as his hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had gone. He said that the rents in one case out of 20 had been left the same as before they came into Court. Now, so far as his (Mr. Synan's) experience and knowledge of the matters published to Members of the House, and which he had seen in the newspapers, went, the Commission, unless where overruled by the third Member of the Commission, who was a landlord Commissioner, generally adopted the decision of the Sub-Commissioners; but that did not prove that the Sub-Commissioners were right. He had a word or two to say to the Committee as to what the tenants of Ireland thought upon this question. Let him allude to what had been stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). The right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated—and he (Mr. Synan) was astonished to hear him—that the House of Lords improved the Bill of 1881. He (Mr. Synan) thought he knew something about the Bill, and also about the Bill of 1870. Who destroyed the Improvement Clause of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), the very thing that the tenants of Ireland complained about, the very thing that constituted the grievance of the tenants? Who destroyed the effect of the clause suggested by his hon. Friend but the House of Lords? That was certainly an improvement of the Bill in a wrong direction; and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman meant that, he (Mr. Synan) agreed with him; but if he meant to say that they improved the Bill in the tenants' direction, surely the proof was palpable that the tenants of Ireland had lost all confidence in the Bill and the administration of the Bill since the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath," upon the Improvement Clause of the Act of 1881, which Improvement Clause was the act of "another place." Well, now he came to the general question as to the action of the Sub-Commissions. He did not propose to go into the individual merits of the Members of the Sub-Commissions; beyond the legal Members of the Sub-Commissions he knew nothing about the Commissions. He, however, knew this—that he recommended that it was his duty to recommend several men in his own county whom he thought ought to be on the Sub-Commission. The men he proposed were large working farmers; but every recommendation of his was rejected, and they were, he thought, rejected on the ground that the sympathies of the men were with the tenants, and not with the landlords. He did not mean to say that their sympathies were not with the tenants, but they certainly had no prejudices against the landlords; but every man who was known to have sympathy with the tenants, and who was a working farmer himself, was, to his (Mr. Synan's) knowledge, rejected. He did not complain of that; he did not blame the Irish Government; he did not mean to say that the Lord Lieutenant knew anything about these men; His Excellency took the recommendations submitted to him by Members of Parliament, by landlords, and by others. He (Mr. Synan) understood that the Members for Ulster had the nomination of the whole of the Sub-Commissioners, so far as the North of Ireland was concerned. He did not deny that the Lord Lieutenant made the appointments faithfully and honestly; but then what was the body that appointed; to whom did the Lord Lieutenant refer the appointments? Viris custodes custodiet? What did the two lawyers of the Land Commission know about the merits of the men who were submitted to them so far as the valuation of land was concerned? Nothing whatever; how was it possible they could know anything about it?

Mr. Synan

Mr. Vernon might know the merits of the men with whom he was personally acquainted; but he could not know anything about the others who were recommended, and what he (Mr. Synan) had said about the third Member of the Commission, both in and outside that House, he was quite prepared to repeat. Mr. Vernon's sympathies were decidedly with the landlords; and if he was to be the person who was to have the nomination of the Sub-Commissioners, what was the meaning of telling him (Mr. Synan) that the Sub-Commissioners were really men who sympathized with the tenants? He did not want to say there were not excellent men on the Sub-Commissions, numbering 24. The Commissions, however, had now been reduced to 10; and what was the character of the 10? He would not say anything about it himself; but his hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had expressed his opinion. The hon. Member had told them that the Sub-Commissioners, who were to be dismissed on the 18th of August, had sympathies and leanings with the tenants, and the hon. Gentleman had stated that to the Committee as a grievance. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Healy) considered the statement he had made well founded; and surely he ought to be a good judge, inasmuch as he had taken great interest in the Land Act, and knew the opinions of the tenant farmers in Ireland as well as any man. He (Mr. Synan) had a great knowledge of the tenant farmers himself, he had mixed with them all his life; but his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy) had the unanimous sympathy of the tenant farmers of Ireland wherever he went, and he told the Committee that every man on the Sub-Commission who sympathized with the tenants had been dismissed, while only those were being retained who had landlord leanings and proclivities. Now, he (Mr. Synan) came to another point of a general character, and he mentioned it because it had been forced upon him; he mentioned it because the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) had said that the Land Commission was a representative Body of the tenants of Ireland; but it was nothing of the kind. When did the Committee think that the 10 Commissions would have disposed of the cases of the 600,000 tenants of Ireland?

If they deducted the 100,000 leaseholders there would still be left 500,000 tenants. The 24 Commissions which had been sitting up to this had decided only 100,000 cases, while 70,000 cases had been decided out of Court. If, therefore, 24 Commissions could only decide 100,000 cases in three years, how long would the 10 Commissions be occupied in deciding the remaining cases? The right hon. Gentleman could work the matter out for himself. What was the goal at which they were aiming, and at which the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to aim by the Bill he introduced a short time ago, but which he dropped so very hastily? Was it peasant proprietary? If so, how could they have peasant proprietary until they had fixed the judicial rents of the tenants of Ireland? Would any man of the 400,000 or 500,000 who had not gone into Court come to any arrangement with his landlord as to number of years' purchase that he was to give for a rack rent? Why, the most remarkable instance had occurred in his own county. The Earl of Devon had his land for sale, and he was willing to take less even than the 20 years' purchase which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, by his Bill, fixed as the value of Irish land. Why, some of the tenants refused to make an offer; some of them would give 10, some of them would give 12; but he did not know that any of them went as far as to offer 16 years' purchase. This was only a single instance of the impossibility of arriving at a settlement of the question upon the present system. He did not mean to say that some of the tenants were not as unreasonable as some landlords; but was it unreasonable for any man to ask how a tenant and landlord could come together to fix the number of years' purchase which should be paid for a holding when the judicial rent of that holding had not been fixed? And by the scheme the Government had just framed they were postponing the settlement of the question until the remote future. He had given the Committee a rule-of-three sum, and if they worked it out they would find that the 10 Commissions would be 15 years in deciding the remaining applications for the fixing of judicial rents. It was impossible to obtain a peasant proprietary in Ireland until the judicial rent of the different holdings had been fixed; and yet the Government would stop, by the very thing they were now doing, the progress of their Bill of 1881. The Government were, by their own action, defeating the object of their own Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had said that the judicial rents which were now being fixed were rack rents, and that an amendment of the law was necessary. He did not go as far as his hon. Friend; but he did go the length of saying that some of the judicial rents were rack rents, and he would give a proof of his assertion. In his own county there were two estates lying side by side, on one of which the judicial rents had been settled. In the one case the tenants went into Court and came out with a reduction of about 5 per cent, the land there being very good. Upon the adjoining estate, however, the landlord had settled with his tenants. The land was of the very same character as that in the first case, and yet the landlord had granted reductions of rent of 10 per cent. Did they mean to tell him that under such circumstances the tenants would go into the Land Courts; but even if the tenants were disposed to go into the Courts, the Government had so limited the number that many cases could not be decided for years to come. He was sorry to say that tenants would not go into the Courts. He knew many leaseholders who had refused to go into Court, even where the landlord had given his consent; they would sooner deal with the landlord outside the Court than go to the Court and come out with what they considered rack rents. What had produced this feeling on the part of the tenants? A want of confidence in the Sub-Commissions. He did not say that the Sub-Commissions were not useful. Where there was a rack-renting landlord the Sub-Commissions were most valuable, because the tenants had some chance at all events of having a fair rent fixed. Unless, however, the tenants had confidence in the Sub-Commissions they would not resort to the Land Courts, but would prefer to arrange with their landlords. He believed in the indirect benefit of the Land Act rather than in its direct benefit. The Act had induced landlords to make arrangements with their tenants; but by what they were now doing, and by alleging that the Land Commission and Sub-Commissions represented the tenants as well as the landlords of Ireland, the Government were making the greatest mistake they ever made. They were destroying the benefit of their Act. They were postponing its operation to the remote future, and doing much to prevent the establishment of that peasant proprietary which they were all anxious to see. He was afraid that unless the administration of the Act was vastly improved there would be another land agitation as violent as that which had just closed.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he should confine the few remarks he had to make to one portion of the subject. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that by Clause 19 of the Land Act an attempt was made to encourage the building of labourers' cottages on the farms of Ireland. He noticed that in their Report this year the Land Commissioners stated that the 19th section of the Act had not been operative to any large extent. The number of orders made by the Sub-Commissioners under this section, during the year ending August, 1883, was 260, and in the preceding year 226—that was to say that in round numbers, up to August of last year, about 500 orders were made by the Sub-Commissioners for the erection or repair of labourers' cottages; and, supposing the progress to be about the same up to August in this year, about 700 orders had been made. Now they came to the subject of how these orders had been carried out. His hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) succeeded in passing an Act making and putting a heavy penalty upon the occupier who, having obtained a reduction of rent himself, and having been ordered to provide for his labourer, failed to do so. But he added a condition which, unfortunately, was not accepted by the Treasury. He suggested that the Land Commissioners should have the power of appointing Inspectors to see that their orders were carried out. The Treasury objected, and obliged the hon. Member to withdraw that provision from his Bill, and a very unfortunate interference it was on the part of the Treasury.

Mr. Synan

When the Labourers' Act was passed last year a clause was introduced seeking to remedy that evil by making the Sanitary Authority—that was to say the Boards of Guardians—responsible for the carrying out of the orders of the Sub-Commissioners, and the Land Commissioners stated in their Report that they had in every instance communicated the order to the Union concerned. He hoped that by a Return that would shortly be furnished to the House the Committee would be able to form a correct opinion as to how many of the orders had been carried out. He was perfectly certain that it would turn out that not half of the 600 or 700 orders had been complied with; because, although the Act said that the Sanitary Authority should do so and so, there was no one to see that any given Board of Guardians put the Act in force in its Union, unless the labourer himself came forward. Now, they knew that the labourer was generally in a very dependent position, and that, therefore, he was not likely himself to come forward and complain of the inadequacy of his dwelling. It was very much to be regretted that the action of the Treasury had marred the effect of that clause, and the question now was what legislative enactment could be passed to remedy the defect. He thought his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan), in his capacity as President of the Local Government Board, might do something; he might have the attention of Boards of Guardians called to the necessity of putting the clause into operation, and of employing the relieving officers, who were also sanitary officers, for the purpose of seeing that the orders made under the section were carried out. He thought, also, something might be done by hon. Members opposite, because there was no doubt that if there had existed any public opinion on this subject many cottages would have been built before now. Boards of Guardians in Ireland represented to a very great extent public opinion. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on a recent occasion attacked very warmly the Board of Works, because they did not carry out in a proper spirit Acts which had been passed for the benefit of the Irish people. Now, here was an Act involving no expense upon the Treasury, no responsibility upon the Boards of Guardians, except that of seeing that an occupier who had obtained a reduction of rent should share that reduction, in a sense, with his labourers. Hon. Members opposite had possession of the platform and of the Press to a great extent in Ireland; and, therefore, they could do a great deal—and he hoped they would—to secure the operation of the clauses affecting labourers' dwellings. He was sorry to see the other day in County Limerick an advocate of the labourers complaining that the Labourers' Act was not put in force in a certain Union, the farmers in which Union were opposing the operation of the Act. He hoped the Chief Secretary would see that the 19th clause of the Land Act was made operative.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he thought that from the action of the Sub-Commissions in Ireland lately, and from the manner in which the most popular of those Commissions were about to be dealt with by the Government, there was a plain moral to be drawn which the Irish people would not be slow to draw; and that was that it was an evil day for popular interests in Ireland when political agitation in that country declined. The Government professed to be very anxious for a return of peace and quietude, and of what they called law and order in that country; and from time to time they quoted, with great pleasure, statistics tending to show that that was the course which events were now taking. But what did the Irish people see concurrently with all this? They could see that as crime declined, and as peace and order were restored in Ireland, in the same proportion the reduction of rents which the Sub-Commissions had been making declined. When Ireland was alive, when the people were determined, and when there was a serious agitation for popular rights and common justice and relief from oppression, the rack rents came down pretty fast; but now that a period of comparative quietude had come it was remarked that the reductions of rent had dwindled down from 25 per cent to 18 and 15 per cent. He had no doubt whatever that as the condition of Ireland improved, the reduction of rack rents or unfair rents would become smaller and smaller until they did not amount to more than 10 or 5 per cent. Now, they were told by the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) that the difference in the amount of reductions made by the Sub-Commissions was owing to the fact that there was a rush into the Land Courts in the earlier stages of the business, and that the worst cases were the first to be dealt with. How did the right hon. Gentleman make that out? Undoubtedly there was a great accumulation of cases when the Land Courts commenced their sittings, but how did the Chief Secretary make out the allegation that the worst cases were the first to be dealt with? He (Mr. Sullivan) maintained that the cases taken first were average cases and that the cases were taken in the order in which they came. There was no selection made of the worst cases, none whatever, and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to make good his allegation. But if it were true that the reductions of 25 per cent made by the Land Commissions in the early stages of their inquiries were the consequence of the rush that was made into Court the Government stood convicted. The Government were convicted of preventing the Irish National Land League submitting test cases. It was declared by the Leader of the Irish people, and by the Leaders of the Irish National Land League, that they intended to submit to the Irish Land Commission a set of test cases on the very opening of the Commission's business, and for so saying and doing the Leader of the Irish people was thrown into prison. That was one of the counts of the indictment against him—namely, that instead of allowing the rush into Court he intended to have submitted to those Courts a series of test cases. It was for recommending the Irish people to await the result of the test cases that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and others who acted with him, were thrown into the cells of Richmond and Kilmainham Gaols. Therefore, he (Mr. Sullivan) thought that the explanation on the part of the Government lay very badly indeed in their mouths. Now, with reference to some of the Sub-Commissions which were about to be discontinued, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did not like the word "dismissed." It was a very remarkable fact—and nothing the right hon. Gentleman could say would explain it away to the satisfaction of the Irish people—it was a very remarkable fact that the Sub-Commissions in which the tenantry of Ireland had the most confidence were those which were to be discontinued. They did their business in the most impartial and most proper manner; but it happened, nevertheless, that the services of the gentlemen in whose decisions the people of Ireland had the greatest confidence were to be dispensed with, while the pets and favourites of the landlords, and of the Irish Tories and Orangemen, were to be continued in office. The Chief Secretary was very fond of the dismissed gentlemen, no doubt; but they might apply to him, with singular appropriateness, the old saying:—

"Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love;
But why did you kick me downstairs?"

Taking the case of M'Devitt, the right hon. Gentleman said he was highly recommended—highly spoken of and written of by, amongst others, eminent and respected Catholic Bishops in Ireland. He (Mr. Sullivan) did not see anything very astonishing in that. It was not with what had been said about these gentlemen before their appointment that they had to deal, but with what was to be said of them now that the Irish people had had some experience of their way of thinking and way of acting. It was within the recollection of all that gentlemen of very excellent reputations indeed had been appointed to various public offices in Ireland, and had very soon changed. That was their experience in his country. It was a well-known fact that men soon changed their colours and their minds, or, at least, their mode of action, after commencing to put Government pay into their pockets. Therefore, the question was not "What sort of a character had Mr. M'Devitt before he became a Government placeman?" but "What character has he earned for himself since he has been in the Government service?" His (Mr. Sullivan's) contention was that this gentleman's conduct had not been such as to cause the Irish people to prefer him to any of the Sub-Commissioners who had been dismissed by the Irish Government. The Committee heard a great deal about the Chief Commissioners. They, too, were all excellent and able men; but he recollected very well that the very moment the names of these three gentlemen were first mentioned to the House, it was said by Irishmen who knew them all that one man was, in reality, the whole Commission, and that man was the representative of the landlords—Mr. Vernon. It was said and believed at the very first, and experience from that day to this had confirmed the judgment, that that one man would rule the Commission. Mr. Litton—whom he (Mr. Sullivan) had had the pleasure of knowing in the House—was a very excellent gentleman, a fair-minded, just man; but he was no match, in a contest of this kind, for Mr. Vernon—a representative of the landlord party—a very extensive land agent. So with regard to Mr. O'Hagan. He was a very estimable man, no doubt; at one time a man of patriotic and national proclivities—a man who wrote some beautiful poetry, full of national sentiment, which would live long after the character of its author, as a patriot, had departed, which would live in Irish literature long after the man himself had been gathered to his fathers. But the man who, in his youth, or in his manhood, as the case might be, had written national poems, or national letters, or national articles, was about the last man he (Mr. Sullivan) would trust after he had become a placeman in the pay of the British Government; because the memory of his former reputation would be always before him, and he would be always trying to convince his colleagues, wherever he might be, that he was no longer a Nationalist, no longer a patriot, and that he could be relied on as much as any other man to do the work that the British Government had appointed him to do. So it was with the Sub-Commissioners, and so it was with the Chief Commissioners. And now they came to this—that Ireland, being again forced down in one way or another—the stress of public agitation in that country having somewhat abated—had to submit to constantly-decreasing reductions of rent in the Land Court. The reward of the Irish people for this so-called return to peace, law, and order was this coming down of the Land Commissioners—this falling-off in their mode of dealing with unfair rents. What was the lesson the Irish people had to derive therefrom? The people read these things broadly and roughly; but they read them, he thought, rightly on the whole. The moral they would draw from the whole set of circumstances was this—that if they wished justice to be done to them, as justice did yet remain to be done, they must keep up agitating, and make their enemies, as they had made them before, afraid of them. He was old enough to remember in Irish history periods in which there was no political life. He remembered the time of depression which followed the Famines of 1848 and 1849, and the traitorism of the Keogh and Sadleir party, who betrayed the interests of the Irish people on the floor of that House. He remembered the hush of misery and despair that came over the country; and this also he remembered—that during the whole of that time nothing was done for Ireland. Nothing was done until the people took heart again, and rose to a certain sense of their position in their own country. They had won something, and he was glad of it—proud of it. He had never denied it—he had stated on Irish platforms, as he stated here, that the Land Act had been a great Act of Emancipation for the Irish tenantry, and for the whole Irish nation, not merely because of the reduction of rents that it had brought about, but because of the lifting up of the hearts of the Irish people, who found that, after all, notwithstanding the mighty forces arrayed against them, they could yet conquer as they had conquered in the past. The Irish people, up to this, however, had only conquered half justice, and he counselled them not to subside and suspend their efforts, but to go on with open and fearless agitation for their rights. If they did, in time they would win the other half measure of justice which was their due. That was the moral he drew from existing circumstances, and that was the moral he trusted the Irish people would draw from them. It was not well, he maintained, for the Government to teach that moral to the Irish people—to teach that, in proportion as they subsided and held their peace, and were not organized, so did the desire of the British Parliament to do them justice decline, and that it was only as they rose in agitation, and almost set the country aflame, that that House, and those who ruled it, would listen to their demands, however just and reasonable they might be. He had heard that night that about £500,000 per annum had been saved to the tenantry by the action of the Irish Land Act. He did not doubt it—he was glad of it—but every penny of this money was their own. They had got nothing from anybody—nothing which did not belong to them. He had heard the taking of this money from those who lately had been receiving it stigmatized as “robbery.” Aye, there was robbery in the case, but the robbers were those who had been taking the £500,000 out of the pockets of the Irish peasantry, with no justice for it except the permission of the law of the land. That there was that permission he granted. But what was this law of the land? It was law made by landlords to enable them to plunder the peasantry. He had heard hon. and right hon. Gentlemen in that House speak of the Irish servant girls in America, England, and elsewhere, sending over money to Ireland to sustain their poor relatives. The fault found with these servant girls was that they no longer sent this money over to go into the pockets of these hon. and right hon. Gentleman. Where had these earnings gone hitherto? Why, into the pockets of the Irish landlords. Such was the old system—of so cruel and infamous a character was it that it extracted not only from the poor people at home, working and living on the soil, the fruits of their toil, but it put under contribution their sons and daughters who had fled to other lands to sustain themselves, and to escape the misery and poverty that they had experience of at home. It was a fact that in years gone by the rack rents in Ireland were paid, to a large extent, out of the earnings of the young men and young women in England, America, and Australia. Thank God that that system, if not quite ended, at all events had been broken down; and, he asked, with what face could these rack-renters—whose names appeared in the Blue Books as such, whose names were on record and would stand in these official volumes, in everything but the strict legal sense, as those of convicted thieves—with what face could these people stand upon the Benches of that House, or anywhere else, and censure the Irish people at home and abroad for their efforts to mitigate this oppression and end this cruel law? If he had unduly detained the Committee, it was because he had wished to put before it this plain fact—that he felt himself, and believed that others felt also, that the cause of this proportionate diminution in the reduction of rents was the peace and quietness and absence of excitement in Ireland, and he hoped there would be an end to that. Not that he counselled disorder, not that he counselled criminal acts; but he did counsel organization and legitimate public action, and did tell the Irish people that failing in that they would fail in everything, and that maintaining that as they ought to maintain it they would obtain from this House of Commons or from any House of Commons, and from this Government or from any Government which might follow it—they would ultimately obtain, in spite of all the powers arrayed against them, the full measure of the rights they were so justly entitled to, and for which they had so long and so patiently struggled.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: It is not my intention to trespass for long on the time of the Committee; but when an hon. Member below the Gangway, without your interfering at all, Sir, speaks of a party in this country as a party of “convicted thieves,” and with his finger deliberately points to hon. Gentlemen sitting on these Benches, emphasizing the expression, I think it is only right that I should rise, not to say much as to what has fallen from the hon. Member, but to say that I do not much care about his opinion; that I do not think we are “convicted thieves;” but that I, and those who believe with me, are strongly of opinion that there are convicted thieves in Ireland, and murderers and associates of murderers, and that they are sitting, not where I am sitting, but not very far off—

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. and gallant Member is in Order in saying that he believes there are not only convicted thieves, but murderers and associates of murderers, sitting, not where he sits, but not far from him?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the expressions used by the hon. and gallant Member highly improper, and I must call upon him to withdraw them.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Who minds? [Cries of “Withdraw!”]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member will withdraw the observation, if he applied it to any hon. Member in this House.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Sir, I wish—[Loud cries of "Withdraw!"—]—I trust I may be allowed to say what I have to say. I wish to remark that, as the words "convicted thieves" were applied to the Bench on which I sit, I did think I might be allowed to use some strong expression in reply. I acknowledge that I used a strong expression—a stronger one than that used below the Gangway. The words "murderers" and "associates of murderers" were stronger than "convicted thieves," and, therefore, I beg to withdraw and to apologize for having used the expression.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must say I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Sullivan), and did not understand him to apply the observation to which the hon. and gallant Member takes exception to anyone in this House. If I had, I certainly should have called him to Order.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was sure the Chairman would allow him to use 15 seconds in the remarks he was about to make. He could assure him that not only were the words to which he had called attention used, but the words were accompanied with a gesture—the hon. Member had pointed to the place where he (Colonel King-Harman) sat. It was because of that that he had taken it that the expression was applied to that part of the House where he sat. If it were not so, he apologized most distinctly and decidedly for what he had said. If, however, he was right in his suspicion that the observation was applied to where he sat, he was sure the Chairman would support him in saying that, while he withdrew the expressions he had used, and apologized for using them, there had been, at the same time, some excuse for his indignation and for using the words he did. It was not his intention to go into the question as to whether or not the Land Commissioners in Ireland had done their duty; it was far too late in the Session to venture upon such a subject. He had very strong opinions on the subject, and he believed those opinions were tolerably well known, at any rate, to the right hon. Gentlemen who represented the Irish Government. He believed the working of the Land Act had been contrary to the declaration which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister made when he brought in the Bill and when he put it to the House. The Prime Minister had said that no damage would be done to the landlord interest, and he was supported in that statement by a noble Lord in the House of Lords, who said that the landlord interest would be rather improved by the measure than otherwise. But they knew perfectly well what had happened. They knew perfectly well that the landlord interest had been reduced by from 25 to 30 per cent all over Ireland. They knew perfectly well that it had not been a question of whether rents were high or rents were low, but that the Sub-Commissioners, wherever they had gone, had obeyed an unwritten, although a perfectly understood, law, which was that the landlords' rents were to be reduced whether they were high or whether they were low. It was perfectly well known that in Ireland where there had been two landlords side by side, one a rack renter and the other a fair and considerate man—one having raised his rents during the bad times 20 per cent, and the other never having raised his rents at all—the man who had raised his rents had had them reduced 20 per cent, while the same, if not a greater, reduction had been made in the case of the man who had never raised his rents. It was a well known fact—hon. Members below the Gangway knew it as well as he did, and hon. Members sitting by the side of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant knew it as well as he did—that the good landlords, so called, had suffered far more than the bad landlords. It was perfectly well known that the operation of the Land Act had been this—that the man who had bought his estates under the Landed Estates Court, or when it was established, or had acceded to them at that time, and had raised his rents to an exorbitant extent, rendering the introduction of some Land Act or other imperative, was the man sitting in his saddle rejoicing; whilst the man who had always worked with his tenantry and had done the best he could for them, not asking rents which were too heavy, not raising them when he could do so, was the man who was now suffering poverty because of the action, he would not say of the Government, but of the Sub-Commissioners appointed by the Government. He would not say more about that. The Government brought in the Land Act, and appointed three Commissioners, whose names commanded, to a great extent, the respect of Irishmen of all classes. The Land Act had been accepted by them in the belief that the three Commissioners to whom he referred were a true and legitimate sample of the Officers who were to be appointed under it. After that, a number of Sub-Commissioners were appointed such as the Irish people never could, and such as he did not believe the House of Commons ever could, have expected. It had been shown that the appointment of these men was wrong, and that the men were not fit to go through the evidence they had had to go through, and to deal with the extraordinary perjury and malversation they had had to deal with during the past two or three years; yet these men, being men of honour, though, perhaps, prejudiced in one way or another, had come round, and had not gone on reducing rents in the way in which they had done when they were inclined to accept the sworn testimony of those from whom, at first, they had to take evidence. He did not mean to go on on this particular subject, but merely made these observations in commencement of what he had to say. In the Vote for the Land Commission they had to take an item for the chief agent for the land sales, and he said that, while they could not go back, and while he did not seek to go back—he wished they could, of course; but he knew that what was done could not be undone—in the matter of the appointment of the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners, he did want to go back on the question of the Commission for the Sale of Land. He was glad to see the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, for he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would agree that he (Colonel King-Harman) had a right to speak on that question, as he had had the honour of speaking to the right hon. Gentleman not long ago upon it in Committee. It was said, when the Land Act was passing through, that the Irish landlords would not be prejudiced by it—that their rights would not be disturbed, and that the land would, if anything, be made of greater value than it was before. Now, what was the fact? They knew perfectly well—they saw it from the Returns he held in his hand bearing on the value of land—that if a landlord wished to sell his estate he could not get more than 10, 12, or 14 years' purchase for it, whereas, before the Land Act was passed, he could get 22, 24, or 25 years' purchase. How was that? He was not going to inflict a long speech on the Committee, and he did not believe in long speeches. He believed in making a few short statements, and one short statement he would make was this—that a very few years before the Land Act was passed, there was a certain gentleman of the name of Murrough O'Brien appointed a Commissioner by the Church Commission to regulate the sale of lands to tenants who held under the Church Body. Mr. Murrough O'Brien used to go down and value these lands, and he valued them, generally speaking, at from 24 to 25 years' purchase. He (Colonel King-Harman) was putting this at the very lowest average he could possibly adopt. After the Land Act was passed, Mr. Murrough O'Brien went down on behalf of the Land Purchase Commission, and wherever he went the tenants, after listening to him, considered that from 10 to 12 years' purchase was as much as they were entitled to offer for the land. They were told to believe that the establishment of a peasant proprietary was the only means of pacifying Ireland; but could it be believed that Irish landlords would be disposed to part with their lands at 10 or 12 years' purchase, when their tenants, four or five years ago, were forced by the same man who now valued the estates at 10 or 12 years' purchase to give 24 or 26? He (Colonel King-Harman) was at a loss to know how these things could be reconciled. The facts were certainly as he stated, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister could put them in any other way. If this question were deferred to a time when there was a possibility of more thoroughly considering it, he would be able to mention several cases in support of his statement. He would be able to show the extraordinary way in which the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act had been administered. He had been from the first, even before the Land Act was passed, an advocate of the extension of peasant proprietary in Ireland. When sitting some years ago, immediately behind where the Prime Minister was now sitting, speaking in support of a Motion for a Select Committee by the right hon. Gentleman the present First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre)—then an unknown Member of the House—he had made the suggestion that a certain sum of money should be applied each year towards the solution of the problem of peasant proprietary. He believed he had proposed that for 10 years £1,000,000 a-year should be applied to the purpose. At the end of that time they would see whether the plan succeeded. £10,000,000 would not have been much to have spent, even if the plan was a failure, whereas, if the experiment had turned out a good one, the gain would have been very great. But the House of Commons in its wisdom would not listen to that system. What was now going on in Ireland made a peasant proprietary impossible. They might wish for it; but the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister could not expect, not only in the interest of the landlords in Ireland—who had been forgotten and forsaken, and, he might say, trampled upon by the Government—but in the interest of the mortgagees, and those who had embarked their money in land securities, that 9 or 10 years' purchase would be accepted. All the landowners wanted was to have a fair and proper mode of sale. He did not say they wanted to force sales, for he did not think it would be right to do that; but he did think the majority of them would be glad to sell and get out of the country as fast as they could. Whether that would be good for the country he did not know—and he would not tell hon. Members below the Gangway whether he was leaving or not—but he would tell the Prime Minister this, that if he really wished to carry out the Purchase Clauses of the Act—if he really wished to benefit the people of Ireland by these clauses, if he really wished to act in a fair and legitimate manner to those who were interested in this subject, he should look into the matter. If he would look into it, he would see that the Purchase Department of the Land Commission was not carried on properly by those gentlemen who were associated with it. He assured the right hon. Gentleman that, personally, he had not a single word to say against the gentlemen who had to do with the Purchase Department of the Land Commission. He did not know them—he had only seen one of them, Mr. O'Brien, once. He had, however, watched the matter very carefully, and had thought over it, and he was perfectly certain that the idea of these gentlemen was that it was their business to induce the tenants to give as little as possible for the land, to grind down the landlords in such a way that they would accept, under duress, the smallest sum of money to turn out. In support of his statement, he would mention one case—that of a gentleman who he knew could be trusted, and who was an honourable man. He had known him for many years; but he had not been in communication with him upon this matter, and he had the facts from that gentleman's solicitors. Mr. Arthur Costello, a member of one of the oldest families in Mayo, held some property in a wild district where the Land League had considerable authority, and during two or three years he had received no rent. Driven into a corner, his mortgagees pressing him hard, he asked the tenants if they would purchase their holdings, and after some negotiation they said they would give him 16 years' purchase. Would any hon. Member say that 16 years' purchase was a fair sum to give for land which was not over-rented?—and no one accused Mr. Costello of having over-rented. The tenants were prepared to give that, and they applied to the Land Commission for the two-thirds of the money required which they were entitled to have under the Land Act, they being prepared to provide the other one-third. In the cases where they were not prepared to put down the money themselves, the local bank was ready to provide it. Could there be a better proof that the security was good enough for the Government to advance two-thirds, when the local bank—which was only a branch of a larger bank—was prepared to advance the remaining one-third? The Land Commission sent down Mr. Murrough O'Brien, and the result was that the Land Commission told the landlord that they did not consider the land worth 16 years' purchase, but only 12 years' purchase. Were Irish landlords to be beaten down in that way to 12 years' purchase? Did the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) suppose that his property, or the property of his father, would be sold at 12 years' purchase? If he carried this matter to a Division, no doubt the noble Marquess would vote against him; but he should like to know whether the Duke of Devonshire's property would be sold on those terms? In Heaven's name, were Irish landlords to be crushed down in that way? If the Government were going to carry out their Land Purchase scheme, they must put fair and honest men on the Land Commission. Having mentioned Mr. Murrough O'Brien's name, he should move to move to reduce this Vote by the sum of £750, the amount of that gentleman's salary. He was not going to impute anything dishonest to Mr. O'Brien, for he believed him to be as honest a man as could possibly be; but he was a man of the strongest possible political opinions, and believed that landlords ought to be brought to their knees and driven out of Ireland. He was, therefore, not the proper person to hold the position he was now in.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, Mr. Murrough O'Brien was a gentleman whom he did not know by sight. With regard to the valuations of land in 1874-5-6, he must say that during those years the price of land reached a very high point in Ireland. Mr. O'Brien valued the Church land; but he did not calculate the tenants' rights, although he did estimate the tenants' improvements. Since he did that, the Church Lands Act had been passed, and that provided that tenants' improvements should be excluded, so that his valuations in 1874-5-6, of 24 and 26 years' purchase, included not only the fee simple of the land, but the entire improvements. He regretted deeply that tenants should have had to pay such enormous prices for land. In his own county they had had to pay 28 and even 30 years' purchase, and they were still suffering extreme poverty. But in connection with the remarks upon Mr. O'Brien, they must take into consideration the entirely altered circumstances between 1874 and 1883, when he valued under the Land Act. With reference to Mr. M'Devitt, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had stated that one reason why that gentleman was maintained on the Land Commission was owing to speeches he had made in connection with the contest in Tyrone; but he was not aware that that gentleman had made any speech in connection with that contest. With regard to Mr. Wyllie, he believed the Land Commission could not have an abler lawyer or a more upright man than Mr. Wyllie in connection with the work of the Commission; and he regretted that some other men were to be removed from the Commission. He had inquired as to their removal, and the explanation was that they were of recent appointment, but were to be displaced. There were 85 in all; but 55 must go, and he deeply regretted that men like these, and Mr. Maguire and others, had been removed. With respect to the Appeal Court, he had looked carefully into their decisions, and he would undertake to say that the variations in the rents fixed by the Commissioners, and confirmed by the Appeal Court, would not amount to £1,000 all round. The hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman) had referred to the Purchase Clauses for small improvements. No one regretted more than he did that the Government had allowed the Purchase Clauses Bill to fall through. That was a great loss to Ireland; and he thought that, no matter what might have been the difficulties of the Session, the Government ought to have passed, at least, some of the clauses of that Bill. That would have given great relief to the state of affairs in Ireland, and he only hoped that one of the first things the Government would do next Session would be to reintroduce that Bill.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he believed that hon. Members on both sides were in favour of promoting the efficacy of the scheme for purchasing land in Ireland; but he considered the Bill as it stood inefficacious. He did not wish to cast any reflection on Mr. Murrough O'Brien; and what he wanted to imply by his Motion was that the Purchase Clauses ought to be most carefully considered during the Recess, so that a really useful measure might be brought in, and not a Party measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £82,680 (including a Supplementary sum of £26,340), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Irish Land Commission."—(Colonel King-Harman.)

MR. KENNY said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst) had done well in pointing out that the average of Mr. O'Brien's valuations for the Church Commission was 22½ years' purchase. Those might be taken as representing the landlords' interest; but since then there had been agricultural depression, and that had brought down the value of land considerably, and also the landlords' interest in the land. He, for one, entirely disagreed with the Motion to reduce the Vote by Mr. O'Brien's salary, believing that when that gentleman fixed the landlords' interest in the land in Ireland at only 10 or 12 years, or, at the outside, 14 years' purchase, he fixed a fair level. He wished now to call attention to the present position of the Commissioners. The hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) had said the original appointments of the Sub-Commissioners were not to be found fault with; but that subsequent appointments were extremely bad. It was a remarkable thing that a Gentleman sitting on the landlords' Benches should not have made himself acquainted with the practice in regard to these appointments; and it so happened that the reductions made by the original Sub-Commissioners were considerably greater than those made by the subsequent Sub-Commissioners. He was, therefore, surprised to hear that the subsequent Sub-Commissioners were not so satisfactory as the original Sub-Commissioners. It had been stated that the Sub-Commissioners who were not to remain, had been discontinued because their appointment was of more recent date; but whoever had informed the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he could not agree that these Sub-Commissioners were discontinued simply because their appointments were of more recent date than the appointments of those who were to be continued. He had a list of the dates of the appointments of those who were to be continued, and also of those who were to be discontinued; and he found that one of the gentlemen, Mr. Davidson, who was discontinued, was appointed in November, 1881, and the fact that he was one of the first who received an appointment, showed that the date of his appointment had nothing whatever to do with his discontinuance. He was well known to be a fair man and a friend of the tenants, and that, perhaps, had more to do with his dismissal than the mere date of his appointment. Then he found that of six Sub-Commissioners who were appointed in December, 1881, four had been retained, Mr. Wyllie being one of the number appointed at that time. He would like to know why that gentleman had been discontinued? Again, while the Legal Commissioners appointed since then had been continued, none of the Legal Commissioners appointed in April, 1882, were now on the Commission. Of the non-Legal Commissioners appointed in 1881, three had been dismissed, and six continued; and it was a singular thing that all those gentlemen who were appointed in 1881, and had been now continued, were all gentlemen who notoriously sympathized with the landlords.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN rose to Order, and asked whether it was right for an hon. Gentleman to say that Judges appointed by the Government—although they were not sworn Judges—were notoriously in favour of the landlords, and sympathized with any one class?

THE CHAIRMAN: The observation of the hon. Gentleman did not reach my ear. If the hon. Gentleman spoke in any way disrespectfully of the Judges, that would be very improper.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he would quote the words of the hon. Member. He said "the Judges who were re-appointed to the Land Commission were notoriously sympathizers with the landlords," implying that they were corrupt.

MR. KENNY challenged the accuracy of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's statement. He had not implied that these gentlemen who had been reappointed were corrupt.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was speaking of the gentlemen who had not been reappointed.

MR. KENNY said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman had entirely mistaken him, because his contention was not that the gentlemen who had been re-appointed were gentlemen who acted unfairly, but simply that they were sympathizers with the landlords. He was endeavouring to show the Committee that a number of gentlemen had been continued on the Commission as Sub-

Commissioners not because, as had been stated by the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), of the date of their original appointment, but simply because their reappointment or non-reappointment had fallen into the hands of the Chief Commissioners, they being gentlemen who sympathized with the landlords, and who recommended gentlemen for appointment who were of their own way of thinking.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN again rose to Order, and said the hon. Gentleman was repeating what he had previously stated, and asked whether the hon. Member was in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think it will be better for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to reply to these observations, and explain his views, when the hon. Member for Ennis has concluded.

MR. KENNY, resuming, asked for the protection of the Chairman against the interruptions of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The hon. and gallant Member had grown suddenly very fastidious as to the use of Parliamentary language, and a few minutes after accusing Gentlemen of being "murderers," it was strange that he should carp at his language. With regard to the Land Commissioners, the Lay Commissioners were not entitled to associate with the Legal Commissioners in the decision of legal points; but he thought that if the law was fairly interpreted, they were entitled to associate with the Legal Commissioners in the decisions of such points. Under the Land Act, he believed, it might fairly be assumed that the Lay Commissioners, instead of being virtually merely valuers, as they now were, and entitled only to consult with the Legal Commissioners on questions purely as to the value of land, were as much entitled to consult with them on other points which arose as the Legal Commissioners to consult with the Chief Commissioner, Mr. Justice O'Hagan. The present composition of the Land Court and the Sub-Commissioners' Courts was very different now from what it was at first, the plan of attaching mere valuers to each Court having been found to work badly, and having, therefore, to be discontinued. But he feared that, under the present arrangements, the non-Legal Commissioners were little better than the official Valuers originally appointed in 1882, and he thought that if they were deprived of the right to consult with the Legal Commissioners, the same state of things would come about, and the same state of dissatisfaction which arose before would recur, and, in like manner, the non-Legal Commissioners would have to be discontinued. The hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst) had called attention to the manner in which orders for the erection of labourers' cottages, made out by the Sub-Commissioners, had been disregarded. An Order had been made for a Return showing the number of such orders, and he wished to ask whether the Solicitor General for Ireland would be able to include anything like an accurate estimate of the orders that had been complied with? If all the orders of the Sub-Commissioners for the erection of labourers' cottages had been complied with, the necessity for a sham Labourers' Act would have been obviated. The number of orders that had been made by the Sub-Commissioners was also, he thought, below the number that ought to have been made; and that was so apparent to the Chief Commissioners that, he believed, twice, if not three times, new orders had been issued for the direction of the Sub-Commissioners who had drawn attention to the matter. He hoped the recommendations made by the Chief Commissioners upon this matter would not be lost sight of. But there was another point in relation to this Vote to which he would, in a few words, call the attention of the Committee, and that was with regard to the effects of the operation of the Act in respect to the leaseholders. This was a question of particular importance; and although he did not propose to discuss it at length, he could not but express his great regret that when the Land Bill of 1881 was introduced in two successive Sessions in that House it had been rejected by enormous majorities, and that Her Majesty's Government, although some of their Irish Legal Advisers had a contrary opinion, should have gone in the face of the almost unanimous desire of the Irish Members, and concurred in the rejection of that salutary proposal to amend the law. He sincerely trusted that when the question of the admission of the labourers to the benefits of the Land Act was again brought forward in that House, another and a better state of feeling would have arisen, and that those who might be in power at the time would see their way to the acceptance of the recommendations of the Commissioners of the Irish Land Act. There was another point to which he would also call attention, and that was to the enormous increase that had taken place in the number of appeals from the Sub-Commissioners' decisions. The appeals in the Chief Commissioners' Court numbered altogether something like 17,000, and the number remaining was about 11,000. At this rate of progress, it was quite evident that the number of appeals to the Chief Commissioners, unless some additional machinery were brought into play, would not be disposed of for a great many years to come, and that, in point of fact, the statutory term under the Land Act would almost have expired before that result could be achieved. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had called attention to the manner in which these decisions were given. He had stated that in about 19 out of every 20 appeals the rent had been raised. He might say, with all deference to his hon. Friend, that this estimate was accurate to this extent—that in 19 out of 20 appeals which had originated with the landlords the rents had been raised. If, in connection with this point, the number of appeals by the tenants were taken into consideration, he was disposed to think that the estimate of his hon. Friend was by no means inaccurate. He had noticed that, in a great many instances, the amount to which the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners had been raised had been extremely ridiculous. He knew instances in which something like an increase of 5s. on a rental of £20 had been made. In looking over the opinions that had been from time to time expressed before the decision of the House of Lords by some of the Chief Commissioners, he found that it had been laid down by them that changes should not be made on the granting of leases by Sub-Commissioners, unless the Court should be of opinion that the rent fixed by the Sub-Commissioners was substantially wrong. But, instead of this principle having been adhered to, they found that the Chief Commissioners had gone down into the country and made changes in the rent that were of so trifling a character as to be merely vexatious. What object, he asked, could the Chief Commissioners have in making these trivial alterations? It was always an invidious thing to attribute motives; but one thing was quite certain, and that was that, whatever the motive of the Chief Commissioners might have been, the effect of these alterations on their part had been to stimulate the number of appeals, and to encourage the landlords throughout the country to rush into the Appeal Court, in the hope that their rents would be, at least, slightly raised, they being well aware that the tenants, in a great number of instances, were too poor to be able to appear with advantage in the Court of Appeal. There was another point, and it was one of the few that had been advanced by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) in which he agreed, and that was that, in a large number of instances, the greater the rack-renter, the better off was the landlord likely to be when he came into Court. He had known instances in which the rent charged had been six times the valuation put upon the holding, and in which it had been reduced to three times the valuation, and he ventured to think that if, in the first instance, it had only been three times the valuation, it would have been reduced to the actual valuation, or to something very near it. This was the state of things which practically prevailed all over the country, and it was notoriously true in the case of those who had only in very recent times become the owners of land which had been chiefly purchased through the medium of the Landed Estates Courts, and who had raised the rents so as to give themselves a dividend of 5 or 10 per cent on the outlay they had made, purely from selfish motives, and who ought to have those rents reduced proportionably to the merits of the case. There were a few points in the Vote which were more in the shape of mere matters of figures, to which he desired briefly to direct the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury. He found on Page 289, which gave the details of the summary of the Vote, that there was one accountant who had a salary of £610 per annum. He wished to point out that the minimum figure was £600, and that the annual increment of the income was £25; consequently, he was unable to see how it was possible that the salary could be £610, unless the person in receipt of it had commenced at that figure? There was also a number of other inaccuracies noticeable throughout the details of the Estimate. For instance, there was a sum of £333 put down as the salary of an agency clerk. Now, in that case, the minimum salary was £300, and the annual increment £15. That being so, he failed to see how it was possible for the figure of £333 to be reached. Then there was an item under the head of Deputy Superintendent of Church Property, and his salary was stated at £255. The minimum, according to the Table given, was £350. There were other and similar instances running through the page, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would be able to state how it was that these inaccuracies occurred?

MR. COURTNEY said, he could at once explain the apparent discrepancies pointed out by the hon. Gentleman. The accountant referred to was appointed on some date such as the 1st of January, and his salary would be £600 for the year ending on the 1st of January following. The Estimate, however, gave the salary for the official year from the 1st of April to the 1st of April following, and the salary of the officer from the 1st of April to the 1st of January—or whatever the date might be—would be at the rate of £600 per annum, and would then begin to run at the rate of £625 per annum, so that the sum payable from April to April would be £610, as stated in the Estimates. The other differences referred to were to be accounted for in the same way.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not wish to detain the Committee more than a few minutes longer. There was, however, one point with regard to the action of the Land Commission in his own constituency which he desired to mention. He referred to the action of Mr. Thomas Walpole, one of the Assistant Commissioners. In the district in which that individual was best known the idea of retaining him upon the Commission was regarded with anything but favour. He was a man who, in the opinion of the people of that district, was utterly unfit for the post he held. His relations to his own tenants had been of the most unsatisfactory description. He was a man who, some five or six years ago, had foisted on one of those tenants, a man named Higgins—an ignorant man—an agreement for a lease, which, however, had never been executed, the terms of that agreement being of an exceptionally hard and aggressive character. The yearly rent was £15, and the value of the holding was only £8 per annum. The first clause of the agreement was against burning anything but bog, and the penalty was £25 per acre. The next was against disposing of turf, and the next against cutting timber, the penalty being £1 per acre. In consideration of liberty to reclaim the bog, which was very much to the benefit of the landlord, the tenant was required to forfeit all right to compensation under the Land Act of 1870, or any other Act which might be passed. The other clauses of the lease were also particularly hard; but that which was to exclude the tenant from the benefit of the Act of 1870, which had been passed, and any other Act which might be passed for the relief of the tenant, showed the kind of man the landlord was. The tenant refused to execute the lease or any other with such covenants. But Mr. Walpole handed the man a draft agreement, and gave him to understand that those were the terms on which he was to hold, and no other. A short time afterwards, the land of the tenant being practically at the mercy of the landlord, he added some acre and a-half to the holding, and at once raised the total valuation to £10, and, at the same time, raised the rent by £4, making the total £19. When the tenant applied to the Assistant Land Commissioners, he was met by the alleged agreement, and although he repudiated it and had never signed it, and although the draft agreement was never dated, the case was decided against him on the assertion of the Assistant Commissioner landlord. The tenant took the case to the Land Commissioners themselves, and they in turn refused him any relief. This was only one illustration of the treatment Mr. Walpole's tenants had received at his hands, and it was not to be wondered at that, under these circumstances, the tenants generally throughout Ireland should regard him as a man from whom they were not likely to meet with even-handed justice. So much with regard to Mr. Assistant Commissioner Walpole. The next matter to which he desired to call the attention of the Chief Secretary was one with regard to which he thought he should be able, at least, to excite the surprise of the right hon. Gentleman. In order not to make the story too long, he would confine himself to the reading of a short statement which he had received from the tenant whose interests were affected. The tenant was a Mr. George Hetherington, and he said—

“I served an originating notice in time for the first sitting of the Land Court under the Act of 1881, and my case was listed for hearing at Maryborough in July, 1882, when the Court dismissed the case owing to Mrs. Dix—who was the landlord—“being a middle landlord, and having only a profit rent of about £7 per year.”

Some years ago, there was a very celebrated series of letters written by a gentleman who was now a County Court Judge in Ireland, and who acted as Special Commissioner for The Times, in regard to the Land Question in Ireland. That gentleman devoted a considerable portion of those letters to the task of showing that the great curse of Ireland at that time was the middleman landlord. What he then said about the middleman landlord was perfectly true. Well, Mrs. Dix was in the position of a middleman landlord, and she drew only £7 profit out of the particular holding referred to. Mr. Hetherington went on to say that—

“The Sub-Commissioners refused to come out and inspect my farm, although I am paying a rent of £156 per year for 63 Irish acres, the Poor Law valuation of which is £80 per annum, £20 of this being for buildings, leaving the Government valuation of the land only £60. My valuator, Mr. William Grange, auctioneer and land valuator of Portlinton, valued the farm at £81 odd, to which valuation he swore at Maryborough. I lodged an appeal against the decision of the Sub-Commissioners, which was heard before the Head Commissioners in Dublin on the 19th of June last, after two years' waiting, and then they decided it in the same way as the Sub-Commissioners in Maryborough in July, 1882. The Sub and Head Commissioners all admitted that my rent was too high; but, owing to the small profit, they said they could not think of reducing the rent. I was under the impression the Act was passed to give redress to tenants who paid exorbitant rents, irrespective of how their landlords held their holdings or what head rent they paid; and if such is not the case, I hope you will bring this defect in the Act under the notice of the Legislature with the view of having it redressed. Here am I, an unfortunate tenant, paying a rent of nearly 100 per cent. over the Government valuation, and what my own practical valuator swore it was worth, and because my landlady holds as a middle one, I must continue to be rack-rented without redress.”

This was the statement of Mr. George Hetherington; but he had had confirmation of the story from quarters altogether independent of the tenant. He thought the Committee would agree with him that anything more monstrous than what had happened in this case could hardly be imagined. Here was a Tribunal that had been established for the purpose of fixing, when necessary, what was a fair rent. The Sub-Commissioners admitted that the rent demanded was not a fair rent; but they found that if they reduced it the middleman would hold the land at a loss, and, therefore, they who were appointed to look after the interests of the tenant, refused to make any reduction, but left the tenant to pay a rental which they themselves acknowledged to be exorbitantly high. This finding of the Assistant Commissioners was upheld by the Chief Commissioners of the Land Court. Under these circumstances, he should be disposed to support a Motion for the reduction of the Vote; but, of course, he could not think of giving his support to that which had been moved by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) in his interesting and singularly sober statement, which was calculated to attract the attention of all who heard it, and which had led him (Mr. A. O'Connor) to look into the record of the Land Commission, which he held in hand, to see how the hon. and gallant Gentleman had himself fared at the hands of the Land Tribunal against his own tenants in support of appeals; but as the hon. and gallant Member was no longer in his place, he would not further refer to that matter. He must say, however, that he could not understand the ground on which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had moved to reduce the Vote, except it was that he objected to Mr. Murrough O'Brien, because he had not thought the land was worth as many years' purchase as the hon. and gallant Gentleman had estimated it to be worth. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) trusted that some Official on the Treasury Bench would give the Committee an undertaking that the statement he had read, as having been written by Mr. George Hetherington, of Ballintougher House, Monasterivan, would receive some consideration at the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. TREVELYAN said, if the hon. Member for Queen's County would put his request in reference to the Land Commission in the form of a Question, it would be much better, because, when applications for opinions on particular cases had to be taken from the Parliamentary Reports taken in that House, the result was not always so satisfactory as hon. Members might wish. With regard to the remarks the hon. Member had made in reference to Mr. Walpole, he (Mr. Trevelyan) had been informed that the rent at which the tenant alluded to was actually £5 less than the rent Mr. Walpole paid the head landlord.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: What has that to do with it?

MR. TREVELYAN said, it had this to do with it, that when Mr. Walpole proposed an agreement to a tenant holding under him, giving him a farm at a rental of £5 less than he himself was paying to the head landlord, it was not unnatural that he should ask for and expect some concession on the part of the tenant. This, therefore, was a matter that had to be taken into consideration when the Committee were asked to criticize the terms of an agreement Mr. Walpole had made with one of his tenants. When the agreement in question was referred to the Sub-Commission, the Sub-Commissioners decided that it should stand, and after that it was confirmed by the Court. The observations he should have made in answer to the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) he did not now think there was any occasion for him to make; but he believed he should have been able, had it been necessary, to have put a very different face on the case from that which had been put upon it by the hon. and gallant Member. He was bound, however, to say, in justice to Mr. Murrough O'Brien, that he had found in the case referred to that where that gentleman had sanctioned the sale to the tenant, the purchase was at the rate of 20 years' purchase. The real difficulty in those cases was that the tenant was unwilling to give the 20 years' purchase which the hon. and gallant Member had put as the standard. Mr. Murrough O'Brien had been considered as rather an enthusiast in favour of the peasant proprietor, and not one who would be likely to throw any difficulty in his way. With regard to what had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst), he (Mr. Trevelyan) thought it a very good suggestion that the Local Government Board should call the attention of the Boards of Guardians to the powers given under the Labourers' Act.

MR. GRAY said, the speech just made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary certainly seemed to him a marvellous piece of logic. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to point to this—that if the tenant paid a rack rent it was right that he should continue to pay it, however exorbitant it might be, if it so happened that, in consequence of any reduction in that rental, the intermediate holder as between the landlord and the tenant in occupation would be compelled to pay more than he was himself receiving. This, putting it shortly, was the argument which the right hon. Gentleman was putting before the Committee as applicable to all cases where it was said that the tenant was paying £5, or any other sum, less than the middle landlord was paying. When the right hon. Gentleman was interrupted by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), who had very pertinently asked, "What has that to do with it?" he (Mr. Trevelyan) had emphasized his argument by saying he thought it had a great deal to do with it; so that, according to the right hon. Gentleman's view, the immediate occupier ought not to be relieved of the rack rent in any case in which the giving of such relief would injuriously affect the interests of the middle landlord. If the Chief Secretary wished to initiate the very extraordinary principle that the payment of a fair rent was not to apply fully if it were found to be injurious to the middleman, he would be going entirely outside the principle of the Land Act, and leaving untouched an evil which the Land Act was intended to remedy. The statement just made by the Chief Secretary was a very serious one, and he ought either to make his meaning quite clear, or else to qualify what he had been saying. There was one point which he (Mr. Gray) wished to put to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. A case was recently tried before Chief Justice Morris. It was a case in which one of the parties, named Bromfield, was a tenant of Lord Congleton. The point was this—whether the holder of a lease could not claim the full benefit of the Land Act, except where the entire land was in the hands of the immediate lessee. The case of the tenant Bromfield was as follows:—He got a lease in the year 1880 from Lord Congleton, and was middleman as regarded the entire property, which was all occupied by sub-tenants. A good deal of the land fell out of the hands of the sub-tenants at that time, owing to death and other causes, and came into the hands of Bromfield's father and Bromfield himself. But, when his lease was almost expired, he had to consider whether he would evict all the sub-tenants or leave them alone. He adopted the plan of leaving them alone. The sub-tenants claimed to have a fair rent fixed, and were now statutory tenants. For the portion of the land in his own possession, Bromfield also claimed a similar right; but the Court ruled that he had no locus standi, but that he would have had if he had evicted all the tenants and got all the land into his own possession. He (Mr. Gray) wished to ask whether this was really the law?

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had just stated, in reference to the arguments used by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), that he need do no more than make a cursory reference to what had been urged. But hon. Members on that side of the Committee were anxious to hear some more explicit answer to the points that had been raised, especially with regard to what had been stated in reference to Mr. Murrough O'Brien. That was a matter on which the right hon. Gentleman had not given a satisfactory reply. The Committee had not been told why it was that when the tenants had agreed with the landlord for what must be considered not an unfair price for the land, and had applied for the money under the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act, that gentleman had recommended the Commissioners not to allow the money, because he did not approve of the price. The price was 16 years' purchase, and Mr. Murrough O'Brien had said it was not worth more than 11 or 12 years' purchase, the result being that the sale had not been carried out. If this was the course that was to be pursued in these cases, he was afraid it would not be of much use to try to sell land under the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act. He would like the Committee to be informed what was the reason of this remarkable change? Mr. O'Brien was for some time an agent under the Church Commissioners for valuing land, and for naming the price which the tenants were to pay for it; and in that capacity he had valued it, in some cases, as high as 26 years' purchase. But now that he represented the Land Commissioners, he was valuing it at 11 or 12 years' purchase. Now, it must be evident that the real value of the land could not have changed to that extent in so short a time. One hon. Member had endeavoured to explain the difference by saying that the tenants' interest in the land had reduced its value—that was to say, that the tenants' interest must be taken out of the valuation; in other words, the hon. Member allowed that the Land Act accounted for a diminution in value of 50 per cent.

MS. GRAY said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken had not carried his argument far enough. He should have gone a step farther, and shown that in this case the property was the same which, at one time, had been valued by Mr. O'Brien at 26 years' purchase, and, at another time, at 11 or 12 years' purchase. The hon. and gallant Gentleman clearly did not understand the position, which was simply this. The land valued by Mr. O'Brien at 26 years' purchase might have been the property of a Corporation, such as the Church Commission, who might have allowed the tenants to acquire a very considerable interest in their property; and, again, the land might have been tolerably good. Church lands generally were good; and 26 years' purchase of such land, held upon liberal conditions, and at a low or moderate rental, from a Corporation not accustomed to disturb its tenants, might have been a very proper valuation; whereas 12 or 14 years' purchase of land of low quality, and rack-rented, might be a very high value. There was no comparison between the two cases.

CAPTAIN AYLMER: I spoke of a fair rent.

MR. GRAY said, that could not be applied as a basis of valuation. One lot of land might be had for 12 years' purchase, if it were fully rack-rented, and of poor quality; another lot of good land, which yielded a profit on the rent, and was moderately rented, might be had for 26 years' purchase. It was entirely a matter of business, and the land valued at 26 years' purchase might be a better investment than that valued at 14 years' purchase. What the hon. and gallant Gentleman should do, in order to establish a bias in the action of Mr. O'Brien, would be to show that the tenants paid the same rent, had the same interest, and that the quality of the land was equal in both cases. Until the hon. and gallant Member could show that, he did not think he was justified in bringing against Mr. O'Brien the charge that he was acting maud fide. If Mr. O'Brien did not exercise some discretion as to the money to be advanced, he would not be fit for his office at all, and landlords and tenants would have nothing more to do than to arrange a value between themselves, and get the money from the Treasury; all they had to do was to place upon the land a value so high that three-fourths of the amount would pay the landlord. The Treasury was, of course, right in securing itself against transactions of that kind; and Mr. O'Brien had not to consider whether the rent of the property was fair, but whether the property constituted a full security to the Treasury for the amount which they were called upon to pay.

MR. SMALL said, he thought the Committee were entitled to some information as to why some of the Sub-Commissioners had been reappointed, and others dismissed. He should like to know on what principle the Land Commissioners or the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had acted in this matter?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he could not afford the hon. Member any more information on this point than that the Land Commissioners watched, with the greatest care, the action of the different Sub-Commissioners. When cases came up on appeal, they were able to form a correct estimate of the fitness of the Sub-Commissioners, and would be guided thereby in their recommendations. With regard to the case referred to by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr.

Gray), he had not laid down in his observations any doctrine of law; he had simply explained the decision of the Land Court in the case, and defended the gentleman in question from what he imagined to be the effect of the very imperfect account of the case given by the hon. Member.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he could express no opinion on the case, which he understood was before the Law Courts.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, before the discussion on this Vote came to an end, he desired to make a personal explanation. He had learned that it was the opinion of the Chairman that the expression "convicted thieves," used by him (Mr. Sullivan) some time since, was un-Parliamentary when applied to Members of that House. In that case, he begged to say he most unhesitatingly withdrew it, because he never desired in any way to contravene the Rules of the House. Further, he begged to say that in using that phrase he had no intention whatever to apply it to any Member of the House.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he was glad the hon. Member had withdrawn the phrase; and, as he had done so, it did not appear to him necessary to say anything more on the subject further than that it would have been not only un-Parliamentary, but highly improper, if the hon. Member had applied it to any hon. Member of the House. Had he supposed the hon. Member meant so to apply it, he should at once have called upon him to withdraw it.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £86,094, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners of Police, the Police Courts, and the Metropolitan Police Establishment of Dublin."

MR. HEALY asked why the Vote for the County Courts, Ireland, was not taken next in its regular order?

MR. COURTNEY said, it would be better to go on with this Vote next. His object was to save time, and he did not think the discussion of the Vote would occupy more than an hour or an hour and a-half.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was not quite sure that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was right in his estimate of the time that would be occupied in discussing this Vote. The Vote might open up some large questions, in the discussion of which many hon. Members would wish to take part. The subject was in itself a difficult one, and ought not, in his opinion, to be considered at 1 o'clock in the morning. His own opinion was that the discussion on the Vote should not be taken then.

MR. HEALY said, the question he desired to raise on this Vote had reference to the conduct of the police in the matter of the arrest of Mr. Chance. The complaint which he and his hon. Friends had to make was, that two individuals, one of them at least a gentleman, had been arrested by policemen in the service of the Government on a charge of entering a house for an unlawful purpose, and that these persons on being arrested were taken to the police station, and then instantly discharged. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had stated that if the persons interested in this matter were not satisfied, they could bring their action for damages; that the Government would simply stand aside and take no steps in the matter. But they had had from the Government no real explanation of the conduct of the police in this affair. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to be good enough to say whether, if an action for false imprisonment were brought against the police, the Government would or would not defend it and pay the damages, if the verdict went against the police? He had yet to learn that the Government would not do this in Ireland. They were informed that the Lord Lieutenant had no control over the local police; but the right hon. Gentleman had given them no satisfaction whatever. The question was whether the police in Ireland had power to take up whomsoever they chose on flimsy charges, and march them with ignominy through the streets to the police station without giving them any satisfaction. He put the case to the English Members, whether British liberty was held at so cheap a price that any policeman might arrest a man on a totally false charge, drive him to the station-house and then, instead of bringing him before the magistrates, having ascertained who he was, turn him loose into the streets? He had put that case to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and he said that any respectable lawyer would take the case up. But the question was, would the police be defended by the Government if an action were brought? The police, however, had a bogus story to tell in this matter, and the Government, of course, defended them. He had often observed the right hon. Gentleman's receptivity of mind with respect to the statements of the police; a policeman had only to make a statement and the right hon. Gentleman swallowed it at once. He asked whether he was prepared, in this instance, to accept the policemen's statement as against that of persons equally credible? Policemen in Ireland were regarded as very superior persons, no doubt; but he had yet to learn that a policeman was necessarily a man of high character, and that his account of his own conduct in the streets was to be received without question. Now, the statement of Mr. Chance bore the stamp of truth on the face of it. He went to a woman to get evidence against Mr. George Bolton in connection with the trial at Belfast. Was it likely that anyone wanting to get evidence against Mr. Bolton would say that he came from Inspector Malone? But the Government had accepted that statement on the part of the police, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was willing to allow the matter to rest solely upon that statement. This was not the way in which matters were usually conducted in this world; if people could get off on their own statements alone, every thief and burglar would escape punishment. But the Government took the statement of the incriminated parties in this case, and had no regard whatever for anything said on the other side. His case was dual—Did the Government approve the arrest; and, secondly, if the action were brought would the Government defend the action and pay the damages, if damages were awarded? In order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of replying, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. TREVELYAN said, he believed that what had passed on this subject in the House up to the present time was that the hon. Member for Monaghan had, four or five days ago, read out a telegram giving, he supposed, Mr. Chance's view of what had passed. He (Mr. Trevelyan) had since read a longer telegram giving the official account, in which the essential point was that the police were under the very decided impression that the Carroll family had been frightened by people whose identity turned out to be different from that which they supposed it to be. He thought then, and he thought now, that under those circumstances, with that information before them, the police were in the right to interfere. He should compare the case to that of a man who was arrested in the act of getting into his own house through the balcony; it would be a parallel case if, under those circumstances, the policeman pulled him down, and took him off to the station-house, and then discovered that having lost his latch-key he was merely getting into his own house. He was informed that under such circumstances, if a complaint were made by a person so arrested, an official inquiry would be held. He understood that Mr. Chance maintained that he had not been properly treated, and that his story was not the same as that represented to the police by the Carroll family. However, he would consult with the Solicitor General for Ireland as to whether an inquiry should be advised. He was informed that an action for unwarrantable arrest would lie; but he hoped the matter would not go as far as that.

MR. DAWSON said, he trusted he should be in Order in drawing attention to the question of the continued postponement by the Government of any action with regard to the recommendation of the Royal Commission appointed by the late Government to inquire into the extension of the boundaries of the city of Dublin. The people of Dublin were situated in this way with regard to the police reserve—they had to pay a contribution towards the police maintenance of 8d. in the pound, while the Metropolitan Police were scattered over a vast area. Now, that was one of the hundred disabilities the city laid under from the want of an extension of the boundaries, and an increase of the area of taxation. A Commission was issued some time ago, and the Corporation was represented by the present Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), and, therefore, very well represented. The net recommendation of that Commission was that the city boundary, for the purposes of police and other things, should be extended, and that the outlying townships should be brought within the city area. From that day to this, not a single thing had been done, and if a case was wanted to show the sort of legislation there was in regard to Ireland it was this—Whatever was just, whatever was reasonable, and whatever was equitable was put off from day to day, and from year to year, while the most obnoxious things and regulations, totally opposed to the interests and wishes of the people, were immediately put in force. He would like to know if there was any chance whatever of this Liberal Government giving any effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission of the late Government? He had nothing to say against the police in Dublin, indeed, in his official capacity of Lord Mayor of Dublin, he did what he could in a time of great disturbance to bring about a rapprochement between the city authorities and the police; he did everything he possibly could in order to preserve the order of the city, and to try and bring about a unity of purpose, by saying a kind word between the police and the authorities. But he had this, nevertheless, to complain of, that there was no sympathy between the police and the people. He saw the other day that magnificent demonstration in London conducted with marvellous regularity and order, simply because of the conduct of the police towards the people. Why, if there had been a similar concourse of people in Dublin, and if the police had been called upon to preserve order, there would not have been the same results. He would mention a case to illustrate the way in which the Dublin police failed to discharge their duty. On the occasion of any popular demonstration the police of Dublin afforded no facility whatever for keeping order. Recently a banquet was given to the Parliamentary Party; but the utmost confusion arose in the streets, in consequence of the complete absence of the police. If His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, however, had been going to the Mansion House, policemen would have been stationed at different parts of the route taken to preserve order. On the occasion to which he referred, thousands of people collected around the Hall; but the police did not turn up until the confusion had almost become appalling. On another occasion there was a reception in Dublin of a distinguished actor, Mr. Barry Sullivan. On that occasion, though the railway authorities applied for the services of the police to keep order, the police were conspicuous by their absence. While the police were always prompt to strain their duty in matters that were obnoxious, they were never present to give assistance to the Civil authorities whenever it ought to be given. In conclusion, he asked the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) if he could hold out any hope of an extension of the boundaries of Dublin according to the expressed wish and recommendation of a Royal Commission which had held a long and arduous inquiry?

MR. GRAY said, he had a question to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, with regard to a question which had already been raised by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). It was a very important question, involving official sanction to the new practice about to be introduced of arresting men and bringing them to the station, and then refusing to prefer a charge against them. The right hon. Gentleman quoted, in justification of a proceeding of that kind, the case of a man who, being found under suspicious circumstances, might be arrested and brought to the police station, and then set at liberty. He (Mr. Gray) thought it was very dangerous for the police to act in such a manner; and he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, or possibly some official connected with the English Administration could tell him, whether, if a man arrested under suspicious circumstances demanded to be charged, or asked the Inspector at the station to prefer the charge against him, the Inspector could refuse to enter a charge? That was the point at issue in the case of Mr. Chance. If a man be arrested through some mistake of a constable, and was content then to suffer inconvenience and annoyance, and be set at liberty, there was little to be said. He could quite understand a policeman in ignorance arresting a man and then setting him at liberty, although he believed that to be against the Rules of the Force. He had always been under the impression that there was a regular Rule, both in England and Ireland—certainly in Ireland—that when a policeman set hands on a man and took him into custody, he had no discretion to liberate him; and manifestly such a Rule was very necessary, if for no other purpose than to guard the police against terrible temptations. A policeman might be open to a bribe, and money might be offered to him to liberate a man. He had always understood that when once a policeman took a man into custody and laid hands upon him, that he was bound to bring him to the police station, and that, having done that, he was bound to make some charge against him. In such a case as that instanced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in justification of the arrest of Mr. Chance—the case of a man arrested on his own premises because he was found under suspicious circumstances, and the police thought he was a burglar, he wanted to know, and perhaps the Home Secretary would tell him, would a subordinate police officer dismiss that man and refuse to enter a charge against him if the man claimed to have a charge entered against him, in order that, in a summary manner before the magistrate next morning, he should have an opportunity of clearing his character? It was one thing for a man to be dismissed with his own consent, in fact condoning the offence of his arrest; but this was not such a case. Mr. Chance, when he was arrested and brought to the station-house, asked the Inspector to enter a charge against him, in order that, on the following morning, he should have an opportunity of clearing himself before the magistrate. The Inspector, however, refused to enter the charge, and insisted upon Mr. Chance going away and taking his own remedy by law. Would such a practice be allowed in England? He hoped the Home Secretary would tell them whether he would permit a policeman to arrest any man, and then, if that man wanted to have a charge entered against him, he would permit a subordinate officer to refuse to enter a charge, but to turn the man out? He thought that such a practice, if allowed, was manifestly fraught with the greatest danger; it was fraught with the greatest possible temptation to the police, who were open to temptation like other human beings. By such a practice they would open the door for very grave abuse; and he could scarcely believe that such a practice, which had been followed in the case of Mr. Chance, would be permitted in England.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSHELL) said, he knew from experience in Courts of Justice that it was by no means uncommon in England for an Inspector to refuse to take a charge against a person brought to the station—not at all an uncommon thing. If a mistake had been made and the Inspector refused to take the charge, the man would be set at liberty. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Gray) had asked if an Inspector would not be obliged to enter a charge if the man arrested insisted upon it? He (the Solicitor General) would certainly say the Inspector would not be bound to enter a charge if it was clear a mistake had been made. An Inspector who believed a mistake had been made would not keep a man in custody a whole night, because the only effect of that would be to aggravate the wrong and increase any possible damages that might be given. It sometimes happened that when a person insisted upon a charge being entered the Inspector made a note of the fact that the man was brought in, but he had refused to enter the charge. If it was perfectly clear that no offence had been committed, the Inspector certainly would not enter a charge.

Mr. HEALY said, the point was this. If a man was taken to the station on some serious offence—loitering for an unlawful purpose, or for burglary, or for assault of some kind, or perhaps for murder—was it in the power of the constable who arrested the man to refuse to make the charge, but to turn him loose?

If a policeman saw him (Mr. Healy) in Palace Yard, and, thinking he was loitering about Westminster Palace for an unlawful purpose, arrested him and took him to the nearest police station, would the constable be at liberty, on his own motion, to turn him out in the street on finding who he was? Who was it who was supposed to have discretion in such matters?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if a policeman saw a man getting over the area railings, he would think possibly that it was intended to make a felonious entry of the premises, and he would arrest the man. The man might be the owner of the house, who had lost his latchkey, and took this method of getting into the premises. The policeman, however, would be perfectly right in arresting him and taking him to the station. If the man satisfied the Inspector that he was the proprietor of the house, and that though he was entering in an unusual manner he was not there for an unlawful purpose, it was quite plain that he would be immediately discharged. It would be a monstrous absurdity to insist that the proprietor of the house should be charged with burglary. The Inspector, by discharging the man, would show his common sense. If the man said, "I will be charged with burglary," it would not be a reasonable request. If, of course, the policeman acted in any improper manner—if there had been no reasonable grounds for doing what he did, he would be punished by the Police Authorities; and if he was not sufficiently punished, an action for unlawful arrest would lie. Of course, these were not details with which he (Sir William Harcourt) was every day conversant; but, so far as he knew, the practice in England was the same as that elsewhere.

Mr. HEALY said the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) had put a case of an extreme character; and, of course, if a man was seen, at 2 o'clock in the morning, climbing over area railings, everyone would say a policeman was justified in arresting him. It was another question altogether whether it was a suspicious circumstance for a solicitor and an attendant to be pursuing certain investigations in broad daylight. He accepted for the moment the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) that he would grant an inquiry; but what he wanted to know was, whether the Government—if the inquiry was against Mr. Mallon, the Head of the Police, and if Mr. Chance was not satisfied—would assume the position of judicial bottle holder as regarded damages, if in an action brought against the policeman damages were given? That question had not been touched upon that night. If such a case as that described by the Home Secretary occurred in London—that of the arrest of a man found climbing over the area railings under suspicious circumstances—everyone would say it was quite right to defend the policeman who made the arrest, in the event of an action for false arrest being brought. But the question involved in the arrest of Mr. Chance was totally different. This was a matter occurring in broad daylight, and a solicitor was not a man who was likely to act in an illegal manner. Mr. Chance and Mr. Meiklejohn entered Carroll's house to make inquiries from her respecting the case in which Bolton and the Crown were mixed up, and a policeman stepped in and arrested them for, so far as he (Mr. Healy) could see, no earthly reason at all. The question he had now to put was, whether the English practice was or was not to be followed in this case, and whether the Government would, in case an action was brought against the constable, defend him, and pay his damages if any were given?

Mr. TREVELYAN said, the answer to the question of the hon. Member practically depended on the result of the inquiry. It was quite certain that if it was stated that hereafter the Government in all cases would defend any action that might be brought against its servants the effect would be to give to those servants too much latitude and induce them to act rashly at critical times. On the other hand, to say positively that the Government would not back up its servants would cause their servants to act timidly on occasions when they ought to act boldly. Every case must be judged by itself. In this case an inquiry would be held, and the whole thing depended upon the inquiry.

Mr. HEALY: Will the inquiry be public?

Mr. TREVELYAN said, that as to the nature of the inquiry he would consult with his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, so as to see what would be done in England under similar circumstances. The object of granting the inquiry was to give full satisfaction to all concerned, and to give them the assurance that the case had been treated fairly. He would take good care that the inquiry should be in every respect fair.

Mr. HEALY asked leave to withdraw his Motion. He supposed, however, the Government would tell them before Report what the nature of the inquiry would be?

Mr. GRAY agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy) that it was only fair the Government should undertake to tell them what the nature of the inquiry would be before the Report stage.

Mr. COURTNEY remarked that the inquiry might not possibly be held before next month.

Mr. HEALY said, he and his hon. Friends only wanted to know what the nature of the inquiry would be. Personally he had no desire to delay the Vote that night, and he would be satisfied if the Government gave them an answer to-morrow.

Mr. DAWSON asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to say something about the Dublin Commission?

Mr. TREVELYAN said, it was impossible to bring forward, at that period of the Session, a Bill dealing with the Dublin boundaries in the manner recommended by the Commission to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Answering a question put to him a few days ago by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the County of Carlow (Mr. Gray), he stated that at the beginning of next Session—the Session which would commence in the usual course in February next—he should be prepared to bring forward a Borough Funds Bill, to bring about the very limited result of enabling the Dublin Corporation to spend Corporation money in the interests of the Corporation. He did not think he could go further than that.

Mr. DAWSON said, there was not so much contention in this matter as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose. The Royal Commission which inquired into the question of the extension of the Dublin Municipal Boundaries sat for some weeks, and their recommendation was perfectly clear and lucid, and it was very improbable that its carrying out would create any contentious agitation.

Mr. GRAY said, he did not wish to discuss the question of the boundaries at that moment; but he wished, in the mildest possible manner, to convey to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who possibly did not take any profound interest in the question of the boundaries of Dublin City, and who had on previous occasions taken care to inform the House that he never read Irish newspapers, that the Irish Parliamentary Party had resolved, that so far as it in their power laid, no Bill for the reform of London should pass unless the Government would give a pledge to endeavour to carry a Bill embodying similar principles in regard to the Metropolis of Ireland. Now, he could not allow this Metropolitan Police Vote to pass without a word of protest against the whole Dublin police system. He had very little concern with the amount of money which the Government might think fit to vote for the maintenance of the expenses of the Force called the Dublin Metropolitan Police Force; but it so happened that this Force was maintained not merely out of Imperial funds, but to a large extent out of local funds. Dublin City and the Dublin Metropolitan District, which extended beyond the City, was taxed to the nominal amount of 8*d.* in the £ for the maintenance of this Force; but not only had the people to pay that direct tax, but they also had to pay indirect taxes, which he calculated brought the rate which they had to pay for the maintenance of the Dublin Metropolitan Police up to a sum equal to about 1*s.* 2*d.* in the £. A cruelly unjust and oppressive tax was maintained in Dublin simply because the proceeds of it went towards the maintenance of the police—he alluded to the £100 licence paid by every pawnbroker in the City of Dublin. He need not explain to the Committee that pawnbrokers did not pay that tax out of their own pockets; they must levy it on the poor whose goods they took in pawn. The tax had been condemned as a thing which could not be justified by a Royal Commission or by a Committee—he was not sure which—he believed it was a special Committee of the House of Commons which investigated the whole question of the Pawnbroking Laws. The tax was only paid in Dublin, and there was no excuse for its maintenance there except that the £100 a-year paid by the pawnbroker was added to the local contributions towards the maintenance of the police. The Government did not care to re-open the question of the local contributions towards the Police Force, because they knew perfectly well that an overwhelming case would be made out against the present system. To levy so cruel a tax as this upon the poorest of the poor was exceedingly unjustifiable; and he thought the Chief Secretary ought to consider whether he could not modify the system in some way. It was patent to everyone that the Force was not kept up to prevent crime, or to maintain order, but purely as a Governmental gendarmerie. He contended that there was no reason why Dublin should not be placed in the same position in regard to its police as every other City in the United Kingdom, except London, which, of course, was governed in a very exceptional manner in every respect. All the great cities which corresponded with Dublin—Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Liverpool—had their police under the control of the Local Authorities, and they were maintained exclusively from local rates. Now, he wanted to know whether the Government intended to maintain in Dublin this exceptional system in perpetuity? The police in English towns were liked by all the people, except the professional criminal classes. The great body of the population looked to the policeman as a friend, they went to him for information and for assistance in various ways, and his experience of the police in London and in the great English towns was that they were extremely civil and attentive, and desirous to make themselves agreeable to those with whom they came in contact. The Dublin Metropolitan Police, however, were trained in a totally different school; they were trained to regard not only the criminal classes, but the whole body of the population, as the natural enemies of the police. They treated the people with a brutality that was unnatural to them; but it was taught them; and one of the main causes why they struck last year was the amount of drill they were subjected to by their late Chief Commissioner (Mr. Talbot), who was a pure martinet, and quite unable to govern them or any other force, and whom the Government were obliged to dismiss with an annuity. What reason was there for training the police as military men? There was no reason. It made them neglect their ordinary police duties, and they were not of very much use as detectives. They simply regarded themselves as a species of Governmental body guard; they were not a municipal or local force. He had pointed out before that if the local officials wanted anything done they could not control the police; but in English towns, the entire body of police being the servants of the Local Authorities, they were governed by that Body for all local purposes, including sanitary purposes. The Lord Provost of Edinburgh, two years ago, asked him if the Dublin Municipal Authorities had control over their police, and, on his replying that they had not, the Lord Provost said that until they had they could not hope to keep the City in a good sanitary condition, adding that it was because the Edinburgh authorities had control over the police that they had a good sanitary system. The result of the system in Ireland was demoralizing. It caused the people to dislike the police, and it imposed a grievous burden on the people; and, at the same time, it was said the Exchequer gave them large contributions, for which they ought to be grateful. But the Government gave money only for their own police, and taxed the people for the remainder. The Municipal Authorities could maintain a better local police force at less cost than they were now compelled to bear for this inferior force. They had to provide this money, and impose a heavy tax on the poor to provide it. They had to pay duty for every carriage in the police district, and the Government took all the fees, while the Local Authorities had to bear the rates and pay for the wear and tear of the hackney carriages of the Government. The Government took the sum paid for carriages, and then put it in the Consolidated Fund as part of the contribution to the local expenses. The time would, he believed, come when the Government would have to apply to the Dublin police the same principles as those which were applied and were satisfactory in every other town in the United Kingdom. When were they going to do that? The police themselves were dissatisfied, and they had struck and brought the Government to their knees, and would do so again as soon as it suited them. He found a Vote put down for "extra pay;" but he thought that ought to be put down as "strike money," £7,500. The police would say they did not see why they should not have another £7,500, and the Government would be absolutely helpless, and would have to swear in Emergency men and special constables. The only duty the police who did not strike had to do was to arrest special constables and take them off to gaol. He himself happened to be in gaol at the time, thanks to the attention of the Judges, for a so-called misdemeanour—though he did not acknowledge that he was a misdemeanant at all—and he remembered being very much amused by seeing bodies of special constables brought in every evening and locked up, having been sworn in in the morning only. If the Chief Secretary had not caved in to the police, Richmond Gaol would have been full of special constables. The whole thing was, in itself, perfectly ridiculous; but it was not a ridiculous matter to the people of Dublin. He thought the right hon. Gentleman should give some hope of a better system, and that the whole system would be reconsidered and placed on a more reasonable basis. With regard to the subject of boundaries, he wished to point out that while a reform was being considered Dublin was suffering. It was surrounded by a ring of towns to which all the wealthy people were migrating, and the result was that Dublin itself was suffering every year from a heavier burden of taxation, from which the wealthier inhabitants escaped by going outside, although they had a share in all the benefits of the City, and thrived by them. Every man who went outside the City threw an additional burden on those who remained, and he could assure the Committee that a terrible amount of injury was being done to the City by this being allowed to continue. The authorities were naturally disinclined to incur any extra expense while the Commission was sitting, and unless the Government stepped in and gave some assistance nothing could possibly be done. That was a state of things created by the Government, and not by any default on the part of the Local Authorities. The remedy of the right hon. Gentleman was this—he said they had the power which English authorities had, to promote a Bill; but that was simply a power enabling various Local Authorities interested to enter upon a Parliamentary contest which would probably cost Dublin something like £25,000; and, no matter who the victor might be, that would probably leave the state of affairs somewhat worse than it was already. It would largely benefit Parliamentary agents on this side of the Channel, but that would be all at the expense of the Irish people; and if the Government felt themselves called upon to introduce a Bill for the reform of the Government of London, the case was at least as strong for Governmental intervention in Dublin. There was a precedent in 1859 which could not be quoted in regard to London, and it would materially increase the difficulties of passing the London Government Bill if the Government convinced Irish Members that the best way to obtain redress for Irish grievances was to block the London Government Bill.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he did not propose to deal at length with the remarks of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray); but it was quite impossible, having regard to the public safety, that the control of the police in Ireland should be in any hands but those of the Chief Executive Authorities, and the time had not yet come when a change could be made in that respect. As Chief Secretary he could not enter into the question of taxation in Ireland; that was a matter for the Chancellor of Exchequer, and not for an Executive Officer; but as to the other subject, his opinion and that of the Government at large was that they could not entertain any proposition at that moment for making over the police or Constabulary in Ireland to any other management.

MR. HEALY said, he thought £50,000 a-year was a pretty penny to pay for the police; and if they were not to have the control of the police they had better have that money back. It was all very well to put the matter off by avoiding any statement; but the people of Dublin would take the matter into their own hands. The English people would never see anything in any argument from Ireland, and he thought the best plan for the people of Dublin to adopt would be to refuse to pay this money. Were the Government prepared to remit this £50,000 a-year to the Corporation of Dublin? If the Corporation of Dublin had the control of the police in their own hands they could do the work with a small number of men and at a less cost. The Government gave police protection to some of their own people, and he thought every Nationalist in Dublin ought to claim police protection. If every man in Dublin claimed police protection the Government would require 400,000 policemen, and what would be the position of the Government then? This was really a very serious grievance, and the time would come, before very long, when the citizens of Dublin would refuse to have these police, and refuse to pay this money.

MR. GRAY said, he did not wish to persist in his opposition; but he was satisfied the time would come when Dublin would no longer submit to this burden. They regarded this as a most injurious and most unjust system, and they would probably adopt the course of declining to pay this tax until they had the control of the police in their own hands.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 73: Majority 54.—(Div. List, No. 199.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

MR. COURTNEY said, this left four Votes—the County Court Officers, the Constabulary, the Prisons, and the Reformatory and Industrial Schools. If they were to take the Reformatory and Industrial Schools that would leave three to stand over till to-morrow. Of course, at that late hour (2.15 A.M.) he would not press another Vote if there was any strong objection to it. Hon. Members, however, must consider the period of the Session. Formally he would move the Reformatory Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he really must ask the Government not to press the Vote at that hour of the night, for the reason that there was no question which was more interesting than the position of these industrial establishments in Ireland. All the elementary industrial schools required to be looked after and fostered in Ireland. Ireland, far more than other countries, required the development of its industrial schools, and the subject was one which deserved a very different sort of discussion from what they could expect to have at that hour of the night. He would, therefore, ask the Government to allow the Chairman to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

REVENUE, &c. BILL.—[BILL 300.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Licences for the sale of tobacco in railway carriages).

MR. WARTON said, that, in this clause, he saw something which struck him as requiring some explanation. The clause referred to tobacco and snuff, and the words he could not understand had reference to sale. They were "personal, mechanical, or otherwise." He could comprehend a "personal" sale; but what other means of selling could there be? How could there be a "mechanical" sale, and of what use could the words "or otherwise" be?

MR. COURTNEY confessed the words the hon. and learned Member had called attention to had rather puzzled him when the clauses were submitted to him by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who were responsible for them. The words referred to certain methods by which cigars or cigarettes might be sold—ingenious arrangements that persons could adopt in the belief that they were not personally selling these things. A penny was dropped into a box, and out came a cigar or cigarette.

MR. WARTON said, he must move that the words "or otherwise" be omitted, as they were sheer nonsense. He should have thought that every mode of selling cigars or cigarettes must be "personal;" at any rate, he was certain they must be either "personal" or "mechanical," therefore it was absurd to retain the words "or otherwise."

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 34, to leave out the words "or otherwise."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): The method may be electrical.

MR. WARTON: That is a sufficient answer. I shall not divide the Committee.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 13 (Payment of sum due to Exchequer from Post Office in respect of expenses for grant of Government annuities. 16 and 17 Vic. c. 45. 27 and 28 Vic. c. 43. 36 and 37 Vic. cc. 44, 67.)

MR. WARTON said, that in this clause it was cited that the fees were paid into the Exchequer. As a matter of fact, they were not paid into the Exchequer, notwithstanding that the Post Office made a profit of many millions every year.

MR. COURTNEY said, the question was merely one of the presenting of accounts between the two Departments—the Exchequer and the Post Office.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clause agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS BILL.—[BILL 295.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. HIBBERT: It is desirable to send this Bill up to the House of Lords without delay. I would, therefore, propose that it be now read a third time.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

EAST INDIAN UNCLAIMED STOCKS BILL.—[BILL 269.]

(Mr. J. K. Cross, Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. K. Cross.)

MR. WARTON wished to say just one word on this Bill. He had the other night ventured to ask a Question of the Government with regard to the measure in the absence of the hon. Gentleman in charge of it. It was understood, though it could not be stated by any Minister in the hon. Member's absence, that everything in reference to the East India Company was to be withdrawn from the measure?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Yes; I said so the other night.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

CHOLERA, &c. PROTECTION

BILL.—[BILL 303.]

(Mr. Gray, Mr. Dawson.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GRAY: The Amendments in my name are simply for the purpose of improving some clauses—to which the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) objected—for applying the Act to Ireland. I hope the Government will not object.

MR. COURTNEY: No.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

INFANTS BILL.—[BILL 308.]

(Mr. Bryce, Mr. Horace Davey, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Staveley Hill.)

CONSIDERATION.

Further proceeding on Consideration, as amended, resumed.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'while the marriage is subsisting, and before any decree or order for divorce or judicial separation has been made,'—(Mr. Warton,)—be inserted before the word 'each,' in page 1, line 12."

MR. WARTON said, the first Amendment was in his name to page 1, line 12. He was glad that, through a fortunate accident the other evening, he was now enabled to move the Amendment with an argument which, he thought, would prevail with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), who had taken a very strong objection to the Amendment, and one which he (Mr. Warton) felt the full force of at the time—

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. and learned Member rise to move the Amendment on the Paper?

MR. WARTON: Yes.

MR. SPEAKER: Then the hon. and learned Member has lost his right to speak. A division took place on it on the last occasion.

MR. WARTON: I should be glad to make an explanation, as the point is an important one.

MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. and learned Member would be out of Order.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to say a few words in support of the Amendment—

MR. BRYCE rose to Order. The hon. Member had already spoken.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, having already spoken to the Amendment, will not be in Order in speaking again.

Question put.

MR. WARTON said, in his next Amendment of the clause he proposed to leave out the words "or persons," and he submitted it was rather important that this should be adopted, considering that in the 2nd clause the reference was to "guardian," in the singular; and he thought that to agree with the word "guardian," the word in this clause should be "person," not "persons." There might be too many "guardians," as each of the parents would have the right of appointment of guardians by deed or will, and it would be better to have one guardian on behalf of each parent. On looking back to that part already passed, it would be observed that the survivor of the guardians might alone or jointly appoint a guardian—it did not say "guardians;" if it did, then in this place they should read "persons." He presumed there was some meaning in putting "guardian" in the singular, and supposed it was to have one guardian, while the other guardian would be the surviving parent. But, then, when the "hereinafter provided" was arrived at, it was found that any number of guardians might be appointed—there was no limit whatever. He really thought that to prevent too many guardians being appointed, persons who might quarrel about the training, the religion, or the estate of the infant, it would be far better to strike out "persons" and make the clause agree with the 2nd clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, to leave out the words "or persons."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or persons' stand part of the Bill."

MR. BRYCE said, in Clause 2 any guardian included any possible guardian; and in this clause it was necessary to keep to the wording, because if only one guardian were appointed and he died there would be no guardian at all.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. TOMLINSON said, since he had put down the first of the next two Amendments he had looked into the matter, and found it was possible that a male infant, if it became married, might become exempt from the control of its guardian. He, therefore, begged to move the Amendment standing next, and, perhaps, the shortest and simplest way to explain it would be to read the clause as it would stand with the Amendments put in—

"Each of the parents of any infant may by deed or will appoint any person or persons to be guardian or guardians of such infant after the death of the survivor of such parents; and where guardians are so appointed by both parents they shall act jointly, &c."

In line 15, he proposed to insert "where," instead of "the guardian or." It was necessary to make such an alteration in order to make sense of the clause, for if the clause remained as it stood each parent might appoint a guardian; and what was meant was that these guardians should act jointly with each other, and not with any other guardians.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 15, to leave out the words "the guardian or," and insert the word "where."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the guardian or' stand part of the Bill."

MR. BRYCE said, he was willing to agree to this Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 15, after the word "guardians," to insert the word "are."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, after the word "appointed," to insert the words "by both parents they."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, to leave out from "with" to end of sub-section."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BRYCE said, the next Amendment was merely a matter of drafting. He had omitted to mention an old Irish Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, after the word "has," to insert the words "in England."—(Mr. Bryce.)

MR. WARTON said, he was not acquainted with this old Act of the Irish Parliament; but he would ask the hon. and learned Member if there was any section corresponding to that in the Act of Charles II. for England?

MR. BRYCE said, the Acts were just the same.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BRYCE said, the next Amendments were consequential on that just accepted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 10, after the words "twenty-four," to insert the words "or in Ireland under the Act of the Irish Parliament, fourteen and fifteen, Charles the Second, chapter nineteen."—(Mr. Bryce.)

MR. WARTON said, he presumed that the Section 6 mentioned was the same as Section 8 of the English Act.

MR. BRYCE assented.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule, page 3, line 8, insert—"14 and 15 Charles 2, c. 19.—An Act for taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries and Tenures in Capite, and by Knights' Service. Section six."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BRYCE said, he hoped the House would be kind enough to allow him to take the third reading now.

MR. WARTON rose to Order. He wished to know, in reference to the request made, whether the expression generally used, "the permission of the House," meant in such a case the unanimous wish of the House, or whether the Question could be put if any Member or Members objected?

MR. SPEAKER: It does not mean the unanimity of the House, but the general pleasure of the House.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

NAVY AND ARMY EXPENDITURE, 1882-3.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That it appears by the Navy Appropriation Account for the year ended the 31st March 1883, as follows, viz:—

- (a.) That the sums expended for certain Navy Services exceeded the Grants for those Services, and that the deficits on such Grants amounted together to £1,427,161 4s. 0d., as shown in column (a) of the Schedule hereto appended;
- (b.) That the sums received in respect of Appropriations in Aid of the Grants for certain Services fell short of the sums estimated, and that such deficiencies amounted together to £1,264 17s. 4d. as shown in column (b) of the said appended Schedule;

(c.) That the sums received in respect of Appropriations in Aid of the Grants for certain Services exceeded the amounts estimated by the total sum of £48,481 6s. 8d. as shown in column (c) of the said appended Schedule;

(d.) That surpluses arose on the Grants for certain Services, and that such surpluses amounted together to £150,636 0s. 6d. as shown in column (d) of the said appended Schedule.

2. Resolved, That to provide in part for the first two above-mentioned sums (a) and (b), amounting together to £1,428,426 1s. 4d. the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury have temporarily authorised the application of the fourth above-mentioned sum (d) of £150,636 0s. 6d. and of £1,264 17s. 4d. out of the third above-mentioned sum (c) of £48,481 6s. 8d.

3. Resolved, That the application of such sums be sanctioned.

—COLONIAL WAR VESSELS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ASHBURNHAM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether an Order in Council under Section 6. of the Colonial Naval Defence Act, 1865, giving to the Victorian vessels of war Victoria, Albert, and Childers the status of ships of the Royal Navy, was issued by Her Majesty under his advice, and on conditions specified by him; whether the Law Officers of the Crown have advised the Admiralty that such vessels, on being placed at Her Majesty's disposal, are to be deemed to all intents vessels of war of the Royal Navy, and would be entitled to fly the white ensign; whether the Government of Victoria, through its Agent General, did not place the vessels in question at Her Majesty's disposal on the 15th of last January; whether the naval officer in command at Gibraltar was instructed by the Admiralty to order the commandant of these vessels to haul down the white ensign when he arrived there on his way to the Red Sea, on the ground that its assumption was premature; whether, after the Council held on the 4th of March, the Lords of the Admiralty requested the Secretary of State for the Colonies to move the Agent General for Victoria to communicate with the commandant by telegraph, instructing him to proceed without delay to Suakin, and place the Colonial Squadron at Admiral Hewett's disposal; whether, this having been done, and the vessels having arrived at Suakin, after the battle of the 18th of March, Admiral Hewett informed the commandant that they would not now be required and might proceed to Melbourne, at the same time expressing his thanks for their presence at Suakin; whether the Admiralty have since declared that they never in any way accepted the services of the vessels, that the Order in Council has conferred no status upon them as ships of the Royal Navy, and have refused to instruct the naval officers in command at Ceylon and on the Australian station to authorize them to resume the white ensign; and if, in view of the obviously inoperative character of an Act intended to encourage the Colonies to establish local squadrons to co-operate with the Royal Navy, he will lay the correspondence with the Agent General for Victoria and the Colonial Office on the Table, with a view to its amendment? In putting the Question as he had, he thought he had sufficient reason to think that, in their conduct in this matter, the Government seemed to show an indifference to the interests of the Empire, which contrasted in a strange manner with their devotion to Party politics. They desired a great deal more to advance those politics than to do anything that might increase the well-being of the Colonies as regarded their relations with the Mother Country.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in reply, said, he should not attempt to follow the last observation of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ashburnham),

but would confine himself to the Question put to him; and, in the first place, he begged to assure the noble Earl and their Lordships generally that it was entirely a misapprehension to suppose that the Board of Admiralty, or any naval officer in any part of the world, for a single moment intended to act with any discourtesy to the Colonial Government of Victoria, or in any way to discourage them in their most admirable efforts to supply themselves with ships of war. Ever since they took up this question of providing naval forces, there was nothing that the Board of Admiralty could do that they had not done to assist them in every way; and they had lent them some of their best officers. He thought he had better give the facts of the case in his own way, without reference to the form in which the Question was put. Last year the Victorian Government built in this country three vessels—Victoria, a gun vessel; Albert, a gunboat; Childers, a torpedo vessel. These vessels were intended to be vessels of war. In dealing with vessels of this kind, the Board of Admiralty could only act according to law, and it was quite out of the power of the Admiralty to create Colonial vessels of war. The law on the point was contained in the Colonial Naval Defence Act, 1865, which, in the 3rd section gave power to a Colony to establish, maintain, and use a vessel or vessels of war, subject to such conditions as Her Majesty in Council might from time to time approve. Their Lordships would see that to constitute a vessel built by a Colony a ship of war it was indispensable that there should be an Order in Council. As respected the ensign borne by these vessels, that was determined by the Queen's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions which were issued in 1879, which laid it down that Colonial vessels of war should wear a blue ensign and pendant. In January last the Agent General of Victoria applied to the Board of Admiralty for an Order in Council to place these vessels under another section of the Act—the 6th section. That section authorized the Admiralty to accept any offer made by a Colony to place at their disposal any vessels of war, and such vessels would be deemed vessels of the Royal Navy. When this application was made the Admiralty considered the matter, and they thought it desirable to consult the Law Officers of the Crown, and they advised that the 6th section only authorized the Crown to accept, for Imperial purposes, vessels already legally existing as Colonial ships of war. It was clear, therefore, that a status must first be obtained under Section 3 before the vessels could come under Section 6, and that there must be an Order in Council before the Admiralty could accept their services. The Colonial Government had not applied for this Order in Council under Section 3, and, therefore, the services of the vessels could not be accepted under Section 6. In the meantime, the vessels had gone to sea, and, by some misapprehension, they flew the white ensign and pendant as ships of war in Her Majesty's Service. It therefore became necessary for the officer at Gibraltar to ask by what authority that was done, and he asked that by orders from home. There was nothing approaching an insult, and everything was done in the most courteous manner. The Instructions laid down the ensign to be borne by Colonial vessels of war. Nothing could be more courteous than the way in which the communication was made. As soon as the defect in the position of these vessels was communicated to the Victorian Government, application was made for an Order in Council to constitute these vessels vessels of war, and application was, at the same time, made by Her Majesty for the authority necessary, under the 6th section, to enable the Admiralty to accept the services of these ships. Both Governments, therefore, took immediate steps to remedy the defect and to allow these vessels, if necessary, to be employed as Her Majesty's vessels. This Order was passed on the 4th of March; but, by that time, the vessels had left the country, and, in the meantime, the Agent General for Victoria offered their services in the Red Sea. It was then the time when operations were going on in the Suez Canal; and the Colonial Government was desirous, if their services were required, that they should be offered. An answer was at once given to the Agent General, requesting him to instruct the officer commanding the vessels to communicate with Sir William Hewett on their arrival, so that, if it was found they were in want of vessels in the Red Sea, he might accept the services of those vessels. They arrived in the Red Sea, and when they arrived there happened to be plenty of Her Majesty's ships there for all purposes necessary, for the House would, of course, recollect that Osman Digna had no ships, and, therefore, there were absolutely no naval services to perform, so they proceeded on their voyage to Australia. After that, the Agent General of Victoria made a communication to the Government, and inquired if the vessels might fly the white ensign and pendant. The Government were absolutely bound by law in the matter. The proper ensign and pendant of these vessels was blue, with the badge of the Colony. He might add, that this distinctive flag for Colonial vessels of war had been communicated to all foreign nations. He could not understand that there could be any misapprehension in this matter as soon as the somewhat complicated legal questions were explained. He could assure the noble Earl opposite that there had not been, from the first, the very slightest idea of casting any slur of any kind or sort upon the Victorian ships; the Admiralty had simply followed the Act of Parliament. There was nothing they felt a greater interest in, or greater concern for, than to encourage the Colonies of Australia to proceed in the patriotic and laudable course they were following now of providing themselves with an efficient Navy.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that he never imagined that any slur was intended to be cast upon the Victorian Government; but, in matters of such delicacy and importance, the greatest care ought to be taken to avoid even the slightest misunderstanding arising in the minds of the Colonists. He was, therefore, glad the question had been at once brought before Parliament by his noble Friend (the Earl of Ashburnham), so that it had not had time to fester into a grievance painful to both sides. Without going into the legal authorities of the question, the explanation was satisfactory. In future, it would be desirable, in order to prevent any misunderstanding, pains should be taken to ascertain what the Order in Council provided for.

After some remarks from the Earl of WEMYSS,

THE EARL OF ASHBURNHAM said, that he was very well satisfied, and he had no doubt that the Colonial Government would be equally satisfied, with the discussion that had taken place. He would, however, point out to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Northbrook) that he had omitted to answer the concluding paragraph of the Question.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, it would not be well to lay the Correspondence upon the Table, as it contained reference to other matters.

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES — THE DESIGNS FOR NEW ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS asked Her Majesty's Government, If they will cause a model of the selected design for the War Office and Admiralty to be made and publicly exhibited? He asked for this because the only way of judging of the effect of a building was from a model. Drawings, as anyone conversant with such matters well knew, were very deceptive. Further, in this case, it was necessary that the new building should harmonize with the Horse Guards and its surroundings; and this could only properly be judged of by having the whole of the buildings, old as well as new, shown upon the model. Now, he must again ask his noble Friend what had become of the large model that, in Sir Henry Layard's time, had been made of all that part of London where our public buildings and offices were situated, with a view to showing upon it any new building or alteration it was proposed to erect or make? His noble Friend had informed him, on two previous occasions, that this model, which was as large as the Table in the centre of their Lordships' House, could not be found; but he hoped further search for it had proved successful, and that they might hope to see it utilized on this occasion. As a matter of fact, the designs for the new Admiralty and War Office were being exhibited in Spring Gardens to Members of both Houses of Parliament; but he thought they should be exhibited in some public place, in order that all those persons who took an interest in the matter might inspect them, and be able to offer their criticisms.

VISCOUNT BARRINGTON asked, with reference to Mr. Pearson's plans for the restoration of Westminster Hall, whether the flying buttresses would be obscured? They were of great interest; and, as shown in the plans now being exhibited, he was afraid they would be almost entirely concealed. He therefore wished to know whether those plans had been definitely adopted?

LORD SUDELEY, in reply, said, that his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works was, at present, considering the advisability of having a model made to represent the plans of the new public buildings, which had been selected by the judges. It was a question how far that model should be made on the present scale of drawings; but the First Commissioner hoped to be able to construct a model during the autumn. The old model plan, showing both buildings and sites, that had been made many years ago, when Mr. Layard was in Office, when the new Public Offices were being considered, and which had the Horse Guards and many other public buildings shown upon it, was on a very small scale, although it covered a large area. If the proposal made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Wemyss) was adopted, and a model constructed of the new buildings, to place upon it, in lieu of the old designs, it would undoubtedly show its position as respected the Horse Guards, but only on a very small scale. That would necessitate reducing considerably the scale of the present drawings, and it was a question whether, if the expense was to be incurred, it would not be better expended on a large scale model, without reference to the old ground plan model. That old model, which had been made some years ago, and which was supposed to have been lost, had only been mislaid, having been discovered at South Kensington, where it still remained. It would be preserved, and would be placed in some convenient room; and if the noble Earl would meet the First Commissioner when it was ready, he would be very happy to consider with him how his suggestion could best be carried out. As to the point to which the noble Earl had alluded, as to the drawings being thrown open for public inspection, he believed that next week there would be no difficulty in people seeing them; but this week it had been limited to Members of both Houses, and the various societies. In reply to the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Barrington), he had only to say that the First Commissioner of Works had already stated, in "another place," that the general plan of Mr. Pearson for restoring the West front of Westminster Hall had been definitely decided on, and a small Vote had been submitted, so that the work might be commenced this autumn. It was most desirable that the old Norman wall should not be exposed to another winter. There were some minor points still left open, and among these the question of raising the towers at the North end, and whether the corridor along the West front should be an open one or not. Mr. Pearson attached much importance to its being open, and used for carriages; but it was possible that it might be advisable to use it as a gallery for rooms. No money would be, however, asked for the purpose this year. The flying buttresses would not be hid. The proposed gallery and cloister would be inside the buttresses, which would stand out six feet, and also be visible above the gallery.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he was greatly obliged to the noble Lord and the First Commissioner of Works for their consideration.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES): My Lords, I beg to give Notice that on Tuesday I shall ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with the strongly expressed wish of this House, and the precedents of other Reform Bills, to introduce proper provisions for redistribution in the Representation of the People Bill in the next Session of Parliament?

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

PARLIAMENT—STANDING ORDERS— AMENDMENTS.

MR. HOLMS said, he proposed, at the request of the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Arthur Otway), to move a series of alterations in reference to the Standing Orders applicable to Private Bills. He would propose, in the first instance, to move, in Standing Order No. 1, 2nd Class, after "Street," to insert—"Subway, to be used for the conveyance of passengers, animals, or goods, in carriages, or trucks, drawn or propelled on rails." The alterations were merely formal.

Standing Order, No. 1, 2nd Class, read.

Amendment proposed to the said Standing Order, by inserting, after the word "street," the words—

"Subway, to be used for the conveyance of passengers, animals, or goods, in carriages, or trucks, drawn or propelled on rails."—(Mr. Holms.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he would make an appeal to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Holms) to allow a little more time for the consideration of the proposed Amendment of the Standing Orders. It was altogether impossible for hon. Members who were in attendance in their places until 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning to appear in the House again at half-past 3 in the afternoon to consider a series of proposals which, for aught they knew, might effect an entire revolution in the existing Standing Orders relating to Private Business. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not object to a postponement of the discussion, which, under the circumstances, was a most reasonable request.

MR. WARTON said, he supported the appeal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin). He

(Mr. Warton) was altogether opposed to undue haste in legislation. He was quite willing to accept the statement of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Holms) that these alterations were only of a formal character; but even formal things were sometimes improper. He scarcely thought it was proper to lay before the House proposals for the wholesale alteration of the Standing Orders without even allowing as much as a day for considering their effect. If the hon. Member for Hythe would divide the House against the consideration of these Amendments now, he (Mr. Warton) would support him.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he wished to know whether, as the further proceeding with the proposals of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) was objected to, it must not, as a matter of necessity, stand over?

MR. SPEAKER: These proposals do not come under the Standing Orders which apply to opposed Private Bills.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that, under those circumstances, he would join the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) in going to a Division if necessary. He hoped, however, that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) would not force the House to take such a course.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that one part of the proposed alterations stood in his name; and it had reference to artizans' and labourers' dwellings. The object was simply to render operative certain Rules which had been passed by the House of Lords on the Motion of Lord Salisbury.

MR. WARTON rose to Order. He desired to know whether the right hon. Baronet was in Order in referring to a Motion which he had down upon the Paper, which related to another subject, and did not apply at all to the Motion they were now discussing?

MR. SPEAKER: I apprehend that all the new Standing Orders hang one upon another in such connection that it would be for the convenience of the House if the right hon. Gentleman were to state his view of the matter.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had been about to state that the Motion relating to the Standing Orders, which appeared in his name upon the Paper, especially those which applied to artizans' and labourers' dwellings, were suggested, after a great deal of evidence had been given on the subject, by the senior Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). They were put in shape, in the first place, by his hon. Friend; but they had been a good deal amended, in accordance with suggestions made by Lord Salisbury. The agents for Private Bills had been seen by Lord Salisbury on the subject, and these proposals had already been assented to by the House of Lords without a Division.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he wished to say one word by way of explanation. The Standing Orders the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had spoken of—those relating to workmen's dwellings—were very good Standing Orders, and he was quite prepared to support them. But that was not the point. The point was whether it was really business to lay upon the Table of the House, at half-past 3 in the afternoon, something which had not been seen by any one of the various interests affected, and to force it to a decision? These Standing Orders affected many hundreds of millions of money vested in tramways and railways, and all he asked for was delay, so that the public might have an opportunity of knowing what the nature of the proposals was.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he trusted the House would not listen to the remarks of the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe (Sir Edward Watkin). These Standing Orders had now been before the public for a considerable time, and an ample opportunity had been afforded to the railway interest, which the hon. Member represented, to the prejudice of the public, for considering what effect they would be likely to have. They had already been before the House of Lords, and might have been opposed there, if necessary. It was perfectly clear that if the railway interest was likely to be affected in any way by these Standing Orders, they would have had a lively opposition from the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe; but the House had never shown any disposition, in matters of this kind, to be in the smallest degree affected by the opinions which might be entertained by the hon. Baronet. He (Lord Randolph Churchill), therefore, hoped the House would not listen to the insidious proposal of the hon. Baronet to obstruct and delay the formal carrying of these proposals, which would have a most beneficial effect upon the interests of the working classes.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he wished to explain that he had not opposed the proposals of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) in any way.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he did not know that the hon. Baronet was entitled to address the House twice.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet, having already spoken, has forfeited his right to speak again.

MR. HOLMS said, the matter had been very fully considered by the House of Lords. During the present Session certain Bills had been passed, which permitted subways to be used as railways; and the only object of these Standing Orders was to explain clearly to the public that that was intended. He did not think there was much necessity for any protracted deliberation.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Standing Order No. 6 read.

Amendment proposed, to add at the end thereof, the words—

"The Notices shall also state what power it is intended to employ for moving carriages or trucks upon the Tramway."—(Mr. Holms.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. WARTON said, that as there was now another question before the House, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) would not be entitled to object to him, on the ground that he was speaking twice on the same question. He had no personal interest in the matter. His only interest was in seeing the Business of the House duly conducted; and he thought that fair time should be afforded for the consideration of any proposal, so that the House might really know what they were about. Hon. Members who had not got the Standing Orders before them would not have the slightest idea what the effect of these alterations might be. He did not say a word against the proposals; they might all of them be very excellent; they might do things that were probably for the good of the general public; but he did not think that was enough to justify the House in passing these wholesale Amendments without having first been afforded adequate time for considering their effect.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he wished to say a word, as there was now another Motion before the House. It was altogether inaccurate to say that every hon. Member must know the nature and effect of the alteration now proposed. The Amendment now under consideration was one which had as yet been before nobody, and hitherto there had been no discussion upon it. Of course, the Standing Orders in relation to artizans and labourers' dwellings had been before the public, and its effect was obvious and well known to everybody. This Standing Order was not in the same position, and it was only a reasonable request that its consideration should be postponed. In making that request, he was certainly not disposed to be intimidated by the would-be Leader and enfant terrible of the Conservative Party.

MR. HOLMS said, he would only say in support of the Motion that its only object was to make the Standing Order perfectly clear.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought it would have been better to postpone the consideration of these proposals until Monday.

Question put, and agreed to; words added accordingly.

Remaining Amendments agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Orders be Standing Orders of this House.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY—MR. CHARLES GEISSLER, PROFESSOR OF MODERN LANGUAGES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What academic degree did Mr. Charles Geissler hold when he was appointed to the Chair of Modern Languages, in Queen's College, Galway; what steps did the authorities of Queen's College, Galway, and those responsible for the appointments in the Queen's Colleges, take to ascertain whether Mr. Charles Geissler was properly qualified to fulfil the duties of a Professor in Modern Languages, and whether the academic degree assumed by Mr. Charles Geissler was a bona fide degree; in what University did Mr. Charles Geissler graduate and take the degree of Doctor in Philology; and were any documents submitted to the President of Queen's College, Galway, showing that Mr. Charles Geissler was not a bona fide Doctor in Philology?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Geissler, when appointed to the Chair of Modern Languages, held the degree of Doctor of Philology in the University of Gottingen. He was appointed to the Professorship at Galway in November, 1868, by the then Government, after consultation with the late President of the College, and presumably after full consideration of his testimonials. The present President, Dr. Moffatt, informs me that he is aware that his Predecessor instituted most careful inquiries as to Dr. Geissler's abilities and character, and that he was assured by some of the highest authorities in Ireland, among whom were the late Rev. Dr. Todd, S.F.T.O.D., the late Dr. Lottner, and Professor Meisner, of Queen's College, Belfast, and others, that he was eminently qualified for the Chair of Modern Languages, the testimony of these gentlemen in his favour being exceptionally strong. Many years ago a letter was brought under the notice of the late President and the Council of the College, which stated that Professor Geissler had not obtained the degree he claimed. This allegation was carefully investigated at the time by the late President, who subsequently stated that the Professor had submitted documents to him which proved that he had taken the degree.

MR. HEALY asked whether inquiries had been made at Gottingen?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was not aware. Professor Geissler was at present abroad.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE KING'S CO. AND CO. TIPPERARY.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the names of several gentlemen resident in Roscrea and its vicinity were recommended by the priests and people of the district to the Lord Chancellor as suitable for the Commission of the Peace; and, if any action has yet

MR. TREVELYAN: The Lord Chancellor informs me that such representations have been received, and that he has been in correspondence thereon with the Lieutenants of the King's County and the county of Tipperary with respect to them; but they have not as yet been finally disposed of.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. KELLY, Q.C., COUNTY COURT JUDGE FOR CLARE.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What explanation Mr. Kelly, Q.C., County Court Judge for Clare, has given the Lords Justices for his conduct towards a juror in his Court?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the County Court Judge states that, in his opinion, the juror referred to improperly interfered with the prosecution at a time and in a manner which was not warranted. This was a matter entirely for the County Court Judge to determine, and he was bound to stop such interference if it was improper as he asserts it was. The Lords Justices have accepted Mr. Kelly's explanation as satisfactory.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—DYING DECLARATIONS—CASE OF THE BROTHERS DELAHUNTY.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the opinion of the learned Judge who tried the case has been given with regard to the importance of a dying declaration made relative to the conviction of the brothers Delahunty at Cork Winter Assizes 1882?

MR. TREVELYAN: The learned Judge has not yet expressed an opinion on the case, which is still before him. He telegraphs to-day that he will send the Papers at the earliest possible moment. When they arrive they will be carefully considered.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN SCANDALS—MR. BOYLE, J.P.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a warrant has been issued against Mr. R. Boyle, J.P., stockbroker, in connection with the Dublin scandals; has he fled from justice; and, is he to be allowed to remain in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that a warrant in this case has been issued; but that it has not been executed, as Mr. Boyle has left the country.

MR. HEALY: The Government are, of course, aware that Mr. Boyle holds a stockbroker's warrant?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes. The whole of the circumstances are before the Lord Chancellor.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—
ATTACK ON THE SALVATION ARMY AT COOTEHILL, CO. CAVAN.

MR. BERESFORD asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to an attack made by a riotous mob on a number of members of the Salvation Army in the town of Cootehill, county Cavan, Ireland, on 22nd May, 1884, in the presence of the head constable and other constables of the local force of the Royal Irish Constabulary; whether, on the following Sunday, several hundred persons again assembled with the intention of attacking the Salvation Army, but were prevented doing so by Captain Mansfield, R.M. and a large force of police; and, whether the Government intend to prosecute the ringleaders of the mob, who are well known to the police?

MR. TREVELYAN: The matter has not previously been specially under my notice; but I have a Report now, from which I find that the circumstances of the disturbances which occurred on the 22nd of May were fully before my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, who decided not to direct any prosecutions. It is true that on occasions subsequent to the 22nd of May further disturbance was apprehended, and police arrangements were made accordingly. My hon. and learned Friend acted on the well-advised opinion of the Sessional Crown Solicitor.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—CLAUSE 19—LOANS FOR LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will suggest to the Land Commissioners to include in their Report of Proceedings (furnished monthly) the number of orders made under Clause 19, Land Act, 1881, for the building or repair of labourers' cottages?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Land Commissioners have drawn my attention to the fact that information on this subject is given in their monthly Returns of judicial rents. They do not think it would be desirable to attempt to include this detail in their monthly Return of proceedings—the issue of which would be greatly delayed thereby.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE HUT AT RATH-GORMACK, CO. WATERFORD.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a police hut was erected in the parish of Rathgormack, county of Waterford, over three years ago, in a district in which not a single outrage was committed during the whole of the agitation, and which is a most peaceable district; and, if he will state why the hut was erected, why it has been kept up for three years at the expense of the ratepayers, and when will it be removed?

MR. TREVELYAN: The police station was established at Rathgormack a little over two years ago. The men are included in the county force, and are not charged to the district. It would be necessary to establish a station in that locality, because a large tract of country there was without police. It is not correct to say, I am informed, that the district is free from outrage. A good deal of intimidation is being carried on. The forming of this station enabled the Government to do away with two protection posts, which were necessarily established for the protection of persons in charge of evicted farms.

In reply to a further Question from MR. LEAMY,

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he was not informed whether, numerically, the two protection posts or the police station included the more men. He should imagine, from the information given him, that there was no extra charge on the county in consequence of the police station, which enabled the protection posts to be dispensed with.

Mr. LEAMY: Will this be kept up?

Mr. TREVELYAN: It will certainly not be kept up, if it is not necessary; but I am informed it is still necessary.

VACCINATION ACTS—CASE OF THE REV. W. KEAY, GREAT YARMOUTH.

Mr. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case of the Rev. W. Keay, curate of Great Yarmouth, who has been twice prosecuted and fined the maximum penalty and exceptionally heavy costs for refusing to submit his child to vaccination, and is now served with notice of further proceedings; and, whether he will call the attention of guardians to the "Evesham" letter?

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL (for Sir CHARLES W. DILKE), in reply, said, the Board had received letters from this gentleman, copies of which had been forwarded to the Board of Guardians, together with a copy of the "Evesham" letter referred to in the Question.

MADAGASCAR—NAVAL OPERATIONS OF FRANCE—PROTECTION TO BRITISH COMMERCE.

Mr. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have received any authentic information from the French Government as to their intentions in Madagascar; and, whether, having regard to the great injury inflicted upon British commerce by the French Naval operations on the Malagasy coast, Her Majesty's Government will take such steps as may be necessary to protect the interests of this Country in the island, and to promote the restoration of peace?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; no such information has been received. I have already stated, in reply to the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), that a British man-of-war has proceeded to the station, and that the Consular Staff has been strengthened in order to afford to British subjects the protection to which they were entitled. Her Majesty's Government have also received assurances from the French Government that the Naval Commanders have had instructions sent to them to carry on their operations in such a manner as to injure as little as possible neutral subjects and their property.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SECRET SOCIETIES—NUMBER OF FREEMASONS.

Mr. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state the number of Freemasons in each grade of the Constabulary Force in Ireland, distinguishing them also by their religious denominations?

Mr. TREVELYAN: No, Sir; the Government have no information on the subject which would enable them to prepare the Return.

Mr. HEALY asked, if his information was correct, that every policeman on joining had to take the Oath of Allegiance to Her Majesty, and that while the members of the force were not permitted to belong to any other secret society, they were allowed to become Members of the Freemason secret society?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir; that is the case.

INDIA (MADRAS)—PERSONAL STAFF OF THE GOVERNOR—POSTAL FACILITIES.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will inform the House from what year the practice dates of allowing Officers, Civil and Military, on the personal Staff of the Governor of Madras, to send letters home for two pence the half ounce, against five pence the usual rate; under what circumstances this new arrangement was made; and, why these Staff Officers, who draw high rates of pay and allowances, should enjoy an advantage denied to poorly paid Regimental Officers?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: Sir, the practice described by the hon. Member does not exist. Letters inclosed in the Governor's bag are carried free, as I informed the hon. Gentleman on Monday.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact, as stated by The Cologne Gazette and The London Observer, that Her Majesty's Government has urged Germany to employ her influence to modify the hostile attitude taken up by France towards England in the Conference on the finances of Egypt, and that Germany has declined to interfere?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, as stated yesterday by the First Lord of the Treasury, it is impossible, until a full statement is made in regard to the Conference, to make incomplete communications in the House in regard to particular points; but I must ask that, meanwhile, no inferences should be drawn, either positive or negative, from my refusal to make such communications.

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—IMPORTATION OF FRENCH RECIDIVISTS.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information as to the results of the remonstrances which, in the interests of our Australasian Colonies, Her Majesty's Government has been making to the Government of France against the proposed wholesale deportation of French criminal classes to New Caledonia, and against the serious injuries which, even with their present limited development, the French penal settlements entail on our fellow-subjects?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have not yet received a reply to the representation which Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris addressed to the French Government on the 23rd of May last; but it is probable that, before replying, they have awaited the Report of the Committee of the French Senate upon the Bill relating to this matter. This Report was only laid before the Senate on the 29th ultimo, and then ordered to be printed. This question continues to engage the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether the Law Officers of the Crown have given their opinion as to the necessity laid upon the School Boards to supply school accommodation; and, whether he can communicate the result of their opinion to the House?

MR. MUNDELLA: We have received the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown; and the result is that the action of the Department since the passing of the Act of 1870 is fully sustained. In their view, the necessity is laid upon School Boards to supply school accommodation. They are, further, of opinion that when a School Board is established to supply the deficiency of accommodation, it is bound to supply such deficiency by School Board schools, and the Department has not the discretion to accept a voluntary supply in substitution for the accommodation to be provided by the School Board.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA QUARTERMASTERS—RETIRED PAY.

DR. LYONS asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, What rate of Army retired pay are Militia Quartermasters, who received Army commissions in 1874, 1875, and 1876, and who had previously served in the non-commissioned rank of the Regular Army for 21 years, entitled to for a service under five years with a Brigade Depot if they are willing to surrender their claim to Chelsea Pension?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: The quartermasters referred to, if compulsorily retired at the age of 55, are entitled to 4s. 6d. a-day as retired pay. If, on the 31st of March, 1877, they were in receipt of Chelsea pension, they can draw such pension concurrently with retired pay; but the surrender of their Chelsea pension would not give a title to higher retired pay.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS—PROMOTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, What prospect a Quartermaster in the Army has of further promotion; and if he could state why this class of soldier is ineligible for promotion to the position of Paymaster in consequence of the present regulations?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: In answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that a quartermaster in the Army may be recommended for promotion to the rank of lieutenant in either Cavalry or Infantry by Article VI. of the Revised Pay Warrant, provided he shall not exceed the age of 32 years. When promoted to be a lieutenant, he is eligible for promotion to the rank of captain after two years' service, either upon half-pay or in a regiment; and, in the latter case, he becomes eligible for a regimental majority up to 40 years of age, and afterwards to promotion to the higher grades. If he remains a quartermaster, he obtains by Article VIII. the honorary and relative rank of captain after 10 years' commissioned service as quartermaster on full pay, which carries with it an increase of allowances and widow's pension. In answer to the second part of the Question, I have to say that the quartermaster is a commissioned officer as defined by the Army Act, and not "a soldier," as stated in the Question; while the present Regulations for admission to the Pay Department do not render him ineligible, but rather facilitate his entry into the Department by reducing the qualifying service from ten to seven years in the combatant ranks for first appointments as paymasters.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—OVER-PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he will consider, during the recess, the practicability of making inquiries, in the case of Elementary Schools in which over-pressure is alleged to exist, by persons unconnected with the management of those schools?

Mr. MUNDELLA: We are satisfied that the provisions of the New Code and the Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors will do all that can be done by the Education Department to prevent the alleged over-pressure. Until it is shown by experience that these precautions are insufficient, any inquiry which would prejudice the action of managers and Local Authorities would appear to be objectionable and unnecessary.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT: Perhaps I may be allowed to explain. We have had many complaints of the kind; and I must say the right hon. Gentleman has given them his best attention. But what I want to know is, will an inquiry be made in each case by an Inspector independent of the Department, in the same way as the Home Office, in case of accident, inspects mines?

Mr. MUNDELLA: That would be hardly fair. The School Boards in the country are most anxious to prevent over-pressure, and I wish that some of the voluntary schools would do now what the board schools are doing. The London School Board, I am informed, have put their pupil teachers on half time. It would be very unfair to institute an independent inquiry, when the School Boards are doing the best they can.

Mr. DAWSON asked whether the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been called to the fact that the introduction of a system of manual or industrial employment during a portion of the day would be a great relief from over-pressure?

Mr. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir; my attention has been brought to the subject.

ARMY—PURCHASE OFFICERS—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of the hardship inflicted on some officers who, having purchased their Subaltern's commissions, have been compulsorily retired from the rank of Major at the age of 48; and, whether, in order to abate this hardship, he will consider if it be possible to extend the age in this case to the age of 50, as has been done in the case of those who had purchased their captain's commission?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If the right hon. and gallant Baronet will refer to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1874 on Army Promotion, he will find that one of the general principles adopted in dealing with the purchase officers was that—

"Officers who had been promoted to a higher regimental rank since the abolition of Purchase cannot claim exemption from any new rules affecting that higher rank."

In reply to the right hon. and gallant Baronet, my Predecessor stated, in 1881, that he would not be justified in disturbing the settlement of 1877 as to these officers, and I can only concur in that decision.

IRELAND—THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, DUBLIN.

Mr. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What facilities are afforded by the Royal College of Science in Dublin for the practical teaching of the artizan classes; what lectures there are on industrial subjects; and, whether there are evening classes for the benefit of persons employed at labour by day; and, if so, how many artizans are in attendance?

MR. MUNDELLA: Full information as to the courses of instruction in the College of Science are given in the directory of that institution, which is published annually. The only special facilities offered to the artizan classes are the Royal Exhibitions, national scholarships, and free admissions, annually open to competition. The College was intended to afford advanced scientific instruction, the general scheme of which was laid down by a Commission presided over by Lord Rosse in 1866. Their Report will be found in Parliamentary Paper No. 219 of 1867. The Professors are not required to give evening lectures by that scheme, or by the terms of their appointment, such evening lectures for the working classes being provided for by the general system of Aid-to-Science and Art Classes; but they have voluntarily given courses at different times. The courses given in the Session 1882-3 will be found at page 307 of the last annual Report of the Department. No evening lectures were given during the Session just terminated, because those during the previous Session were not sufficiently well attended to induce the Professors to continue them. I trust I may be allowed to supplement my answer to the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot), and add that in cases of over-pressure in board schools inquiry is always made by an Inspector of the Education Department, independently of the School Board concerned.

MR. DAWSON: Might I ask if there is any scientific or other institution in Dublin, a city of 300,000 inhabitants, to give instruction to artizans?

MR. MUNDELLA: There are the same facilities in Dublin as in London, and in every other city and town in the United Kingdom. We make just the same grants to students in Ireland as to students in England and Scotland, and the same scholarships are open.

EAST INDIAN UNCLAIMED STOCKS BILL.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to proceed with the East Indian Unclaimed Stocks Bill this Session; or, if not, whether the discharge of the Order will be moved this evening?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Yes, Sir.

CENTRAL ASIA—DELIMITATION OF THE AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Russian escort which is to accompany the Commission for delimiting the frontier of Afghanistan is to consist of a battery of artillery, a regiment of cavalry, and a regiment of infantry?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No information of that character has been received by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BOURKE: Then I will ask—I hardly know whom—but will Her Majesty's Government take steps to ascertain, before the Commission starts from India, what the nature of the Russian escort is to be; and whether, if this Commission is to go on, they will make arrangements for having a suitable escort for the British Commissioners?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think the Question regarding the escort to the British Commissioners would be more properly asked of the Under Secretary of State for India; but I can certainly say that the question is receiving attention, and I have no doubt that, in regard to the Russian escort, Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg will keep the Government fully informed.

MR. BOURKE: Has the noble Lord noticed a statement in The Bombay Gazette with regard to the Russian escort? If not, I shall be very happy to supply him with it.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have seen a notice in one of the newspapers; it is probably that the right hon. Gentleman refers to.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: In the event of this Frontier being settled, I wish to ask the noble Lord if the Government are prepared to state what means they are going to take to maintain it afterwards?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir. I stated the other day that, while these negotiations were going on, it was quite impossible to make a statement in regard to the subject.

MINES REGULATION ACT, 1872— INSPECTORS OF MINES.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can now inform the House as to the decision of the Government regarding the necessity for increasing the number of inspectors of mines?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the Treasury on the subject; and, having received the sanction of that Department, he hoped soon to make arrangements for appointing additional Inspectors, in accordance with what he thought was the general view of the House expressed during the recent debate on the question.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIVER SHANNON.

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If the outlay of £58,757, expended in sluicing the weirs to regulate the Shannon floods, has been defrayed entirely by the Treasury?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes, Sir; the navigation over the whole of the Shannon is managed by the State, which collects the receipts, and applies them towards the necessary expenditure. The improvement of the weirs was commenced in the distressed period of 1880, and, being a work intimately connected with the navigation, had to be paid for entirely by the public, although local proprietors have, no doubt, partly benefited by it.

NAVY—NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is contemplated to take steps to secure for Naval Courts Martial such a degree of legal revision as is given to Army Courts Martial?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; it has appeared to the Board of Admiralty to be desirable that the proceedings and findings of courts martial should be submitted to the Judge Advocate of the Fleet, with reference to any points of law that might arise concerning them, and some time ago orders were given accordingly.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) — INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS, LIMERICK—SURCHARGES.

MR. BERESFORD asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Sir John Lentaigne, C.B., surcharged some of the male and female managers of industrial schools situated in Limerick a considerable sum of money for inaccuracy in their reports, and representing to him that a number of children were in the schools when they were inmates of the Limerick Union Workhouse; whether the managers were paid a sum of money, from several counties, for the same children, who were supported at the expense of the ratepayers; and, whether he will state to the House the several amounts which have been thus paid to these managers?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is a fact that Sir John Lentaigne, when auditing the accounts of the Government grant in aid, surcharged the managers of three Limerick schools, in respect of certain children, who were paid for at a time when they were in Limerick Workhouse Hospital. The amounts were—St. Vincent's Industrial School, £109; Limerick Male School, £29; St. Joseph's Reformatory School, £1. It is also a fact that the Government have received an explanation from the managers, which has enabled them to decide to remit the surcharge—the explanation being shortly that there were always in the schools a larger number of children than the Government grant was paid for, and that when it was necessary to send some of the children to the workhouse hospital, in consequence of their suffering from infectious disease, the managers omitted to send forward to the Industrial Schools Department the names of the children to be substituted in respect of the claim for the rate in aid. This is probably the circumstance to which the hon. Member refers, as Sir John Lentaigne does not audit the county grants. They are audited by the Local Government Board auditor. He is at present on leave of absence, and I have not been able to communicate with him.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—EXTRA POLICE.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state the number of extra police, including officers and men, quartered in each county and city in Ireland; also the dates respectively of the several proclamations of the Lord Lieutenant, under which they are so quartered; also the counties and cities in which the recent reduction of extra men has been made; and the amount of such reduction in each county or city?

MR. TREVELYAN: The information asked for could not be conveniently given in answer to a Question; but I shall be happy to hand to the hon. Member, at once, a table showing the number of extra police in each county on the 31st of December last and the 30th of June respectively, under Section 13 of the old Act, and under the Prevention of Crime Act, and the reductions made in the six months intervening. I could not give the dates of the several proclamations under the Prevention of Crime Act without a reference to Dublin, which time does not permit of, no notice of the Question having been received. But the Papers will contain the dates of the proclamations under Section 13 of the Act of William IV.

MR. PARNELL said, that the information referred to would be sufficient for his purpose.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— RAILWAY AT SUAKIN.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is a fact that different kinds of "plant," with which it is impossible to construct a Railway, have been sent for that purpose to Suakin; and, if the Government authorize this pretended construction of a Railway, and for what purpose?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, in view of the possibility of a railway being constructed in the Soudan, a light contractor's tramway of 18-inch gauge, which was in store, has been sent out to facilitate operations at the landing stages, piers, and depôts at Suakin. A small quantity of the metre gauge has also been sent out, which will be the gauge adopted, if the railway is made. The contractor's railway which was sent out was not for the purpose of the construction of a line of any considerable length; but only for putting the place in a state of preparation if a railway were to be constructed.

NAVY—H.M.S. "GARNET"—THE IN- QUIRY INTO CHARGES AGAINST OFFICERS.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What has been the result of the investigation into the charges made by Mr. Donovan, editor of The Granada People newspaper, against certain officers of H.M.S. Garnet?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: We still await the Report on this subject which was called for from the Commander-in-Chief of the Station. As there has been considerable delay, we have renewed our request for a reply.

EGYPT (ARMY OF OCCUPATION)— RAMLEH BARRACKS.

MR. A. ROSS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any Report was made on the sanitary condition of the barracks at Ramleh, in Egypt, before their occupation by British troops; and, whether there is an unusual amount of sickness, especially enteric fever, prevalent among the battalion quartered there?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am aware of the painful circumstances which has induced the hon. Gentleman to call attention to this matter—the death of a near relative, his gallant son. I hope the hon. Gentleman will permit me to express my sympathy with his family. I, however, may say that in September, 1882, owing to the prevalence of fever among the Force at Alexandria, and especially among that portion of it encamped in and about Ramleh, it became necessary to find barrack accommodation for the troops, and all available buildings were then inspected and a Report furnished. The Ramleh barracks were stated to be large and good barracks, occupying an admirable site exposed to the sea, with a bathing stage available; they required to be cleansed, ventilated, and provided with proper sanitary arrangements. In the Sanitary Report for 1883 it is stated that a large amount of sanitary work has been carried out in these barracks, and that all the sewers and pits are now in a good sanitary state. The present sick rate at Ramleh is high; by the last Return there were 16 cases of enteric fever under treatment, and a total of 185 sick from all causes in a strength of 1,303. An increase of febrile disease is to be expected at this season in Egypt, and the principal medical officer in Egypt (now at home) states that it would be impossible to attribute all the enteric fever to the insanitary state of these barracks after the extensive sanitary work that has been carried out in them. There were 25 cases of enteric fever under treatment at Cairo.

POST OFFICE PROTECTION BILL.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the importance to the public interests of the provisions in the Post Office Protection Bill, relating to the forgery and disclosure of telegrams, the mischievous destruction of letters in pillar boxes, and the manufacture of fictitious stamps, and seeing that the Bill has passed the House of Lords, he will give an early opportunity for the discussion of the measure, so that it might pass into Law this Session?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, the Government were very desirous of passing the Bill. They could not stop Supply for the purpose; but, as the Bill had been through the Lords, he had very good hope that they should find an opportunity of passing it this Session.

PARLIAMENT—WESTMINSTER HALL (WEST FRONT)—SITE OF THE OLD LAW COURTS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Prime Minister, Whether he will use his influence to provide, on the ground lately occupied by the Law Courts, to the West of Westminster Hall, accommodation for the Grand Committees?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that he must first have an opportunity of consulting the First Commissioner of Works before he expressed any opinion on the subject.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY— STANDING ORDER 426A.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move—

“That, for the remainder of the Session, the Standing Order of the 27th of November, 1882, relating to Notices on going into Committee of Supply on Monday and Thursday, be extended to Saturday,”

The Marquess of Hartington

said, it would be evident to the House that if he were to move the Motion which stood in his name on the Paper yesterday, to include Friday as well as Saturday, that a great deal of time would be lost, as such a Motion would lead to the expression of great difference of opinion. It might be, perhaps, of interest to the House, and they would see that the Government had some justification for the proposal, when he told them that for the whole of Supply last year there were 26 Sittings, and that they had already spent 30 Sittings in Supply this Session, and had some more in prospect. Therefore, he hoped the House would be generally favourable to the Motion, and support it. With regard to the Sitting to-morrow, it would be for Supply, and Supply alone. The Government should not think it right, as far as they were concerned, of promoting any other Business, either of their own or of private Members. He moved the Resolution of which Notice had been given.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, for the remainder of the Session, the Standing Order of the 27th of November, 1882, relating to Notices on going into Committee of Supply on Monday and Thursday, be extended to Saturday.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it could not be a matter for surprise that the Prime Minister was adopting the best means he could to bring the Session to an end. He (Mr. Newdegate) could not help asking with Martial—

“When men begin with so much pomp and show,

Why is the end so little and so low?”

The product of all this labour was small. Now, independent Members were asked to give up the remainder of their opportunities. He was no advocate of Obstruction—he had made proposals to prevent it on November 21st, 1882, which the Prime Minister had described as too severe; and he had not, until the last opportunity, called attention to one of the gravest subjects, the defensive power of the Royal Navy. [“Oh, oh!”]

MR. SPEAKER said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, whom he would remind of the Question before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, if he had trespassed, he apologized; but when hon. Members were asked to resign privileges, it was only natural they should discuss opportunities of usefulness resigned in contrast to the object to be gained. He was not aware until he saw the letter from the Admiral of the Fleet—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is entirely out of Order in pursuing this subject; his remarks have no reference whatever to the Motion before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he respectfully asked whether, on the Appropriation Bill, or on what other occasion during the remainder of the Session, it would be competent to bring this grave subject before the House, if the Resolution proposed by the Prime Minister were adopted? His apology for not having intervened sooner was because it was not until the 21st of last month that the letter of the Admiral of the Fleet was written. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I have already ruled this subject to be irrelevant to the Motion before the House; therefore, I must again ask the hon. Gentleman to abstain from that line of observation, and apply himself to the Motion before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he begged again to apologize. He would sit down again, putting to Mr. Speaker this question—If the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman passed, when would there be an opportunity of bringing the subject to which he referred before the House?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not rise to oppose the Motion, which, at that time of the Session, he thought a very reasonable one, provided the Saturday's Sitting was restricted to the Business of Supply. But he hoped, first, that the House would not be asked to sit to an unreasonable hour on Saturday; and, next, that when they had got the Supply they wanted, the Government would themselves move the Adjournment of the House, and do all in their power to carry the Motion. [Mr. GLADSTONE nodded assent.]

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that on a former occasion, not long ago, when the Government gave an assurance that nothing but Supply would be taken, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) combined his forces with those of hon. Members below the Gangway, defeated the Government, and brought forward and passed through Committee a measure which was not expected, and in which they were interested. Bearing that in mind, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to give an assurance to the House that if they agreed to the Motion they would not find themselves in the same position as that to which he had referred.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he gathered from hon. Gentlemen opposite that they had a good deal to say on the Irish Votes. Besides those Votes, there was the Diplomatic Vote, and there were Supplementary Estimates. The House ought to have an understanding that, if the Irish Votes took a considerable time, neither the Supplementary Estimates nor the Diplomatic Vote should be brought on.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government would do all in their power to confine the Business to Supply. They had no intention of taking either the Diplomatic or the Supplementary Votes to-morrow. If the House adopted his Motion, then he thought he should have sufficient confidence about Supply to be able to engage to take the Diplomatic Vote as the first Vote on Monday. With respect to the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), the incident he referred to was the misfortune and not the fault of the Government. They were bound by every means in their power to secure the adjournment of the House when they moved it at a reasonable hour.

MR. ANDERSON said, with reference to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) said about him, he wished to point out that nothing irregular whatever was done on the occasion referred to. It had always been the practice of the House to allow whatever Members of the House were present at the time the Order of the Day was called to decide when that Order was to be taken; and if there was a Saturday Sitting, and the Member in charge of the Bill wished to put it down for Saturday, it rested with the Members of the House present at the time to say whether it should be put down for that day or not. Further, when the Order was reached on the Saturday, it rested with the House to say whether it should then be proceeded with or not. He merely rose, however, to vindicate the right of private Members to deal with their Bills in that way in the future as they had done in the past. It was in no way tyrannizing over the House, or taking an undue latitude, because it rested with the House to say what should be done.

MR. GRAY said, that he had for some time on the Paper a Motion in which several hon. Members, irrespective of politics, took an interest. It was a Motion with respect to the policy of the Post Office in regard to the telephones. He was anxious to test the opinion of the House by a formal vote on the question. He did not expect to have that opportunity now. In view of these facts, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) ought to see that the Postal Vote should be taken at such an hour as would give facilities for discussing the question.

MR. WARTON said, he hoped the Government would resist the putting down by private Members of Orders for to-morrow.

MR. BOURKE said, he supposed the House might conclude, notwithstanding anything that had just passed, that the Prime Minister would be able to carry out to-morrow the conditional promise he made yesterday—that he would make a statement in reference to the Conference.

MR. GLADSTONE: On Monday.

MR. HEALY said, he would ask that a time should be fixed at which Progress should be reported to-morrow, so that they should not be kept until an unreasonable hour. To try to get all the Irish Votes passed on Saturday would only lead to wrangling. There was a strong desire on the part of Irish Members to get the Irish Votes passed and go away home; and, therefore, there was not any likelihood of their unduly prolonging the debates. He would wish that they should have an understanding with the Government that the adjournment should take place at 6 or 7 o'clock. On such Sittings the Government counted on their fingers how many Irish Members were present, and they brought down a number of hard-headed men, who would not be influenced by argument, to outvote them, and put them down. When the Constabulary Vote was taken to-morrow, he hoped the Government would not press on the Vote for the Queen's Colleges. He would like to have a specific statement of the Votes to be taken on Saturday; and, also, whether the proceedings at that Sitting would exclude the Report of Supply.

MR. COURTNEY said, that both the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) knew that it was not in the power of the Government to entirely arrange how the Votes should be taken. He thought he could suggest a plan by which matters could be arranged, so as to appropriate the time remaining at the disposal of the House in a fair and equal way. It would, however, be impossible to carry it out unless there was some concurrence on the part of the hon. Member and his Friends, and unless there was some economy of time and economy of speech. He trusted it was not too much to expect that the Motion with regard to the National School Teachers in Ireland might be disposed of upon the Irish Education Vote, and then they might be able to get through the remaining Votes in Class III. that evening.

MR. HEALY: Including the Constabulary Vote?

MR. COURTNEY said, that Vote was in Class III., and he hoped it might be disposed of that night, though they might have to sit to a late hour. Saturday might then be confined exclusively to Class IV., which might be got through by a reasonable hour in the evening. Then on Monday Class V. might be taken, beginning with the Diplomatic Vote; and they might hope, at an early hour on Tuesday, to take the Revenue Votes, when the question could be raised in which the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) and others were interested. In that way, Supply might be got through in four Sittings.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had distinctly overstepped the limits of his functions. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) had never understood it to be a part of the hon. Gentleman's duty to dictate to the House the manner in which it should proceed with its Business, or the order in which the Votes should be taken. ["Oh, oh!"] He was perfectly certain that if such a statement had come from the Prime Minister, it would have been listened to with attention, and, perhaps, followed up. He had risen, however, for the purpose of communicating to the House and the Prime Minister an idea which had come across him. The Secretary to the Treasury had not noticed the only remark of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) which he might have answered with advantage, and that was whether Report of Supply could be taken on Saturday. But matters turned upon that, for if the Prime Minister could take the Report on Saturday, and on the Report would communicate to the House the result of the sittings of the Conference, he thought some advantage would be gained. They were very much pressed for time, and great inconvenience arose from the uncertainty of the time that might be set apart for a discussion on Egypt, and it might be necessary for hon. Members to consider what line of action they would take on the question. It would be very inconvenient to postpone the statement until Monday at 4 o'clock.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, it was almost useless to hope to get through the Constabulary Vote that night, and he would therefore propose that it should be postponed until Saturday. It was desired by hon. Members who sat near him to discuss the Vote fully and fairly, but without undue expenditure of time.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he would ask whether the Government could not make a definite statement as to what Votes would be taken on Monday? If the discussion on the Irish Votes were prolonged beyond the period the Government anticipated, the Diplomatic Vote might be postponed to Tuesday. He thought that if the Diplomatic Vote could not be taken for certain on Monday, it would be better to fix it for certain on Tuesday.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought the programme of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) somewhat over-sanguine. He (Mr. Gregory) wished to express a hope that Bills would not be proceeded with, as they had been lately, at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning after Progress had been reported on Supply.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Childers) said, it was practically impossible, as suggested by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), to take the Constabulary Vote as well as Class IV. on Saturday. They must, therefore, finish the Constabulary Vote that night, if Class IV. was to be taken on Saturday. As to the question of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), the Diplomatic Vote would, under any circumstances, be the first Order on Monday. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had attacked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) in a very unfair way, for having done his best to explain the probable course of Supply. The noble Lord forgot that the Prime Minister had already spoken, and could not speak again. Besides, his hon. Friend was more conversant with this subject than any other Member of the Government, and it was only natural that he should point out what he considered to be the best course to adopt. As to the suggestion of the noble Lord, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought it was evident that it would be extremely hard on the Government to undertake to make a communication on the Conference to-morrow, assuming that the Conference arrived at a decision the same day. He was not aware of any Vote upon the Report of Supply upon which any reference to the question of the Conference could be made; and it would be irregular to make an important statement about foreign affairs upon a Vote which had nothing to do with them.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA: I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not the case that the Prime Minister may, with the leave of the House, make a statement at any time?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; that would be so.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he thought it was unfair on the part of the Government to try and force all the remaining Irish Votes through on Saturday. He protested against that manner of burking Irish questions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether the Speaker had ruled that it would be in Order, at 6 o'clock to-morrow, by leave of the House, for the Prime Minister to make a statement as to what had passed in the Conference?

MR. SPEAKER: It will be clearly competent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that he would then make an appeal to the Prime Minister to make some statement on the Egyptian Question to-morrow, more particularly when they remembered what had been the course pursued by the Government in connection with the Conference. It had been such as to give rise to grave suspicion, in some quarters, that the Government desired to burke discussion. ["Oh, oh!" and "Shame!"] He made no accusation of that kind himself; nevertheless, the accusation had been made, and had been believed in; and he would, therefore, in their own interests, recommend the Government to take every opportunity of allowing the House to discuss the question. He could not but think that it would be for their own interests that they should tell the House to-morrow, if it was in their power, what had happened in the Conference, so that hon. Members might have Sunday and Monday to consider the position, and determine what was to be done. He ventured to make an earnest appeal to the Government on the subject.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he concurred in the appeal made by his hon. Friend (Mr. A. J. Balfour) to the Government to make such a statement to the House as they might be in a position to make. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought that such a proceeding would be out of Order; but they had now the authority of the Speaker for saying that it would not be. The Prime Minister, moreover, had given a pledge that the House should be made acquainted with the result of the Conference; and it was only reasonable, in view of the great interests concerned, that the Government should make a statement at the earliest possible moment.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the fact was that the time of hon. Members was valuable. On the other hand—he had to take this view—that there was some inconvenience in a conditional pledge; and a conditional pledge was the only pledge that the Government could give. It would be impossible to say to-day how long the Conference would sit to-morrow, or what deliberation on the part of the Cabinet as to the conclusions arrived at by the Conference might be required. But, subject to that uncertainty, they should desire to accommodate hon. Gentlemen in any request if it was reasonable. Consequently, if they were so happy as to have it in their power to do so, they would make that statement to-morrow.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, he was anxious that some definite understanding should be come to between the Irish Members and the Government. It was utterly impossible to cram into to-night and to-morrow a full discussion of the remaining Irish Votes; and he told the Government plainly that, if they forced the Irish Members, by a policy of fatigue, to pass these Votes before they were amply discussed, it would be the duty of himself and his Irish Colleagues to discuss them again on the Appropriation Bill. He asked the Government not to take the Constabulary Vote that night.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that, seeing the House would be infallibly occupied with other Irish questions, he would also urge the Government to postpone the consideration of the Constabulary Vote until to-morrow.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped the House would allow him to express great regret at his having appeared to differ from the Speaker's ruling. He wished to give Notice that he would, to-morrow, ask the Speaker this Question—What opportunity, after the adoption of the Resolution now passed, would be available to hon. Members who might desire to bring forward the question of the sufficiency of our Naval preparations to meet any combination that might be brought against us?

MR. SPEAKER: It would not be in Order for the hon. Gentleman to give such a Notice to the Chair. It is not for me to state what opportunities may be open to the hon. Gentleman; but, if he asks me, I may point out that the various stages of the Appropriation Bill afford a wide scope, and perhaps he may find an opportunity on one of those occasions.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS

(IRELAND).—RESOLUTION.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY, in rising to call attention to the grievances of National School teachers in Ireland ; and to move—

"That this House views with deep regret the impossibility of at present introducing the Education Bill for Ireland promised last year by the Chief Secretary, and that, seeing the hardships which the Irish National Teachers are undoubtedly subjected to, and the necessity which exists of rendering so important a body of public servants contented with their work, this House is of opinion that provision should be made forthwith to improve their incomes temporarily, and that a Bill removing their several grievances should be introduced early in the next Session."

said: Sir, the grievances of the Irish National School teachers, of which I have the honour to be the mouthpiece to-day, are three-fold. In the first place, the teachers complain of insufficient salaries; in the second place, they complain of the want of fit and proper dwelling-places; in the third place, they complain of the want of proper provisions for retiring pensions, when they have worn out their lives and their usefulness in the Public Service. Now, all these grievances are very great grievances, and no apology whatever is needed, on the part of the teachers who make them, or of any hon. Members of this House who support them, in pressing them upon the attention of the Government. There is no duty more incumbent upon a State than the proper education of its citizens, and that duty presses with especial gravity upon a State in its dealings with citizens who bear their citizenship not by choice, but by compulsion. The English Government have insisted upon taking into their own hands the care of Ireland and of the Irish people; they have adopted Ireland, according to that Oriental principle which gives to adoption all the rights and privileges of veritable parentage. Yet, in the Eastern method of adoption, there are generally two parties to the transaction. But though we are by no means a willing party to this process of adoption, though we absolutely refuse to regard England as our mother among the nations, we have the right to insist, and we do insist, that, so long as this principle of adoption holds good, England shall properly fulfil all the duties she has thereby incurred, and of all those duties the duty of properly educating the Irish people takes a foremost place. In no part of this Empire is education more important than in Ireland. Thanks to the fostering care which this country has exercised for so long over our destinies, we have not those large manufactures which, in the happier condition of England and Scotland, afford employment to their peoples. By education, and by education alone, can the vast bulk of the Irish people hope to rise to influence, to affluence, or to ease. Now, you cannot have fitting education without fitting teachers, and you cannot have fitting teachers, except under certain conditions. One of the greatest authorities on education, the great German author Jean Paul Richter, in the exquisite treatise on education which is called Levana, likens teachers and taught to the Gods and the first men. Teachers, he says, physical and spiritual giants to children, descend to these little ones, and form them to be great or small, and he declares that it is a touching and a mighty thought that the teacher has the great spirits and teachers of our immediate posterity under his influence, and that he leads future suns like little wandering stars in his leading strings. The mission of the educator of youth is, indeed, one of the most important that a man can be intrusted with; but it is impossible for any man to attend to that important mission with the necessary wholeheartedness, if his mind is incessantly harassed by cares both now and in the future, and his mind must always be thus harassed so long as the wage he receives is so cruelly insufficient for his daily wants as it is at present. Now, what is the wage which is deemed sufficient for Irish National School teachers, every one of whom, be it remembered, has in his hands the education and, in consequence, the future destiny of a large number of Irish citizens? The average income of an Irish National School teacher, by the Parliamentary Return of June, 1881, is under £60. This sum, most unfairly insufficient in itself, appears yet more insufficient and unfair when we remember that it is rather less than one-half of the average income of teachers in England and in Scotland. The highest salary an Irish National School teacher ever gets is poor enough; the lowest is miserable in the extreme. Attempts have been made from time to time to better this condition of things by systems of results fees; but the attempts have so far wholly failed to materially improve the position of the Irish National School teacher. It is only one other example of the unconquerable patience of the Irish race, that, in defiance of the privations that so unjust a scale of wage brings with it, the Irish National School teachers have so far been able to hold their own well, as far as results go, with their better-paid brethren of England and Scotland. But, when we take into consideration the terribly unequal conditions of the competition, this successful rivalry of results cannot be expected to continue. There is—it is really not surprising—there is a dearth of candidates for the posts of National School teachers in Ireland. You cannot lure men into the acceptance of posts of grave responsibility and arduous labour by the temptations of starvation wages, miserable habitations, and no prospect of a provision for their helpless old age. Does the House think that Irish teachers can live on the air, promise-crammed? Does it consider less than £60 a-year a tempting salary for human beings in the responsible position of teachers of the rising generation? At least, the Irish people do not think so. From all parts of Ireland come official Reports, recording the difficulty of finding teachers. District after district announces—

“A great dearth of candidates. We are told by competent authorities that the Service is only the last resort of those despairing of more coveted posts.”

Melancholy stories are told of teachers who—“Would be sore pinched if their incomes were not augmented by the profits of their little shops.”

And so the dismal record runs on, instance after instance, for page after page. Some of the Irish National School teachers, sorely pressed by need, have endeavoured to combine their duties as the instructors of youth with the pursuit of farming on their own account. This is greatly to be deplored, if it is not greatly to be wondered at. We learn that these half-teachers, half-farmers—

“Never apply themselves to their studies with a view to improving their classification, but spend the greater part of their time, outside school hours, in working upon their farms;”

that they make neither good teachers nor good farmers; we learn that, in their manner, dress, and conversation, they have a greater resemblance to agricultural labourers than to school teachers. Such a combination of rural pursuits with the duties of the education of others might have been possible in a simpler age than ours, when the shepherds of Theocritus tended their flocks upon the Sicilian slopes and Virgilian shepherds hived their bees on the Roman Campagna. There was no reason why Comatas should not teach Lacon how to pipe and sing in the intervals between pressing his wine and shearing his sheep. Melibœus might easily snatch leisure from his thatching or digging to instruct Tityrus in the movements of the stars and the change of the seasons, or the fortunes of the Trojan War. But we have passed away from those pastoral days. Modern education requires something more from its professors than Comatas and Melibœus could offer to their pupils, and modern education does not look with a very favourable eye upon the attempt to combine the quiet pleasures and cares of a farmer's life with the task of giving instruction to the young. At the same time, the teachers who thus become farmers are not to be too severely blamed. What reward have they? What hope have they? It is scarcely strange that they endeavour to glean from the cultivation of the fruitful earth some better means of keeping body and soul together than is afforded to them by the cultivation of the human mind. Nor is it strange that these teachers turned farmers should, in the end, become more of the farmer than of the teacher. The farmer's is the more profitable occupation of the two. It is the State that is to blame for the niggard spirit which tries to cheat the human understanding by underpaying its teachers. It is the State that is to blame for doling out, with parsimonious fingers, the pitiful sums that it now offers to the ministrants of education in Ireland, sums so pitiful that, if they are persevered in, the State will soon have no teachers at all, or only teachers that are worth no more than the beggarly denier they are bought for. But the lack of salary is not the Irish teachers' only want. The want of a proper dwelling too often presses just as heavily upon him as the scarcity of salary. The cases in which provision is directly made for the teacher's abode are few. Even by the most recent figures, some 80 per cent of the teachers were unprovided with residences connected with their schools. It is not very long since London was stimulated to unexpected pity by ghastly, yet, I have no doubt, perfectly accurate pictures of the miserable way in which the London poor were housed. It became quite fashionable to go "slumming." I wish it could become, for a few weeks, the fashion for some of the sympathetic spirits in London to cross the Irish Sea, and learn how, not the poor alone, but the teachers of the poor—those whose task it is to make men forget or conquer their poverty—are housed. The dwellings in which many of the teachers have to live would not be chosen by a charitably-minded manager of a menagerie as hutches for hyenas. The teachers are often pent up in narrow limits, badly lighted, badly drained, badly ventilated, except indeed when, as frequently happens, the roof blows off or falls in, and allows of too much ventilation. Even these wretched dwellings, which defy alike the laws of health and the custom of decency, are miles and miles away from the schools in which the teachers have to teach. Now, Sir, I come to my third point—pensions. In all vocations of life, men look forward to a time when they may rest from their labours and wait with folded hands for the hour of their death; in many vocations men hoard for themselves the small sum which will allow them to end their days of toil in an evening of peace. But the vast majority of the Irish National School teachers cannot possibly do this. Their meed is barely sufficient to keep them alive; it allows them no margin for laying anything by. They are amongst the most valuable servants of the State and they deserve a pension. Well, the Government has made some provision at last for this, but what provision? The Government seems to have acted on the principle of the survival of the fittest, and to have retarded its pensions as long as possible, in the hope, apparently, that very few Irish teachers may live long enough to profit by its delusive munificence. For example, a first class teacher, on entering the Profession at 18, would receive at 65, after 47 years' service, a pension of £88. The third class teachers, who are, of course, the most numerous, would only receive £35 for the same life's labour. Yet, if the same teacher retired at the age of 58, after 40 years' toil, he would only receive a pension of half the amount he would receive if he held on for seven years longer. Thus, the Government apparently regards the last seven years of a man's work as of exactly the same value as the whole 40 years preceding. In fact, the Government pension is really a reward for physical endurance—the survival of the fittest. The education of the Irish people has always been accomplished in the face of difficulties that would have driven a less-determined people to despair. Through darkened generations, the Irish people strove with all their strength to be educated, and the English people strove with all their strength to prevent them from being educated. The Irish priests, as heroic as the disciples of Patrick who carried Christianity to the Highlands of Scotland, the pine forests of Germany and the Islands of the Northern Seas, fought once again a fight with barbarism, and once again prevailed against it. When no Catholic might open a school, the priests established what were known as "hedge schools." The new defenders of the Faith gave to a hungry people that intellectual food which the harsh law denied them. In the end, the hedge school and the hedge scholars triumphed, and England had to learn that she could not withhold education from the subject people. But she has not learnt the lesson thoroughly yet. The State provides the means of education, but the means are not sufficient. The Government has accepted the responsibility, and it must face that responsibility in a proper spirit. I trust the Government will see their way to do something at once, and to promise more for the future, for the Irish National School teachers. I beg, Sir, to move the Resolution that stands in my name.

COLONEL NOLAN, in seconding the Motion, said, that it was hard that the National School teachers in Ireland were not remunerated on the same scale as their brethren in England and Scotland. While the salaries of these teachers were £127 in England, and £138 in Scotland, in Ireland they averaged only a little over £60, or less than one-half. At the same time, the cost of living was in no instance less, and in some greater, in Ireland than in those countries. The consequence was that the Irish teacher, who could not be expected to dress like a labouring man, was, in reality, worse off than the peasant; and he could inform the House that many of the Irish School teachers were obliged to walk about in peasant dress on account of their poverty. The Government were always going to do something "next Session," but the Irish Members never got such a promise as would bind gentlemen of honour to bring in a Bill. It was said that on account of the amount of money received from England and Scotland by taxation, that all the more should be expended in these countries. What he (Colonel Nolan) contended was that the Education Estimates for England and Scotland had advanced by leaps and bounds, while those for Ireland had remained stationary. The statistics on the question went to show that the cost of the Government per head for education in Ireland was practically the same as the cost per head in Great Britain, as during the last 12 years the grant to Ireland had been becoming proportionately less. The difficulties of educating people who were spread over a wide area, as they were in the case of Ireland, were greater than those involved in educating the people of towns, and even the population of Scotland was, on the whole, more concentrated than that of Ireland. Yet the Government did not give Ireland a little more on this account, and it left the teachers in a wretched condition. It had been said that they ought to look to the localities for some help; but the fact was, that whereas in England the cost of education was largely contributed to by various wealthy classes, and by the application of endowments, of which both that country and Scotland had a great many, in Ireland there were very few endowments remaining, what there originally were having been confiscated, and the only rich class in the latter country who, in the event of their decease, were likely to bequeath money for the purpose of endowments for educational purposes, were out of sympathy with the people as regarded religion, and were to a large extent absentees. Neither was it of any use to expect assistance from the Poor Law Guardians, who, though not indifferent to education, thought it ought not to be maintained out of the poor rates, and therefore some other resource must be looked to. A very heavy responsibility rested upon the Government in regard to the subject, and he thought the Government ought to provide about £100,000, which would suffice to meet the case for some time to come.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House views with deep regret the impossibility of at present introducing the Education Bill for Ireland promised last year by the Chief Secretary, and that, seeing the hardships which the Irish National Teachers are undoubtedly subjected to, and the necessity which exists of rendering so important a body of public servants contented with their work, this House is of opinion that provision should be made forthwith to improve their incomes temporarily, and that a Bill removing their several grievances should be introduced early in the next Session,"—(Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy.)

—instead thereof.

COLONEL COLTHURST, in supporting the Motion, said, he should be sorry to think that the success or partial success of the teachers' claim should depend upon whether the Government were appreciably to increase the grant for education. Even if it were not increased a great deal might be done to remedy the great grievances of the Irish teachers. When the Unions were made contributory, a large number at first availed themselves of the power of contributing, and they did not find their contributions burdensome to the rates. The Cork Union contributed up to the present time, and did not find it burdensome to do so. But one Union after another dropped off; the example became contagious, and now the number contributing was reduced to four. Whether or not a National rate for Poor Law purposes would be justifiable he did not say; but there could be no question it would be justified in the case of education; and he believed still if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland brought in a Bill next year, authorizing a National rate of 1d. in the pound, it would amply provide the Irish National School teachers with an adequate addition to their salaries.

There should be a minimum below which the salaries of no well-classed teacher should fall, and if such a rate as he had suggested were adopted, the minimum salary would be provided. With regard to pensions, he was of opinion that the demands of the teachers were fair. He thought 35 years' service should entitle a teacher to a pension, irrespective of age. The Teachers' Residences Act was no doubt a very liberal and praiseworthy measure, as it offered to any locality in which it was desired to build a teacher's house, a sum of £200. It was possible for a teacher in a good district to take advantage of that Act; but a teacher with a poor salary, and with managers who would not assist him, could not. It was also nearly impossible to obtain suitable sites for teachers' dwellings, owing to the want of sympathy that existed between the rich and poor classes in Ireland; and since the passing of the Land Act, there was the greatest disinclination on the part of occupiers of land to part with a bit of land upon any terms whatever, and if teachers were to be properly housed, compulsory power should be given to acquire sites on which to build residences. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) had done good service in bringing this matter before the House, and he hoped that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would give precedence next Session over all other measures, including the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, to a well-considered Parliamentary scheme for redressing the many grievances which harassed and embarrassed the action of the National School teachers of Ireland.

Mr. DAWSON said, he had great pleasure in congratulating his hon. Friend the Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) on his admirable speech in introducing the subject; but he could not congratulate the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down (Colonel Colthurst) on the remedy of hope deferred, which he had proposed as a solution of the Irish National School teachers' grievance. Educators of the people in Ireland were shamefully neglected. The teachers in England and in foreign countries were treated with the deepest respect; but in Ireland the reverse of that was the case. This was, he contended, due to the fact that, in the latter, the teachers were protected by the Government; while, in Ireland, they were scarcely officially recognized. The minimum salaries formerly offered to National schoolmasters—namely, £15, were such as a cook would not accept; and the maximum salaries, £45, they would not offer to their valet. No doubt, that state of things had been improved through the exertions of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon); but still their remuneration was entirely incommensurate with their abilities and devotion to work. The disproportion which existed between their salaries and those of English and Scotch teachers were almost inexplicable, and he failed to see any reason why the social position of an English teacher should be better than that of an Irish teacher, or why, in this country, teachers' salaries should be 100 per cent more than they were in Ireland. He hoped the Government in the future would give the same protection to Irish teachers as they had afforded in the past to teachers in England. The teachers in Ireland were paid by results; but there was no compulsory education in the country as in England, so that the teachers were not given the materials for producing results. With regard to pensions, teachers usually entered the Profession at 17 or 18. If they retired at 38, after 20 years' service, they got £6 a-year pension; if they retired at 48, after 30 years' service, they got £18; if at 53, after 35 years' service, they got £25; and if at 65, after 47 years' service, they got half their salary. An Inspector of Police who, on the other hand, retired at 49, after 27 years' service, got a pension equal to his full pay of £200 a-year. Again, the teacher was obliged to pay something in order to add to his pension. If he lived he got it back; but if, after years of labour, he died before getting it back, the money was confiscated, instead of coming to his family in the hour of its greatest need. He did not deny that they had obtained some advantages, the Government having, at one time, given them a small taste of their bounty; but since then they had withdrawn it, and, in the main, all the promises which had been made to them had proved illusory. They got the promise of residences; but as their erection was made perfectly optional with the managers, the teachers were still without residences. [Colonel NOLAN:

The managers could not get sites.] Then, they were to get grants from the Unions; but that promise had also proved illusory. The contributions from the Poor Law Unions were practically nothing; and, looking at the unpopular and unpatriotic character of the administration of the Commissioners of National Education, he must confess he did not blame the Guardians for not contributing to a system with which they had no sympathy. Soon after the passing of the Act, the teachers got £27,000 from 65 Unions, but, in 1882, they only got £9,000. These things might be amended by a Bill which he was told the right hon. Gentleman had in his pigeon-holes. But the question was, what would the Government do to relieve the teachers to-day? He would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with the aid of the Prime Minister, should introduce a Supplementary (ad interim) Vote to help those unfortunate people.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) had introduced the subject in a speech which showed, at any rate, that he sympathized with everything which concerned education. It was an extremely cultivated speech, and one which, as a veteran of the House, he might be allowed to say gave very good hope as to the contributions which, in after years, the hon. Member might make to the debates of that House. The hon. Member had stated the case of the Irish teachers with a view to an immediate solution, which was put in a more definite and pointed form in the peroration of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Dawson). The proposal of the hon. Members was that a Supplementary Grant should be made out of the general Exchequer; but before the Government acceded to such a proposal, they would have to examine the premisses upon which it was asked; and, in examining those premisses, he had come to a conclusion very different from those of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway and the hon. Member for Carlow. It had been said by the hon. Member for Athlone that unsuccessful attempts had been made to better the position of the teachers, and that their position was now as bad as for many years back. Upon that point, he at once joined issue with the hon. Member. The position of Irish teachers had improved to a wonderful degree of late years. Since 1871 their position had been improved in one way and another, the most definite and remarkable of which was the introduction of the system of result fees. In the year 1872 the salaries of masters in the way of class ranged from £52 to £24, whereas they now ranged from £70 to £35; while the class salaries of mistresses, which, in 1872, ranged from £20 to £12, now ranged from £27 to £58. The payment per pupil had risen from 13s. 11d. in 1871, to £1 3s. 8d. in 1882, and the collective figures proved still more that an immense improvement had been made in the course of the last 10 years. Again, in the year 1871 the grant to Ireland from the Exchequer was £381,000, and in 1883-4 it was £726,000. Of those amounts, £262,000 was paid to the teachers in 1870-1; and in 1883-4 the amount was £580,000. That was an immense rise, and absolved the Government, as he thought, from the charge that they had done little or nothing in the matter for many years past. Comparisons which, though sufficiently striking, were, he thought, considerably exaggerated, had been made between the position of the teachers in Ireland and those in England and Scotland. It had been asserted that teachers in England and Scotland were paid twice as much as those in Ireland. The fact was that the average teacher in Ireland got as much as £80 a-year; while the average certificated master in England received £120. That was, no doubt, a very considerable difference; but it was not twice as much. [MR. DAWSON: What about the female teachers?] The average annual salary of the female teachers in Ireland would certainly amount to £60 from all sources; while in England it would amount to £72. He had not taken the general average. The difference would be represented very much more accurately by half as much again than by twice as much. When a demand was made for money from the Exchequer—that was, for money paid by the taxpayers of the whole Kingdom—it was necessary to look not only at the actual position of the people it was to benefit, but also at what the taxpayer had done for them already. Respecting it, he had to take a great deal of exception to what had been said by hon. Members. He would not enter into the general causes which had been referred to to explain the very different average which local aid occupied in Ireland and in England; but there could be no doubt it was very great indeed. In England, the population at the last Census was 26,000,000, and the Parliamentary Grant was £2,400,000. The number of pupils was 3,000,000, and the payment for each pupil from the Exchequer was 15s. 10½d. The payment for each pupil in Scotland was 17s. 8½d., and in Ireland £1 11s. 1½d. Now, he was sure no Englishman or Scotchman, neither would he himself, grudge that favourable proportion to Ireland; but it was a serious matter to ask the taxpayers of the Kingdom to increase that amount. If £100,000 were granted to these teachers, it must be recollected that of that amount Ireland would only pay £10,000, Scotland £11,000, and England about £79,000. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), who was a clever statistician, had somehow made out that Scotland received more than Ireland in the matter of education; but the calculation he (Mr. Trevelyan) had made was that it did not receive as much as Ireland, though the proportion of population was as 4 to 5. In Scotland at the last Census there were 3,735,000 people, and 421,000 pupils on the rolls. As he had said, in England there were 26,000,000 of people, and £2,400,000 was paid by the Exchequer. That was something less than 2s. a-head for the population. In Ireland there were 5,160,000 people, and £730,000 paid by the Exchequer, or nearly 3s. a-head for the population. In Scotland there were 3,700,000 people, and only £372,000 paid for popular education, or about 2s. a-head for the population; so that, instead of Scotland having more or as much paid to her for education as Ireland, she had only a little more than half as much. That being so, he thought the House should be very slow indeed to improve the condition of Irish teachers any further by direct money payments out of the Exchequer. He was sure, however, that there was no Englishman or Scotchman who would not improve the position of the Irish teachers, if it was done by the same process as in England and Scotland, and that was by securing a better attendance of the pupils, and, consequently, better results. One great cause of the poorness of the condition of the Irish teacher as compared to those of England and Scotland, was the deficiency in the result fees, owing to the number of children who went to school being so very much less for each teacher; and, therefore, the one method of improving the position of the Irish teachers, which, more than anything else, would, he thought, be approved of by hon. Members in every part of the House, was the introduction into Ireland of a system of compulsory education. He did not wish to press too far the argument which had been alluded to by anticipation by almost every speaker on this subject that night; but the real cause why Irish teachers were so badly paid was the absence of local aid. What the cause of that absence of local aid might be, he would not discuss at the present moment. The absence of that aid, however, was more striking than hon. Members opposite were aware. The hon. Members opposite had referred to the want of endowments in Ireland, and to the absence of the rich class; but there was one source of local aid which did not depend upon the presence of the rich, except indirectly, and that was the school pence. In England, with 3,000,000 of children, the school pence amounted to £1,500,000—that was to say, each child contributed 10s. a-year. In Ireland, with 469,000 children, the school pence amounted to £93,000, or about 4s. a-head. Then he came to the voluntary subscriptions; and here he must express his entire sympathy with those hon. Members who lamented the very small sum which was contributed voluntarily towards the support of the Irish schools. There was not in Ireland the same class as in England, who were inclined to subscribe voluntarily towards the support of the schools, or, at all events, its benevolence and public spirit did not run in that direction; and by far the most striking grievance of Ireland was the existence of Irish landlords in the South who did not do their duty, nor a tithe of their duty, towards the education of the people. [Mr. KENNY: Or anything else.] He would confine himself to the matter of education at present. In England the sum raised by voluntary contributions for educational purposes was £724,000, in Scotland it was £30,000, and in Ireland it was £40,000. The deficiency this caused, which he thought was a serious evil, had to be met, and he thought it was made up by very much larger contributions from the Exchequer to Ireland in proportion than to England. Then he came to the income derived from rates, and this was a most significant fact, because the rates were, after all, the contributions not only of the few rich men, but they were exactly in proportion to the wealth and poverty of the members of the entire community. In England the sum derived from the rates was £808,000; in Scotland, £191,000; and in Ireland, £11,904. The main reason for this difference in figures was that in Scotland, the rates were entirely compulsory; in England, they were to a large extent compulsory; while in Ireland, they were voluntary. He could not concur on this point in the observation of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson), who said that the English Government had just let the teachers taste of their bounty, and had then withdrawn it. That observation should have referred not to the English Government, but to the Boards of Guardians. The latter had the power of contributing in exactly the same way as all the Boards of Guardians in Scotland did, and as a considerable number in England did. Under the circumstances, however, it was not his business to blame the Irish Boards of Guardians for their action in this matter—in fact, he did not think that they were to blame in reference to it, because people would not, in the long run, bear their share of a voluntary rate, for the purpose of giving a man a larger salary than he was willing to work for. By subscribing this money they would not get more children educated; they only gave the teachers a better salary, and considering how formidable the increase of rates was, he did not wonder that so few Boards subscribed, or that the people declined to take fresh dues voluntarily upon themselves. But if the ratepayers of Ireland would not do in this matter as the ratepayers of England and Scotland did, the responsibility no longer rested upon the English Government, but upon the people of Ireland, speaking through their Representatives, who objected to the rates in aid being made compulsorily. In the very poorest parishes in Scotland, the school rate was paid cheerfully, and sometimes eagerly. With regard to the residences of the school teachers, he entirely sympathized with the Bill dealing with the subject, which had been introduced by the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst). There, however, again, Parliament was not to blame. Money might be borrowed for their construction, maintenance, and improvement, repayable in 35 years, at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, which were far more reasonable terms than England could obtain, and it was hardly fair to reproach the Government, when those facilities were not taken advantage of. With reference to sites for these residences, however, there was a difficulty, and no Bill would be introduced by the Government which did not remove that grievance thoroughly and completely. The hon. Member for Athlone had referred to the question of pensions, and had remarked that the reason why there was better provision for teachers' salaries in England and Scotland than in Ireland was the superior educational endowments in those countries. In England and in Scotland the teacher had not got a pension. In Ireland, although the conditions were not so favourable as could be wished, the teacher had a pension, and the fact was that there was greater provision in Ireland for paying teachers' pensions out of endowments than in England. A sum of £1,300,000 out of the Irish Church Funds was set aside for teachers' pensions, which was as much an endowment fund as anything could be; and, further, owing to the ancient endowments which had now been diverted to another purpose, the Irish teachers had an advantage which they appreciated, and which was not possessed by England and Scotland. As to the methods by which these pensions were distributed, the fair comparison was not with the Irish Police, but with the teachers of England and Scotland, and the fair question to ask was—whether the £1,300,000 allotted for pensions was distributed so as to be of the greatest advantage to Ireland. The allowances for long and meritorious services were calculated by actuaries on the quinquennial scale, the mean period being 35 years. Five years was the very least period at which a system of pensions ought to be revised, and as to the system it was necessary to adopt age in preference to time of service, so as not to exclude the great number of Irish teachers who had not originally been Government teachers; and until, at any rate, these men and women had passed off the scene, the Government could not alter this arrangement. The quinquennial distribution would come next year. He had reason to believe that there was a surplus, and it would be disbursed so as to be of the greatest advantage to the main body of the teachers. [Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: How is the scheme received by the teachers?] Hon. Members seemed to doubt whether the teachers valued the system. The best evidence of that was that out of 10,621 teachers in the Service, 9,343, or 88 per cent, had joined in it, though it involved a payment from their own resources. Beyond that, he thought the vast majority of them would be found supporting it when it became known that the membership was voluntary, not compulsory. There was no way of improving the teachers' incomes except they obtained a higher classification, and one reason they were unable to obtain a high classification was the deficient and anomalous system of training in Ireland. Still, he thought when hon. Members made speeches condemning the shortcomings of the Government, they ought to say something about what the Government had done. They ought to remember that for a Minister who had left a former Government on the question of undenominational education, it was not an easy matter for him to go back on his antecedents and persuade successfully a House, which was largely leavened with strong undenominational sentiments, to do in Ireland that which alone could enable the Irish teachers to take advantage of the system of training. They must not expect too much in the first year of a new system; but this year they proposed to divide a sum of £10,000 between three Training Colleges of the sort to which Irish teachers were willing to resort, and to which Irishmen in general were glad to contribute. But that was not all; for the Government had viewed with favour, and very practical favour, the proposal that public money should be lent for the building of Training Colleges. His general reply, he was afraid, would disappoint many hon. Members. The Government would not bring in an Education Bill for Ireland which did not deal drastically with the question of sites, and that did not establish a system of compulsory education of a nature which the Leaders of the Irish people would generally accept; the Government would not bring in a Bill which would give the Irish Members an opportunity of saying that they would call upon the ratepayers of Ireland to do what the ratepayers of Scotland had done, though he could well understand that the Government would not make that a point on which the other provisions of the Bill must stand or fall. But when it came to a question of paying more money out of the Exchequer, except in the shape of improved result fees and kindred matters, there he must stop and say that he could not advise the Treasury to assent. He could not accept the Resolution of the hon. Member for Athlone, except on a condition which the hon. Member would hardly accept—namely, to leave out all the words from "opinion" down to "that Bill." Unless he accepted that offer, he was afraid he could not do anything in the matter.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Would the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what is the present position of the Training Colleges?

Mr. TREVELYAN said, the system of grants to these Colleges was exactly the same as in England and Scotland; £10,000 had been taken this year, of which £3,319 was to go to the College in Baginbun Street; £5,273 to St. Patrick's Training College, in Drumcondra; and £1,440 was to be expended on the new College of the Church of Ireland, to be opened in Kildare Street in September.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Are there only three denominational Training Colleges in Ireland?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Yes.

Mr. HEALY said, he was sorry to say he was sure the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) would be received with intense disappointment, not only by teachers in Ireland, but by the entire country. The right hon. Gentleman had told the teachers they had nothing to expect from the Government. There was no hope whatever of the Bill suggested being accepted in Ireland, and he was amazed, and thought it extraordinary, that when a Gentleman distinguished for candour, as the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was, was making his stinging contrast between the contribution from the local rates in England and Scotland and those made in Ireland, that he overlooked the important point that the Irish people, unlike the English and Scotch, had no more to say to the class of education they received than the people of Lapland. Compulsorily educational contributions from local rates would be fought tooth and nail by the Irish Members, unless the Boards of Guardians were previously altered upon the lines of the Poor Law Guardians Bill, and unless there was a complete reform of the so-called Board of National Education, whose leading characteristics he (Mr. Healy) declared were anti-national. That Board included the Judges, Mr. Chief Justice Morris, Mr. Justice Lawson, together with other successful patriots, and likewise four Protestant clergymen and one Protestant Archbishop; but it had not upon it any Catholic Bishop or priest. They must have that Board made representative and thoroughly national. In fact, there was no hope of their ever obtaining a thoroughly efficient system, until they swept away, root and branch, the whole of what was called the National Board, or, at any rate, they must swamp them, before they would have the confidence of the Irish people. With respect to the new denominational Training Schools, he was anxious to know how they were to be maintained? Were Roman Catholics to support their Training College, the Presbyterians theirs, and the Protestant Episcopalians theirs, or were they to be supported out of a common fund? If that were so, he would ask the House to look at the injustice of the proposal. The majority of the rate-payers in Ireland were Catholics, they constituted four-fifths of the population, and were they to be made to find the largest share of the money, and pay rates for the benefit of other denominations, with whose schools and teachings they had no sympathy? They must have a stringent guarantee, before they would consent to compulsory rating, that they should have proper representation, and that the money of the Catholic and Protestant and Presbyterian people would go to Catholics and Protestants and Presbyterians respectively. He would now ask the House to consider the position and prospects of the Irish teachers as compared with those of the

Irish Constabulary. Why, there were more policemen than there were teachers in Ireland, showing that it was the policy of the Government to coerce the people, and at the same time keep them plunged in ignorance. So, too, the Vote for Education was £732,627, while that for the Police was £1,440,095, or nearly double. The constables were far better paid and received far better pensions than the Irish National School teachers. It took a teacher 47 years to gain a pension of £35 a-year; while a constable, after 20 years' service, received £30 a-year, a teacher receiving the magnificent sum of £6 a-year for the same period. If the Constabulary did not get the pay they wanted, as had lately been seen in Dublin and in Limerick, they instantly struck, and they received what they wanted. In fact, the Government had not so much power over them as, in ancient times, the Romans had over the Prætorian Guards. The reason of that was that the British Government knew that, without the aid of their bayonets, they could never keep up English rule in the country. But if the teachers were to try to follow their example, the Secretary to the Treasury would be quite tranquil, for the Government would be only too pleased to save the cost of the education of the children, whom they would prefer to see grow up in ignorance. Then the right hon. Gentleman had told them that he would bring in a Bill for compulsory education in Ireland. So far as he (Mr. Healy) was aware, there was no feeling in the country adverse to compulsory education, and he thought that, with proper safeguards, the system would be received with satisfaction by the country at large. The real cause of the non-attendance of children was, in his opinion, due to the extreme poverty of the people, whose children had such wretched clothing that they were not able to go to school and associate with children who were better dressed. On the other hand, if those who did not attend for that reason did attend, children of a better class would not care to mix with them, and would probably be withdrawn. The right hon. Gentleman had, no doubt, come down again to the House prepared to rebut the case he (Mr. Healy) was endeavouring to present to the House on behalf of these poor people; but the statements on which he was going to rebut them had been prepared by officials in Dublin, with salaries of £1,000, or £1,500 a-year, who were clad in broadcloth, whose stomachs were not empty, and who lived in grand houses. Those were the people who were trying to prevent any improvement being effected in the condition of a wretched class of persons with an income of £55. The expenses of the Office which supplied the right hon. Gentleman with his facts amounted to £782,000. Then, £26,000 was paid for agents, £40,000 for Inspectors, £33,000 for model schools, which were not wanted, and £10,000 for normal establishments. Those services, paid for on that scale, left only a total of £570,000 for Irish National School teachers. They were told that the teachers' positions must be improved out of the rates; but they would not find the Irish people disposed to vote a penny out of the rates in addition so long as the working of the system was controlled by a Board full of Protestants and Presbyterians. As to the teachers themselves, taking into consideration the amount received by those in England and Scotland, it could hardly be expected that they could get the best class of men for the post for £57 a-year. The comparative treatment of the Constabulary and the teachers was a disgrace. There was far more inducement to become a policeman in Ireland than a teacher; not only were the former better paid, for a sub-constable on joining the Force got, on an average, £4 a-year more than a well-paid National School teacher, but, in addition, they also got both clothing and lodging free, besides magnificent pensions. There was no question about sites for police barracks; but there was for schoolhouses. Indeed, police barracks and workhouses were the most ornamental objects in Irish landscapes. He ventured to think there was not so disgraceful a story to tell of Russian government in Poland, as the one he had read with shame and humiliation—namely, the treatment of the teachers in connection with their annual dinner which had taken place in Dublin. Because, after drinking the health of the Queen, they had not drunk that of Earl Spencer, who was simply a Member of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet, an explanation was demanded, and every teacher would have been dismissed had they not made an abject apology. The circulars had been signed by a Mr. Sheridan; and he (Mr. Healy) should be happy, at the proper time, to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of his salary. Where was this absurdity to end? The meanness and the odious and contemptible character of such tyranny were atrocious, yet the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland winked at it. He (Mr. Healy) never heard him utter a word in extenuation of a system which in Ireland excited only indignation and disgust. He supposed that, after drinking the health of the Lord Lieutenant and of the Lady Lieutenant, it would henceforth be necessary to drink that of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and that of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, and then that of the little Princes of Wales, and the little Princesses of Wales, and so on, until they came down to policemen. That was the absurdity to which they had come. He hoped that, on the Estimates, they would have some explanation of that state of things, failing which, it would afford him great satisfaction to move a few Resolutions. He had to say, finally, that the few miserable grants that were made were doled out in the most wretched way imaginable to the teachers and their relatives. He charged the Government with, in some instances, keeping the money from the sick and dying men. To a man who was sick a grant of £30 or £40 was of great consequence. It could, at all events, procure him a great many necessities which were essential to the alleviation of his suffering, and it might, at least, be sufficient to cover the expenses of burial when the man was dead. But the Government, or those well-paid persons in Dublin who were charged with its administration, carped at these trifles in the spirit of Shylock, and denied the amounts to the persons who were entitled to them or to their relatives. That state of things, he thought, could not be defended by the Government. He regretted the action which had been taken by the Government with respect to the Motion, and in declining to yield to the demands of the teachers. The right hon. Gentleman had not shown the least sympathy, or the least intention of yielding anything for the poor people for whom he was pleading; but he could tell the right hon. Gentleman that those 11,000 or 12,000 persons would remember how they had been treated.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he wished to explain, with reference to the averages given by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), that the comparison which he made was between the certificated masters in London and the principal masters and mistresses in England, and the principal masters and mistresses in Ireland. Although the comparison of the hon. and gallant Member was not an unfair one, yet, on reflection, he saw that the hon. and gallant Member included the assistant teachers in his comparison. He (Mr. Trevelyan) had not made out the comparison between the principal and assistant teachers combined with the certificated and uncertificated masters.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, it appeared to him that the present was not a fitting or opportune occasion to enter on the discussion of, or to express his individual opinion on, questions of such importance as the establishment of a system of compulsory education in Ireland or the constitution of the Board of Commissioners for National Education. What, then, the friends of the National School teachers desired was to hear a statement made, showing that the Government had given some real consideration to the demands made, and were prepared to apply a speedy and efficacious remedy for the principal grievances which had been admitted to affect this important and deserving body of public servants. He had been much disappointed at the tone of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He proposed no feasible solution for the difficulties incident to the failure of the Act of 1875. Vague statements were made that at some distant date, and contingent on a general change in the system of education, the funds required were to be provided from local sources. The late Chief Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) stated that the teachers were to participate in the full benefits contemplated by the Act.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. PATRICK MARTIN, continuing, said, he recollected that the late Chief Secretary, when the Act of 1875 was under discussion, and he had been warned in the House that the Act was destined to be a total failure, stated that it would be tried only as an experiment, and if it failed, means should be devised by the Government to obtain funds to pay result fees in full to the teachers. Subsequently, in 1876, when it became clear the Act would not work, he proposed to make the provisions in the Act compulsory; but, on inquiry, he found that to pass an Act by which the Boards of Guardians should be compelled to contribute to the result fee was impossible, and that such a measure would receive the opposition of the great bulk of the Irish Members. The very figures of the Permissive Act showed, in the clearest manner, that the ratepayers in Ireland would never consent to the passing of a Compulsory Act. For what did they find? That the number of contributory Unions, which began under the Act at 70, had, since it had been made manifest that the Government did not intend to bring in a Bill by which the grievances of the teachers could be remedied, successively decreased, until it had reached the present number of four. Under these circumstances, he thought the House had a right to feel disappointed with the reply of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It was but a repetition, in its main statements, of the promises made and expectations held forth in 1876. It was high time the Government should make up their mind on this question. If, as was plain, the Government were determined, in the present state of things in Ireland, to retain the entire control of education in the hands of Commissioners appointed by, and responsible alone, to the Government, it was just they should provide the funds required. It was absurd to expect the Guardians to contribute, unless they had also a voice in the management, and there was a popular element in the management and control of the educational system. Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to say that national education should be controlled by the popular vote? If not, then it would have been better to have said that the Government had no intention of doing anything, than to have made the speech he did. It would have been better not to have raised expectations that would only lead to disappointment. The right hon.

Baronet the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, backed by a strong Government, could not bring in a Bill to make the contributions of Boards of Guardians compulsory. Was it not, then, most unreasonable that the Chief Secretary, after the promises he had made and the answers he had given to the teachers' deputations, should now suggest that after he had consulted with and ascertained the views of the Irish Members he would consider the propriety of bringing in a Bill of this character? The majority of Irish Members had more than once stated that any measure framed on those lines would have their opposition to encounter. As to the privations suffered by the teachers from want of suitable residences, he thought the House had a right to complain of the conduct of the Government. The Government had opposed the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) to make provisions for teachers' residences. Nothing was done. Not the slightest effort was made by legislation to provide a remedy for the difficulties incident to the procuring of sites from landlords either legally unable or unwilling to give them. The Treasury, too, had as was pointed out by their Minutes, in fact, frustrated the intentions of Parliament. Yet even in this respect, as well as in respect to the pensions question, where remedies might be at once provided by an alteration in the Treasury Minutes and Regulations, no satisfactory assurance had been given. He trusted the Secretary to the Treasury would now at last rise and promise that his Department would recede from the position they had taken up in these matters. It was conceded by the Chief Secretary that many of the complaints of the teachers were well-founded, and that their conduct as a body entitled them to favourable consideration. The fact that they were not as highly trained as the English and Scotch teachers was the fault of the Government; and if their English and Scotch brethren were better educated, they were in receipt of double their salary. Nothing was more calculated to create discontent than the admission that grievances existed without any earnest attempt to remedy them. He, therefore, trusted that the Government would reconsider the position they had taken up, and that, instead of opposing, they would accept the terms of the Resolution, which were only fair and reasonable.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, he thought that the treatment of the question under discussion during the evening had been characteristic of the manner in which Irish questions were generally treated by the House of Commons. Nearly all the 500 and odd English and Scotch Gentlemen who undertook to govern Ireland had been mainly conspicuous by their absence during the discussion of this important subject. At all events, those Gentlemen who were absent had been spared the mortification of hearing the set of utterly callous platitudes with which the Scotch Secretary for Ireland replied to the complaints of the Irish Party. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman was mainly composed of direct or indirect compliments to the independence of the Scotch people; but he seemed to have no sympathy whatever with the people whose affairs he was sent to administer. There was no indication in it of a promise to do anything for the Irish teachers. He (Mr. O'Donnell) came down to give his warmest support to the Resolution; but it was no disappointment to him to hear the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, because he full well knew that there would be no substantial reform hinted at by the Government. They were told that the Government were not unwilling to bring in a Bill for compulsory education. With proper guarantees, such a Bill would be welcomed by all who were interested in the education of the Irish people; but, apart from that, some prompt and efficient measure for remedying the grievances of the teachers ought to be introduced. The Irish National School teachers were obliged to eke out their miserable pittance by burdening themselves with the obligation of cultivating plots of land. They laboured under this disability—that they were a peaceful and a law-abiding body of men, who brought up their pupils on peaceful and law-abiding principles, and, consequently, Her Majesty's Government felt they could despise their complaints and disregard their feelings. If there were any danger whatever that a refusal to redress their grievances would be followed by a healthy development of what would be called in this country "Constitutional sedition" among this large body of public servants, a great deal more attention would be paid by the Government to their complaints than was now given to the utterances of their Parliamentary Representatives. The course now taken by Her Majesty's Government was a distinct violation of the pledge made by their Predecessors in 1875, when the right hon. Baronet the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), in proposing a measure for the relief of the teachers, said—

"If it succeeds, well and good; the teachers will be reasonably remunerated. If not, the Government will take such steps that the remuneration now intended shall be paid to them."

That intended remuneration had not been paid to them, and the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland showed that the present Government had no intention of fulfilling the pledge so clearly and emphatically given by their Predecessors in Office.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that he deprecated the language that had been applied to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Notwithstanding his "platitudes," as the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had termed them, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was of opinion that, so far as policy was concerned, a more honest Chief Secretary than the present holder of the Office had never sat upon the Treasury Bench. But if the Poor Law Guardians did not do their duty in the matter of education, it was for the Government to compel them to do it; and the statement of the right hon. Gentleman showed that no other course was open. What did the hon. Member for Monaghan mean when he said that the Poor Law Guardians could not be expected to assist the teachers when they had not the control of education? Did he mean that they should be a distinguished Philosophical Society to draw up the curriculum? [MR. HEALY: No.] Was it that they had not the arrangement of the money matters? He was in a difficulty with the hon. Gentleman; but, with all his astuteness, if he accepted either alternative, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) would impale him on the horns of a dilemma. He agreed with the hon. Member who said that the case was harassing and painful, and required immediate attention; and as the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not seen fit, or rather had not been empowered, to put down on the Estimates a sum to meet the present difficulty, he should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy), if he went to a Division. He should do so, however, without using the grievances of the teachers as a political stalking horse, by claiming local control of finances, or curriculum. The remedy was to be found in compelling the Guardians to pay their contributions, instead of leaving it optional with them; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman, in the Bill he proposed to bring in, would tax the nation in the interests of the nation—namely the education of the people.

MR. MARUM said, that the people of Ireland were greatly alarmed at the growth of local taxation, and, while there was every disposition on the part of Boards of Guardians to act fairly by the National School teachers, they would object to an increase of the burden of local taxation, which had increased since 1866 by £1,000,000 sterling. It already amounted to 35 per cent of the rental of Ireland, and if this taxation went on increasing, the ratepayers would soon be swamped by it. Apart from that pressure, there was no indisposition on the part of the Guardians to spend rates for educational purposes; but they felt that to put the entire burden upon the land was unfair, owing to the relations which existed between Ireland and England. He thought the parallel drawn by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, between Ireland and England in this regard, was altogether unfair, seeing that, in Ireland, they had practically no manufactures or commerce as they had in England, and that the entire population was thrown upon the land. The incidence of local taxation and the Imperial burdens placed upon it required as much consideration in Ireland as in England, and the hardship was greater in Ireland, because of the absence of commercial wealth, which was kept out by continued misgovernment.

MR. FINDLATER said, he decidedly deprecated the introduction into the debate on that question of any violent Party politics. He did not think any such controversy was in the interest of the Irish teachers. He should say he did not think that the teachers were treated fairly by the Government, and he would cordially support the vote for the Resolution.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Findlater) as to the undesirability of mixing up Party politics with a question of this kind. All classes in Ireland were actuated with the one desire to see the admitted grievances of the Irish teachers remedied. They were told that it would be necessary to make the rate in aid compulsory. That might or might not be necessary. At the first blush, he was not disposed in its favour; but until that was done—if it were to be done—were the grievances of the teachers to remain unredressed? What they claimed that night was that the Government should endeavour at once to remove the injustice under which the National School teachers of Ireland now suffered. There was no Party in Ireland—National, Liberal, or Tory—which did not admit the grievances of the Irish teachers, and yet these most deserving men were left without the means of a decent livelihood. He believed the people of Ireland would be quite ready to contribute freely to the expenses of education, if they had the control of it in their own hands. That night the teachers' case entered on a new phase. He heartily congratulated them on the fact that their case was no longer in the hands of a Gentleman representing an Irish constituency, who, at the same time, no doubt, showed some zeal in the interests of his clients, but who appeared now to consider much more keenly the interests and the convenience of the Government than the interests of the teachers. It was now in the hands of the Irish Parliamentary Party, and on behalf of himself and his Colleagues he would say night or day henceforward they would not cease their active exertions until the justice so long delayed was done to this deserving body of men.

MR. KENNY, in supporting the Resolution, said, that Irish National School teachers had been compelled to live in houses which were entirely unsuited to persons in their station in life. Therefore, the time, he thought, had come when proper dwellings should be provided for them. At the close of the year 1880 there were 7,429 teachers in charge of the Irish National Schools, and the number of residences supplied rent free was 1,515. Out of that number, 235 had been built under the provisions of the Residences Act since 1875, and the remaining 1,280 had been provided without aid from the State. In England 47 per cent of the teachers, and in Scotland 57 per cent, were provided with residences; but in Ireland only about 15 per cent were so provided, and in many cases their residences were very miserable. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had said that, with regard to pensions, the Irish teachers were better off than their brethren in England and Scotland, who had no such provision made for them. That difference, however, arose from the merest fortunate accident. When the Church in Ireland had been disestablished and disendowed, a sum of £1,300,000 was set apart, the interest of which was to furnish three-fourths of the pensions, while the teachers themselves contributed one-fourth, which was withheld from their salaries. But as no male teacher was entitled to a pension until he was 65, and no female teacher until she was 60, it might be concluded that there were very few National teachers in Ireland who were pensioners. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had also stated that, while in England the children contributed 10s. per head of the school fees, in Ireland they contributed only 4s. per head. That was a very creditable contribution from the Irish children, considering that the comparative wealth of the two countries was as 13 or 14 to 1. The hon. Gentleman the present economical Financial Secretary to the Treasury was, he was sorry to say, one whose policy was not such as would lead them to believe that there was much likelihood that the demands of the teachers would be granted. He quite agreed in the observations of the preceding speakers as to the inadequate salaries which the teachers were paid for the services which they rendered the country.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he considered the case of the National School teachers embodied a distinct breach of faith against Her Majesty's Government. The Bill they had introduced completely broke down, the ratepayers having declined to support the experiment which the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks - Beach) promised would adequately deal with the grievances, under which it was admitted a most deserving body of men suffered. They had been told that, within some definite number of years, the position of these men had been very considerably improved. To a certain degree, no doubt, it had; but only from the point of starvation and disgrace. It had been improved, but had not as yet reached the level of justice. It was the old story, for, like all English legislation, the grievances were not redressed, but were dealt with in the usual peddling, piecemeal fashion, which satisfied nobody. The system which had been adopted by the Government of that country, in dealing with Irish affairs, had been always of that piecemeal character, which satisfied nobody. It was a little patch here and a little patch there, wasting the time of Parliament and breaking the hearts of the unfortunate people who had been kept all this time waiting for justice. He had heard their condition contrasted with that of the Police, both with regard to salaries and pensions, and he felt compelled to say that the case afforded a true indication of the whole system of British rule in Ireland. The position might be summed up with these words—they petted the policemen and they starved the teachers. The Government had had their reward for all this. The men whom they had trained to bludgeon their fellow-countrymen had been rewarded; whilst those who were intrusted with the enlightening, educating, and moral training of the children, had been despised and neglected. One of the chief features of the case was that these teachers were not paid on a similar scale to the teachers in England and Scotland. Liberals thought nothing of giving £30,000 to an Admiral who had performed the noble feat of bombarding an almost defenceless town; but they begrudged the Irish teachers the moderate grants they justly claimed. If they had Home Rule in Ireland, this meritorious class of men would be treated in a very different manner. Why should the Irish teachers, who produced good results, be underpaid at least 50 per cent to the amount given to English and Scotch teachers? It was of no use to say that some of the emolument of the teachers in England and Scotland was derived from sources other than the Exchequer; they were wealthy countries. It was a matter of proof that the Irish teachers did their business as well as the Englishmen and the Scotchmen, and it was also a fact that the cost of living in Ireland was quite as high as in England and Scotland. What encouragement was it to education in Ireland to use the teachers in such a way? He protested against the system of delay, deceit, and disappointment that had been practised, by those who sat on the Treasury Bench and received large salaries, towards this poor and deserving class who had worthily performed their duties. Many of these unhappy men and women had to walk miles through the wet and the snow to reach their schoolhouses. The whole subject was a disgrace to the Government, who were bound in honour to do something at once to alleviate the condition of these deserving people.

Mr. BIGGAR said, the lower employés of the Post Office and these National School teachers were the worst treated officials in Ireland, and their condition contrasted very unfavourably with the emoluments received by other officers. The Government ought to introduce a measure upon a liberal basis which should put an end once for all to that discussion.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he cordially joined with his hon. Colleagues in the advocacy of the claims of a class of men whose claims had been recognized by successive Governments, and whose grievances had not been remedied by any. He must say he had been very much disappointed with the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the Irish teachers, who had been very moderate in their demands, would also be disappointed with the tone the right hon. Gentleman had adopted. He thought the anomalous position of the assistant teachers was well worthy the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He also thought the right hon. Gentleman's figures were entirely wrong, as he had included in them the normal establishments, the Metropolitan model schools, and the training establishments. As it was, the pay of the Irish teacher was only half of that of the English teacher. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the establishment of denominational Training Colleges, which had done much to meet the wishes of the vast mass of the Catholic people of Ireland, and he believed valuable results would follow the taking that step. He complained of the niggardly system under which the Irish Teachers' Pension Fund was administered, under which the fund had been increased some £59,000, by unexpended interest, while the teachers themselves were obliged to contribute largely to the fund out of their scanty incomes. Another point was, that was a great grievance on the school teachers that they had to provide the school materials for their pupils out of their own funds, and wait to be recouped for their outlay by the desultory payment for them by the parents. They applied to have the usual trade allowance of 10 per cent made to them, to cover any loss they might sustain; but their application was passed by with contempt. There were several other matters which rankled in the minds of the teachers, showing them they had nothing to expect from this Administration, and it was impossible that their feelings towards the Government which treated them in such an illiberal manner should not be reflected in the teaching of their pupils. That was perhaps the best feature in the whole matter, as it was an earnest of the next generation being imbued with a strong national feeling.

MR. EUGENE COLLINS said, he thought that it had been admitted on all sides that the condition of the National School teachers in Ireland was an unsatisfactory one as regarded their remuneration, their residences, and their pensions, and that they should not be allowed to remain so any longer than was possible. He dissented, however, from the mode in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had brought forward his own views before the House. The right hon. Gentleman had argued the subject ably and moderately, but from a point of view that did not apply to the condition of Ireland. In his (Mr. Collins's) view, there should be such a reform of the Educational Department in that country instituted as would make it a representative Body, and bring it into unison with the views of the people. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted statistics showing how much pupils paid in this country as compared with Ireland, while the real business before them was to see how far it was possible to improve the condition of the teachers. In his opinion, a compulsory rate for the payment of the teachers was a necessity. On the valuation of Ireland a rate of 1d. in the pound would produce £70,000, which would increase the salaries of the teachers by about £7 per head. But a compulsory rate could not be levied in Ireland so as to give satisfaction, unless a board were constituted that would represent the views of the people. If, in addition, the Government could be induced to supplement that £70,000 by an equivalent sum, the pay of each teacher would be increased by £14. Whether the rate he proposed should be a national, a county, or a Union rate, was a matter which could be discussed afterwards. He would advise the Government to agree to the general proposition of the Motion, but without committing themselves to immediate action.

MR. PARNELL said, he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he came to consider this question after he came into Office, adopted an attitude which he must now see upon reflection would result in leaving the question unsettled, and the admittedly just claims of the poor people unadjusted for a number of years to come. It must be very evident to the right hon. Gentleman, upon the whole course and tone of this debate, that it was hopeless to expect that the suggestion which he had made for the settlement of this question—namely, that the Irish Members should agree to a compulsory rate in aid of the salaries of the National School teachers being levied upon the Irish Unions—that it was quite hopeless to expect that such a proposition as that would ever be acceded to. Unless, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman was likely to find himself in a position to force a Bill, providing this settlement of the question, through the House in the teeth of the opposition he would meet from the Irish Benches, there were only two other courses open to him—either the just and universally admitted claims of the National School teachers with regard to increased salaries, improved residences, and a better system of pensions would have to remain unsettled, or else some rate in aid would have to be provided out of the Imperial Treasury. So long as they allowed them no local representative institutions in Ireland it was perfectly impossible for the Irish Members to agree that compulsory rates should be levied upon the Irish ratepayers to supply the admitted deficiencies in the salaries of these teachers. On the other hand, he could very well imagine that if a system of local government were adopted in the Irish counties, some plan or arrangement might be devised by which this difficulty with regard to local contributions might be got over; but in the present aspect of affairs, with the Board of Guardians as the only Body in the slightest degree approaching a representative capacity in the Irish counties and cities, it was impossible for them to consent to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. What he wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman was this—whether, in the meanwhile, until these local representative institutions were introduced in Ireland, which they were so long expecting, and which they might hope to obtain in the ordinary course of things after a few years—what he wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman was, whether they were really to take it as finally and definitely stated that nothing was to be done for these unfortunate men in Ireland? Meanwhile, a large body of teachers whose claims were admittedly just were neglected, and their salaries were, upon an average, much lower than either the English or Scotch teachers. They were now living on an average salary of only £57 a-year; and he would further ask whether the right hon. Gentleman considered that it was right that a large proportion of the National School teachers in Ireland should continue to exist on a salary of less than 30s. a-week? The increasing paucity of candidates for teacherships showed how serious the matter was becoming. Had this been a question of increasing the pay of the Constabulary, the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have found no difficulty in applying for an extra grant from the Imperial Exchequer; but he refused to do so in this case, although there could be no question that a greater back debt existed in respect of education than with regard to any other matter. There was nothing in the past dealings of the English Government with Ireland which did them more discredit. They had deliberately in past times, by penal laws and coercive legislation, prevented the Irish youth from obtaining the advantages of legislation, and that should be taken into account by the right hon. Gentleman, who had inherited, to some extent, the odium which attached in this matter to the English Government and the people of England. He believed it was quite impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to maintain the position which he had taken up that evening, and that before many months, in consequence of that debate and others that would follow, the right hon. Gentleman would be obliged to make some other proposition than that made that evening.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 61: Majority 2.—(Div. List, No. 202.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BILLS— UNPRINTED BILLS—

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WARTON, on rising to call attention to the possibility of Bills being read a second time in this House before they were printed, said, that he was precluded, by the Rules of the House, from moving the Resolution which he had placed upon the Paper, and which was to the effect—

"That, in the opinion of this House, no Bill should be read a second time unless it has been printed, excepting a Bill brought in by a Minister of the Crown, and then only if and after such Minister shall have stated in this House that such Bill relates to a matter of urgent public importance."

In justification of the action he had taken he would refer to the case of a Bill which was introduced this Session by an hon. Member below the Gangway, and which was actually read a second time before it was drafted, and he observed that other instances of a similar kind had fallen under his notice. The present Speaker, and also his Predecessor in the Chair, had ruled that there was nothing to prevent such a proceeding. He would not occupy the time of the House any longer, as he hoped the Government would do what they could to prevent the repetition of what he considered a scandal by giving effect to the terms of his Resolution.

Mrs. DODSON said, he must commence by thanking the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Warton) for the courteous manner in which he had brought this matter forward. He had brought forward a case of more force than anticipated, for he (Mr. Dodson) had only been aware of one Bill having been read a second time without being printed. The hon. and learned Member had, however, drawn attention to other cases; and, of course, they were all violations of the unwritten, and of what was generally supposed to be the invariable practice of the House. A proceeding of that kind amounted, in fact, to a breach of the received custom of the House, although there was no express Rule prohibiting it. All Bills were printed; but there were some—Ways and Means Bills, for instance—which were not circulated for obvious reasons. It was quite possible, under circumstances of pressure—although he did not know of a case—that a Ways and Means Bill might have been read a second time before it was printed. A case of that kind, however, would come under the exception for which the hon. and learned Member had provided in his Resolution, for the reason that such a measure must necessarily be in the charge of a Minister of the Crown. The proposition of the hon. and learned Member would require careful consideration before it could be adopted, because it would really tend to relax the practice of the House rather than to maintain it. If the hon. and learned Member made out any objection to the existing practice in the case of the Ways and Means Bills, no doubt his hon. Friends at the Treasury would be glad to consider the matter. With this assurance he trusted the hon. and learned Member would be satisfied.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that, in his short experience of the House, he had known three cases in which Bills had been read a second time without having been printed. He could give the names of these Bills, but he preferred not to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) £66,837, to complete the sum for County Court Officers, &c., Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, that on this Vote the Prime Minister would be able to answer a question which he (Mr. Healy) had put concerning the possible future employment of Mr. Clifford Lloyd.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had written to Lord Spencer on the subject, but had not yet received a reply; and, consequently, was not yet able to deal with the matter. It was understood, he thought, that the Question was to be answered on Monday.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £99,980, to complete the sum for Prisons, Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, that on this Vote a pledge had been given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland last year which did not appear to have been carried out. The Government, during the Phoenix Park trials, made some rules as to prison discipline which were much more strict than those obtaining in England; and the right hon. Gentleman had promised that the rules, particularly those regulating visits to prisoners, should be considered with a view to their revision. The matter seemed to be left entirely in the hands of the Governors of the gaols.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he regretted he could not say whether the Report of the Prisons Commission, which had just been unanimously agreed to, referred to this subject or not.

MR. HEALY said, that what had occurred was this. In the month of May, in the period to which he had referred, the Government made Rules, and laid them on the Table of the House, 30 days being required to elapse after that before they came into force. Previously, every prisoner had been entitled to receive certain periodical visits; but under these Rules such visits were only to take place at the discretion of the Governor of the gaol.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that unless something had been done by the Prison Commissioners during the present Session, he could not say that any step had been taken in the matter. It certainly appeared to him unsatisfactory that the question should be left to the Governors of gaols. It ought to be in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. HEALY said, he regarded the right hon. Gentleman's statement as very satisfactory. When he was in prison, he had found the Governor of the gaol a very excellent and obliging person; but he did not think that, generally speaking, it was safe to entrust these powers to such officials, and some alteration ought to be made in the Rules.

Mr. DEASY said, he wished to know whether it was intended to accede to the request of the Corporation of the City of Cork to permit them to appoint one or two justices to visit the male prison of that city, in order to hear any complaints the prisoners might have to make as to their treatment? The request was a very reasonable one, and should be granted, in view of the fact that serious complaints had been made regarding the prison, and unpleasant facts had been revealed in connection with it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he was sensible of the evil the hon. Gentleman referred to, and it had occupied, and was still occupying, the attention of Her Majesty's Government. At present the law did not permit the visitation the hon. Member desired to see instituted—it could not be done under the 24th section of the Prisons Act—but, in a Bill recently brought in, power was given to the Lord Lieutenant to alter the rule regarding the visiting justices of prisons.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. MOORE said, he was sorry to be obliged to stand for a few moments between the Committee and this Vote; but he felt bound to call attention to the fact that there had been of late a good deal of unpleasant feeling existing in regard to the action of the Government in connection with industrial schools in Ireland. There could be no doubt that within the past 12 months, at least, the Government had obstructed the development of Irish industrial schools in every way in their power. A comparison between the English and Irish industrial schools would show that the latter were not at all liberally treated. Ever since the beginning of this year—indeed, even further back than that—every attempt to extend the industrial school system in Ireland had been met by a determined and resolute resistance on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Almost every application made to the Government by those interested in the matter, however reasonable, was met in a most arbitrary spirit, and one of the most arbitrary refusals had been that in the Ballinasloe case. The managers of the school there had been most anxious to have it turned into an Industrial Institution, and had made application to the Government with that object; but—certainly up to three or four weeks ago—no answer had been received. No more proper application could be made than was made in this Ballinasloe case, and that the matter was deserving of attention was evident from the fact that there was not a single industrial school in the Province of Connaught. At Letterfrack, a large sum of money had been subscribed for the purpose of forming an industrial school, and yet nothing had been done, although he could not say that the Government had absolutely refused the application in this case. The case of Tipperary, also, had been neglected. In that case, a large sum of money had been subscribed for the extension of the existing building, so as to provide for the accommodation of a larger number of children, and the Government had only sanctioned the maintenance of 64 children, whereas the building was capable of maintaining double that number. In such cases as these, he thought the Government should only be too ready to recognize and encourage local effort. A great and important work, substantial in its effects, was being carried on by these schools, and he hoped the Government would do all they possibly could to support them.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to be quite fair on the subject, and to admit that the limitation was not imposed without some reason, because there could be no doubt that there was a much larger percentage of children in proportion to the industrial school accommodation in Ireland than there was in England. That fact was to be accounted for in this way. In Ireland they were not, as in England, any Poor Law schools where children were brought up and educated. In Scotland, where the people had always made good use of their opportunities, they did not want

Poor Law schools—they had all their poorer children in industrial schools. But this limitation was especially hard in the case of Ireland, because it was not placed upon the schools according to their merits; it was, he believed, fixed on a certain day, in 1879, when the number of children in every school was taken without any reference whatever to the size of the school, the amount of school accommodation, or the place where the school was situated. The consequence was that this anomaly was created—that in some places they were over-supplied with schools for girls; which in other places were absolutely deficient, just as his hon. Friend had pointed out with regard to board schools. That matter had been brought very forcibly before the Commission on which he sat as a Member. That Commission, of which he was a Member, made recommendations which they believed would meet the case, at the same time insuring due caution in the administration in order to prevent the admission of children to the schools who ought not to be admitted. They also recommended that there should be no limitation beyond the size and accommodation of the school subject to the control of a Secretary of State. His hon. Friend (Mr. Moore) would, however, find that question treated in detail in the Report of the Commission. There was another hindrance to the working of the system in Ireland—namely the uncertainty of contributions. In England, contributions were voluntary as in Ireland. In England, he did not suppose there was a Town Council which did not contribute a fair sum towards industrial schools; but in Ireland it was entirely different. As the Committee would be aware, it was the Grand Juries and Corporations which contributed in Ireland, and these only to the extent of a 1s. or 1s. 6d. a-week, per head, of the children; while the Grand Juries of the South Riding of Tipperary and of Queen's County refused to give a single 6d. towards the expense of industrial schools. The managers, as his hon. Friend had pointed out, had not, in consequence, sufficient income to carry on the work. Thus the only school in his county was that in the City of Cork, in which he was personally interested, which the Committee would perceive was a totally inadequate provision for a population of 500,000 Catholics. He believed that all Catholic opposition would disappear, if only the limitation complained of were taken away, and the other recommendations of the Commission were carried out. Further, he thought, although some persons had a great objection to compulsory contribution, that the contributions should be made constant, without which he believed that the requirements of the industrial system could not be carried out in Ireland. Finally, he hoped his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland would take the recommendations of the Commission into his careful consideration, and, if legislation was to follow, as he understood it would in the case of England, that it would follow speedily.

Mr. MARUM said he should like to supplement the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken (Colonel Colthurst), whose statement with regard to the Grand Juries was perfectly true. He himself had committed two children to an industrial school, objecting to sending them to a reformatory, where they would be treated as prisoners and convicts. The managers declined to receive the children. He employed counsel, and the matter was contested; but such was the law that the Grand Jury of the Queen's County refused to give any capitation grant for the juveniles committed to an industrial school. The Grand Jury of that county consisted of 22 Protestant and one Catholic gentlemen. Now the result of this was that when the children were released they were unable to get any employment, and were consequently thrown upon society; those who were interested in them could not get them admission into any situation. The mere statement of this case ought to be sufficient to teach the Government that a reform of the existing system was urgently required. The natural solution of the question was, in his opinion, that power should be given to magistrates to compel the managers to admit juveniles committed to industrial schools, and that the Grand Juries should be compelled to pay for them.

Mr. TREVELYAN said that any change that the administration might require—that would restore the industrial schools in Ireland to their proper use of receiving children committed by the magistrates—must meet with the hearty concurrence of Her Majesty's Government. He did not think the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) had brought forward any argument to show that there was any great laxity of administration; but, at all events, there was a very different idea in the minds of those connected with industrial schools in Ireland from that with regard to the schools in England. In Ireland, every child sent to an industrial school was paid for by the Government at the rate of 5s. a-week; whereas in England a majority of children were paid for at rates varying between 2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. a-week, 6s. a-week being paid for boys sent to training ships. The fact of the matter was that the ideas which prevailed in Ireland with regard to industrial schools were so very different from those in England that it was necessary to have some limit, and the question was as to what that limit should be. Ought it to be an arbitrary limit of number, such as had been laid down; or a limit on the freedom of committal by the magistrates? He very much preferred the latter, if it could be carried out; and if there was legislation on this subject next year, as he hoped there would be, he would certainly help his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Colthurst) in trying to get Ireland included, and in trying also to get the recommendation in Section 24 of the Report of the Commission, of which his hon. and gallant Friend was a Member, applied to that country. He thought the schools in question should be, as far as possible, kept to their proper and legitimate object—namely, that of providing the children for whom they were intended with some place in which they could be properly brought up. He spoke of orphans, destitute children, and beggars, wandering about without a home, and likely to follow the footsteps of the habitual criminal. If it were possible to confine the committals of children to these schools to that class, he should certainly be glad to make the limit one of limitation of committals and not of number. If children committed could be confined to the classes specified in the Acts, there would be less reason for restriction; but other classes were sent into the schools, and, without giving the name either of the school or the manager, he might mention to the Committee that a case had been brought before his notice in which a manager wanted to change a school which provided for children of one sex into a school for the other sex. He wrote to the manager, and he replied that he found the children were improper objects, and he had sent them all home to their parents. Hon. Members would, he thought, allow that the case had given him a considerable amount of work. He should be glad if this vexed question could be settled by legislation in the course of next year.

Mr. WARTON asked for an explanation of the decrease with regard to the estimated extra receipts from parents of children sent to reformatory and industrial schools; the amount received last year being £1,350, and this year only £1,150. He thought the comparatively speaking large difference of £200 ought to be explained.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, before the right hon. Gentleman answered the question of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) should like to urge on the attention of the Government a point which had been impressed upon it by the Inspector of Reformatory Schools for some years past in his annual Report. It was a matter of the greatest consequence to the unfortunate children that they should receive some protection when they left the schools. The period of their discharge was, of course, most important in view of their future welfare. When they were discharged from the reformatory, they were particularly liable to all sorts of temptations and dangers, and to fall into the hands of the criminal class. He complained that the money which was given in England towards meeting the cost incurred in connection with children after their liberation was not also given in the case of Ireland. It was not necessary to emphasize the importance of this point, because it was perfectly clear that an allowance of this kind would enable boys to escape from those dangers at the outset of their industrial career which certainly brought down a great number of them to the ranks of crime. There was no reason why Irish reformatories and industrial schools should be treated differently from similar institutions in England. Now, that the question had been raised in the House, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) would give it the attention it deserved.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the point raised was one of great importance; but it was one which must be considered with the whole question of reformatory and industrial schools by the Royal Commission. As to extra receipts, he had only to say that, unfortunately, experience had shown them that the estimate of extra receipts made last year was too liberal. The present estimate corresponded more exactly with what might be expected to be realized now. He could not help thinking that the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) was under a misapprehension with regard to the scale of payment of Inspectors in England and Ireland. Sir John Lentaigne received a salary of £400.

Mr. HASTINGS said, that, as a Member of the Royal Commission on Reformatory and Industrial Schools, he should be sorry to let it be supposed that the feeling with regard to the want of subsidization for Irish industrial schools was confined to Irish Members. English Members felt the want quite as strongly as Irish Members; and he hoped that, at no distant time, the Irish Government would find it in their power to make some greater provision for the Irish schools. The Commission were very much struck with what many of the schools were doing, and they would be very glad if the schools were extended. While he thought there was room for improvement in English industrial schools, much more was needed to be done in the industrial schools of Ireland.

Mr. MOORE said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) would allow him to correct him. Sir John Lentaigne's salary as Inspector of Schools was only £300 a-year; the additional £100 a-year was granted him by the Duke of Marlborough on his retirement from the Prison Board, and was strictly personal to himself. He (Mr. Moore) was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) alluded again to the comparison between England and Ireland. It was very easy to go into comparisons. Perhaps Ireland had been generously treated in respect to her industrial schools, and it was perhaps true that the Irish industrial schools were much ahead of similar institutions in England. But if the right hon. Gentleman had made a little comparison of the expenditure in other Departments he would not have found the advantage on the side of Ireland. In the matter of the training of teachers, for instance, Ireland did not receive her fair proportion of grant from the State. He did not understand the policy of the Irish Government in respect of industrial schools, which had been a source of great benefit to the poorer classes. He moved to reduce the Vote by £1.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. Member serious?

Mr. MOORE: If it would be more convenient, I will move to reduce the Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 66: Majority 46.—(Div. List, No. 203.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the hour (12.45) was still early; and, therefore, he proposed to take a few of the non-contentious Votes. They had to meet again at 12 o'clock, and, in consequence, he would not take anything that would occupy much time. He proposed, in the first place, to take the Votes for the National Gallery, and a few other Votes in Class IV.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) if he could give the Committee any explanation with regard to an erection that had been put up outside the National Gallery? To what purpose was the building to be devoted; if the cost of the building was intended to be defrayed by Parliament; and for what length of time that most unsightly erection was to remain to disfigure what was very properly considered the finest site in Europe?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, the building had been placed there by the desire of the Trustees of the National Gallery, in order that photographs might be taken of certain pictures in the Gallery. It had been found that the light in the Gallery itself was not sufficiently good to admit of proper photographs being taken. The building would be removed at the end of two months. He did not think the public would raise any serious objection to the building under the circumstances.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: What will be the expense?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I believe the whole thing is a private enterprise.

MR. WARTON said, he protested against the manner in which the Estimates were now being taken. He was sure that the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Coope), who entertained a strong feeling with regard to the opening of the National Gallery in the evening, would have been present had he had the slightest idea that the Vote would be taken that night. He (Mr. Warton) was of opinion that there should always be a clear understanding what Votes would be taken at a particular Sitting, in which case time would not be wasted in considering which Votes should be taken, and which should not. Upon this particular Vote he had to complain; and he was sorry he had to do so in the absence of the only person who could give him an answer on the subject—namely, the hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. G. J. Howard), that there was no accommodation of a certain kind in the National Gallery. In the Louvre in Paris, and in other great picture galleries, proper accommodation was provided. He had himself been inconvenienced by the absence of accommodation of the nature he referred to in the National Gallery. It was perfectly disgraceful that in this country there should be a Puritanical objection to recognizing the necessity of what vitally affected life.

MR. COURTNEY said, he knew the hon. Gentleman the Member for Middlesex (Mr. Coope) took a great interest in lengthening the time during which the National Gallery was open to the public. The question was not an unimportant one; but it belonged strictly to Class I.,

where the buildings for the National Gallery were provided for, and not to this class, which dealt solely with pictures.

MR. TOMLINSON said, there was another matter which ought not to be passed over in silence, and that was the small amount of room there was to see the pictures.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a matter which can be dealt with under this Vote.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the Prime Minister gave a distinct pledge the other day that the Votes should be taken seriatim. Of course, if the Committee decided to jump over several Votes, and take a particular Vote, it was all very well; but he thought that, in view of the pledge of the Prime Minister, they ought to take the Votes in their order. The Committee ought to be very careful what they did; because, if it did not now, it might on a future occasion, lead to great inconvenience to take Votes out of their regular order. It was not fair, at 1 o'clock in the morning, to jump over Votes, in opposition to the assurance of the Prime Minister.

MR. COURTNEY said, he quite concurred with the right hon. Baronet that the Votes ought not to be taken out of their order unless the Committee was so agreed.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: We have not been asked.

MR. COURTNEY said, the question was before the Committee. [MR. WARTON: Progress!] He really thought that, at that time of the year, they were consulting the convenience and interests of the Committee in taking now those Votes which did not involve matters of dispute, deferring to another Sitting the contentious Votes.

MR. KENNY asked why, if the Votes were non-contentious, they should not be taken a couple of days hence? It was highly inconvenient to take the Votes out of the regular order. No one had the slightest idea that this Vote would be taken that night. It was extremely desirable that some system should be devised, by which the Votes which had been taken should be enumerated for the guidance of Members, say, in the Paper showing the Orders of the Day. Only that night an hon. Member asked if a certain Vote had been taken, or was to be taken; but no one could tell him. It was subsequently ascertained that the Vote had been taken out of its proper order, the result of which was that the hon. Gentleman was prevented from raising a point in which he was interested. Nothing would be gained by endeavouring to take this Vote to-night; indeed, it was evident time would be saved if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) put the Vote down for to-morrow. It was very inconvenient that hon. Members should be kept there late that night, because they were required to assemble again at 12 o'clock, with the possibility of their sitting into Sunday morning.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would move to report Progress. He considered that the Government, which represented the majority of the House, were bound by the pledge given by the Prime Minister. He (Mr. Biggar) had known many a squabble to arise upon the endeavour to pass a few non-contentious Votes at a late hour of the night. When such an endeavour was made, it generally happened that there was a lot of talk about the desirability of reporting Progress, and the result was that very little progress was really made. If the Votes had been put down for the next day, in all probability they would have been taken with a run. To come back, however, to the primary point, he really could not see on what ground the Government advised the Committee to act in contradiction of the pledge given by the Prime Minister. It was quite possible that not one of the Votes which were called contentious would be so. He did not wish time to be occupied unnecessarily; indeed, he should like the House to adjourn for the holidays at the earliest possible moment. At the same time, some hon. Members interested in this Vote might have stayed away in consequence of the pledge of the Prime Minister; and, therefore, he moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 56: Majority 38.—(Div. List, No. 204.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. GRAY said, he must move that the Chairman do leave the Chair; but he merely wished to make a suggestion. A considerable number of Votes had been passed; but the Return in the hands of hon. Members did not show what Votes remained to be passed; and he hoped that next Session the Government would improve that Return, so that it should show each week the Votes that had been passed, and the Votes that remained to be passed. The Return would then be of real use to Members, and he did not think it would involve any real additional expense or trouble. For the convenience of the Committee he made this suggestion, which, if adopted, would, he believed, prevent a good deal of difficulty. He begged to move, formally, that the Chairman leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gray.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he thought it would probably prevent misunderstanding if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) would state in what order he intended—without making an absolute promise—to take the Votes to-morrow?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, that he proposed to take the Constabulary Vote first, and then proceed with the remaining Votes in Class IV. As to the point raised by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray), the Return was not prepared under his authority; but he would see what could be done.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked, whether any arrangement had been come to respecting the Duke of Marlborough's pictures?

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to point out that there was nothing in this Vote to show what was the cost of producing the catalogues in the National Gallery. He would ask whether there was any means of ascertaining the cost?

MR. COURTNEY said, he did not think the sale of the catalogues paid the cost of their production; but they would come under the Stationery Vote. No arrangement had been come to respecting the Marlborough pictures.

MR. WARTON complained of the contemptuous treatment of the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) by the Secretary to the Treasury, and said it would be a national loss if these pictures were allowed to go from the country. There was no other country in Europe that would not pay any price for them; and probably some American millionaire would buy what ought to belong to the nation. It would probably be a long time before another such opportunity as this would be presented, and considering the action of the Government a disgrace he should move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would recommend the Secretary to the Treasury not to proceed with this Vote, considering that the House would meet again in a few hours for a Saturday Sitting. By persevering, the hon. Gentleman was only inflicting prolonged agony on those Members who would have to be here again when the House met.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to make an appeal to the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington). He understood the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to say, in reply to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), that Class III. would be taken on Friday, Class IV. on Saturday, Class V. on Monday, and Class VI. on Monday. That was the statement of the hon. Gentleman; and he (Sir Robert Peel) wished to ask the noble Marquess if he did not see the expediency and justice, after the statement of the Prime Minister, of taking the Votes seriatim, and that with Class III. the Estimates should cease for to-night, Friday?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the right hon. Baronet's recollection was not very accurate. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had given no distinct pledge, but had only made suggestions as to the order in which the Votes should be taken. The Government had hoped that the Irish Constabulary Vote would be concluded that night, and they were endeavouring to carry out the indication given as to the Votes. With respect to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), his impression was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Prime Minister—one of them, certainly—had made a statement respecting these pictures, and had said all that could be said on the subject. More than had been said could not be stated. He hoped the Motion to report Progress would not be pressed.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he would join in the appeal of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) to the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) not to press his Motion; although he thought some little ground had been given for the Motion by the way in which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had treated the question of the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) respecting the Marlborough pictures.

MR. COURTNEY said, there was nothing further to be stated on the subject.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he was aware that that was the state of the case; but he wanted to point out that these pictures had created a great deal of interest, not only inside, but outside this House; and he thought that if the Government would give an assurance that this matter was under careful consideration, and that they would do their best to secure some of the pictures, that would give great relief and satisfaction. Some of these pictures, it was acknowledged by all acquainted with the subject, were of the highest value, and could not be rivalled; and although those who took great interest in such matters did not occupy so much time as Irish Members did when they had a grievance, that was no reason why they should not receive courtesy from the Government. If some such assurance were given as he had suggested, he thought the Committee might allow the Vote to be taken.

MR. GRAY said, he was dissatisfied with the reply of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. Warton

MR. WARTON said, that, as several hon. Members had left the House, on the understanding that the Votes in Class IV. would be taken to-morrow, he felt it his duty to move that Progress be reported. He believed that the Gentlemen he referred to had much to say upon this particular Vote.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. COURTNEY said, he had selected these Votes on account of their non-contentious character; he therefore trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would not press his Motion, but allow the Vote to be taken, as also the Votes for Learned Societies and the London University.

MR. WARTON said, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion to report Progress, on condition that the Vote for the London University was not taken in the absence of the hon. Baronet the President of the University.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) was not President of the University; he was a Member of the Senate; and, as he (Sir Farrer Herschell) was likewise one of that Body, he thought he should be able to answer any questions which might arise on the Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he would point out that the building in which the National portraits were deposited was by no means safe. It appeared to him that the pictures were exposed to danger both from the weather and from fire; and he would be glad to learn whether something could not be done to protect them.

MR. COURTNEY said, the question raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Captain Aylmer) had been over and over again under consideration. The Government looked upon the building as temporary only; and he (Mr. Courtney) would be glad to see the pictures removed to a place of greater safety.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, it had been his intention to move a reduction of this Vote, unless the Government gave an assurance that the pictures would be removed to a place of safety; but after the intention expressed by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) that they would be so removed, if possible, he would not do so.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he would point out that the danger of fire to the pictures arose not only from the nature of the building in which they were deposited, but from its proximity to the buildings of the Health Exhibition—that was to say, the temporary buildings that had been put up. He would ask whether extra precautions were taken in consequence of that proximity; and, if so, whether the cost incurred thereby would fall upon the Health Exhibition, or the National Portrait Gallery?

MR. COURTNEY said, he believed that all necessary precautions were taken. The real danger to which the building was exposed arose from the fact that there was a spirit warehouse in its immediate vicinity.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, that there had been a fire close by the building not many days ago.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £16,400, to complete the sum for Learned Societies and Scientific Investigation.

MR. BUCHANAN said, there was one point in relation to this Vote that he desired to bring before the Committee. He referred to the question of meteorological observations. The Committee would recollect that a good deal of discussion had taken place a few years ago with reference to the Meteorological Council. As he understood the position of that Body, at the present time, it was established for five years, at the termination of which period its members would have to be re-appointed. A great deal of dissatisfaction had prevailed in many quarters as to the manner in which this Body distributed the money granted by Parliament; and it appeared that the Treasury instituted an inquiry into the subject, which had been fully discussed. But the dissatisfaction had come up again, particularly with regard to the smallness of the sums devoted to meteorological work in Scotland. An important meteorological observatory had recently been established by private effort on Ben Nevis. And yet only £100 was allocated to it out of the £15,000 voted. Even this sum it was possible might be withdrawn, owing to a petty quarrel between the English and Scottish authorities. The Scottish Meteorological Society, which did more work than any other meteorological body, had no representative on the Council, which was simply a Committee of the Royal Society of London. He would like to receive from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) an assurance that this matter would be looked into, in order that, after all that had been done, the best meteorological work done in the country lately should not be put aside and ignored by those who had the disposal of the funds voted by Parliament for the purpose.

MR. COURTNEY said, he would point out that the action of the Government towards the Meteorological Council had been the same as that with regard to all learned societies—that was to say, they did not interfere with the manner in which they distributed the funds placed at their disposal. They could not, therefore, intervene in the question between the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and the Meteorological Council.

MR. BUCHANAN said, it had been recommended by the Treasury Departmental Commission that the Council, in its annual Report presented to Parliament, should specify the way in which the money at their disposal was expended. He thought that the House, having voted the funds, ought to see whether the money was properly spent.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he objected to the grant of £500 for the Royal Geographical Society, which produced very small results.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that in this case he dissented entirely from the view taken by his hon. and gallant Friend who had just sat down (Captain Aylmer). He believed that no money was better spent than the £500 voted for the Royal Geographical Society, and that, considering the value of the work done by the Society, the amount of the grant was very small.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £8,346, to complete the sum for the London University.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE AMENDMENT BILL [Lords.].—[BILL 307.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 29th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Appeals in matters under £200).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that he had been in communication with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard), in relation to this clause and Clauses 8 and 9, the Appeal Clauses of the Bill, and in deference to what he thought was the wish of the Committee he would consent to those clauses being struck out.

Clause, with Clauses 8 and 9, severally struck out of the Bill accordingly.

Clause 10 (Appeals from referees).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he had great doubt whether it was intended by his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Hardinge Giffard) that this clause should also be struck out. It was not of the same class as the other clauses which had been struck out; but if it was desired to omit the clause the omission could be effected on Report.

MR. WARTON said, he had had some communication with his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Hardinge Giffard) in regard to the Bill, and he was able to say that this was not one of the clauses the hon. and learned Gentleman desired to see struck out.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Judge may order trial by an official referee in certain cases).

MR. WHITLEY said, this was a very objectionable clause, and he should have liked to see it struck out. If, however, he could not get some assistance from the Committee he should not put hon. Gentlemen to the trouble of dividing.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was quite aware that, in many quarters, there was some apprehension that if the clause remained in its present shape its operation would be very objectionable; but it must be seen that there was full power given to refer issues to referees. At the same time, in order to confine the clause to cases where all parties consented, he proposed to amend it by omitting all the words from "and," in line 31, to the word "officers," in line 36, inclusive.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, to omit the words from "and," in line 31, to "officers," in line 36, inclusive.—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. TOMLINSON said, he was not sure that the omission of these words would cure all the mischief of the clause. Perhaps the Law Officers would say whether, in their opinion, the Amendment would cover a case in which any of the parties were under disability.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, there would be very rare cases—he hardly knew of any—in which parties to an action, who were under disabilities, would not consent. If there were, however, persons under disabilities whose consent could not be got, that would be a reason for a Judge to consider whether he should refer it.

MR. WHITLEY said, he was quite content with the Amendment suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Question put, and negatived; words struck out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 23, inclusive, agreed to.
New Clauses.

MR. COURTNEY moved the insertion of the following Clause:—

(Officers not to be employed without good service certificates—42 & 43 Vic. c. 78.)

"The provisions of section twenty of 'The Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, with respect to pensions under that Act shall, as regards appointments made after the commencement of this Act, extend to salaries under that Act."

Clause (Officers not to be employed without good service certificates—42 & 43 Vic. c. 78.)—(Mr. Courtney.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Question, "That the Clause be read a second time," put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. WHITLEY proposed the addition of the following clause after Clause 12:—

(Trial of actions in district registries.)

"Nothing in this Act shall prevent the right of parties to try actions in district registries, and to refer same to the district registrars when the parties so desire."

Clause (Trial of actions in district registries.)—(Mr. Whitley.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he had no objection to offer to the clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. HASTINGS proposed the addition of the following Clause:—

(Judges of county courts to have the same qualification as Queen's Counsel.)

"Judges of county courts shall have every qualification conferred on Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the Law by the Act of the thirteenth and fourteenth Victoria, chapter twenty-five."

The hon. Member said, the object of the clause was to enable Judges of County Courts, whether Queen's Counsel or not, to be placed on the Commissions of Assize for the purpose of assisting, if called upon, Judges in the performance of their civil and criminal duties.

Clause (Judges of County Courts to have the same qualifications as Queen's Counsel)—(Mr. Hastings.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. WARTON said, this was an extraordinary and grave proposal. By his clause, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hastings) suggested that County Court Judges, many of whom were not even Queen's Counsel, should rank as Judges. He (Mr. Warton) felt it his duty to say that, judging from his own personal experience, four out of every five County Court Judges were totally unfit to try Assize cases. He should like to know on whose suggestion the hon. Gentleman proposed the clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that he, on the contrary, thought that some of the County Court Judges were well fitted to try Assize cases. Some inconvenience had been found under the present rule, which provided that only Queen's Counsel should be deputed to assist a Judge in the trial of Assize cases, and it was suggested that, in some cases, it would be a public convenience if County Court Judges could be put in the Assize Commission. He trusted the clause would be adopted.

MR. HASTINGS said, he proposed the clause upon his own responsibility, knowing, as he did, many County Court Judges who were well qualified to try Assize cases.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he would ask if the clause of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hastings) had really anything to do with the Bill under consideration? The Bill was one to amend the Supreme Court of Judicature Act; but this clause related to County Court Judges.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he thought this was a clause which distinctly came within the purview of the Bill, because the Bill dealt with Assizes, and regulated those who were to be put in the Commission of Assize.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must rule that the next two new clauses, standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Worcestershire (Mr. Hastings)—namely,

("No writ of mandamus or prohibition to issue to Judge or officer of county court, but persons aggrieved to have right of appeal as under the 'County Courts Act, 1875.'") and

("The court or judge hearing such appeal may make order to do complete justice between parties, and direct as to costs.") could not be proposed, as they were not relevant to the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, he had received a letter from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), urging him (Mr. Warton) to move the new clause which stood in the hon. Gentleman's name. He therefore begged to move the insertion of the following Clause:—

(Vacations may be regulated by Order in Council.)

"Her Majesty in Council may from time to time make, revoke, or modify orders regulating the vacations to be observed by the High Court of Justice and the High Court of Appeal, and in the offices of the said Courts respectively.

The Solicitor General

"The provisions of section twenty-five of 'The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875,' shall apply to every Order in Council made under this Act."

Clause—(Vacations may be regulated by Order in Council)—(Mr. Warton),—brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he sympathized a great deal with his hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in his desire to regulate the Vacations for the public convenience; but he could not assent to this clause. The adoption of the clause would show a total want of confidence in those who now regulated the Vacations.

Question put, and negatived.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (CHANCERY EXAMINERS' OFFICE) [COMPENSATION].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of compensation to persons holding the office of sworn clerk to the late Chancery Examiners, on the abolition of that office, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 2nd August, 1884.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE, Vote 29.
Resolutions [August 1] reported.

QUESTION.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask what is to be the course of procedure to-day? I understand there was a conversation yesterday in the House from which it was inferred that the Prime Minister might be able, upon the Report of Supply, to make some statement with regard to the issue of the Conference. I shall be very much obliged if any Member of the Government—perhaps the Home Secretary—could tell us whether it is probable that such a statement will be made; and, if so, at what time it is probable that the progress of the Civil Service Estimates will be interrupted, and the Report of Supply taken?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I believe the Conference is at this moment sitting, and it would be the desire of the Prime Minister to make an announcement as to its decision at the earliest possible time, in order to give the necessary information to the House; but, at the present moment, it is impossible for me to state at what time that information will be given.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: At what time will Progress be reported on the Civil Service Estimates?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am afraid it would not be very judicious to make that statement; we had better reserve it. I think, from what the Prime Minister said the other day, there is no intention to carry on the proceedings to an unreasonable hour.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked whether the Votes to be taken to-day would be confined to Class IV.; and whether Supplementary Estimates would not be taken?

MR. COURTNEY replied that the Votes for to-day would be the Constabulary Vote and the Votes in Class IV., including the Supplementary Estimates in that Class.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the course which the Government had pursued in reference to the imposition of a force of extra police upon the County of Limerick. He found that during the year 1882 the county had been charged the enormous sum of £6,966 for extra police. He did not object to extra police being sent into the county if there were reason to suspect disorder or outrages upon life and property; but the County of Limerick was able to challenge comparison with the most peaceful county in England in regard to crime and outrage. Notwithstanding that fact, a tax was imposed upon it in one year of £6,966 for extra police. These extra police were distributed broadcast all over the county, not for the sake of preserving peace and order, but to assist the landlords in collecting their rents. Their services were entirely unnecessary so far as the protection of life and property was concerned, and their time was occupied in driving cattle, and in enabling the landlords to extort rack rents. There was no more quiet or peaceable county in Ireland until, in an evil hour, Mr. Clifford Lloyd made it his headquarters. In the town of Kilmallock, in which he (Mr. O'Sullivan) resided, and which he was consequently thoroughly acquainted with, the peace and order of the place were maintained by 10 or 11 constables up to that time; but immediately after Mr. Clifford Lloyd arrived at Kilmallock 50 or 60 extra police were drafted into the town, notwithstanding the fact that it was altogether free from anything in the shape of crime and outrage. From that moment the inhabitants saw every morning scores of police going out with the military, not for the purpose of putting down crime and outrage, but to collect the rents of the rack-renting landlords. The majority of the landlords in the county were good men; but, unfortunately, there were among them some black sheep. Perhaps there was not throughout the whole of Ireland a worse landlord than a gentleman in that county named Coote. It was almost entirely owing to the action of this gentleman with regard to his tenants that the force of extra police had been imposed upon that part of the county. He had been known to serve writs upon his tenants for a single half-year's rent. His land was more highly rented than any other in the county. He obtained for it £3 or £4 an acre, and yet, notwithstanding that fact, the moment a tenant got six months in arrear he was served with a writ. Three of Mr. Coote's tenants had been evicted who had held their farms for years. Because, owing to the depression which occurred in regard to agricultural operations in 1878, 1879, and 1880, these unfortunate persons found themselves unable to pay the rack rents imposed on them; they were summarily evicted from their farms, no terms whatever being offered to them. Mr. Coote was perfectly aware that these three tenants had offered on several occasions even within the last three months to settle the rent at whatever sum the Land Commission might fix as a fair rent. They wrote to Mr. Coote making that offer, but it was contemptuously refused. Indeed, the landlord did not condescend to return an answer to their communication. Nevertheless, this was a man for whose protection Her Majesty's Government had put up a police hut and kept six extra police on his farm. He thought it would afford to the Committee a good illustration of the way in which the tax for additional police operated. As he had said, there were six police stationed upon Mr. Coote's farm. Yet it was a place in which there had been no crime or outrage, and their sole duty appeared to be to mind the farms from which the tenants had been evicted, notwithstanding the fact that they had offered to pay up all arrears and to pay any rent which the Land Court was prepared to fix. It was the conduct of this class of unscrupulous landlords which gave rise to the land agitation of 1879-80, and was the cause of the Land Bill being brought in by the Government and passed by Parliament. If Mr. Coote's tenants' rents were not paid by the 1st of May, he sent them notice that it must be ready on the 14th, and those who were unable to pay it on that day were served with an attorney's letter on the 16th. Certain tenants who went on the 20th to pay the rents were told that it would be refused unless they were prepared to pay 10s. 6d. in addition in the shape of costs. He had known one of these unfortunate tenants go to the solicitor's office, six miles off, on the 21st of May, in order to pay half a-year's rent due on the 1st of the same month, with 10s. 6d. to the solicitor for writing a letter. Was that a gentleman who was likely to bring peace, contentment, and happiness to the Irish people, or make his tenants satisfied with their lot, even under the provisions of the Land Bill? This was the same gentleman for whom the Government continued to provide a hut and police protection, for no other purpose than to watch the farms of his evicted tenants. Surely the course pursued with regard to him encouraged him in the style of action he adopted towards his tenants. He had received a letter from one of this gentleman's tenants—a tenant whom he (Mr. O'Sullivan) knew intimately, and one of those who had been evicted by Mr. Coote. He was able to say, without fear of contradiction, that the person to whom he referred was one of the most honest and industrious tenants in the County of Limerick; but he had found it impossible to pay the rack rent demanded of him when the seasons turned against him. He would only trouble the Committee with a short extract from the letter written by this tenant, in order that hon. Members might be able to comprehend what it was the Government were upholding by keeping an extra police force in the County of Limerick. He wrote—

"I have been evicted by my landlord, Mr. Coote, for one half-year's rent. My rent was £103 16s. per year, but my poor rates on the entire farm and outhouses were only assessed upon £49 15s., or less than one-half of the rent. I offered, shortly after my eviction, when I had raised some money from my friends, to pay the half-year's rent and costs, which offer my landlord refused, unless I would pay the full rent of the land during the time it was lying idle, although Mr. Coote had possession himself of it during that time."

Mr. Coote had the land in his possession, or in the possession of his bailiff, because no other person would take possession of it. So anxious, however, was this poor man to regain possession of the land, that he said in his letter—

"I further offered to give £150 if I could get my farm again on the same terms as the Land Commissioners had fixed in the case of two farmers on the two next farms to mine, but this offer was also refused."

He (Mr. O'Sullivan) did not wish to go any further into this case; but it was regarded, in the county of Limerick, as a great hardship that this poor man should have been served with a writ and evicted for the non-payment of a single half-year's rent, the rent itself being double that at which the farm was assessed by the poor rate valuation. Yet this landlord, who refused those fair offers to pay rent and arrears, was the gentleman for whose protection the Government imposed upon the county a heavy police tax. He was sorry to say that there were other cases of the same kind in the county of Limerick; but he had selected this one, because he was personally acquainted with the circumstances, residing as he did within two miles of the farm to which he had directed attention. He had stated that the extra police tax amounted in the year 1882 to the sum of £6,966. That extra force was sent into the county, not in consequence of any disturbance, or in order to prevent crime and outrage, but solely because evictions were being carried out broadcast, and the evicting landlords were in dread that either themselves or their property would be injured. He appealed to the justice of Her Majesty's Government to say whether this state of things ought to be continued, and whether this heavy additional tax should still be imposed upon a county which would bear a favourable comparison for peace and order and absence of crime and outrage with any county in England? Would they persevere in this imposition? He contended that it would be disgraceful if they did, especially when their sole object—at any rate in the case of the landlord to whom he had referred—was to uphold a man who refused to make any terms whatever with his tenants, who evicted them when simply half-a-year in arrear, who refused every fair and reasonable offer made to him, and who wrung from his unfortunate victims the highest rack rents it was possible to impose. Could it be supposed that while landlords were permitted to follow a course like this, it would be possible, even with the aid of extra police, to sow the seeds of peace and contentment in the neighbourhood? It was too bad that the county should be kept in a fever of excitement and compelled to pay what amounted to a heavy fine on account of the oppressive action of one man. He knew that the Government had no control over the action of this individual; but, at any rate, they could withdraw the police, who were now employed in assisting to evict tenants, notwithstanding their willingness to come to a settlement on fair and reasonable terms, and who were told off to protect the deserted property from which the tenants had been removed.

MR. MARUM said, he had stated at the time this extra police tax was imposed upon the county of Limerick that it was entirely unnecessary, and that it would produce the discontent and ill-feeling which it was intended to prevent. If it had ever been necessary to place 50 additional police in the county the times had very much changed since, and at the last Assizes the matter was brought under the attention of the Grand Jury by a Presentment. It was said, however, that that was not the time for taking action in the matter, and that they were assuming to themselves the functions of the Executive. It was pointed out to them that it was a matter with which they had nothing to do, but that the extra police were sent into the county by the Executive Government; that the cost of it was, under the Prevention of Crime Act, to be charged upon the locality in which it was employed; and that, as a matter of fact, the same course had been pursued in other districts where it was feared that serious outrages might be committed. But in most cases the extra police had been withdrawn when tranquillity was restored, and the local expenditure incurred had not been very large. Moreover, he found that in this very county, at the Lent Assizes, Mr. Justice Barry had congratulated the county upon its peaceful and orderly condition, and upon the absence of crime and outrage. Nevertheless, the Government still declined to withdraw the extra police, and the result had been to create great dissatisfaction throughout the county. A more peaceful and law-abiding county than the county of Limerick it was impossible to find, and yet this enormous local taxation was still imposed without the slightest necessity. The Grand Jury declined to take any action in the matter, and threw the entire responsibility upon the Executive. He believed that one main ground of the present condition of affairs was the defective distribution of the regular Police Force. At one time the population of his own county of Kilkenny was more than 150,000; it was now only 90,000, but the police force was maintained at the same strength as when the population numbered 60,000 more. In Limerick the same result had been brought about; and he would appeal to the Chief Secretary and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, whether such a condition of affairs afforded any pretence whatever for continuing the imposition of an additional force of police? If there was any disturbance in any part of the county, the Lord Lieutenant had the power of drafting into it an extra force, and to call upon the locality to pay the expense. In the county which he represented the greatest dissatisfaction was expressed at the action of the Executive. Only the other day there was a large meeting of the ratepayers, who had appealed to him to take some steps in the matter. All he asked the Government was that if 50 additional police, or any number of extra police, were required in the county, and their employment were justified by the state of crime and outrage, then let their services be continued, but if not let them be removed. At that moment the extra police were costing the ratepayers of the county of Kilkenny a sum of £2,400 a-year, without the slightest necessity for their employment, and, in addition to that heavy tax, the farmers were suffering from the continued depression of agriculture, and the competition to which they were subjected from abroad. As a matter of fact, the local taxation was becoming enormous and unbearable. Everything was thrown upon it, and every fresh Bill introduced into Parliament added to the local burdens. A great deal of the necessity for having the local Constabulary was owing to the want of perfect confidence on the part of the people in the administration of justice. If the people had perfect confidence in the local Courts, they would not take the law into their own hands; but if they had not that confidence, of course they fought it out. He could not express too strongly the general dissatisfaction there was in the county with this enormous taxation, which the people believed to be unnecessary; the question was not whether this system was more secure, but whether it was necessary, and he challenged the Chief Secretary to say that it was necessary.

MR. DAWSON said, there never had been a better instance than this in which the people ought to take the advice of Lord Macaulay to "tell those who call for obnoxious taxes to call again," because there had never been so unjust and so unnecessary an impost as this. He would like to know what Englishmen would say if they saw ladies dragged through English streets, as they had been in Limerick, because they sympathized with those who, for their patriotism, had been put in prison? One of the right hon. Gentleman's reasons for these extra police was that when the people saw others being degraded in this way they lost their temper. They were naturally indignant. What could the right hon. Gentleman say to a state of facts which he could not deny? If Limerick was in such a state of tumult; if these occurrences were of such a dangerous character as to render these extra police necessary, why were the rioters not brought before the Judges? The County Court Judges, every Judge of Assize, and every Chairman of Quarter Sessions, had said they had nothing to try; but if there was this disorder, why were not the rioters brought before those Judges? He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to deny that during the presence of the police the County Court Judges had nothing to try. Could there be anything more grievous than that? When did a policeman ever lose his life in Limerick? Did Mr. Clifford Lloyd even lose a hair of his precious head, which had been the cause of so much trouble and tumult wherever he went? Had there been any case to bring before the Judges of Assize? They had gone to Limerick again and again, and had declared that their appearance there was almost unnecessary. In one breath the right hon. Gentleman declared Limerick to be in such a state of crime and danger that he must deluge it with police at every corner, irritating the people with their menaces; while, on the other hand, the Judges declared that there was no crime. Whenever the Judges were attacked a great deal was heard from the Government Benches about the inviolability of the Bench and the purity of the law; but now it seemed that the Judges had been lax, and the law had not been applied, for the Judges had done nothing in the state of things in Limerick which the right hon. Gentleman had described. How would the right hon. Gentleman's statement as to the state of Limerick tally with the fact that the Judges did nothing? He should be glad to hear the answer to that; and, meanwhile, he must again refer to the extraordinary contrast between the salaries of the police who were to repress crime and the salaries and incomes of the teachers whose duty was to teach the young. Last night he and his hon. Friends had pointed out that while there were only 11,000 teachers in Ireland, there were 13,773 policemen. The Government provided fewer people to prevent crime than police to put it down. They paid constables £59, £69, and £79 a-year; but they only paid National School teachers, whose labours would tend to render the police unnecessary if they were properly paid, only £57 a-year. The Chief Secretary must also be aware that the Constabulary in the counties and towns were beyond the control of the Municipal Authorities, while the contrary was the case in England; and yet the right hon. Gentleman was continually drawing comparisons between the two cases. If he would give the Irish Local Authorities a share in the control of the police, they would be quite willing to bear the burden in proportion to their means. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten what that proportion should be, and to think they should pay the same proportion from their local resources as the people in England; but he thought the proportion should be only as one to seven. Ireland had grown poorer; her means of wealth had been dammed and dried up by a hostile and inauspicious Government, and she was now less able than she was at one time to pay a large proportion; and yet they were constantly told by this country, which was really the cause of the poverty of Ireland, that they ought always to pay similar sums to the amounts paid in England. Why did the Government think it so necessary to protect Mr. Cliford Lloyd when he went to a town with a population of 40,000, like Limerick? And how many men did they think were required for that purpose?

An army of police he supposed. This potentate could not go out without a large body of police, not to protect him, but to intimidate the people; and they had heard how he had been guarded even when going to garden parties by a posse of police. Therefore, upon this Vote Irish Members must take the opportunity of calling attention to these things. If more money was spent upon those who would teach the people to refrain from crime, there would be little need for the maintenance of this enormous army of police. If this God-given Government would take away their police and their soldiers, and leave him and his Colleagues and the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) to manage their own affairs, there would soon be an end to this difficulty. It was said that they would quarrel; but what did Shylock say?—

“If you prick us, do we not bleed? if you tickle us, do we not laugh? if you poison us, do we not die? and, if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?”

He was sure that if the people of England could once grasp the true state of things in Ireland they would rise up as defenders of justice to Ireland. Last night they had heard a great deal of the abolition of Slavery, which occurred 50 golden years ago; but the people of Ireland were still in a state of slavery under these English Pashas, and the slaves of Jamaica and America never suffered more keenly. But there was no Royal Highness, and there were no great Lords, or a great people to take as much interest in the wrongs of Ireland now as they did in the abolition of Slavery half-a-century ago. When speaking of the abolition of Slavery, these people did not forget to pay a tribute to the great Irishman, Daniel O'Connell, who helped to free the slave by his great advocacy. In conclusion, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell him, as a Limerick man, who had filled the office of High Sheriff, who had lived there all his life, and had been there when all these police were there, and saw that there were no cases to be tried, how he could go back to Limerick and tell the citizens to keep quiet under this iniquitous tax? If he could get no answer from the right hon. Gentleman, his advice to the people within the law about these police and the extra tax would be to use that pithy sentence, "call again." He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would return to the rôle of an historian and an English statesman, and give up the rôle of a statesman not inspired by Englishmen, but by Dublin Castle. He had faith in Englishmen, and believed that if they were well-informed upon these matters they would not pursue their present course in regard to Ireland. What a contrast there was between Ministers who were free from the fetters of Dublin Castle, and those who were in its fetters! He hoped the Chief Secretary would forget that he was Chief Secretary for Ireland, and would only remember that he was the biographer of Lord Macaulay, and would not drive the people of Ireland to the necessity of putting into practice the advice to "call again."

Mr. DEASY said, he would confine his observations to the extra police in the County and City of Cork. He believed that Captain Plunkett, the District Resident Magistrate, meeting the Mayor of Cork in the street, said that if the Corporation would express the opinion by resolution that 170 police were sufficient to maintain the peace, 20 men would be added to the free force of 150, and the remainder of the extra force would be removed. But when the Corporation passed such a resolution, the Chief Secretary said he could not at present increase the force to 170, and that the Corporation would have to wait three years for that to be done. Captain Plunkett must have known what the state of the law was, and he was not satisfied that he had not, in this instance, made that statement in order to lead the Corporation into a trap, and give an excuse for continuing the force in the City. The extra police quartered in Cork for the last 17 years had cost the people £15,000, though no reason was assigned for continuing those men in the City. Year after year the Judges had declared the City to be in a most peaceable condition, and there had been a great absence of crime. In fact, he was sure no community in England could show such an absence of crime as Cork had in the last 17 years; but he believed the reason for maintaining the police there was that Captain Plunkett saw that the country was returning to its normal state of peace and quietude, and he was determined to show that there was some necessity for his presence in the South of Ireland. If he did not keep up this force he would not retain his present office, for which he got £2,000 or £3,000 a-year. That, he believed, was the reason for his action; but he was satisfied that if the Chief Secretary had been allowed to exercise his own judgment, these complaints would not now have to be made. A kind of promise had been given that this extra force, which now numbered 39 men, should be reduced by 19, and that would still leave 20; but, owing to some change introduced by the Divisional Resident Magistrate, he believed the police of the borough were paraded frequently in some central place, thereby throwing such an unnecessary amount of work on their shoulders, that even 170 men were scarcely able to discharge the ordinary police duties. If the police had been left in the hands of the ordinary magistrates there would have been no difficulty, because the people had more confidence in them than in the magistrates who had lately been appointed. If the Government would listen to the advice of the people, who really understood this matter, they would remove these police. The only duty the extra policemen had to perform was to dance attendance on the Special Resident Magistrate. He had 20 detectives on his own staff. What they did no one knew, and yet the people were charged with their cost. Another cause of complaint was that eight of the regular men were absent from the City, which the citizens did not get credit for, and that, in consequence of that, Captain Plunkett pretended that he had to keep a larger force than would otherwise be necessary to preserve the peace. But, strange to say, with all this force in Cork, the only crimes of any consequence which had been committed there for a number of years had remained undetected, and there was a strong suspicion that one of these crimes—a case of manslaughter—was committed by three detectives. The way in which the charge against those three detectives had been investigated had met with the universal disapproval of the people of Cork; the belief being that the officers of these men had deliberately shielded them from justice, and that if the investigation had been properly conducted these men would have been brought to justice. However that might be, as the incident was now eight months old, he would not further refer to it; but he would ask the Chief Secretary whether any information had been received from Captain Plunkett or from the police authorities of Cork as to the perpetrators of the outrage which he had already several times brought under his notice—namely, the wrecking of the Lough Chapel? The Corporation, Magistrates, High Sheriff, and other gentlemen of position had several times petitioned the Government to withdraw the extra police from Cork, on the ground that 160 men would be sufficient to maintain the peace; and, in 1882, the then Chief Secretary (Mr. W. E. Forster) promised that when the time arrived for a redistribution of the police, the Lord Lieutenant would consider the desirability of removing the extra police. He would like to ask what steps the Lord Lieutenant took in 1882 to ascertain whether it was necessary to keep these extra police in Cork? He was inclined to think that, as the Corporation did not then refuse to pay the extra tax, the Lord Lieutenant did not take any steps to ascertain whether these men were necessary. He hoped these questions would be fully discussed that day, and that the matter would be carefully considered. The whole question of extra police in Ireland would be raised by the senior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and would have to be discussed, and it was for that reason that he had now mainly confined himself to that portion of the force in Cork County and City. Looking over the interesting Returns presented last year, he found that the cost to the ratepayers in 1882, on account of the extra police quartered in the county, was £10,000; and, as far as he could see from the Return supplied to the senior Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) last night, no important reduction had since taken place in the number of men in Cork County. But the Judges had declared at the Assizes in the last two years that the county of Cork was in a very peaceable state indeed, and the number of outrages was very small. Even when the late agitations had been at their highest point, the county of Cork was in its normal condition. Why, then, was this cost of £10,000 to be put upon the ratepayers? He could not understand it, unless it was that the Government wished to take every opportunity they could get for annoying the people and punishing them for endeavouring to wring justice from Parliament. The way in which these police conducted themselves in the country was another matter upon which he had to find fault. He would only refer to one case, about which he had asked a Question in the House a week or two ago. That was a case in which the Head Constable went to the keeper of an hotel, a widow with six or seven children, in Ballydehob, and threatened her that if she permitted meetings of the National League to be held in an out-house attached to her hotel, he would oppose her application for a fresh licence at the Licensing Sessions, and persuade the magistrates not to grant it. She at once, of course, communicated with the Secretary of the National League, and he (Mr. Deasy) was then furnished with the Question which he had put to the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman expressed a very strong opinion as to the conduct of the Head Constable, and promised that he would not permit such a wanton interference with the rights of the people. He was perfectly satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's promise, and he did not think it necessary to prolong his observations now, because, as he had said, the whole question would have to be dealt with in a much more extensive manner. The Government, however, had not the excuse for quartering these extra police on the county of Cork, which they gave with regard to the extra police in Limerick. They could not point even to a single case of a boy throwing stones, and, in fact, he thought that if they looked through the calendar of crime in Cork they would find that it compared very favourably with any county or city in the United Kingdom. There was one other matter to which he wished to draw attention, and that was the course taken by the police in the City of Cork four months ago, after the election in that City. Several meetings of Queen's College students were held at a place belonging to a Benefit Society. Two or three evenings after these young gentlemen had held a meeting, and passed a resolution in favour of one of the candidates and condemning the system of the Queen's Colleges, two policemen visited the room, and endeavoured to frighten the old woman who was in charge of it into giving the names of all who had been present at the meeting. He had put a Question to the Chief Secretary upon that matter, and the right hon. Gentleman gave a very evasive answer indeed. So strongly was that answer condemned in Cork that he had received several letters from people altogether unconnected with the Society or with the Queen's College, asking him to press for further information. He believed the cause of this visit was that a few weeks before the election another meeting was held at the same place, at which a strong resolution was passed condemning the way in which Captain Plunkett had acted in the South of Ireland, and particularly his action with regard to the public meetings of the National League in the county of Cork. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman could give him any answer as to the visit of the police to the rooms of the Society in question; but he hoped he would give an assurance that meetings of the National League would not be suppressed during the Recess. There would, he was sure, be great danger to the peace in the county of Cork, if, during the Prorogation, Captain Plunkett was allowed to act as he had acted last winter in suppressing National League meetings throughout the county. These meetings had been most orderly, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give this assurance with regard to meetings which the League proposed to hold during the Recess. A series of meetings had already been held, and he would appeal to the Chief Secretary to give an undertaking that they would not be interfered with so long as the people were orderly and kept the peace.

MR. McMAHON said, there had been thousands of people parading the streets of Cork on one night, without any disturbance taking place; but these police, when under the control of men of the stamp of Captain Plunkett, were a constant source of irritation to the people.

COLONEL NOLAN contended that there was no necessity for these extra police, and complained that those who paid for them had not the control of them. The county was in a most peaceable condition, and there was no wish on the part of even the most desperate character to commit any outrage. If at one time these extra police might have been necessary, the necessity had ceased two or three years ago. There were a number of police barracks in the county which served no useful purpose, and in the same way a large number of people received police protection, which, in a great many cases, was quite unnecessary, but for which the county had to pay. At the same time, he acknowledged that the responsibility of deciding whether people needed police protection or not was one of a serious nature; but unless it was very clear that people wanted protection, it should not be paid for by the county, but by the country generally. The Government was bound to protect the lives and property of the public; and unless there was a flagrant case in which a man had been threatened, such protection came within the ordinary circumstances of the general security of life and property which any civilized Government undertook at the expense of the country at large. It was a matter of opinion whether a particular locality or a particular person should be protected. The Chief Secretary might give this protection if he liked; but he certainly ought not to charge it upon the people. The increase of taxation had become enormous, and was most injurious to the people. As an instance of the vicious way in which this system worked, he would mention one barony. It was on the sea shore; the people did not want any rates, and they refused to pay the county cess, which was very heavy. Then they were charged for extra police and for several other things which came under the county cess. The Chief Secretary ought to look into such a case as this, and see that in a poor locality in a mountainous district the taxes were not so heavy as to be oppressive and to drive the people into a state of passive resistance. Then there was another district which was absolutely free from crime, but which, nevertheless, had to pay for the extra police in the county. That tax they regarded as simply vindictive punishment; and he did not think the Government took sufficient trouble with regard to these cases. The Chief Secretary, of course, could not visit all these places, and he had to take the advice of the magistrates, and unpaid magistrates were generally prejudiced. Others were unprejudiced; but the unprejudiced did not take the trouble to write to Dublin Castle. It was to the interest of the police to pretend that a locality was in a dangerous state, in order to show how efficient they were in keeping the peace, and how necessary they were, and how advisable it was, in the interest of the State, to increase their emoluments and promotion; but the Chief Secretary should be kept on his guard against the Reports of people of this kind. He did not pay the slightest attention to the representations of those who were elected by the people. Questions on these matters had been repeatedly put by hon. Members who generally voted with the Government on foreign and other questions; but, as a general rule, the Government did not pay the slightest attention to the elected Representatives of the country. In his view, the Chief Secretary ought to take care to obtain—he knew that was hard—unprejudiced Reports as to the state of the country; and if there was no absolute necessity for these extra police, or a doubt as to whether they were necessary, then he should say he would not put the burden on the people. A second reason why he did not think the people should pay this tax was this—English Members were not always aware of the manner in which the money was allotted in Ireland for police. The Government found a certain number of police which were not charged on the county; and if there were any extra police, then they called upon the county to pay for a certain number of men over their ordinary strength. In England the county would decide for itself whether it should apply for additional police, and then the county would have to pay. It was important to insure that the police were not withdrawn from their ordinary duties; but that frequently occurred. He was perfectly certain, speaking with regard to Galway, that the authorities at the depôt in Dublin found it extremely convenient to keep back 50 or 60 men who ought to be in Galway, so that they could send out three orderlies, instead of only one, for an officer, and in order that they might be able to keep the recruits a little longer under instruction. He had not the least objection to their doing that, so long as it was at the expense of the Government; but he thought that when they charged the county for an extra 100 men, and then only sent 40, in order that the depôt in Dublin might have a few more men for other purposes, they inflicted gross injustice on the rate-payers of Galway. His remedy for this was very simple, and was one which the Chief Secretary ought to have adopted long ago. There should be someone to inspect the Reports, so as to see what men were away, and whether their places were filled up; and the Reports ought to be open to Members of Parliament and others concerned in Dublin. The only person who could be intrusted with the inspection of the Returns would be someone representing the cesspayers. The Government might say there were the Grand Juries to represent the cesspayers; but they did not altogether represent the cesspayers, and it would be useless to hand over this duty to a Grand Jury unless there was some special man to look to it, who would not be influenced by the general body of the Grand Jury. This plan would not cost much money or trouble, and ought, he thought, to be adopted by the Government. For the last three years the people had been paying money which ought to have come from the pockets of the Government on their own showing. He had brought forward this idea of public Returns as to the state of the police last year, and the Solicitor General for Ireland then said he would look into the matter. He would like now to know what had been done, and whether he, or any other Member, could go and inspect Returns showing where men were, and why they were charged upon districts when they were not in those districts? This might be considered a matter of detail; but it was more than that to Irish Members, and he must press the Government to take steps to enable them to see these Returns. As to another point, the character of the police seemed to vary a great deal. In his own county (Galway), they did their duty quietly and efficiently. During the last three or four months there had been no complaints; but before that, especially in the Southern part of the county, they had been anxious to pick quarrels, and had been enforcing the regulations with very bad temper. It was most essential that, if there was any excitement, the police should act with good temper and moderation; but, instead of that, their action had, in many cases, tended to provoke quarrels and disturbances. They had been very irritating at Loughrea towards the people, and one of the officers had encouraged them in that foolish practice. He saw an instance of it himself. He attended a meeting, which was very quiet and orderly, and nobody who was there wished to interfere in the slightest degree with the police constable who was in attendance, if he would only remain quiet. The constable, however, acted most ostentatiously; indeed, it was evident his instructions were to make as much fuss and as much of a demonstration as possible. The chairman of the meeting was very efficient, and, fortunately, everything passed off quietly. If the police were anxious to interfere with the people, it was not to be wondered at if conflicts occasionally occurred. All he asked was that the authorities should send to the town of Loughrea efficient and good-tempered constables, and not encourage the officers to get in conflict with the inhabitants. It appeared to him that, in many instances, the police, instead of setting an example of moderation and good sense, went out of their way, as they certainly did in Loughrea, to arouse the indignation of the people, and cause petty fights. Complaints to this effect were constantly reaching him from different parts of Ireland, and he could not help thinking they were well-founded.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, there were two or three points to which he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. One point to which he would particularly direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman was the wholesome monotony in the expressions of the Judges of Assize with regard to the present condition of Ireland. The Charges of the Judges of Assize showed that from Antrim to Cork and from Galway to Drogheda there was a remarkable and unprecedented absence of serious crime. Only that morning he took up an Irish paper in which he saw the statement that at the recent Assizes there was no case of general interest to the public. As a matter of fact, crime and popular excitement appeared to exist to a greater extent in those places where extra police were quartered than in any other. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would say that special police were only sent to districts where there was crime; but the Chief Secretary would see, if he examined the matter carefully, that some of the places in which disturbance and crime prevailed were particularly quiet before the extra police were sent there. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would take the recent statements of the Judges of Assize into account in any future police arrangements for the country. Another point he wished to direct the attention of the Chief Secretary to was that in almost every case, if not in every case, where the Resident Magistrate asked for extra police, the request was made without any consultation with the ordinary Bench of Magistrates. He did not think that ought to be the case; the Resident Magistrate ought in such matters to take the advice of his colleagues on the Bench. Another thing to which he would direct the attention of the Chief Secretary was that in the majority of cases the extra police were not stationed under the Prevention of Crime Act, but under previous legislation. He held that if extra police were required, they ought to form part of the permanent force of the country, and ought to be paid for by the Government, and not be an extra charge on the country. Then, he should like to say a word or two upon the question which his hon. Friend (Mr. Deasy) referred to—namely, that of the extraordinary treatment of the Cork Collegians upon the occasion of a recent meeting of theirs. He felt a personal interest in the City of Cork. He was born there, and at one time belonged to the same class as the young men now attending the Cork College. He could hardly imagine anything more wantonly oppressive than to send the police to watch the proceedings of these young students on the occasion of their meeting to pass a resolution in favour of the candidature of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Deasy). The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary knew perfectly well that in the times of the Wars of Napoleon, the patriotic spirit, extinguished in almost every other class in Germany, was kept alive by the young men of the Colleges; and it was the spark from their patriotic feeling which lit up the whole country. He hoped, therefore, that in future the right hon. Gentleman would be as careful as possible not to allow his policemen to interfere with the demonstrations of the students of Ireland, unless there was the gravest and most pressing cause. Furthermore, he thought the Executive Government should, as far as possible, discontinue the employment of members of the Police Force as shorthand writers to take down the speeches of National and popular speakers. He did not know whether the Chief Secretary knew anything about shorthand writing; but he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) knew that it was a very difficult art to acquire with anything like facility. He remembered Lord Palmerston once saying in the House of Commons that he had given some study to shorthand, and he found he could write it well enough, but when he had written the notes he could not read a word of them. That he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) fancied was very often what happened with the gentlemen of the Irish Police Force. It was, undoubtedly, more difficult to learn shorthand than some foreign languages, and he could not believe that Irish police officers could be efficient shorthand writers. He might give an illustration of the way in which police shorthand writers took notes. He once made a speech in his own county, and the shorthand notes taken of his remarks by a policeman were produced in the State Trials. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary thought he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) ever talked sedition; but, if he did, he would perhaps admit that the sedition would probably be couched in decent English. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman, however, that in the report of his speech there was neither sense, nor meaning, nor construction, nor grammar. That was of no consequence, because he was not charged with any seditious offence; but it might have been in the case of some younger man carried away by the excitement of the moment; it might easily have been made to appear that a speaker said the very opposite to what he did say. Again, he happened to be in the county of Waterford, and it was announced he would deliver a lecture to a purely Literary Association upon a purely literary subject. He was favoured with the presence of a couple of shorthand writers, although he had nothing to say that might not have been delivered to a Church Congress. He now asked the Chief Secretary whether he would not direct that, as far as possible, public men who were going to make speeches, especially on purely literary topics, should not be honoured by the presence of any of these unprofessional shorthand writers, who were supposed to be sent as guardians of law and order? These were two or three points he pressed on the attention of the Chief Secretary, and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman by attending to them would do a good deal more to secure contentment and good order in Ireland than he could by any extra police he quartered on the country.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he thought the system of charging extra police in Ireland upon particular localities was a barbarous device, and one that worked very unfairly and inequitably. No doubt, there were historical precedents for it. The Norman tyrants of old inflicted such injuries upon the Saxons; but the system certainly could not be considered applicable to the present day. Extra police might sometimes be required in some parts of the country; but a reasonable thing to do in that case was to let the charge for those police fall upon the general fund, because, see how the matter, as it now stood, worked. It was well known that the men who met together and concocted outrages and atrocities, took every possible care that their secret should only be known to a very narrow circle. That was notoriously the state of the case, and yet it was found that the punishment for whatever offence was committed was levied upon a wide district of the country, and people who had not been privy to the outrages, and who did not even sympathize with them or approve of them, people who often were very badly able to pay this unjust taxation, were called upon to pay these iniquitous taxes. There had been very striking instances of the unfair working of the system. A gentleman in the county of Westmeath, whose sister-in-law was killed by a shot intended, it was generally believed, for the gentleman himself—at all events, for whomsoever it was intended it certainly was not intended for the lady—and the district was taxed and fined in order to pay compensation to the relatives; a portion of the compensation actually was to be paid by the brother-in-law of the lady who was in the carriage with her and at whom, it was believed, the shot was fired. That was a specimen of the working of that splendid machinery for repression of crime in Ireland. This gentleman, the brother-in-law of the lady who lost her life, wounded in heart and bleeding internally from the cruelty he witnessed and the loss he sustained, was asked by this British Government to pay a tax as if he were associated, or as if he sympathized, with the crime that had been committed; he was asked to pay a portion of the compensation which was to be awarded to the relatives of the deceased lady. There was another instance of this hateful system in another part of Ireland. The nuns residing within the peaceful walls of their convent, spending their days and nights in prayer and good works, were served with notice that they had to pay a share of taxation for the compensation for some outrages committed. Could anything be more unjust or unfair? If outrages occurred, and if extra police were required in some localities, surely it was the business of the whole community; it was the business of the British Government to send the necessary force for the preservation of order and to pay for them themselves. There was also this additional argument in the case. Was the British Government free from responsibility for the disorders in Ireland? Could the British Government hold its head up and say—"We are innocent in this matter, we have nothing to do with the promotion of disturbance or the cause of discontent in Ireland?" Why, the British Government—he did not allude to any particular Administration—was itself the chief offender; the mal-administration of the British Government in Ireland was to blame for whatever disorder and disturbance and discontent arose in that country, and therefore no one had a better right to pay for the extra police quartered on the country than the British taxpayer. Now, he believed that in the county of Westmeath there were about 86 extra police—the Chief Secretary, of course, was in a better position to give the correct figures than he (Mr. Sullivan) was—there were, he believed about 86 extra police in the county, and he supposed that the cost of that extra force would be something like £8,000 per annum. On the average it was a little less than £100 a-year per man. That was a large amount to be levied upon a particular locality.

Mr. TREVELYAN pointed out that only a moiety of the sum was paid by the county; he believed that, as a matter of fact, it was about £2,600.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the correction; but the charge of £2,600 was quite sufficient for his argument. If the tax were levied upon the whole county it would fall pretty lightly upon individuals; but levied as it was upon a small area, it became a very oppressive tax. And it must be borne in mind, too, that the tax, levied as it was upon limited areas, was, strictly speaking, paid by people who were innocent of any participation in the crime and who entirely disapproved of it. This taxation was no cure for the evil complained of. The few men who made up their minds, for one reason or another, to perpetrate these outrages, would never be deterred by the consideration that a tax would be levied upon any particular district. They were desperate men, and forgot the terrible consequences that might accrue to themselves from their action; and was it to be supposed they were going to be deterred from their evil practices by the consideration that a tax of 1s. in the pound, or 10d., or 2s., as the case might be, would be levied upon a certain part of the country if the crime they contemplated were committed? He claimed from these considerations that this system of taxation was unjust, that it worked no good, but that, on the contrary, it worked great harm. Let the Committee see what means the Government took to discourage crime and outrage in particular localities, to produce contentment, and to preserve peace. A man from the county of Westmeath, who confessed to having been a participator in criminal matters, and to having been a conspirator for the perpetration of murder and outrage, turned an informer some time ago against his fellow-conspirators. What did the Government do with this odious man, upon whose information his accomplices were prosecuted to conviction? Did they send him out of the country; did they send him to some place where his previous career would have been unknown, where his bad character would not have been notorious, and where, consequently, his presence would be no incentive to disturbance and disorder? No; the Government allowed this man to return to the very part of the country from which he came; they allowed him to resume his ordinary mode of living in the place where he was naturally and inevitably hated and detested by everybody, especially by those whose relatives, connections, and friends he had sent to penal servitude, or to the gallows. The Government let that man come to the very spot where they knew his presence must be hated, and especially by one class. And what more did they do? They sent a police force there to protect him. That, certainly, was not the way in which to promote quietude, contentment, and good order in that part of the country, or, indeed, in any other part of the country. As he had said, they sent a police force with the man, and planted a hut there for their accommodation. Just a word with regard to informers. He knew it was said that informers assisted in bringing criminals to justice, and that on that account there was something to be said for them; but it must be recollected that it did not follow at all that informers did, in very many cases, aid in doing justice; they aided in doing injustice, inasmuch as they had been the cause of innocent men being brought to the prison or to the gallows. They had a direct incentive so to do, in the fact that by prosecuting a man to conviction, whether innocent or guilty, they saved their own necks. He had the firm belief that many of the informers in Ireland had, for the sake of saving their own necks, or saving themselves from penal servitude, given testimony on oath that was very acceptable to the Government, but which was decidedly untrue. He maintained that the course pursued by the Government in the case of the informer to whom he had referred was unbecoming, unwise, and improper; it was remonstrated against by the clergy of the locality. They knew the danger of having this odious man reinstated in the part of the country to which he formerly belonged, and they sent a Memorial on the subject to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. In that Memorial they said—

“We have heard that it is intended to allow Crowe, the informer in the recent conspiracy trials, to return to his former place of abode; we believe that his presence would seriously endanger the public peace.”

Such was the representation made to His Excellency in the interest of peace, order, and quietness, and surely it was worthy attention. It received, as a matter of fact, very little attention—at all events, no practical action was taken upon it by the Lord Lieutenant. The Memorialists went on to say—

“Therefore, we humbly pray Your Excellency will make it a condition of his pardon that he shall reside elsewhere.”

The Memorial was signed by the Catholic clergymen of the locality, men who were anxious for the peace and good order of the district; but it was disregarded by the Lord Lieutenant, who chose to send Crowe, who, upon his own confession, stood convicted of outrage and crime, to the place from whence he came, and amongst the people whose hearts and feelings were excited and exasperated by his conduct. Such were some of the beauties of British government and British rule in Ireland. He maintained that in many cases the protection police were not necessary at all, and that they were got from the Government by representations made by Resident Magistrates and others. But who convinced the Resident Magistrates of the necessity of such police? About a month ago he asked, in the House, the Chief Secretary a Question concerning a lady in the county of Kerry named Miss Lucy Thompson. Miss Lucy had a force of six policemen to take charge of her, and she was very proud of her escort, and the men themselves seemed to be very pleased with their employment. The belief of all well-informed people was that Miss Lucy was in no more danger of attack or outrage than any Member of the House; but a friend of her's—some Pasha in the shape of a Resident Magistrate—recommended that the force should be sent down for her protection. He asked the Chief Secretary, the other day, if the policemen were tenants of Miss Lucy Thompson, and whether she, consequently, had any pecuniary interest in the retention of the force? And the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to say that such matters well deserved looking into. He believed the right hon. Gentleman intimated that he would have inquiries made on the subject; and, therefore, if it was within the memory of the Chief Secretary, he (Mr. Sullivan) would be glad to learn, before the debate closed, whether the protecting force were tenants of the lady? The belief in the locality certainly was that the force was not needed; therefore, their retention was a great outrage upon the people. Now, there was another lady of even more warlike and dashing deportment than Miss Lucy Thompson. He referred to Miss Gardner, who lived in the West of Ireland. He did not know how many policemen she had for her protection; but her house was a little arsenal, and she herself went about heavily armed like a trooper. There was, of course, a ridiculous aspect in the matter; but it was very annoying and provoking to the people of the locality to see this heroine flourishing about, armed and equipped in that fashion. He had often wondered, considering this lady's great military capacity, why the Government had not thought it right to employ her in the Soudan; he certainly thought she would have given as good an account of herself against the Mahdi as scores of the warriors the Government had sent out against him. The presence of these extra policemen was nothing more nor less than an encouragement to bad landlords and bad landladies all over the country; they felt that they were superior to public opinion, and that they could defy the common feelings of the people; that they could do just as they liked within the limits of the law; and there was no compulsion upon them to soften their hearts and do justice to the people round them. The readiness of the Government to send out an extra police force was an encouragement to landlords and landladies to continue in a state of hostility to their neighbours. He should like the Chief Secretary to inform them what earthly need there was for 86 extra policemen to be quartered upon Westmeath? He granted that some outrages had been committed in some particular localities; but he could not grant that the localities were in any way responsible for them. Agrarian outrages were committed, as a rule, by small parties of men who laid their plans in private, and carried them out with all possible secrecy. The localities, as he had said, could not be held responsible for them, and, therefore, to put a heavy tax upon the people, mostly struggling tenant farmers who were totally unable to bear the infliction, was as gross an injustice as it was possible to conceive. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would consider whether the enormous extra force of 86 men in Westmeath ought not to be greatly reduced, and whether the whole system of charging extra police upon localities was not one that should be discontinued.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY said, that, unfortunately, the very objectionable dynasty of Resident Magistrates was by no means extinct in Ireland. For example, Cork was cursed with the presence of a particularly objectionable specimen of this dominant race. The Government seemed to have an almost marvellous instinct for finding out the kind of men who were most likely to be distasteful to the Irish people, and making them captains over them. Captain Plunkett had succeeded in making himself exceedingly objectionable and unpopular in Cork in quite a variety of ingenious ways. One of the devices this magistrate had adopted was the frequent shifting of members of the police force. A large number of the police force in Cork were comparatively popular with their fellow-townsmen; that was to say, they were of the same faith, and in many ways were in sympathy with the people. Captain Plunkett, however, had adopted the ingenious method of transplanting such constables to the North of Ireland, and bringing down from the North a large number of young and inexperienced policemen, unsympathetic in feeling and almost diametrically opposed in faith and race. By that process he contrived to make the citizens of Cork, not only personally uncomfortable, but to have little trust in the administration of the law. Moreover, Captain Plunkett had deprived many of the ordinary magistrates—who were not conspicuously or remarkably unpopular magistrates—of almost any power whatever. The extra police in Cork had been very largely increased since Captain Plunkett came there; indeed, it was a curious fact that whenever members of this particular school of Resident Magistrates arrived the extra police were almost invariably increased. It was so when Mr. Clifford Lloyd came to Limerick. The presence in that historic city of Mr. Clifford Lloyd was almost immediately followed by an increase of the police. The question of the extra police was a serious one for the Irish people, and very naturally they strongly objected to the way in which half of this obnoxious tax was to be paid by the occupier. If any proper portion of the tax were paid by landlords, the Government, no doubt, would have long since abolished this wholly indefensible tax.

MR. KENNY said, that Irish Members had up to this attacked this Vote, on the ground of the extraordinary and entirely unjustifiable manner in which extra police were drafted into almost every county in the South of Ireland. Extra police were quartered upon particular counties under two Statutes. The first of these Statutes was that of Will. IV., under which the Treasury paid half the cost of the force, and the county cess was levied for half. The majority of the extra police drafted into the Irish counties were so drafted under the Act of Will. IV.; but there were a great number of extra police drafted into the counties under the Prevention of Crime Act, and when police were drafted into a district under that Act the district became liable for the cost of the force; and it not unfrequently happened that policemen were quartered in out-of-the-way districts, so that the tax for their maintenance proved very burdensome to the people. There were cases in which certain localities had been taxed to the extent of 12s. or 14s. in the pound for the staff of extra police. He complained that, in the majority of instances, the presence of extra police was entirely and absolutely unnecessary. The fact was, there were too many policemen in Ireland. Three or four years ago, a great effort was made to recruit the Police Force in Ireland. The original number of the Force was something like 10,000; he should think the present number was 15,000. The Government did not know what to do with their policemen, and the result was that, partly with the object of getting rid of them, they sent them down to places where their presence was absolutely unrequired, and taxed the county with the moiety of their expense. He entirely objected to the adoption of such a principle. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) asked the Chief Secretary yesterday whether he would give a Return, or state in reply, the number of extra police drafted into the different counties in Ireland?

The Chief Secretary stated that it would be inconvenient to reply to the Question within the usual limits of an answer; but he would be glad to place the hon. Gentleman in possession of the facts. It would be of interest to the Committee to hear from the Chief Secretary, in his speech upon this question later on, a statement as to the number of extra police quartered in the various counties of Ireland, not only under the Prevention of Crime Act, but under the Act of Will. IV. He (Mr. Kenny) had frequently noticed that, when he had asked the Chief Secretary under what Act certain extra police were quartered in a given district, the right hon. Gentleman invariably succeeded in getting out of the responsibility of answering the Question by stating that he was not informed, or something to that effect, or else that the immediate district was not taxed for the maintenance of the force. That was a disingenuous method of avoiding questions upon the subject. As a matter of fact, the localities were taxed, and taxed very heavily. If extra police were drafted into a district under the Act of Will. IV., a moiety of the expense would, of course, be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund; but if a hut was erected for the men's accommodation, the entire expense of the building would be thrown on the district, so that in one way or another it was contrived to seriously tax every district in which the extra police were brought. He would come later on to a few special instances in which the drafting of extra police into a district was entirely unnecessary. But, previous to doing so, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to state, in his reply, what was the present position of Mr. Jenkinson? To the general public in Ireland the position of Mr. Jenkinson was a complete mystery. He desired to know whether Mr. Jenkinson was to be paid under this Vote, or, if not, under what Vote he was to be paid? If Mr. Jenkinson's pay had ceased in Ireland, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee when it did so. Was it proposed to reappoint him in Ireland? If so, what position was he to hold in the future? They also wanted to have a clear understanding with regard to Mr. Clifford Lloyd. The other evening, when the Magistrates' (Ireland) Salaries Bill was brought forward, the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) ventured the statement that Mr. Clifford Lloyd would not be one of the magistrates appointed under that Bill. He (Mr. Kenny) desired to know whether the fortunes of that Bill had in any way affected the fortunes of Mr. Jenkinson? Mr. Jenkinson was now a pensioner under the Crown, and received something like £1,000 a-year for services he had rendered in the past. It was somewhat too bad to have him foisted on the people of Ireland, as he believed it was proposed, because, when it was found inconvenient to continue the gentleman in the position of Director of Criminal Prosecutions, the Government went to the trouble of introducing a Bill in the House to make provision for his further maintenance. There was an item in the Vote, under the head of "Good Service Pay," for five County Inspectors. He believed that four of those Inspectors were Captain Reed, Captain Plunkett, Mr. Butler, and Mr. Slagg. He should like to know whether County Inspector Smith, the gentleman who issued the famous Circular to the police, instructing them to shoot down any person they saw looking in a menacing manner towards Mr. Clifford Lloyd, was one of the gentlemen who was to receive good service pay? It looked very like a matter in which the Irish Government desired to patronize the persons who offended most violently against popular feeling in Ireland, if County Inspector Smith was to be one of the five gentlemen rewarded. There was an enormous difference between this year and last, in the allowances which were made to the Constabulary. The difference consisted in an increase of £22,000. He should like to know how the extraordinary change from £55,000 to £77,000 had been brought about? Furthermore, in the ordinary pay of the police, there was an increase of £20,000 making altogether an increase in those two items on this Vote of over £42,000. These were increases which required explanation. They were very grave and serious items, and it was too bad to have the expense of the Constabulary increasing year by year in Ireland, especially now, when the services of the police were more than ever unnecessary. Wherever they went in Ireland they found the country swarming with policemen. If they drove along a road they found a police hut at every corner; policemen were to be seen at every turn, and in the most out-of-the-way places, and for this state of things the country was to be severely taxed. It was a well-known fact that the policemen in Ireland did nothing towards the discharge of the functions which policemen performed in this and other countries. The Irish police were a military force; they prowled about the country armed with rifles and bayonets, and they looked with disdain upon any such menial function as attending to sanitary arrangements, or other properly organized police duties. There must be a complete and radical change in the Irish Constabulary system; but until the firearms and other military accoutrements were taken from the men, it was impossible to expect that the duties of the Constabulary in Ireland would be efficiently and properly discharged. Now, he begged to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary a case to which he had already directed the attention of the House by way of Question, and that was the extraordinary claim that was made for compensation under the Prevention of Crime Act by a certain police constable in the county of Clare. The police constable in question claimed £405 compensation for money and a watch which he alleged were destroyed by fire—maliciously destroyed, as he represented, by fire in a wild and out-of-the-way district in Ireland, where he was on police duty; £395 of the total amount had been, according to the statement of the constable, in the bank. He represented that he had had that amount in his possession for a number of years, and he produced, in support of his statement, a pass book, or what he represented to be a pass book, which was supposed to prove everything. Now, that pass book was all written at the same time, and was offered by the constable for the purpose of proving his case. He represented that he had lost, or in some way mislaid, the original book in which the accounts were entered, and consequently he improvised this new book in order to prove the amount of money in his possession. He stated in his evidence that at a certain date a fire took place, and he had in his possession a sum of £196; but when the items in the improvised account book were examined, it was found that he had only the sum of £110. Furthermore, he represented in his evidence before the Chairman of Bounty Sessions, that a sea captain in Galway had cashed a cheque for him of the amount of £196. Now, sea captains were not in the habit of cashing cheques for £196, and policemen were not in the habit of having such cheques in their possession. The constable further stated that the sea captain sold him a watch, and that he presented the cheque for that enormous sum in payment and received the balance. He (Mr. Kenny) considered that, upon the face of it, the statement was a lie; it must be perfectly plain to any person who knew anything of sea captains and policemen, that sea captains were not in the habit of placing so much confidence in ordinary policemen as to change cheques for them. The evidence called to prove the case of the constable was extremely weak indeed. The wife of the man was called, and she swore she had never seen such an amount of money in the possession of her husband. In reply to his (Mr. Kenny's) Question, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary stated that £100 of the total sum came from the constable's father-in-law and £100 from some other relative of his. In evidence before the Grand Jury, he stated distinctly that he only got £35 from his father-in-law and £48 from another relative; altogether the amount he received from extraneous sources did not reach £100. The Chairman of Bounty Sessions, at which the claim was in the first place decided, stated that, in his opinion, there was no evidence whatever that Sub-Constable Carlow lost his money; but that, on the other hand, his witnesses contradicted themselves in a variety of essential particulars; in fact, in the opinion of the Chairman of Bounty Sessions, the claim was utterly groundless. The Chief Secretary had stated that it had been known that a sub-constable of police in Ireland had had in his possession £1,500. It appeared to him (Mr. Kenny) that if police officers in Ireland could, out of their earnings, amass such a large amount of money as £1,500, or even as £395, as Sub-Constable Carlow represented he had in a hut, which he was in the habit of leaving unguarded for days together, there was very small ground indeed for the proposal which the

Chief Secretary made last year to increase the pay and pensions of the members of the Irish Constabulary Force. There was, however, such a habit to champion the Constabulary in the House of Commons, that he was not at all surprised the right hon. Gentleman should get up and defend them. Of course, the Chief Secretary would base his defence of Sub-Constable Carlow upon the action of the Grand Jury. But hon. Gentlemen knew what Irish Grand Juries were. They knew that Grand Juries were not representative bodies. They were directly nominated by the Sheriff of the county, and indirectly by the Lord Lieutenant. They knew that Grand Juries were essentially a class of men who were not concerned by the taxation they levied, that they were men who took good care to levy taxes upon small districts, and possibly to increase a rate of 5s. in the pound to 10s. in the pound. Of course, it was a very convenient method for policemen who wanted to make a little money, to come forward and swear that they had had bank notes, the numbers of which they did not remember, maliciously destroyed. It was a convenient way of making money, and as policemen in Ireland could not make money so easily as by committing perjury, they were great fools if they did not commit perjury. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; hon. Members knew that the chief qualification of a man for the office of policeman in Ireland was that he had no regard for the truth. The experience of many hon. Gentlemen was, that Irish policemen never told the truth when it was not convenient for them to do so; and his opinion was that policemen would be perfectly certain to take the advantage of the prejudice of a Grand Jury and make money at the expense of the ratepayers, if they found it necessary. Furthermore, his opinion was that those ratepayers who were taxed by an irresponsible body, such as a Grand Jury, were fools if they paid the taxes levied upon them. He recommended the people who were taxed unjustly to precipitate reform by refusing to pay iniquitous taxation. He could cite many cases in which the police tax in Ireland was unjustly levied. He did not propose to go into them at any length; in fact, he would only cite one. There was at Lisdoonvarna a person named

Gardner, who had a police hut and five policemen to guard him. Notwithstanding the fact that there were seven or eight constables, and a sergeant-constable, in Lisdoonvarna, the sergeant-constable had thought fit to recommend that five constables should be told off for the special protection of Mr. Gardner. To judge by recent circumstances, Mr. Gardner was quite able to take care of himself, the last instance of which occurred a short time ago, when he assaulted a peaceful individual, and was sentenced to a fine or seven days' imprisonment. Besides, Mr. Gardner had told the police that he did not require their services; and it appeared to him that it was only a piece of false generosity on the part of the Irish Government to insist on forcing that assistance on persons who were not anxious to have it. It simply bore out the argument used in the beginning of his remarks, that there was an excess of police throughout the country, and that for their employment the Government had to adopt an extraordinary and unjust course towards the various districts. As long as the Government retained in their service in Ireland a number of policemen largely in excess of the number required, it was certain that those districts would be mulcted by the Government in order the more conveniently to dispose of the extraditing, and so long would the country be forced to suffer the imposition of unjust taxation, which was at that time creating feelings of dissatisfaction and political rancour, which would not very easily be allayed.

MR. O'SHEA said, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, before he replied, whether, in connection with the case mentioned in debate, he intended to give any instructions with regard to police constables keeping large sums of money in their barracks, or huts, with the object of discouraging them from asking for compensation should those barracks, or huts, be burnt down? He would also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in consideration of the absolute peace which reigned throughout County Clare, a large number of police were to be removed, or had been removed; and, if so, whether he would cause inquiry to be made with regard to those who remained, with the view of removing them also?

Mr. Kenny

MR. LEAMY regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not in his place, because he wished to ask him for some explanation with regard to the extra police force in the county of Waterford. He had put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman a few days ago on this subject, and the right hon. Gentleman stated, in reply, that the number of the police force in Waterford County was 219. He (Mr. Leamy) submitted, that if these figures were correct, it was most extraordinary that so large a force should be kept there, chargeable upon the ratepayers, especially as the county had been distinguished for its quietness for some years past. If the right hon. Gentleman thought it necessary to have this extraordinary force in the county, it would be perfectly easy for him to apply to Parliament for the powers necessary for the purpose; but he contended that it was manifestly unjust to send this large force into the county and charge them upon the ratepayers, at a time when they were already burdened with taxation. If the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had to pay for the extra police out of his own pocket, he would, no doubt, think a very much smaller force sufficient. He would ask on whose recommendation these men were sent into the county? The right hon. Gentleman, when he answered his former Question, said that the county was not the most peaceful place in Ireland, and that there had been many cases of intimidation there; but it was extraordinary that the Prevention of Crime Act should be put in force there under the actual circumstances, and a very large number of extra police sent there. Such a state of things would not be permitted in an English county for 24 hours. The whole proceeding was most unconstitutional; and to charge people who had no voice in the control of the police force with a large sum of money for its maintenance, was an act of which no honest man would be guilty. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to get up and make statements about the disturbed state of the district; but, of course, he must know that no one had any means of ascertaining whether those statements were correct; but there was no doubt that in making them he was dependent upon others for his information—that was to say, upon the Resident Magistrates—who could show their gratitude in no better way than by saying that the districts were disturbed. Perhaps an additional force of 20 or 30 men might have been required; but to send down the enormous number complained of was out of the question. Was it Captain Stack that recommended the men to be sent? He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give some information to the Committee on this point. The right hon. Gentleman said they were not extra police at all; but how could he (Mr. Leamy) know whether they were extra or ordinary police? It was perfectly absurd to tell him, under the circumstances, that they were not extra police. Were they to be told that they were not extra police because they had been withdrawn from the ordinary force, their place being filled up by others? It was not the custom in England, when crime was committed in a county, for the Home Secretary to send down an extra police force; he hoped, therefore, that this extravagant expenditure for police in Ireland would be at once abolished.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, upon two occasions during this Session it came to my lot to call attention to part of the question of the extra police in certain districts of Ireland with regard to the quartering of extra police in the cities of Cork and Limerick. We had discussions in this House upon this limited branch of the question, and we received very little satisfaction from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. We made out an overwhelming case against the necessity of extra police in those two cities; but we were put off in the usual way. Although there was considerable correspondence between the Local Authorities in Cork and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the Resident Magistrate, Captain Plunkett, the result has been, practically speaking, to leave the people of Cork pretty much as they were before, to pay for the extra police until the time when the right hon. Gentleman promises that the subject of the amount of the police force to be allowed for that city shall receive the attention and reconsideration of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. But the question to which I have to direct the attention of the Committee is of a very much wider scope, extending, in fact, to the quartering of extra police throughout the whole of Ireland—throughout, I may say, almost every county and city of Ireland; and I think I shall be able to show that there exists no longer any practical necessity for this extra force of men—in fact, that the necessity never existed at all, or, at any rate, that it cannot be said to have existed during the last two years as regards a considerable proportion of Ireland. I shall, I think, be able also to show that although the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary may have recently, within the last three months, turned his attention to the advisability of reducing the extra police force in some of the Irish counties, yet that he commenced to do so very much too late; that the steps he has taken in that direction are entirely inadequate; and that we have a fair claim to urge upon him a very much larger and more immediate reduction with regard to a very considerable proportion of these extra forces in many Irish districts and counties. Speaking generally, the Irish Executive is entitled, under the Act regulating the matter, to have a free force of 10,636 men and officers, besides a reserve force of, I believe, 400 men and officers, and the revenue force, the number of which I do not exactly know, but which may be somewhere between 150 and 200. Exclusive, then, of revenue and reserve men, the total free force for which the authorities are entitled to charge extra when they are sent out of the county, and for whose payment the Executive was entitled to ask Parliament to grant a Vote, is 10,636. The actual free force distributed under this power by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at the last quinquennial period in 1882—in July, I believe—amounted to 10,030, or 630 men short of the actual full free force which might have been legally raised for service in Ireland. Now, Sir, at the very threshold of our case I think we are entitled to make a very serious complaint with regard to the action of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in this matter. I believe that the free force in Ireland was distributed in 1882 by Earl Spencer, after the period of Office of the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had commenced—at a time when the Government had applied to Parliament for their coercive powers, and were representing to Parliament and the country that the state of Ireland was very serious indeed. Well, Sir, at that time, and under such circumstances, the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Executive deliberately refrained from raising a free force in Ireland to the extent of the number of men which the Act of Parliament authorized. They kept it 630 men short. I suppose I am not allowed to impute intention or motive to such an impersonal body as the Irish Executive; but if I were allowed to do so, I can only say that it would appear that their intention must have been to obtain further means of fining and levying imposts upon the districts and counties concerned—further means than those supplied to them by the Act of Will. IV. and other Acts by which they are entitled to send extra men into the different districts. Well, as I have shown, the Irish Government deliberately kept the free force at the last quinquennial period of redistribution 530 men under the number authorized by Parliament; on the other hand, they sent into various Irish counties the enormous extra force of 3,426. As I have just explained, there are various enactments under which the Executive Government can levy and send extra forces, and quarter them on the inhabitants. Under the 13th section of the Act of Will. IV., which gives power to the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim a district, they levied and quartered on the districts 2,221 men. Under Section 12, which gives the magistrates power to call for an extra force, and which requires a representation from the magistrates before it can be sent, 859 men were sent, and I think the Committee might with profit note the smallness of the number of men who were considered by the local magistrates to be necessary as compared with the number that the Lord Lieutenant sent without their advice or request: 859 men were quartered on the 31st of December last, and on the 30th of June of the present year they had been reduced to 844. The authorities have also sent from the reserve force 91 extra men; and under the Prevention of Crime Act, which permits all the force to be levied upon the district, no matter how small, upon the 31st of December, 1883, there were 195, making a grand total of 3,421 extra men quartered on the 31st of December, in the greater portion upon the ratepayers, and with respect to 195 wholly so quartered. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the section of the Act of Will. IV., under which these quarterings have been made. Section 12, under which 859 were quartered, provides that in any case in which seven or more magistrates of any county, at any Petty Session, being a majority of magistrates present, shall certify to the Lord Lieutenant that the number of chief or other constables and sub-constables so appointed for any such county is inadequate for the due execution of the law, it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to appoint such further number of constables to such county as may be so certified to be necessary, and to remove such chief, or other constables and sub-constables, from time to time. There are some points in regard to the application of this section which we have no information upon, and I should be glad if it could be supplied to us in the course of the debate by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. In the first place, I am anxious to know the dates of the applications by magistrates for the extra forces in the different counties, whether they are of recent date or of late date, and what the practice of the Irish Executive has been in reference to the removal of such extra forces. There is no provision, and it appears to me to be a serious omission in the section, for the removal of this force which has been quartered on the application of the magistrates. It is left optional to the Lord Lieutenant to remove them as he thinks fit. It is very possible that the applications in some cases for these 950 men may have been of ancient date, and that they have been allowed to remain, possibly against the wishes of the local magistrates themselves. Then I come to the 13th section, under which the great bulk of the extra police in Ireland have been, and are still quartered, a moiety of the maintenance being levied on the ratepayers. This section provides that the Lord Lieutenant, by the advice of the Privy Council of Ireland, may declare by Proclamation—and I wish distinctly to direct the attention of the Committee to these words—that any county, city, or town, or barony, or half barony, or county at large, or any district that is, or are, in a state of disturbance and require an additional establishment of police, and thereupon the Lord Lieutenant may appoint such extra police as he may think proper, not exceeding so many in each district so declared to be in a state of disturbance. Well, Sir, it appears to me that the true meaning of this section is that there shall be an actual state of disturbance within the district to entitle the Lord Lieutenant to issue this Proclamation; but I doubt very much whether in respect of any of those counties where it has been made the issue of the Proclamation was originally justified; but if, in any case, this were so, that justification no longer exists. It is quite impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to say that any county or district in Ireland is at present in a state of disturbance, and consequently the original justification for the Proclamation has entirely ceased, and we are entitled to ask upon what ground this large force of extra Constabulary is still kept quartered upon the ratepayers throughout the country. Since the 31st of December there has been some slight reduction of the number of extra police. The figures on the 30th of June, 1884, as supplied to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, give for the extra men under the 13th section of the Act of Will. IV. 877, and for the extra men under Section 12—namely, those originally requested by the local magistrates, 849; for the extra men from the reserve, 86; and for extra men under the Prevention of Crime Act, 30. This last head is the only one which shows any material reduction—namely, from 195 to 30, leaving the total number of extra men quartered in the different districts under the enactments which I have explained, on the 30th of June, 1884, at the enormous figure of 2,827, or a reduction of 599 extra men in six months; a reduction which amounts to something like one man in every six. Now, I wish to refer to the cost of these extra men in the counties, and I find the total given in the Estimate as the cost of the extra men is £110,800. Under the Prevention of Crime Act there is £18,000, making the enormous sum of £128,800, which is levied violently, unconstitutionally, and, as we contend, illegally, and without the slightest local control, upon the Irish ratepayers. Now, Sir, it has been very much the custom with English Ministers, and particularly with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to allude to this amount of reduction which has been obtained by the tenants under the Irish Land Act; but I find that the reductions given by the Land Courts during the three years' working of that Act amount to £270,000. The Irish ratepayers consequently have to pay back to the Government for extra police half of the money which they have received in reductions. The Government having decided to despoil the landlords to the extent of £270,000 a-year under the working of the Land Courts for three years, in order to make themselves still more beloved in Ireland, they proceed to despoil the ratepayers by compelling them to pay a sum equal to half that sum for the cost of extra police. I stated a short time ago that I wanted to prove that there was nothing in the state of Ireland which required this extra force of police. Now, the fact is that the Government, having deliberately neglected at the last quinquennial period to raise the number of free men to the amount they were entitled to do by the Act, and having also raised a large number of extra men—having thus raised the total number of men authorized by Parliament from 10,636 to 13,456—now do not know what to do with them. They have no power under the law to distribute these 3,000 extra men as a free force, and they therefore distribute them as extra men, part of the cost of whom is to be paid by the localities. In view of the peaceable state of Ireland, which has now continued for two years, and in view of the Charges of the Judges, I maintain that if the Government still desire to keep up this swollen police establishment in Ireland they should apply to Parliament either for a Supplementary Estimate, or for an amending Act enabling them to make this charge upon the taxpayers. It is monstrous that it should be charged upon the districts. This matter affects nearly every county in Ireland. The county of Clare does not seem to have participated in the reductions made in some of the other counties between December, 1883, and June, 1884; indeed, it heads the list for the large number of extra men which, on the 30th of June, were still quartered in that county. I find that at a former period in 1883 there were 236 extra men quartered there under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant under the 13th section of the Act of Will. IV. There were in June last still 235 extra men, involving a charge on the ratepayers of that impoverished county of between £8,000 and £9,000. I find that at the first period in 1883 there were 33 additional Constabulary under the Prevention of Crime Act, and that the only reduction which was made in the county of Clare between the end of March last and the middle of this year has been in respect to these 33 men, the cost of the large force of 235 extra men being still left to be borne by the taxpayers of the county. I do not know whether any recent reduction has been made; I am now speaking from the most recent information I have received on the subject, some of which has been furnished to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland this morning. The free force to which that county is entitled is 328 men under the last distribution of the Lord Lieutenant. Therefore, there are very nearly as many extra men placed in this county as there are free policemen—that is to say, that the police force of the county Clare is nearly double the normal number. Let us turn to the state of the county, as disclosed by the Parliamentary Returns for the last quarter. I find that for the whole of county Clare—a very large county, containing a very considerable population of small farmers who have derived little benefit from the Land Act—in the whole of the county the number of outrages, exclusive of threatening letters, which I do not notice in matters of this kind, amounted to four. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman what justification there is for keeping up this swollen police force in that county in view of the Returns in reference to crime during the last 12 months? Well, now, another county which is very much imposed on is the county of Cork. In the East Riding of the county of Cork, on the 31st of December, 1883, there were altogether 185 extra men—11 extra men sent from the reserve force, and 174 men sent under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation. In this Riding of Cork there has been no reduction whatever made in the six months between December, 1883, and June, 1884. The same number of extra men that were quartered there on the 30th of June last are now quartered on the ratepayers at an annual cost to them of £7,500 for the half county. Well, now, Sir, in the East Riding of county Cork there were only three agrarian offences committed in the last quarter. This Riding is entitled to a free force of 422 men, so that the number of extra men is over one-third of the total of the free force. Going on to the West Riding I find that on the 31st of December, 1883, there were 143 extra men quartered, all under the 13th section, or Proclamation Section, of the Act of Will. IV. During the period of six months, up to the 30th of June, 44 of these extra men were removed, still, however, leaving the enormous and entirely unnecessary extra force of 99 men for this Riding, in which only six agrarian offences were committed during the quarter. I should also like to direct the attention of the Committee to Judge O'Brien's Charge to the Grand Jury at the recent Assizes in county Cork with reference to the state of the county. He says—

“So far as I can collect from the sources which are open to me, I am happy to state that the condition of this great county is one that very nearly justifies the description of entire and absolute quiet and security.”

He refers to a temporary small increase of crime since the last Assizes in the East Riding; but he goes on to say—

“I find that that small increase is more than balanced by a very large diminution of offences in the West Riding of this county, in the proportion of 68 reported offences.”

Of course, Judge O'Brien is speaking of all offences, agrarian and otherwise, which came before him—

“In the present year, as against 114 in the past year for the same period, and I find that this great decrease appears to be almost entirely in offences that tend to indicate by their diminution a restoration of social peace and tranquillity, and the absence of agrarian outrage in both Divisions of this county.”

He goes on to say—

“I observe as a most important feature of the change that has taken place the subsidence of almost all forms of intimidation, and an absence of all restraint on personal conduct,” and so on. Well, now, Sir, I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he does not intend to show his appreciation of this state of affairs in the county of Cork? Perhaps I had better not weary the Committee by going over the whole list of Irish counties; but, speaking generally, I may say that the list shows that there are extra men quartered in almost every county and city in Ireland. In county Donegal the number of extra men was not so large as it was in some other counties. In that county there were 100 extra men at the end of 1883, and they were quartered there at a cost to the ratepayers of over £2,000 a-year. Seventy of these extra men have been taken away in the six months which have elapsed since December, 1883, leaving 30 men still as an extra charge upon the district at a cost of nearly, according to the information in my possession, £1,000. In the East Riding of Galway there were 183 extra men on the 31st of December, 1883, there were now 145 extra men in that Riding, and during the last quarter there were only two agrarian offences, exclusive of threatening letters. The total cost of the extra men in this Riding during the year ending the 30th of June last was £5,800. In the West Riding of Galway there were on the 31st of December, 1883, 270 extra men, and on the 30th of June, 1884, there were 200 extra men quartered there under the Act of Will. IV. On the 31st of December last there were in the same Riding 22 extra men under the 12th section of the Act of Will. IV.—that is under the magistrates' requisitions, and there were eight extra men on the same date sent from the reserve force. There were 70 extra men under the Prevention of Crime Act, making altogether an extra force in this one Riding of 300 men, or 12 men in excess of the free force establishment to which the Riding was entitled. Well, now, Sir, in the county of Kerry there were on the 31st of December, 1883, 11 extra men from the reserve force, and on the same date there were, under the 13th section of Will. IV., 196 extra men, and these numbers remain now practically unchanged, for the total number of extra men quartered in this county on the 31st of December was 207, and the total number of extra men now quartered there was 203, or a diminution of only four men. These men involved a cost to the county of over £8,000 a-year. In his Charge to the Grand Jury of the county of Kerry on the 16th of July, Mr. Justice O'Brien said—

"The present condition of the county compares favourably with the past."

The county of Limerick was another very oppressed county in this respect. On the 31st of December, 1883, there were 235 extra men quartered, and that number has not been diminished in the six months ending the 30th of June, 1884; 235 extra men still remained in county Limerick, this county being entitled to a free force of 281 men. There were only six agrarian offences, all of them of a very trivial character, committed in the county of Limerick for the last quarter of which we have any Return. Judge Fitzgibbon, in addressing the Grand Jury of the county of Limerick on the 11th of July, said—

"There are altogether eight cases to go before you. There is one of manslaughter, but there does not appear to be any great difficulty in dealing with it. The other seven cases are simply for assaults. Having regard to the large population of your county, and the circumstances of your district, there is nothing on the face of the list requiring any observations from me."

The question of the extra police force of the City of Limerick has already been debated fully in this House, and I will not refer to it further. The county of Mayo on the 31st of December, 1883, had 50 extra men under the 12th section of the Act of Will. IV.—that is to say, requisitioned by the magistrates. On the same date, there were in the county 125 extra men under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation. Mayo does not appear to have had any men quartered upon it under the section of the Prevention of Crime Act. There were altogether at this date a total extra force in Mayo of 178 men. That force has been reduced in the period of six months to 112 men, involving a cost to the ratepayers for the year of nearly £4,500. For the last quarter in which we have any Returns, the number of agrarian offences in the county of Mayo only amounted to three—that is to say, the ratepayers of the county have been charged £1,500 for each agrarian offence committed during the quarter. The county of Sligo, on the 31st of December, 1883, had 50 extra men under the magistrates' requisition section. They had 45 extra men under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation, making altogether 95 extra men in this county—a force which was not reduced up to the 30th of June, 1884. The list of agrarian offences discloses only the small number of two for the last quarter, and the cost to the ratepayers of the county of Sligo for the extra men will amount to something like £4,000, or about £2,000 for each agrarian offence committed during the last quarter. In the North Riding of the county of Tipperary on the 31st of December, 1883, there were 114 extra men quartered under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation. That number was reduced on the 30th of last June to 94, involving an annual cost to the ratepayers of £3,760. In that Division of the county of Tipperary there were no agrarian offences during the last quarter. In the South Riding of the county of Tipperary there were 80 extra men quartered under the magistrates' requisition section of the Act of Will. IV. On the 31st of last December there was one extra man from the reserve, and there were 100 extra men quartered on the Riding under the 13th section of the Act of Will. IV.—that is to say, under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation, making altogether 181 extra men in the South Riding of Tipperary on this date. That number on the 30th of June was reduced to the number of 155. The 100 men under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation have been reduced to 75, and the extra man from the reserve has been taken away. The number of agrarian offences in the South Riding of Tipperary during the last quarter only amounted to four, while the cost to the ratepayers of the extra force amounted to something like £6,000 a-year, or, on the average, £1,500 for each agrarian offence. The offences, I notice, were of a very trivial character. Now I should like to direct the attention of the Committee also to the Charge delivered to the Grand Jury by the Judge who presided at the Tipperary Assizes. On the 8th of July the Lord Chief Justice, addressing a Grand Jury, congratulated them on the smallness of the Calendar, the disposal of which, he said, would not detain them very long. Westmeath is the next county on my list. I find on the 31st of last December there were 23 extra men quartered on this county upon the requisition of the magistrates. There were 63 extra men quartered there under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation, and one man was quartered upon the county under the Prevention of Crime Act. During the six months which elapsed from December last to June, the one man had been removed, so that the extra force of Westmeath still stood at 86 men. Now, I wish to direct the attention of the Committee to the case of some other counties which have always been regarded as quiet counties, and in the case of which there seems to be still less justification for the maintenance of extra police forces. Take the case of Meath. In December, 1883, there were 72 extra men quartered there under the 12th section of the Act of Will. IV., and three under the Prevention of Crime Act. There are now 52 extra men quartered in this county under the Act of Will. IV., at a cost to the county of something like £2,000. I should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could give me any information as to the date of the representations made by the magistrates with regard to those counties on the list where extra police are quartered under the 12th section of the Act of Will. IV.? I refer to the West Riding of Galway; to the county of Kilkenny, where 55 men are quartered under this section, and none under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; King's County, where 15 men are quartered under the provisions of the 12th section, and only 12 under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; Queen's County, where 15 men are quartered under the 12th section, and none under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; the county of Longford, where 34 extra men are quartered under this section, and only 22 under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; County Mayo, where 50 men are quartered under this section, and 60 under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; County Meath, where 52 extra men are now quartered under this section, and none under the Proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; the county of Kildare, where 18 men are still quartered from the reserve force by the Lord Lieutenant, but none under his Proclamation; the county of Louth, where 15 men are quartered under the 12th section, but none under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the county of Sligo, where 50 men are quartered under the 12th section, and 45 under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the South Riding of the county of Tipperary, where 80 men are quartered under the 12th section, and 75 under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the county of Waterford, where 16 extra men are quartered under the 12th section, and 50 under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the county of Westmeath, where 23 extra men are quartered under the 12th section, and 63 under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; Belfast, where 320 extra men are quartered under the 12th section by the desire of the magistrates or the Corporation, and none under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the county of Dublin, where 10 extra men are quartered under the 12th section, and none under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the county of Fermanagh, where 10 extra men are quartered under the 12th section, and none under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; the county of Monaghan, where 12 extra men are quartered under the 12th section, and none under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation; and the city or county of Londonderry, where 45 extra men are quartered under the 12th section, and none under the Lord Lieutenant's Proclamation. Now, Sir, I could go on indefinitely referring to the statistics on this subject; but I think I have proved enough to show that in almost every Irish county there is an extra force of police; that in every Irish county there is a very low Calendar of crime; that at all the Assizes the Judges were unanimous in their testimony to the peaceable condition of the different counties. The police force throughout Ireland generally is enormously swollen by the number of 2,800 extra men over and above the free force authorized by Act of Parliament. I think we are entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman for his justification of this state of things. I do not see how the Government can expect us calmly to pass this Estimate upon the Returns with which we have been presented—Returns showing that the condition of Ireland is absolutely normal as respects its tranquillity and freedom from crime. All the contentions upon which successive Chief Secretaries have justified the retention of extra police forces are entirely absent. In the present case it is impossible for us to allow this Estimate to pass without very strenuous protest and opposition, unless we hear something far more satisfactory than we have yet heard from the Government. The reduction of 500 and odd men which has taken place during the last few months out of the total force is entirely inadequate. There are several of the counties to which I have alluded which are amongst the most impoverished throughout Ireland. The county of Clare contains a very large population of very small tenant farmers. The county of Cork is also in a similar position; the county of Galway, where the police tax is also most crushing, is in a very impoverished state; the county of Kerry is notorious as being one of the most poverty-stricken counties in Ireland; the county of Limerick, the only rich county on the list where the force is very high, is remarkable for having been absolutely free from crime of any kind during the last two years; the county of Sligo is another impoverished county; and the county of Tipperary is at present, and has been for a considerable time, exceedingly quiet. I might go over the whole list and show, in the same way as I have abundantly done with respect to those counties, that there is not the slightest justification, even from the point of view of the Government, for the maintenance of this cruel tax resulting from the quartering of large extra forces of police upon the people. Three years ago the Predecessor (Mr. W. E. Forster) of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) informed the Committee, during one of the discussions which took place on this Vote, that in a short time he hoped to be able to hand over the police force to elective authorities in Ireland. The lapse of time which has taken place since then do not justify the prediction and hope of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster). Instead of the force being reduced, we have had it enormously increased. Apart from the hardship to the localities, and to the ratepayers who have to pay these crushing inflictions, the force in its character is absolutely unconstitutional. Eminent Constitutional lawyers, like the late Mr. Butt, have given it as their opinion that the maintenance of this police force in Ireland, an absolutely military force in its character, is a breach of the annual Army Discipline Act. Certainly, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary should tell us to-day that he proposes to diminish this extra force by at least one-half during the next six months, and that he hopes within the subsequent period of six months to dispense with it altogether.

If we do not receive some assurance of that kind, the action which will have to be taken by the people of Ireland and by their Representatives is a matter which will have to be very carefully considered. The rates for extra police are now levied by the Grand Juries, bodies absolutely without any particle whatever of a representative character. If in any district the Grand Jury refuse to levy the rate, there is the Judge's fiat to compel them to do so; and if they then refuse to levy the rate, there is the further order of the Queen's Bench; in fact, the whole levying of the extra police is beset with a series of cast-iron enactments which might do credit to an age of barbarism and a rule of despotism, but which are certainly out of place on the Statute Book at the present time. For our part, we shall not cease to protest against these enactments; and, as I have just said, in the absence of any satisfactory assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, it will become a matter for serious consideration whether the collection of this oppressive tax cannot be prevented by the organized action of the people of Ireland. We have from the glowing pen of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) himself some very significant and good advice upon the subject. The taxes, the refusal to pay which was referred to by the right hon. Gentleman in terms of approval, were taxes levied upon the people by the Representatives of the people in Parliament, so far as the people were then represented; but these taxes are not levied upon our people by Parliament; they are levied by an irresponsible clique in Dublin Castle, some of whose iniquities have recently been brought to light by the exertions of my hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien). I have no doubt that the distribution of these extra police amongst the unhappy counties I have referred to depended very much upon the Reports of the notorious person whose conduct is now the subject of examination by the Dublin Police Court sitting in camera. I have no doubt that if the system could be further examined into, and I trust that a long time will not elapse before an opportunity may be found of examining into the system which obtains in Dublin Castle—I have no doubt that if the system were further investigated and examined into, we should find that the action of the Irish Executive was directed and depended upon the advice of men very little better in character and position than that of the Government officials, whose conduct so recently became the subject of criminal investigation. So long as you rule Ireland by a centralized system of Government at the dictation of a group of permanent officials in Dublin Castle the possessors of swollen and enormous salaries, whose existence necessarily depends on keeping up a state of alarm in the minds of the English people and Parliament with regard to the condition of Ireland, so long you will find it is impossible for you to rule her justly, and that it will continue impossible for you to escape the complaints and the criticisms which we have been compelled to direct against you and against your system of administration during the present Session, and so long will the administration of Ireland by England and by the ring in Dublin, who have got possession of that administration, be a subject of reproach amongst the peoples of the civilized world. I beg to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £100,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I propose, in replying to the considerable number of Gentlemen who have spoken upon a subject of such interest to Ireland, to go through their speeches consecutively, and to come last to the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who spoke with an amount of statistical preparation that deserves special notice. While, however, the last words he spoke are still ringing in our ears, I cannot but enter my protest against them. The hon. Member said that he considered that it was very likely that if some leading officials in Dublin Castle had their conduct examined, their characters would stand little higher, I think he said, than the characters of the two people connected with different parts of the government of Ireland, one of them not connected with Dublin Castle at all, who have been accused of very great crimes indeed. Sir, it is quite plain that if the hon. Member has evidence of that fact, he ought to produce it. I must call the greatest attention to this, because it is a very serious matter. Everybody knows very well who the Lord Lieutenant and myself are advised by in high matters of criminal and police administration. If the hon. Member has evidence against any of the persons who are well known to advise us, that evidence ought to be produced in a Court of Law.

MR. PARNELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give me a Select Committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the whole system of criminal investigation in Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: This is not a question of the criminal system of Dublin Castle; it is a question whether a singularly odious imputation, which I am inclined to think the hon. Member does not feel the full gravity of, ought to be made without evidence against any people, whether they are members of the Irish Administration or whether they are private individuals. The first hon. Gentleman who addressed the Committee was the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), and the particular point to which he referred in connection with this question was the protection of a certain landlord, a Mr. Coote. The hon. Gentleman said Mr. Coote was an extremely unpopular landlord, and he asks if we uphold him and the system he adopts towards his tenants. We neither uphold Mr. Coote nor the system of his dealings with his tenants; his dealings are not, as a matter of fact, a subject for consideration by the Executive Government. What we did was to give him such protection as his safety required. It is certainly a very unfortunate thing that these relations between landlords and tenants should have existed in Ireland, and that so much evil should have come out of them; but if one consequence of them is that the life or the limb of any individual, be he landlord or tenant, is in danger, it is plainly the business of the Executive to afford them protection. I may say with regard to the question of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), respecting the police of Limerick, there is some prospect that at no distant date there may be a reduction of the extra police quartered in the county.

MR. PARNELL: To what extent?

MR. TREVELYAN: To the extent that safety will allow. I hope hon. Members will think I do my best to reduce the number of extra police whenever I can. I now come to the review of the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum). Kilkenny is a county in which the Lord Lieutenant has had no direct concern with the police. In Kilkenny there are extra police, because they were asked for originally by the magistrates. The hon. Member (Mr. Marum) says the number of police ought to be reduced on account of the suffering of agriculture and the overburdened rates of the county. Well, Sir, I do not think that on that account alone Kilkenny has any special right to a reduction of its local burdens, which reduction would mean throwing the expenses on the general taxpayer. There has very recently been a reduction of 15 extra police in Kilkenny. The extra police in that county are now 55 in number, so that that county, a rich county, and a prosperous county agriculturally, compared with a great number of the English counties which have to join in paying the taxes out of which these police would be paid for if they were not paid for by the county of Kilkenny—that county is only burdened to the extent of about £2,200 or £2,300 a year. If the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) would take an English agricultural county of the same rating as Kilkenny, a county in which the agricultural industry is the same as in Kilkenny, he will find that that county would be glad, and glad many times over, if its contribution to the police of the county only amounted to £2,300. I am bound to say there is no county in England which stands in the same position pecuniarily as Kilkenny, which has not to pay at least twice as much for its police; and, therefore, I think it would be extremely hard if the English counties were to be called upon to pay for the extra police required in Kilkenny. The hon. Member may say that these 55 extra police are not required. It was not the Lord Lieutenant who placed them there of his own accord; he placed them there on the application of the magistrates. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) asks on what date these applications of the magistrates were made? On that point I am quite ready to call for a Return; they are, for the most part, of considerable standing, because the present number of the police, generally speaking, represent what the magistrates, who are responsible for the quiet and peace of the country, consider ought to be the nominal force of the country. In the case of Kilkenny, however, the application was made in 1882. I have only made a general observation, because, whether they are of long or short standing, the magistrates, I feel sure, would listen to the general opinion of the country; and, at any rate, whatever their own opinion might be, the Government most certainly would listen very attentively to the opinions of the magistrates upon a subject of this kind. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) began his speech by referring to the City of Limerick, and he said we had increased the police force there in 1882 on account of the riotous state of the town, and yet we had obtained no convictions; we had not brought any prisoners either before the Petty Sessions magistrates, or before the Assize Judges. Well, Sir, that is not the case. I say that in the case of almost every riotous disturbance that is recorded in Limerick there was some conviction more or less important. But that in itself is not all, because the main cause of the bringing extra police into Limerick in 1882 was the general riotous state of the streets, and the danger in which policemen would be who were either patrolling singly, or patrolling at too great a distance from their nearest comrade. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) says that the state of things in Ireland is so oppressive that he almost expects, or at any rate hopes, that the English people themselves will rise up and put an end to it. Sir, I am not quite certain whether it is altogether judicious to call the attention of the English people to the question of police in Ireland. I have got the figures here which are taken from the last published Criminal and Judicial Statistics—namely, those published in 1883 for the year 1882.

Mr. HEALY: The English people control their police.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I am aware of the main arguments of hon. Members from Ireland upon this question; but I was speaking about the financial state of Ireland, to which the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) referred. I find that in England the total cost of the police was £3,264,000; of that the proportion paid by the localities is £1,985,000—that is, 1s. 6d. per head is paid by the population of England towards the maintenance of their police. In Scotland the cost of the police is £331,000, and £197,000—that is to say, 1s. 1d. per head of the population is paid for the maintenance of the police by the localities. In Ireland the total cost of the police in 1882 was £1,452,000. The part paid by the people was £124,000—that is to say, 6d. per head of the population. Since then the total cost of the police in Ireland has somewhat risen; and I take it that the part paid by the community has risen to such an extent that probably it comes to 7d. per head. I cannot see that that represents a state of things which would excite the overwhelming indignation of the people of England if it were brought before them. Well, now, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) has just suggested one argument bearing upon this question; but there is another which, of course, every hon. Member on those Benches feels the force of, and that is that though Ireland pays extremely little for the cost of her police the cost is very unequally distributed. If it were 7d. per head for the whole of Ireland that was paid towards the cost of the police, the tax would not be so severely felt, and I allow that 7d. per head grows to be considerably more in the counties which are specially taxed; but in only one case does the police tax amount to anything like what it does in English counties; in no part of Ireland, except in the City of Dublin, is the payment at all equal to that of an ordinary English county or an ordinary English town; still, undoubtedly, in many places it is considerably more than 7d. per head. The hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Cork (Mr. Deasy) referred for a time to the police for the City of Cork. He stated that Captain Plunkett had 20 detectives on his staff. Well, Sir, he has not 20 detectives on his staff; he has nine; and these detectives are not paid for by the City. I explained the other day that the hon. Member labours under a misapprehension with regard to the police question in the City of Cork; no exception is made and no more of the police force are charged for than those on duty.

MR. DEASY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Captain Plunkett stated before a Committee of the Cork Corporation, a few weeks back, that he had 22 detectives on his staff?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not aware of it. Captain Plunkett has nine detectives quartered at Cork, and those are not paid for by the City. If there are any other detectives besides, they would be used for purely local purposes, and they would be as much local policemen as any other of the local staff. The nine detectives who are there, are there for the purpose of providing for the general safety of the Kingdom by preventing the importation of dynamite, and checking the arrival of dangerous men from America; but, as I have said, they are not charged to the City. The hon. Member (Mr. Deasy) asked me for an assurance that meetings would not be interfered with this year. On that point I can speak very positively to this effect, that our interference or non-interference depends upon those who call the meetings together. If meetings are called together in places where there are "Boycotted" farms in any number, and places where outrages directed against special persons are really apprehended, and places where special persons would be put, for some reason, in fear of their lives, the Irish Government would have to act up to its now somewhat long-established principle of action. It is impossible to allow meetings to be so announced, so placarded, and so conducted as to interfere with the civil rights of individuals by putting them in terror of life or limb. Those parts of the country in which that is likely to be the case are now few, I am glad to say; and most certainly, so far as ordinary political excitement is concerned, the Government is of opinion that such excitement is rather healthy than unhealthy. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, that is my opinion; and I think it is borne out by my speeches. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) explained to us that during his election, which he said was an election exciting a good deal of interest in the town, no outrage or rioting took place. Our general experience in Ireland, as elsewhere, is that well-contested elections, whether they are for municipal or Parliamentary purposes, are times when the worst passions of the people are merged in the great flood of healthy and legitimate excitement in which the population are involved. So far as that is the case with elections, it is the case with meetings which are held for purposes of getting up political feeling, and not for the purpose for which some meetings have been held in certain parts of Ireland, of putting pressure upon the minds of particular individuals. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) said he considered the number of the free force was too many, and he asked for Returns from the different counties. I will see whether the Return for which the hon. and gallant Member asks can be given. I have got a little Return here which shows that the difference between the regular normal force and the real force is about 5 per cent. The hon. and gallant Member thinks that Galway is badly used in this particular. Well, Sir, that is not the case. The free force in each of the Divisions of Galway is in one case 288, and in the other 289 men, while the normal strength is 266 and 268 men; so that Galway preserves, as nearly as possible, the actual average. I am glad to inform him that Galway is a county in which there have been pretty considerable recent reductions of the extra force. The force has recently been reduced in the East Riding from 173 to 145, and in the West Riding it has recently been reduced from 220 to 200. There are still a certain number of people under protection in the West Riding; but the Riding is becoming steadily more peaceable, and further reductions may be hoped for at no very distant period. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) asked a question about the attendance of shorthand writers with the police at meetings—a matter which shall receive my almost immediate attention. I should be very glad if the police authorities could be induced to see that, at large open meetings attended by Members of Parliament, shorthand writers could be dispensed with, for this appears to me one of the relics of a more turbulent state of things which we may hope has passed away. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Sullivan) has spoken with some severity of the Government, because they allowed a witness to come back to the country where he had been living, and then sent a police force to protect him. The hon. Member applied to that person very strong, though possibly not undeserved, language, though I must say I think he should have applied it to those persons who were convicted by that man's testimony. He described him as a pet of the Government, and as a very valuable individual. Now, Sir, I must say that I think it would have been a most arbitrary stretch of power for the Government to say where a man should or should not live; and if he lives where he chooses to live, I must say that I think he has as much right to our protection as every other citizen. The hon. Member has asked me whether a particular lady—a Miss Thompson—profits by the protection of the police. I have been asked that question before, and it shall not go without an answer. I regret to say that I have known some other instances where a person does profit owing to the attendance of the police. As to the presence of extra police being an encouragement to bad landlords, that would carry the hon. Member very much further than he probably meant to go. In the first place, the relations between landlord and tenant have now been placed upon such a footing that, except in comparatively rare cases, a man can hardly show himself a bad landlord.

Mr. HEALY: There are 100,000 leaseholders.

Mr. TREVELYAN: I said in the majority of cases. In the next place, it is an extremely dangerous principle to lay down that you are not to keep the number of police—the force which the law requires—in order to enforce the law, because certain individuals may strain the law. I cannot imagine any doctrine which would lead to a more perfect state of lawlessness, upheld by the moral sanction of the people. Whether a man strains it or not, the law is still the law; and you cannot accuse the police, who are required to enforce the law, because it is put by some people to a use which you would not wish it to be put to. The hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) has asked for the number of extra police under all heads; but I think that in some respects the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has relieved me from that task. At the same time, I shall be glad to provide the hon. Member for Ennis with any papers or particulars that he may wish for. They lie in a narrow compass, and half-an-hour's reading will put him in possession of the facts. The hon. Gentleman has asked what is the present position of Mr. Jenkinson, and whether he is paid out of this Vote. During the last few months Mr. Jenkinson has been much in London, guarding the public from the attacks which have been made upon them. The very serious case which was brought to an end yesterday proves that these attacks are not imaginary. Now that the case is over, I may say that it is impossible for anyone to read the scientific evidence as to the effect produced by these bombshells without feeling sure that they were meant for murder, and that they could not be used for any other purpose, and murder of the most terrible sort. Anyone who reads this evidence cannot fail to see that the men who use these weapons are terrible enemies, and Mr. Jenkinson's duty in London has been to enable the Government to meet these enemies with success. But Mr. Jenkinson is paid out of the Civil Service Vote, and not out of the Vote now before the Committee.

Mr. KENNY: Will he for the future be paid out of the Irish Establishment, or will he be paid out of the English Votes? Will he be sent back to Ireland?

Mr. TREVELYAN: He is, of course, on the Irish Establishment at present; but his ultimate position will have to be arranged between the Irish Government and the Home Office. The hon. Member has asked about Mr. Clifford Lloyd—whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd's position, as defined by the Secretary to the Treasury, is to be modified by the withdrawal of the Magistrates (Ireland) Salaries Bill? Sir, what was stated by the Secretary to the Treasury was stated, if I may use the expression, baldly, without any other circumstance being mentioned. The fact of the matter is this—it is the intention of the Irish Government that all appointments to these Divisional Magistracies shall henceforth be made from the ranks of the officers of the police, and Mr. Clifford Lloyd does not belong to that Force. The hon. Member for Ennis asks me to explain the cause of the increase of the Estimate; but I must say that I am almost afraid to say anything to meet his wishes, because on one occasion, when I made a speech explaining an increase in the Estimate in the case of the Vote for Law Charges, the hon. Member for the City of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), in a very bright speech of his own, charged me with having made a discursive and rambling speech, although I kept very closely indeed to the Estimate. The principal cause of the increase in pay arises out of the Act 46 & 47 Vict., which was passed by Parliament last year, and is caused by the lodging and bait allowances, which were granted pursuant to the recommendation of a Committee of Inquiry, and which formed part of the elaborate financial statement which I made to the House on a previous occasion. The principal decreases are in extra pay and in travelling expenses, owing to the country being in a more settled condition. A great deal, however, occurs on the item of rent of barracks. Actually the amount paid has risen by £400; but I apprehend that the very great decrease in the rent arises simply from the fact that the police have now ceased to pay the 1s. a-week which they did pay by way of rent for their quarters. The hon. Gentleman referred to the case of Sub-Constable Carroll, which was certainly a very singular and curious case; but a case in which the Grand Jury, so far as I can gather, are absolutely responsible. It is not a case for the Executive Government at all, except so far as we might adopt the recommendation of the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. O'Shea), and issue a Circular to inform police constables that they must not keep large sums of money about them in the expectation of being compensated by the Grand Jury. Whether there is sufficient likelihood of such cases recurring to make such a Circular necessary I do not know; but if such a case did recur, and no such Circular was issued, I should feel a little guilty towards the locality that had to pay. I now pass on to the hon. Member for Clare, who asks me whether there is any chance of the number of protection huts in Clare being diminished. I am glad to be able to inform the hon. Member that there has been a very substantial reduction recently in Clare. As to the instances in reference to which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has provided statistics, I may say that those statistics are not up to the very latest date, and I take all blame to myself for that; but within the last few days the number of extra police has been reduced from 235 to 200.

Mr. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the sum paid for them was over £9,000?

Mr. TREVELYAN: I said at the beginning that this was a very important point, and that I believed there were counties in Ireland where considerable reductions might be made. If the force in Clare is still somewhat in excess—and I take the hon. Member's word for that—I cannot hold out the same hopes of further reduction as in other counties, because there have been rather serious outrages in Clare within the last month, and the state of the district is very decidedly disturbed. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) inquires as to the extra police at Waterford, and he is evidently under the impression that they are still at the number at which they were recently put. But the police have been reduced to about 68 from all sources—16 from one source and 20 from another. He asks me on what information they were originally sent down there. It was upon the information of the Special Resident Magistrate that they were sent, and they have been reduced upon the recommendation of the same gentleman, who is now a Divisional Magistrate. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) began with an allusion to the grievance of that City. Sir, I stated that I was very anxious to take into consideration the opinion of the Corporation of Cork. Their view was that the City requires 170 police. Some hon. Gentleman—I do not remember who—said that, in his opinion, that was in consequence of some misstatement, or some misrepresentation; but their statement is that their City requires 170 men, and we should have to weigh their opinion most carefully. If they think it requires 170 men to do the duty, then I must say that a great community like Cork does not labour under a great pecuniary grievance, whatever may be their grievance in not having the control of the police, in having to pay for 10 extra police—a moiety of 20—at a cost of between £800 and £1,000 a-year. The hon. Member, speaking of the Proclamation under which the police were sent down, states that he doubts whether any Proclamation was justifiable. But it must be remembered that these Proclamations were made, for the most part, in the years 1881 and 1882, when the country was in a state of very great and dangerous excitement, and when there was a very great amount of crime. During the period of the late Government and of the Government before it the Police Force of Ireland was 9,800 men or thereabouts, and the outrages were very few; but when the outrages grew up to the enormous numbers of 1881, 1882, and 1883, the additional police were all required—they were necessary to preserve the peace of the country. The hon. Member for the City of Cork has compared the amount gained in the reduction of rents with the amount paid for extra police; but the hon. Member, when dealing with the reduction of rents, only gave us the figures of the reductions obtained by the fixture of fair rents. I always claim to have added to them the reductions made under agreements, and these two come together to considerably over £500,000; and I am inclined to think that at least as much more—hon. Members opposite would say very much more than that—is due to the indirect operation of the Land Act, and if we make the comparison in that way, I should say that at the very least the Land Act has put 10 times as much into the pockets of the farmers, in the shape of reduced rents, as has been taken out to pay for extra police.

MR. PARNELL: It was not the Land Act that did that.

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member has so completely confined himself to the operations of the Land Act, that I naturally gave the Land Act credit for it. Now, the hon. Member, in his appeal to the Committee, has entirely left out of sight one most important question, with regard to which I have not heard a single word said to-day, and that is the question of the police pensions. It must be remembered with regard to these pensions—of which we heard a good deal yesterday, when they supplied an argument or a comparison with the pensions of the National School teachers—that, while in England the State contributes nothing at all of any sort or kind, in Ireland it contributes everything.

MR. HEALY: Shame! Give them nothing.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am stating a financial fact. I am not quite sure to which country that expression applies; but, as I have already stated, this matter has not been mentioned before to-day, although it greatly reduces any grievance which Ireland may have against the payment of the extra police. The moment the extra policeman is taken off, the county pays nothing for him—it gets rid of him entirely—but, in England, a moiety of every policeman is paid for by the locality, and his pension is paid for by the locality alone. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has asked what we are going to do with the reduction of the police? The hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) did the same, and both hon. Members gave vent to something approaching to a serious menace in the shape of a sort of appeal to the Irish people not to pay police tax. But I think that even those hon. Members will confess that if you reduce the police too suddenly and too entirely in all the counties in Ireland, you would give rise to a state of things which would compel an increase of the police tax. I would never for a moment consent to the immediate total reduction of the extra police in such counties as Kerry or Clare. I should consider it most wicked to do so, both for the sake of those counties immediately, and for the sake of the peace of Ireland in the future. But the Government have been, and are, anxious to take advantage of the improved state of the country, and to reduce the police in a fair proportion. The hon. Member has stated, with perfect accuracy and fairness, the amount of the reduction that has been made in the last six months. The net reduction in the number of the police during that period has been about 475, counting those in Clare, of which the hon. Member was not aware. The extra police have been reduced at the rate of about 80 a month—I wish I could say that during the last month the outrages had fallen off quite in the same proportion. Well, Sir, at such frequent intervals do I consider it my duty to write around to the Resident Magistrates and ascertain what reductions can be made, that even since these figures, from which I was enabled to provide this Return, came in, I have been told of four counties where there are hopes of reduction, and all round Ireland the authorities are constantly looking about to see what reductions can be made. At this moment it is hoped that almost directly we may reduce all the extra police in Donagal, all the extra police in King's County, and make a substantial reduction of 25 in Sligo, and of 20 in Tipperary. If the police can be reduced in this way—not doing it for dramatic purposes; not for political purposes; not in such a manner as to spare six or eight hours' debate upon the Estimates, and a disagreeable Division at the end of it; but doing it conscientiously and practically, and with reference to the state of each given locality where the reduction is made—I can see that at the end of the next six months there would be a very substantial relief to the ratepayers of Ireland. I can say for myself that I will spare no exertion to see that these reductions are kept up to the very maximum which we can induce the local police authorities to agree to. Further than that I certainly cannot go; for, in the first place, I am of opinion that to run the risk of burdening again the taxpayers of the country by any renewal of the state of agitation and lawlessness which before existed in Ireland would be extremely wrong; and, in the next place, I am very much struck by the small price which the Irish people are called on to bear for the police of the country as a whole.

MR. HEALY : Cannot the right hon. Gentleman give us the relative figures for England, Ireland, and Scotland?

MR. TREVELYAN : I will directly. I am very anxious, I repeat, to reduce the police; but I cannot do it at the risk of any renewed agitation or disturbance. Another motive which governs me is that I conceive it would be a most terrible confession, both for rulers and ruled, if the alienation between the two countries should be so complete that we could not hope to return to the same state of law, order, and goodwill that existed before the occurrence of the outrages and crimes of 1881 and 1882. Sir, the figures which have been given to me are taken from the Criminal and Judicial Statistics for the year 1882, when the total cost of police in England and Wales was £3,264,000, of which £1,985,000 was paid by the localities—that is to say, about 1s. 6d. per head. In Scotland the total cost was £331,000, of which £197,000 was paid by the localities; and in Ireland the cost was £1,452,000.

MR. PARNELL : What is the sum this year?

MR. TREVELYAN : I have not got the figures; but it will be more than that. A sum of £94,000 was paid for extra police in the country, and £50,000 in Dublin. I should think that £144,000 would be about the amount.

MR. PARNELL : The statement in the Estimates does not refer to the Dublin police?

MR. TREVELYAN : No.

MR. PARNELL : What is the amount for Dublin?

MR. TREVELYAN : About £51,000; and my impression is that it is about £94,000 for the counties.

MR. HEALY : What we want to get at is this—is the county and City of Dublin included in this?

MR. TREVELYAN : They are not.

MR. PARNELL : Then you add these?

MR. TREVELYAN : By adding the three items together it would come to £180,000.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, there was one point that the Chief Secretary did not touch upon in that part of his speech in which he expressed his desire to lower the tax now levied upon the ratepayers, and that was the number of men short upon the Establishment. He (Colonel King-Harman) had called the attention of the House to this subject at various times by Questions and in other ways; but he had never been able to get a satisfactory reply from the Government. Not only he, but others had also called attention to this question without getting any satisfactory answer. He understood that in December 1882, the free force, so called, was 630 men short, and the extra force for which the country had to pay was 3,426. That number had now been reduced to 2,827; but he had not been told what state the free force was in. If it was 600 men short at the present moment, as he believed it was, why was not the country—why were not the ratepayers—credited with those 600 men; why did not the Government give the country their full free force, and reduce the extra men by 600? That was to say, why did not the Government reduce the extra police by about one-fourth? To him it seemed they were entitled to have a free force of 10,000 men; but instead of having that number they only got 9,000, and yet the Government charged them for the full 3,000 extra men. He thought they ought to have their full free force before they were charged for an extra force.

Mr. HEALY said, he was sure the Irish Members below the Gangway were extremely glad to receive the support the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) had given them. He thought that when Gentlemen in the position and holding the politics of the hon. and gallant Gentleman supported them, it was time for the Government to consider whether this grievance was not one that should be seriously looked into, especially when it was evident from the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman that there was no privilege at stake. They were told that it required a certain number of police to keep down crime and outrage; and although they were entitled to a certain number under the Act of Parliament, they did not get them, and he was sure that the Irish people would be as satisfied with coercion by a free force as being coerced by a force for which they had to pay extra. That was a contention that every Conservative could support as well as every Nationalist, and it was astonishing that the Government should act in the way they were doing. He trusted that the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) would be read by the narrow-minded landlords throughout the country, for it really proved that it was not in the interest of the landlords to go on maintaining a force that ought to be paid for out of the British Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman opposite used a very remarkable sentence when he said he would make a maximum reduction if he could induce the local police authorities to agree. But what did that mean? It meant that they were altogether in the hands of the local landlords; the local landlords would "Boycott" them and their wives and families unless they did as they were required. The Police Inspector would not be asked to the landlords' dinner, and the magistrates' wives and daughters would not be able to stretch their legs under the landlords' mahogany. Now they had had the sensible and clear speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman he was sure the stupid landlords would begin to see they had no particular interest in allowing the country to be swindled on the present system, and would cease to "Boycott" the local magistrates and local Inspectors of police if they made the recommendations that the Government said they would appeal for. This was entirely a matter which was dependent on the local feelings of the landlords. If the landlords would now be induced to see, from the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, that the free force was quite sufficient to get them their rents, they would at once have recommendations from all the little landlords throughout the country, recommendations coming up from them that the free force might be relied on, so that expense should be saved, and they would thus have very valuable results from the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. But if that was not the case, he would put this point to the Government. If the Government still persisted in keeping up the paid free force he would put this case. At present the expense of the force was thrown entirely upon the county cess, as there was much more likelihood that people would strike against the poor rates than the county cess. The poor rates involved a vote, and the people had always been recommended to pay their poor rates in order that they might have a vote. In his opinion, however, this charge ought to fall on the poor rates and not on the county cess, more especially as the landlord paid half the poor rate. The landlord was the person who wanted these extra police, and it was therefore monstrous that the people should have to pay that out of the county cess. If it was thrown upon the poor rates, and the landlords having to pay half the rate, and not now being able to raise the rents as they used to do, the landlords would be much more careful in asking for these extra police when they knew they would have to pay half the cost. He would ask the Government to consider, if there were not to be a stand against this extra police tax, and in view of the unfair amount that the people had to pay, whether they would not change the incidence of the tax to the poor rate, which the people had a clear incitement to pay in view of obtaining the vote, and which was an incitement to the landlords not to call for extra police because they would have to pay some trifle of the money themselves? It was very remarkable that the Government should rely solely on the demands of the magistrates in these instances. The hon. Member for the County of Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) referred to that, and stated that the Government would be willing to listen to what the magistrates had got to say. Of course, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman just admitted it was on the demand of the magistrates the extra police force was given, of course on the demand of the magistrates that force would be reduced. It had been said that the landlords were out of the country, but he believed that if every one of them were out of the country there would be more peace and order than there was at present. The landlords in the country were the chief cause of the crime, disorder, and outrage that prevailed; the magistrates, therefore, being the sole fount of opinion the Government had to go to, the Government could only expect the one reply, so long as it cost them not one single penny to saddle the people with this extra police force. Let them get some other advice in Ireland besides these interested parties. Where were the people to come in in this matter? There were 5,000,000 of people in the country and about 100,000 officials; the 5,000,000 counted for nothing, and the 100,000 officials counted for everything. Had not the time come, therefore, when the people should have some assurance on this matter? As had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, he hoped they should come back to the time when there might be pleasant relations between England and Ireland, but how could they have those pleasant relations when the people were entirely unconsulted on these matters? Take, for instance, the way in which Captain M'Kernaghan was treated after Francis Hines was hanged. He was removed from the County Fermanagh because he gave decisions against the Orange interest. He was "Boycotted," and he was now scarcely received by a single magistrate in the country. Such things exercised an enormous pressure upon the minds of these people. These local officials were obliged to go in accordance with the opinion of the local hierarchy, the landlords; therefore, when the Government asked for the opinions of the officials they were only getting the opinion of the magistrates themselves, not the opinions of the people of the country. The Government to-day had also drawn attention to the extraordinary generosity of the Government towards the police in the matter of pensions. There was also a Police Bill before the House to give pensions to the police of Scotland. But did the Irish Members wish to pension the Irish police? Not a bit of it. Cut the pensions off to-morrow and ask for their support, and they would be most joyfully gambolling to the Lobby to support the Government. They spoke of the high amount they paid per head to what they paid in Ireland. Was that the Irish Party's fault? If the Government increased the wages and the pensions, the Irish Members did not ask them to do it. No, it was because the police struck, and would have turned their bayonets against the Government. It was a condition of things brought about entirely by the Government. They paid the Irish police extravagant sums and gave them pensions, and then said that in England they only paid 8*s.* or 10*s.* in the pound, whilst in Ireland it was 3*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. He was surprised that the Government should resort to that kind of logic. If they wished to make a proper comparison between England and Ireland, they must put in force the system that prevailed in England. He thought a great deal of weight would be attached in Ireland to the remarks of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) with regard to this free force. The fact that the country was paying £180,000 per annum for police they did not want and could not control, would be taken into serious consideration by the people of Ireland. The grievances of the people of Ireland were so cunningly glossed over by the Administration of the country, that it was hard to get at them. They had to peg away in that House for weeks and weeks, and months and months; and it was only now that they had succeeded in getting the facts of this free force out of the Government. Now that the people would know that in the City of Dublin alone they paid £50,000 a-year, and outside £130,000, he ventured to think that the Irish people would take this matter seriously to heart, and before long they would have such an outcry that the Government would be compelled to change the system.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wanted to draw the attention of the Committee for a few minutes to the cost of the Liberal Government in Ireland, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had made some remarks as to what happened, and endeavoured to show that the state of Ireland was never better than it was now. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was asking the Committee for a very large sum of money; he was asking for £1,440,000 for the Constabulary of Ireland, and had just had £146,000 for the Dublin Metropolitan Police. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought the right hon. Gentleman should have followed the example of his Predecessor, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), and should have given the Committee some information as to the state of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman gave absolutely no information as to the state of Ireland, and not a single Member of the Committee would be able to say whether the condition of the country was more favourable or less favourable than last year or the year before. Considering this sum was very large, considering it was an increase on last year, and considering that it had been, as far as he could recollect, the invariable practice of former Chief Secretaries always to give some information as to the social condition of Ireland, he certainly trusted that the Committee would not sanction this Vote without getting further information from the Government as to those points, because it appeared to him the design of the Government was perfectly obvious. They wished to go down to the country, to their constituents and followers in England, and point to the greatly improved condition of Ireland, to the almost total absence of crime, and then attribute that improvement to the ground of their remedial legislation. But what did they find from the speech of the hon. Member of the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)? They found there was an extraordinary diminution of agrarian outrage, having sunk, as they saw from the list of the last quarter, from four to nothing. The outrages during the last quarter were 130, of which 93 were threatening letters; and, of course, threatening letters were excluded from the calculation in considering Irish crime;

so that the state of Ireland, so far as agrarian crime was concerned, was really nought. Without agrarian crime, there was hardly any sort of crime in the country. The hon. Member for the City of Cork pointed out that, although the state of Ireland, so far as agrarian crime was concerned, was normal, or less than normal, the extra police who were being maintained in Ireland by the ratepayers, over this Vote for which the Committee was now being asked, amounted in number to 3,000 practically, and cost in money £180,000 over the Vote. That was what the hon. Member for the City of Cork had stated; but he should like to add an illustration for the advantage of the Committee, or anyone outside who might care to read it. The cost of the administration, in addition to the £50,000 for Dublin, and in addition to the £180,000 for extra police, should be put down at another £100,000, or nearly £100,000 for the expenses of their land legislation. That was the cost of the Liberal government of Ireland. That being so, he had the curiosity to get the Estimates for the last two years the late Government were in Office, and they were really worth the attention of the Committee. He would take the year 1878, at the same time asking the Committee to bear in mind what the Chief Secretary insinuated as to the condition of Ireland at that time. The Vote the Chief Secretary was now asking for was £1,500,000. The Vote which the late Government asked for was, in round numbers, £1,000,000. That was in 1878; so that there was now an increase over 1878 of £500,000. But the cost of the extra police in 1878 amounted to only £27,500, and the extra police in proclaimed districts was only £332. £27,000 in 1878 against £180,000 in 1884, after four years of Liberal Government. But the year 1879 was a still more favourable one. In 1879 he found—and this was the last year of Office of the late Government—the cost of the Constabulary in Ireland was again, roundly speaking, £1,000,000, no increase to speak of; and the extra police cost to the Irish people was less than the year before, being only £25,000, and the extra police in proclaimed districts was only £350. That was in 1878 and 1879, when, he ventured to state, the statistics of Irish crime, such as they had been favoured with to-day, were, if possible, higher than at the present moment. That was what the people of this country and the people of Ireland had to pay for the luxury of Liberal Government; an increase of £500,000 alone in the Constabulary Vote, and an increase of £160,000 in the cost of extra police; and yet, in the face of those figures, the Chief Secretary did not trouble to give to the Committee the slightest authentic information as to what were the Government's views of the state of Ireland; notwithstanding the extraordinary crisis Ireland went through two or three years ago, the right hon. Gentleman did not trouble to give the Committee the slightest information as to the state of Ireland from the records of Dublin Castle, or as to the policy the Government meant to pursue. The Chief Secretary did say that, so far as the reduction of the extra police was concerned, he had been looking it over calmly, and, perhaps, in four counties there might be some hope of a reduction.

MR. TREVELYAN: I said that for the last six months we had been reducing the number of extra men by 80 a month; that I could not name the reduction that would take place; but I named those counties in which the force had been reduced, and I have every hope of going on reducing the number for some time to come.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he apologized to the Chief Secretary if he did not hear him correctly, for there were some Liberal Members below the Gangway who carried on so loud a conversation that he had the greatest difficulty in following what the right hon. Gentleman did say. But he wished to put this to the Chief Secretary and the Committee. Seeing that the Session had nearly terminated, and that statistics were now before the House; considering that was the last opportunity they would have of ascertaining the state of Ireland before the Autumn Session, he should like the Chief Secretary, if he would so far trouble himself, to state to the Committee more comprehensively and more lucidly what was the exact state of Ireland with respect to crime, and what were the prospects of Ireland returning before long to a more Constitutional and more normal Government. The right hon. Gentleman who represented the borough of Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) said that the state of Ireland was repugnant to the English mind. So it was, and he (Lord Randolph Churchill) believed there was not a man on either side of the House who did not admit that the form of Government which they applied to Ireland was repugnant. Therefore, viewing the fact that the form of Government was entirely different from that of this country; viewing the utterances that the Liberal Ministry were continually using with respect to Ireland and the success of the present Administration; viewing all these things, and seeing the enormous contrast between the sums of money asked for by the late and the present Governments, he invited the Chief Secretary to give them some further information as to the state of Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that as the Chief Secretary did not rise immediately, he would like to draw attention to one point in connection with this extra police force—namely, that the taxation for extra police should only be put in force when the free force, to which the country was entitled, stood at its full complement. In the year ending March 31, 1883, they had voted £11,632,000 for the cost of the Constabulary in Ireland. Of that no less than £92,000 had been saved; but the saving was to some extent balanced by £33,000 of extra cost. The saving was, to a large extent, made out of pay and extra pay, the country being so quiet that there was no necessity to spend all the money that had been voted. But, in regard to extra money, fuel and light were stated as having cost nearly £5,000. The Committee ought to know how this large sum came to be required, the exact sum put down as being spent for these purposes was £4,894. Then, again, there was a large sum, £3,840, for arms and ammunition for the Constabulary; a great deal of the extra charge of £33,000 consisting of money put down for these purposes. It might be asked, why was it that when they had effected so large a saving on the previous year that the Government should charge the country anything in the shape of extra rates? As it was, the Government charge to the country, by way of extra rates, was £84,000. This question of over-estimating the cost of the police and charging the counties with extra rates was an important one, and he thought the system most unfair; and he should like to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant if there was any expectation that there would be a saving out of the £150,000, such as there had been last year. This over-drawing of accounts should be avoided as much as possible, because it was sure to lead to waste. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) should look after that matter very closely. The ordinary Estimate for arms and ammunition was £1,900, and yet the sum that had been expended in these things was £3,840. That could not have been needed by anything that had occurred in the country, and, to his mind, there had been extravagance and waste simply because Parliament had voted so much money. The House of Commons ought not to encourage this sort of thing by voting any larger sum than was likely to be actually needed.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he, for one, should be sorry to interfere with the charge made for extra police in any district where outrages were shown to have occurred; but he desired to point out how unfairly the existing system worked. In the county of Cork, in a district with which he was acquainted, the police force had been reduced below the necessary level, and the number of men at the station was the smallest number that could supply patrols, the strength being reduced to some two men, the rest being sent to some other county instead of the necessary number of extra men being sent from Dublin to such counties where the numbers might be short of the full establishment, or of what might be specially needed. Under a system by which men were taken from this or that county station to supply deficiencies elsewhere, the consequence was that patrolling ceased and outrages commenced, so that, in a little time, it might be necessary to send extra police, which would be charged on the district in which outrages might occur, owing to the number of police having been thus reduced. He thought the whole system of extra police, as had been well pointed out by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), required to be revised; and he certainly should support any proposal to reduce this Vote, for this reason and no other—that he did not object to making the districts pay for extra police where they were rendered necessary by outrages; but he did object to the rules being increased through the necessity of sending extra men to districts in which the stations had been denuded of their ordinary complement of men.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sorry to intervene between the Government and the statement they were about to make to the Committee, which he was sure was at the present moment in a state of nervous anxiety, that had been created by the reference made to another subject, to be discussed bye-and-bye. He felt assured that Her Majesty's Government would kindly pardon him for preventing them, by this interposition, from fulfilling the expectation of the last triumph they had prepared for themselves in the statement on that other matter they were desirous of submitting to the House. But, in spite of the anxiety of the Government to announce their victory, he must take leave to detain the Committee by a few remarks on an important question that had been brought before it by various Members for Irish constituencies. He could not think that this discussion had been particularly satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government. It had been characterized by what had been the main features of all the discussions they had had throughout the week on this question of the Irish Constabulary—namely, that all the facts and arguments were on one side, and all the miserable and shallow pretences on the other. There was, on the one hand, this remarkable fact, that they had had the Representatives of all sections of Irish opinion denouncing Her Majesty's Government, and they had had the Representatives of every constituency that was practically affected by the police tax rising up, and, in the names of their constituents, condemning that tax. They had had that tax denounced with equal fervour by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst), who was ordinarily one of the loyal supporters of the Government; and they had also had it reprobated by hon. Gentlemen on those (the Irish) Benches, who could scarcely be regarded as persistently loyal in the confidence they gave to Her Majesty's Government. Even the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), who almost invariably disagreed—and hotly disagreed—with the opinions expressed on those (the Irish) Benches, had concurred with them on that occasion, in bringing against Her Majesty's Government the charge that they had not deferred in any way to the wishes of the Irish people. The statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin agreed with that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst), that the Government ought to be compelled to pay for the large extra force with which they sought to charge the Irish people. He would now turn to another point—namely, that upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in dealing with the large amount the Irish people had to pay for the police, had indulged in one of his favourite answers to the arguments employed by the Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman had entered on what he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) could not but term a mischievous and foolish comparison between the respective payments of the English and Irish taxpayers. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that the conditions of the taxpayers in the two countries supplied a fair basis of comparison? The right hon. Gentleman was positively eloquent on the small amount per head paid by the people of Ireland as compared with those of this country. Let them take, for example, the case of the county of Galway. Let them just look at the large amount the people of the county of Galway had to pay—namely, £14,960. There were several other counties that had to pay equally large sums; and yet it was a fact that the Province of Connaught, which was called upon for such vast sums as compared with its actual resources, was a Province in which the people were in such a condition that they could not afford to pay so heavy a charge, many of them having to live in houses which had been frequently described as hardly fit for beasts. In that part of Ireland, in which the tenant farmers were scarcely above the position of labourers, they were, nevertheless, compelled to pay these exorbitant charges for the maintenance of the police employed by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to the interruptions which had come from those (the Irish) Benches, had asked what was the difference between the amount of crime that had to be dealt with under the late Conservative Government and that which had to be met by the present Liberal Administration? The question was, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought, sheer nonsense. The right hon. Gentleman said there was three times the amount of crime during some of the years in which the late Conservative Administration held Office.

Mr. TREVELYAN said, he had not made that statement.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman had said there was under the late Government sometimes as much crime as there was at the present moment in Ireland. Now, how did that statement agree with the very remarkable figures that had been brought before the Committee by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill)? The fact was that crime was three times less than it was during the last months of the late Administration; and yet, notwithstanding the decrease of crime there was the enormous increase of £500,000 in the amount charged for its repression. Let the Committee realize this—three times as little crime, and £500,000 more to pay in the shape of police taxation! He could not but think that the Government must be utterly unable to reconcile these two sets of figures. The noble Lord would be justified, when he went down to his constituents, in drawing attention to these bloated charges which a Liberal Administration were calling on the Irish people to pay. He would ask the Committee to recall the remarkable scenes they had lately witnessed in that House when the arguments of the Irish Members on the different questions they had brought forward had found acceptance in all parts of the House. These things showed that the exposures made by the Irish Members of what had been going on in Ireland were beginning to tell, and that the secret of Irish Government was ceasing to be a secret, but was rapidly becoming one of the common places of politics, the discussion of which must immediately precede a drastic reform. They had discussed, last night, the question of National Education in Ireland; and a great many English Members must have been astonished to find that there was such a system in Ireland as had then been disclosed. He remembered the famous boast that was said to have been made by the Minister of Education under Louis Napoleon. He said that when the clock struck a certain hour exactly the same lessons were being repeated in every school in France; and, in the same way, the so-called Board of Education in Ireland, consisting of men alien in every sense of the word to the Irish people, could say that, in spite of all the wishes and aspirations of the Irish population, at a certain hour of the day in every school in Ireland a particular system of education was being enforced. In regard to the police, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had had the courage to enter into a comparison between the treatment of the police, in the matter of pensions, in the two countries—England and Ireland. In doing that, he had left out of the question the great central fact that in England the Local Authorities had the control of the police, while in Ireland, as had been stated over and over again, they were simply and mainly a military garrison, neither controlled by the Local Authorities, nor wanted by the people. They were not required to keep the peace; they were not needed to preserve order; but were maintained as the only sanction to British rule—the sanction of subsidized bayonets.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have now to ask the Committee that as the discussion has lasted several hours, this Vote may be agreed to, and any further remarks upon it postponed until the Report, inasmuch as the House is in expectation of a statement upon an important matter as to which delay would be highly inconvenient.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he did not intend to stand for any length of time between the Committee and the statement about to be made by the Prime Minister; but he would remind the Committee that since 12 o'clock that day and down to within a very few minutes ago, hon. Members on the Irish Benches had been obliged to retail the grievances of their country in connection with the Constabulary Vote to almost empty Benches; but now the House had begun to fill they were asked to put aside these Irish questions, in order that the Prime Minister might announce the collapse of the Conference to an anxious and expectant audience. Not a Cabinet Minister had been present during the whole of the discussion on the Irish Constabulary Vote. During most of the time occupied by the exhaustive address by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the strength of the Liberal Party had varied between six and four Members, including the Representatives of Her Majesty's Government. That was the sort of attention the Imperial Parliament had been in the habit of giving to the statement of Irish grievances in that House; and now, after six hours of discussion carried on before empty Benches, when there was at length an opportunity of having something like a full House to listen to a debate on Irish affairs, the Premier suddenly and confidently came in and asked that the Irish question might be put off until the Report or some other period, in order that he might have the joy and satisfaction of telling his faithful henchmen that he had managed to wriggle out of the Conference. He asserted that the proceeding of the Government that day in interrupting the discussion of an important matter, under such circumstances, was a scandal which, however, was entirely in keeping with the worst spirit of their political conduct towards his countrymen. They had brought the Irish Members together at 12 o'clock on a Saturday, and had kept them for hours with no one to listen to their grievances, and when a number of hon. Members, excited by the rumours in the morning papers, came down to the House, the Prime Minister said—"Let us get rid of this Irish discussion; it can go on at any other time; nobody cares about it; but there is a House for me to glorify the Government, by telling it that the Conference has failed, and that the little game we have been playing for so many months has at length been successful." That conduct capped the insolence with which Her Majesty's Government had treated Ireland again and again throughout the Session, and he hoped his countrymen would look at it in its proper light and draw their own conclusions. They should be told that the Irish Members had been for six hours speaking to empty Benches, and that as soon as the House had begun to fill, Irish questions were to be shelved, in order that the Prime Minister might make a statement on Egyptian affairs.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should not attempt to discuss the question that was then before the Committee; as he thought that the particular point raised in connection with the Constabulary Vote had been pretty well exhausted; but there were other points to be raised in relation to that Vote, which would not be decided by the Division they were about to take. He wished, therefore, to ask the Government whether they would not make the Report of that Vote the First Order some day next week, so that the points he had alluded to and which had not been dealt with, or referred to in the most remote degree might be discussed in a reasonable manner? He had one grievance to call attention to. He did not think the discussion upon it would last a long time; but at the same time it was a practical grievance. He consequently appealed to the Government to arrange that the Report of the Vote might be made the First Order on the day for which it might be fixed, and he would promise that he would not occupy more time than he could possibly avoid.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think I can promise to make this Vote the First Order; but I hope the hon. Member will have a convenient opportunity afforded him of discussing the point he desires to bring forward.

MR. PARNELL said, the Prime Minister had expressed a desire to be allowed to make a statement in regard to Foreign Affairs, and had suggested that the discussion of the Irish Constabulary Vote should at once be closed, in order that he might be enabled to bring forward that matter, leaving the debate on the Vote to be resumed on the Report. He (Mr. Parnell) should, therefore, defer until the Report the reply he had been desirous of making to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, only saying at the present moment that he regarded that speech as most unsatisfactory. Postponing any further remarks he should have to make until the Report, he supposed the Committee would now go to a Division upon the Vote.

Question put.

MR. PARNELL said, he was not in the House when the Prime Minister expressed his desire that the discussion should close, in order to enable him to make that important announcement upon Foreign Affairs which was expected from him that evening; but, he said, upon hearing of it, that he was willing to agree to the arrangement on the understanding that matters in connection with the Vote were discussed upon Report. It should be understood that a fair opportunity should be afforded for the purpose—he would not say such a good opportunity as they now had, at 6 o'clock in the evening; but an opportunity when a fair discussion could be raised. He ventured to submit that it would be a reasonable arrangement to take the Report stage not later than 11 o'clock or half-past.

MR. GLADSTONE made a gesture of assent.

MR. HEALY wished to say, without standing in the way of the statement about to be made, that the Chief Secretary had had due Notice of the intention to raise questions in relation to the conduct and treatment of Mr. French. He would not stand between the House and the Prime Minister now. He would only say that the Government must be prepared, on the Report stage, to have these matters fully discussed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he also was anxious to bring forward upon this Vote some questions as to the treatment by the police of persons among his own constituents, and the action of subordinate agents of the police in Queen's County. He would endeavour to do this on Report. He waived his right now in deference to the wish of the Prime Minister, upon the understanding, which, so far as he could gather, had been arrived at, otherwise he should have felt it his duty to go into the question of the treatment by individual constables and sub-constables of persons among his own constituents in Queen's County.

MR. PARNELL said, he was anxious there should be no misunderstanding on the point. Were they to understand that the Report of this Vote would not be taken later than half-past 11?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he intended to answer the hon. Gentleman to that effect. He could not give an absolute pledge as to the exact time; but, as nearly as possible, he would say it should not be later than, say, half-past 11.

Mr. PARNELL said, in reference to another Vote, that for Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions, the discussion was terminated prematurely on the understanding that matters in relation to it could be raised on Report; but the Report of that Vote was taken on the previous night without any Notice to Irish Members, and while most of them were absent.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he regretted that, inadvertently, this was done, and he sent at once to the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) to express his regret.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I believe, Sir, that I am acting in conformity with the general wish of the House, and perhaps with the convenience of the House, in asking leave to make a statement, which consists of information material to the public interests. I shall not occupy the House for any great length of time, nor shall I aim at minute and exact particularity in the statement; but will endeavour to convey to the House, as well as I can, the salient and principal points of that which has taken place, in such a way as to give a clear idea, and in substance an accurate idea, with regard to the whole matter. Sir, it is my duty, in the first place, to state, with much concern, to the House that which has already crept abroad in the shape of public rumour, that the Conference met to-day at 12 o'clock, and that it has failed to attain the object for which it was called together—namely, that of adopting, by European authority, a plan for the adjustment of the financial difficulties of Egypt. There were three principal subjects in relation to Egyptian Finance which were brought before the Conference—(1) the prospective charges of the administration of Egypt; (2) the present necessity of a loan to meet the immediate wants of Egypt; and (3) the prospective Revenue of Egypt, and its means of meeting the charges. As regards the prospective charges upon the Revenue of Egypt—namely, the sums necessary, upon a reasonable estimate, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of government in that country, I am glad to say—and it is an important result of the Conference, having regard to what may happen—that there is no difference of opinion expressed among the different Powers. Next, with regard to the present necessity of a loan to meet the demands upon the Egyptian Treasury, I may say, in substance, that there was no difference of opinion expressed. The amount of that loan—speaking in round numbers—would have been £8,000,000 if it had covered the whole of those demands; but there was another form in which the case might have been dealt with, under which the loan made would have been for certain purposes only, not including the indemnities for the proceedings of incendiarianism at Alexandria. If those indemnities were excluded, and they were paid for directly by an addition to the Egyptian Debt, and not by raising cash for the purpose, then the loan would have been about £4,250,000 in round numbers. Those are the three great points of finance to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. With respect, Sir, to our purposes in the Conference, they have been briefly these. In the first place, to secure a provision, moderate but adequate, and substantially fixed, for the necessary charges of the administration of Egypt, which, under whatever arrangement that can be made, must, from the nature of the case, be a first charge upon the revenues of every country; secondly, we could not make ourselves parties to any plan the execution of which would be incompatible with just and mild, though firm, government in Egypt. Of course, I am quite certain that no Power in the Conference would advisedly have proposed a plan that would be incompatible with those aims. But we, having certain views as to the amount of money that could be levied in Egypt consistently with their attainment, had for an essential principle of our conduct to adhere to those views, and not to be led into the adoption of any propositions which, in our opinion, would have been attended with results savouring of injustice and oppression. The third object that we had in view was to secure for the Bondholders, who are creditors of Egypt, upon a stable footing, all that which it is possible they can really in the long run receive—namely, their dividends, subject to no other diminution than such as the absolute necessities and primary wants of the Government of the country may entail upon them. Lastly, Sir, I have no scruple to state to the House that although I have no such proposal to make now, yet had it been part of the price of a really stable and complete arrangement for securing the financial equilibrium in Egypt, we should then have been prepared, as the House will see when the Protocols are laid before it, to ask Parliament to make use, to a moderate extent, of the credit of this country for the purpose of assisting to bring about so desirable a consummation. Sir, these were our objects. In the hope of meeting the various and serious difficulties of the case which have grown out of the difference in Estimates between the Government of France and the British Government as to the prospective revenues of Egypt, we have successively submitted several plans to the Conference. The whole of these will be presented in the Papers that are immediately to be placed in the hands of Members; but I will now only state so much as is necessary to explain the final issue—points upon which the respective views have been found mutually irreconcilable. The Representatives of France and England, as I have said, differed irreconcilably in their estimate, not of charge, but of receipt. The Representatives of France absolutely refused any diminution of the dividends payable under the Law of Liquidation. The Representatives of England declared and held themselves unable to accept any plan that did not make certain provision for the necessary charges of administration, which are in their nature first charges upon the Revenue. Well, Sir, only when great authorities—and both France and England are countries in which what may be called financial science is considerably developed—when great authorities differ upon a matter of this kind, a prospective matter, it is time alone that can ultimately decide between them. A great responsibility is incurred on the one side and on the other; and it is quite evident that the party which is right ought to gain its end. When we found the existence of this serious difficulty, the question that came before was this—was it possible to devise a plan under which, if we were right, the charges of Government would be sufficiently provided for, and under which, if France were right, the full dividends would be received by the Bondholders? The matter was considered by us with a view to obtaining a plan of that character; and what was done can, I think, be explained to the House as a form that is not otherwise than simple. I can explain it by stating simply the order of charges upon the Egyptian Revenue. We submitted a plan—and this is the plan to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the House, as connected with the final issue—we submitted a plan in which the charges on the Egyptian Revenue were stated in the following order:—In the first place, we proposed that there should be a pre-preference Debt of £8,000,000.

Before any administrative charges?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; before any administrative charges. The noble Lord is perhaps not aware that under the Law of Liquidation already special provision is made independently of charges for administration, and we were desirous of confirming this arrangement so far as we safely could, and no further. The plan, therefore, was this. In the first place, there was a pre-preference Debt of £8,000,000; that might have been £8,000,000 raised in cash in order to meet the indemnity claims, and to meet all other claims which are now pressing on the Government of Egypt; or it might have been a loan contracted for £4,500,000 in cash, and the issue of pre-preference Bonds for the remaining £3,500,000.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL:

At what rate of interest?

MR. GLADSTONE: At such rate of interest as it could be raised at in the market. We proposed pre-preference obligations in order that the money might be raised on the most economical terms. The second charge on the Egyptian Revenue was to be the dividends on other Debts, minus a deduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent—a deduction which we had originally proposed—and so we proposed to leave the Debts in their position of preference and anterior to the administrative charges, but minus a deduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The third charge was the administrative expense of the Government at a fixed amount, which I may state in round numbers at £5,250,000 in all. It is well to say that I speak of the Egyptian pound; but there is no great difference between that and the pound sterling. There is a good deal of detail in this, of course; but I will not trouble the House with it—it will only bewilder their attention. The fourth charge on the Revenue, after the administrative expenses, was to be the $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, making up the full dividend on the Debt now due to the Bondholders, and some other items of Debt I need not now more particularly mention. Then, fifthly, there was a provision for the disposal of the surplus, if surplus there should exist. In this way, as we considered, both the objects were gained. If we were right, the expenses of the Government would have been perfectly provided for; and if the French calculations were right, besides providing for the expenses of the Government, there would have been sufficient provision for the payment of full dividends to the Bondholders. We proposed this as a permanent arrangement; but rather than have seen the Conference fail, we should have been prepared to accept this plan for a period of three years only, to be followed by a re-assembling of the Conference, as that would have given a sufficient time for testing its operation, and showing which calculations were most entitled to reliance. Well, to-day—and only this day—the French Representatives presented their final proposals, to which I will call the attention of the House, and the House will kindly compare them with the proposals of the British Government, which I have just described. According to the French proposals, there were certain classes constituting an order, in which charges were imposed upon Egyptian Revenue. In the first class there was set the new loan of which I have spoken, and what is known as the "Privilege Debt." I have not mentioned "Privilege Debt" before, because we did not make an essential distinction between the two kinds of Debt; but the French, in their proposals, made that distinction—consequently, for the first I introduce the term "Privilege Debt." Well, that was the first charge on the Egyptian Revenue; the second charge was to be the other, and principally the Unified Debt. On this the full dividends were to be paid before any of the other charges of administration were satisfied. The third order of charge upon the Revenue was to be the expenditure necessarily connected with the administration; to which the French Plenipotentiary added a fourth, a provision to which, I believe, he attached greater importance and value than we did—that is to say, that after paying all the dividends in that diminution, and after paying all the administrative charges, the surplus Revenue should be freely at the disposal of the Egyptian Government. But, apart from the surplus, it was necessary—and we undoubtedly deemed it pre-eminently necessary—to consider the provision to be made for the case of deficit. I forgot to state to the House at the beginning that our estimate of the Egyptian Revenue was made with all the aid we could obtain, and all the care we could apply to it, and it shows a deficit of between £300,000 and £400,000 a-year; whereas the French are more sanguine in their estimate by a sum of between £600,000 and £700,000. The difference between our plan and the French plan which we are now scrutinizing was that we made provision for a deficit, if it should occur, and it was this. In the case of a deficit, it was to be considered and provided for by joint consultation between the Egyptian Government and the Commission of the Caisse. I may say that the constitution of the Caisse according to the proposal of the French would, we understand, have been altered, and, instead of consisting of the Representatives of four Powers, it would have consisted of the Representatives of seven Powers—namely, the whole of those Powers who met together in the Conference. The Egyptian Government and the Commission of the Caisse were, as I have said, to devise the measures necessary to meet the deficit; but if these measures involved an infringement on the full dividends, in that case it was provided—firstly, that the Caisse could not act except by a unanimous vote; and, secondly, in the event of any difference among the members of the Caisse, the matter was to be referred—as to supplying the deficit—to the seven Powers, Representatives of which were then assembled in Conference, and who, unhappily, have not been able to deal with the question of Egyptian Finance. To this plan I am bound to say, without requiring a very long time for any minute investigation, we took decided objection. As we conceived, the fatal objections were two. Certainly, in the first place, it would have meant, if there be any truth in our computation of Egyptian finance—it would have meant financial confusion in Egypt. For, Sir, upon the existence of a deficit what would have happened? This would have happened. The Egyptian accounts of Revenue and Expenditure are not made up—nor are those of any other Eastern country—to a certain day, as are the accounts of England on the 31st of March. They must be gathered together a long time, and after much inquiry, in order to constitute anything like a real exhibition of Revenue and Expenditure. That having been performed, they were to be referred to the Commission of the Caisse with the Egyptian Government. But the Commission of the Caisse was necessarily, and by its own composition, a hostile tribunal. It would have been their business to examine every minute particular, to see what arrears there were in the collection of Revenue—to see whether it was possible to gather in that Revenue, and institute most elaborate inquiries, requiring an indefinite time; and then there would be the condition that if any single Power objected, no result could be obtained. And the final provision was that there should be a reference to the seven Powers of Europe. It was, in our view, pretty plain that the Powers of Europe, if they had instructed their Representatives upon the Caisse to object to supplying the deficit by deductions from the dividends, would simply repeat their objections when their Representatives met again in Conference. But, Sir, besides the financial objection, we took another objection to this plan, which was quite fatal to it in our eyes—it was the position assigned by this plan to the Commission of the National Debt, or the Commission of the Caisse. There has been in this and, perhaps, in other countries a belief that it was part of our plan to re-create the Dual Control in a form yet more stringent, more savouring of dominion over Egyptian affairs. That was never any part of our plan; but I am bound to say that, in our deliberate conviction, it must been the inevitable consequence of the adoption of the French proposals, and I will take the liberty of stating our objections to it in some words used to-day by Lord Granville at the Conference, and which will appear upon the Protocol—

“We do not think that powers of this magnitude should be in any case intrusted to the Commission of the Caisse. We have already proposed to give to that body by the Anglo-French Agreement powers of check and investigation as great as we can justify; but the present proposal is fundamentally different. The additional powers proposed by the French Plenipotentiary would, in our judgment, confer on the Commissioners of the Caisse a mastery over the Government and the affairs of Egypt; and to this we can on no account consent.”

Well, Sir, I have now explained, I think, pretty well the manner in which it has come about that irreconcilable difficulties prevented the Conference from arriving at a conclusion; but there are other certain results which have been achieved by the Conference. Amid this wreck of good intentions and much intelligent labour on all sides, it is a great thing that the Powers should be agreed as to the necessary charge upon the Egyptian Government, and substantially as to the loan needful to be contracted in the present exigency; and I must say it is also a great advantage that there should be a total dissipation and destruction of the idea which has prevailed in this country that we should ever have proposed to constitute what, in our view, was an International Control similar in kind to that of the Dual Control, or, as I think in this case, one involving evils considerably beyond it. The view which we take of Egyptian finance was supported in the Conference by Italy and by Turkey; but France, as I have said, was unable to bring her opinions into harmony with ours; and Russia, Germany, and Austria, in those circumstances of difference between England and France, declined to give any opinion. The end of it is, therefore, that the Conference, not having arrived at any result, according to the mode of procedure adopted on some other occasion, has been adjourned without any date being fixed for its reassembling. I have now, Sir, substantially concluded what I have to state to the House. Of course, this failure—this complete failure—of the effort made by us for the satisfactory adjustment of Egyptian Finance, through the action of the United Powers, will entail upon us very serious consideration of the position and of the measures which will be necessary. I need hardly say that I am not about to enter upon these measures without safe and trustworthy conclusions, which cannot be arrived at by the Government without further consideration and the lapse of some time. My remaining business is to say that the Protocols will be presented at the very earliest moment, and to explain when that earliest moment will be. The House is aware that it is absolutely necessary to submit draft Protocols to the Plenipotentiaries who have taken part in the Conference. I do not think that will entail any serious delay. My noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will be able to state, in case of need, what has been done. In consequence of Monday being Bank Holiday, there will be some difficulty; but we have endeavoured to confront that difficulty, and to secure rapid progress in the preparation of the Papers on that day. A large number of copies—120, I believe—will be ready on Monday afternoon.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Without translation.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, without translation; but I hope they will be a sufficient number for practical purposes, and on Tuesday it is hoped that the Papers will be generally distributed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will they be ready at the meeting of the House on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes. I understand that the Papers on Monday will be ready for the meeting of the House. Well, Sir, there is one other question which will naturally be asked—What is the position of the Anglo-French Agreement? I always told the House that the Anglo-French Agreement was entirely dependent upon the arrival at a substantial result by the Conference; and the consequence is that that Agreement is now in abeyance, and is without any binding effect and force as regards either Power. I must not, however, shrink from saying that Her Majesty's Government continue to value the provisions of that Agreement; and, moreover—although, unfortunately, a difference has arisen upon a matter of computation, with regard to which a difference may most innocently occur—we continue most highly to appreciate the spirit of friendship and conciliation, and far-sighted wisdom which, as we think, was shown by the French Government in negotiating the provisions of that Agreement. I thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to this statement. A full one it could not be. Still, I believe that in outline it is a true and correct one; and if there is any desire to put any question in regard to it, we will endeavour to answer it with the indulgence of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The extreme gravity of the statement which we have just listened to I am sure will be appreciated by the House, and I should be very unwilling to make any comment at this moment on what we have heard. We have been promised information supplementary to that which the Prime Minister has given; but what I wish particularly to inquire is this: We are now approaching the end of the Session; is it intended by the Government to make any proposals to Parliament in the residue of the present Session? We must remember that the Conference was invited to meet on account of what the Government considered the very serious and urgent condition of Egyptian finance. It was hoped by the Government that the result of the meeting of that Conference would be the adoption of a plan which would meet the difficulties which they described as urgent and immediate. Well, unfortunately, the Conference has failed to devise a plan, and what we wish to know is this: How does the Government propose to deal, or will they tell us very soon, if not now, how they propose to deal with those difficulties which the Conference was called together to deal with, and which it has failed to deal with? Or are we to suppose that the House is to separate without any proposal being made on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think I may say without doubt that we have no proposal of the kind to make to Parliament. I was, perhaps, not sufficiently full in my statement. I said we should have asked Parliament for the use of British credit if a substantial arrangement could have been adopted; I ought to have added that, as no substantial arrangement had been adopted, we do not intend to make any proposal, any request to Parliament for the use of its credit, or any other proposal.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Are we to get no further information as to the state of Egyptian financial affairs?

MR. GLADSTONE: I stated before that we had already begun to take the matter into consideration, and shall endeavour to probe to the bottom the question in order to ascertain what would be our duty in this very difficult and complex state of things. This will necessarily require some time, but we shall proceed without any loss of time that can be possibly avoided.

MR. PULESTON: Before any plan is adopted will it be submitted to Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: Of course, before anything is done to commit this country to pecuniary liability Parliament must be consulted; but I cannot bind myself as to the measures to be adopted by the Government of Egypt.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can name a day on which he expects to make a proposal on this subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I certainly cannot.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether we are to understand that Parliament is to separate without our being afforded any opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government in Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: We naturally wait for a request. I presume that anyone who had been listening to this statement of mine would have understood that we would be prepared to discuss the matter; but we await the request.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I would like to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman with reference to negotiations, which we can see have not had any result.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in Order in discussing the subject; there is no Question before the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Then I will ask the Prime Minister whether he can tell the House what is the estimate of the total liabilities of the Egyptian Government; what is the estimate of the annual income which the Egyptian Government has laid before the Conference; and what is the order of precedence in the claims, apart from administration, upon Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: As regards figures, I have decidedly avoided them; but the hon. Gentleman when he sees the Papers on Monday will find there the fullest statements on the subject, and I do not think he will have any reason to complain of lack of information. As to the order of the charges, he will find that stated very clearly, both as proposed by the English and as proposed by the French Government.

MR. GRAY: The right hon. Gentleman stated his estimate of the cost of administration was quite £5,250,000; but he did not state, on the part of the Government, what were the probable receipts. In fact, he stated one side of the account and not the other.

MR. GLADSTONE: The material point I sought to state was the difference between the French and English estimates. With regard to the figures of the case, they belong to the statement; but they hardly belong to a statement such as I have just made.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I think it is quite impossible that the House could be satisfied to rise for the Prorogation without some more certain knowledge of the intentions of the Government. I propose, therefore, on Monday to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can give us a day for the discussion of the subject? He might be able to tell me now, by giving us, say, Thursday next.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will give an answer on Monday. I would like to consult with my Colleagues first.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it is the fixed intention of the Government to allow Parliament to separate without any statement as to what the Government intend to do towards settling the financial difficulties of Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that the House will perceive how difficult it would be for us to do so. An extraordinary state of things has arisen in a foreign country, situate at a great distance from us. I do not think it would be wise, or that—seeing that the period before the Prorogation is only 10 days—we could possibly give any such information within that time.

PARLIAMENT—SUPPLY—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House will immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply.”

—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to Order, and asked the Speaker, as a point of Order, whether, after the Order for Supply had been set up and had been discharged by the Chairman reporting certain Votes, it was competent for a Member of the Government to move that the House should resolve itself into Committee of Supply? He did not think that in the whole history of Parliament such a precedent had been established.

MR. HEALY asked whether, in the circumstances, the Resolution passed yesterday extending to Saturdays the Standing Order as to Mondays and Thursdays was now applicable; and, whether Supply not now being the First Order, Motions could be discussed on the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair?

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the Questions of the two hon. Members, I must state that I consider that the interruption which has taken place to the ordinary course of Business was by reason of an extraordinary counsel with the House itself. [“No, no!” from the Conservatives and Irish Members.] The interruption took place with the permission of the House; and I have no hesitation in saying that I shall observe both the spirit and letter of the Motion agreed to by the House on Friday—that on the Question of the House going into Committee of Supply on Saturday, the Speaker shall immediately leave the Chair. I do not see anything in the interruption which has taken place to prevent the House from being in precisely the same position in which it was when it met to-day at 12 o'clock. Under these circumstances, I consider it my duty to leave the Chair without any Question being raised upon it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, with reference to the observation of the Speaker that the interruption of the Business was in consequence of the wish of the House, pointed out that the agreement came to was that the statement of the Prime Minister should be made on the Report of Supply, which should be moved at a certain hour if possible. He thought the Government had taken an unfair advantage of the House in the course that had been pursued to-night.

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that yesterday, when the suggestion was made that the statement should be made on Report, he entirely disapproved of it, because it seemed to him a most violent method of proceeding; but he reserved in his mind what would be the best and least violent method of obtaining the object the noble Lord had in view.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the Motion of the Secretary to the Treasury was a complete and flagrant departure from all the traditions of the House, and it was not justified by a single precedent. Supply had never been suspended except when the Speaker had been called in because disorder had arisen. Most of the Irish Members had gone away, believing that the Order with reference to Supply had been concluded. The Government could see that the Irish Benches were almost completely empty, as they thought Progress had been reported. Now, to ask them to resume the debate when the House was full of English and Scotch Members, and there were only very few Irish Members, was absolutely unfair. [Interruption, and cries of “Order!” from the Ministerial Benches.]

MR. HEALY: Order! Order! Order!

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR complained of the interruption, and said that not one single argument had been advanced from the Treasury Bench in support of such an extraordinary step, and he desired to enter his protest against it.

MR. MONK said, there was no necessity for the Motion just made by the Secretary to the Treasury. [Several MEMBERS: He has made it.] According to the Speaker's ruling he had simply taken the Chair for an important communication to be made by the Prime Minister, and Committee of Supply should be resumed without a Question being put.

MR. SPEAKER: I believe the hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct, and that I might have left the Chair immediately after the statement of the Prime Minister. But the Secretary to the Treasury having made the Motion, I was, of course, bound to put it. As I said before, I consider that the course of Business has been interrupted that a statement might be made on a matter of national concern; and the House ought to be placed in the same position that it was before the interruption occurred.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the Chairman of Committees had reported to the Speaker the Resolution agreed to in Committee. Therefore, the First Order of the day had terminated. The Second Order was Report of Supply; and before the Motion of the Secretary to the Treasury could be put it was absolutely necessary to go through the Orders of the Day, of which there were 40. It would be setting a precedent which hon. Members opposite would some day bitterly regret if this Motion were agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER: The Chairman could not leave the Chair without reporting to me the proceedings of the Committee. The House had made no Order as to the time at which the Committee should sit again. It may properly proceed as if there had been no interruption. The Question is "That this House do immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, as a point of Order, whether he could not move, as an Amendment to the Question, that the House should resolve itself into Committee on Monday next?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; on the question of time, there may be an Amendment.

MR. CALLAN asked why the Prime Minister had asked them to close the Vote for Irish Constabulary purposes except to make a statement—

MR. SPEAKER ruled the hon. Member out of Order.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: In order to place myself in Order, I will move, as an Amendment, that this House do resolve itself into Committee of Supply on Monday next. There is nothing so dangerous as setting a precedent of this kind, which on some future occasion may be used by the Government for their own purposes. If Irish Members, and I myself, had supposed that the Government would pursue this unprecedented course, we should certainly have done all in our power to oppose the Prime Minister's proposition. The Government has, by means of a protest, obtained a Vote of £1,500,000 on an abbreviated discussion—and a Vote which they would, in all probability, not have obtained until 12 o'clock at night. I do not believe that there is a more jealous guardian of the rights of Members of the House of Commons than the Prime Minister; and if he will only shake himself free from the evil influences of the Secretary to the Treasury—who apparently recoils from no proceeding, whatever may be its character—and appear in the character of Leader of the House, instead of Leader of the Ministry, he would assent to this course of procedure. If, however, he should persist in this Motion, I do not think he will do much good, for there is nothing that will create more strenuous opposition.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "immediately," in order to insert the words "upon Monday next,"—(Lord Randolph Churchill,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'immediately' stand part of the Question."

MR. GLADSTONE: I desire only to correct the view taken by the noble Lord, who said this is the most dangerous precedent of which any Government can avail itself. The noble Lord said I availed myself of a pretext to make a statement to the House. What the noble Lord called a pretext is the fact that the House itself, represented by many Gentlemen who spoke, by the silence of all the rest—and, most of all, represented by the noble Lord himself—expressed a very strong desire yesterday that, for the convenience of the House, a statement should be made to-day, and not on Monday, with regard to Egyptian affairs.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: On the Report of Supply. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GLADSTONE: I only wish to observe that the noble Lord's statements as to a pretext having been resorted to are really idle; because what the Government have done they have done in obedience to the impulsion of the House, and without any dissentient voice. [Cries of "Without Notice!"] There should, therefore, be no fear of the misuse by the Government of such a precedent for the future for Government purposes. The noble Lord said he wished to have the statement made upon Report; but recollecting that Report of Supply was a recital of the Votes passed by Committee, I considered that that proposal would be the most inconvenient way that could be devised of dealing with the subject. When the House meets upon a Saturday at the close of the Session, it usually sits in Supply to a late hour, and sometimes until Sunday morning; and it was considered by the noble Lord that after disposing of Supply, perhaps at 11 o'clock, an hour before Sunday, we should take this question of the Egyptian Conference. To make the statement at that time on Report of Supply would be most inconvenient to hon. Members, besides which the usual means of publicity will have been completely paralysed until Monday morning. It appears to me that for the House to hear the statement at 6 o'clock was convenient, and that the postponement to 10 or 11 o'clock would have been very inconvenient indeed. I hope that, under these circumstances, and considering the origin of this affair, which was entirely the impulsion of the House itself, and was not suggested by the Government—I hope we may not be prevented from proceeding with Supply. It was well understood, or should have been understood, there was no intention of taking any Irish Votes; and there could not be a more lamentable exhibition, not for the Government, or the Opposition, but for the whole House, than a continual wrangle on this subject.

MR. DAWSON said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had missed the point they endeavoured to bring out, which was that if they were able to interrupt proceedings of Supply in this way, why was it considered necessary to pass the Constabulary Vote? Why were not the proceedings in Committee merely suspended in order to enable the statement of the Prime Minister to be made, instead of Members being given to understand by their agreeing to a Vote that Supply would be closed for the day?

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked whether the House would have consented to report Progress if it had been thought that the unprecedented proceeding would be resorted to of setting up Supply again? The fact that Irish Votes were not to be taken did not reconcile the Irish Members at all to this strange and new and startling innovation, which followed so curiously upon the inadvertence of yesterday, for which the Secretary to the Treasury was responsible. He desired only straightforward conduct on the part of the Government, and should certainly resist such an innovation as they proposed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am sorry to see the difficulty which has arisen in this matter. I must admit that the circumstances are peculiar; but I think it would be well for the Government to consider how far they are likely to advance Public Business by pressing the Motion. It was generally understood that the Irish Votes were fixed for to-day, and that that would be the only Business; but yesterday, in consequence of the position in which it was known that the Conference stood, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) asked whether it would not be possible on Report of Supply for a Minister to make a statement with regard to the Conference. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, I understand, raised an objection to that course of proceeding, stating that it would not be convenient, on Report of Supply, to make such a statement. That objection, however, was overruled; and I certainly understood that Report of Supply would be taken at some period between 6 and 8 o'clock, and that the statement would then be made, provided the Government were in a position to do so. I myself was certainly under the impression that the Prime Minister's statement would be made at the conclusion of Supply. Under the circumstances, and seeing the feeling of the House, I would venture to put it to the Government whether they would be consulting the convenience of the House by the course they propose; and whether, if they persist in it, they will gain any advantage?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, if there was any intention of continuing the contest upon this question, it would be unseemly to further prolong it. He wished the House, however, to be under no misapprehension. Some hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House seemed to think the Government intended to take the House by surprise. [Cheers.] That was entirely unfounded—there was no such intention. He believed there was no man in the House who did not know the whole afternoon the course which would be taken. ["No, no!"] He should have supposed that it would have been known from the ordinary sources of information. It was quite understood that the Constabulary Vote, which had been discussed for six hours and a quarter, would be taken first, and when that was disposed of the Government hoped they should be allowed to make progress with other Votes in Supply. [An hon. MEMBER: It was not disposed of; it was interrupted.] He had patiently listened to the hon. Member, and he hoped he should be now allowed to speak for a few minutes without interruption. It was suggested, during the discussion as to the order of Business, that it would be for the convenience of the House if the Prime Minister were to make a statement with regard to the Conference; and it was thought that it would also be for the convenience of Members if the statement were made about 6 o'clock. It was now made a complaint that the statement was made by some false pretence. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members should not easily charge others with false pretence; but it was becoming a habit to use language of that kind, which was most offensive and unfounded. They might some day be sitting on the Ministerial Benches themselves, when they would be extremely indignant if similar charges were made against them. What was intended was to give effect to the discussion on the Constabulary Vote, and as the interruption in the Business occurred it was thought it would be a convenient time to take the Vote. There was no desire to curtail the discussion on the Constabulary Vote. ["Oh, oh!"] So thoroughly was that understood that the Prime Minister came to an agreement with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the discussion of this matter should be postponed till the Report, which would be brought on at a reasonable hour. How, then, could it be said that on false pretences the Government endeavoured to curtail discussion? He reminded the House that it was the desire of hon. Members that the Session should be brought to a close as soon as possible; and he hoped, under all the circumstances, they might be allowed to proceed with the consideration of some of the English Votes.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had complained of the use of strong language; but it was, he believed, at a Saturday Sitting that the proceeding occurred to which the historic phrase "a dirty trick" had been applied by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Perhaps his own proceedings that day would deserve the phrase as well. If any strong language had been used, it had been elicited and more than excused by the conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite. When hon. Members from Ireland rose, and in the most respectful manner called the Speaker's attention to questions of Order, they were assailed with the cry of "Name!" That form of interruption was one of the most odious and insulting that could be used towards an hon. Member; and if there was any person who ought to be named it was the person who cried "Name, name!" He himself brought no charge of deliberate unfairness on the part of the Government; but the fact still remained that hon. Members on these Benches had been taken completely by surprise. He warned the Government that they should resist them in this proposal as long as the Forms of the House permitted, and that not one minute of time would be gained by an attempt on the part of the Government to trample on the traditions of the House.

Mr. COURTNEY said, there had been no intention of over-reaching or misleading the House. What had been intended to be done was to move to report Progress, and on that Motion to make the statement in regard to the Conference. The Prime Minister was about to make that Motion; but the Chairman had left the Chair before his right hon. Friend could get up. That was the whole basis on which the charge of unfairness rested. The Chairman having left the Chair, and the statement having been made, he had moved that the House immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply. Six hours were given to the Constabulary Vote, and the discussion appeared to have been exhausted; but as some hon. Members got up and said they had other observations to make, it was agreed that the Report of the Vote should be taken at half-past 11. In the circumstances, however, there did not seem to be any prospect of making progress in Supply; and, therefore, he should withdraw the Motion, thus allowing the Business of the evening to come to an end.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that if they adopted the proposal of the Secretary to the Treasury they would establish the precedent against which they protested. One of the most distinguished men that ever adorned that Chair, Mr. Speaker Onslow, said on a memorable occasion that the Forms and Rules of the House were an indispensable protection of the minority, and that it was the duty of every Speaker and Chairman for the time being to enforce those Rules and Forms for their protection. One of the best established Rules of the House was, "That the Orders of the Day be disposed of in the order in which they stand on the Paper." The first Order that day was Supply; the second was Report. Supply having been brought to an end, Report ought to be next taken.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, now that the Government had yielded what they had been contending for he hoped this discussion would not be prolonged. They would take no further Votes in Supply, but would proceed to the Report. They would accept the proposal that on Monday the House should resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was prepared to withdraw his Amendment, on condition that the Secretary to the Treasury withdrew his Motion.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was necessary to make an Order as to Supply for Monday.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'upon Monday next' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Committee upon Monday next.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [1st August] reported.

First and Second Resolutions postponed.

Third Resolution agreed to.

Fourth Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. WARTON moved that the Report be postponed until Monday, as a protest against the manner in which the Vote had been taken in Committee by the Secretary to the Treasury.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Debate on the Further Consideration of the Resolution be adjourned,"—(Mr. Warton,)—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 4: Majority 32.—(Div. List, No. 206.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

Postponed Resolutions to be considered upon Monday next.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: As a personal explanation, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I voted in the minority, because I thought I was voting that the Report be not adjourned.

House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock till Monday next.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of laying on the Table of your Lordships' House certain Papers, and I must apologize to your Lordships for their not being in a more perfect state. It has been physically impossible to produce the Protocols with the translations in the time within which we were most anxious to present them. I think, however, that these Papers will give the general information which your Lordships require, and the translations will be ready the day after to-morrow. Your Lordships are aware that the Conference was, at its sitting on Saturday, adjourned without coming to an agreement on the alteration in the Law of Liquidation. It is not necessary for me, on this occasion, to say much in regard to the preliminary Anglo-French Agreement, which has already been submitted to your Lordships. I am aware that it has met in this country with considerable criticism, and even Votes of Censure have been threatened. For my part, I not only believe that the Agreement would have gained by full discussion; but I regret that the Agreement, from a condition made at the time, is not at present binding either on France or on this country. It was negotiated in a statesmanlike and friendly spirit on principles which I shall always consider creditable to the two Governments, securing for each country that which was valuable for each, and on both making concessions which were valuable and just. Charles Fox, when he invented handicapping two racehorses, advised that the owner of each should place a sovereign in the hands of the handicapper. If one owner accepted the award and the other refused, the sovereign went to the owner who accepted; but if both owners accepted, or both owners refused, the sovereigns remained with the handicapper, who, Mr. Fox thought, might be assumed to have come to a fair and a right decision. On the principle which a great statesman applied to a mere pastime, it might equally be argued that when two Governments arrived at an adjustment of a natural difference, which at first obtains the approval of both countries, or which provokes considerable criticism in both, there is an a priori probability that the arrangement has not been of a very one-sided character. I am very sorry to say that this sort of justification, whatever it may be worth, for the British negotiators has not been wanting in France. The arrangement was severely criticized by the French Press, and the feelings of the Chamber have been so adverse that it naturally had its influence upon the negotiations. I have here a short Memorandum showing the different proposals that were made to the Conference. Our first proposal was made on the 28th of June. It was that a pre-Preference Loan of £8,000,000 should be guaranteed by England, the interest and Sinking Fund amounting to 4½ per cent; that the interest on each of the existing loans should be reduced by ½ per cent, and the Sinking Funds suspended—we left it to the Congress to decide whether the Domain Loan should be included—that the surplus should go, one-half to the Egyptian Government and the other half to the Sinking Funds, and that the charge for the Army of Occupation should be limited to £300,000 a-year. Then came the French counter-proposal made on a higher estimate of revenue. It was made on the 22nd of July, and was as follows:—That the Sinking Fund should be suspended, but that the rate of interest on all the loans should be maintained except the Suez Canal Loan made by England, from which 1 per cent should be deducted; that the administrative expenses should be fixed at the sum proposed by England; that an inquiry into the land revenue should be undertaken by England, and the result communicated to a Conference in 1886, and that the £8,000,000 loan should be guaranteed by all the Powers. To this, which we rejected, we made two counter-proposals on the 24th of July. One of these was that the new loan should be raised without guarantee, the indemnities being paid in its Stock; that the administrative expenses, as agreed between us and the French, should be the next charge on the Egyptian Revenues; that the third charge should be the interest on the existing debts; that any surplus should be divided equally between the Sinking Funds and the Egyptian Exchequer; and that any deficit should fall on the interest of the loans. The other proposal was that the diminution of interest under our original plan should last only for 10 years, and that the Conference should then meet again, and that we should only guarantee so much of the pre-Preference Loan as would not be required for the indemnities. On the 28th of July we discussed the first of the two proposals, to which the French objected, proposing instead to make the entire interest of all the existing debts the second charge, and the administrative expenses the third. If there should be a surplus the whole should go to the Egyptian Exchequer for 10 years. If there was a deficit the Commission of the Caisse would arrange, in concert with the Egyptian Government, how to meet it; but that no reduction in the interest of the Debt could take place. After discussion, in which we offered to give our proposal a duration of only three years, the French took it ad referendum. On the following day, the 29th of July, no answer having been received from the French Government, we made, on a suggestion from Count Nigra, the following amended proposal:—That after the interest on the New Loan, which would form the first charge on the Revenues of Egypt, the next charge should be the interest on all the existing loans, less $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; that the third charge should be the administrative expenses; that the fourth should be the $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, so far as the balance would allow, and that if there was any surplus it should be divided between the Sinking Fund and the Egyptian Exchequer; and that this arrangement should be for three years. To this, on the 2nd of August, the French made their final counter-proposal, which we rejected.

“That the New Loan should be made in Privileged Stock, which would be the first charge on the Revenues; that the second charge should be the full interest on the other loans, but that the Sinking Fund should be suspended for three years; that the third charge should be the administrative charges as we had settled them; that any balance should go to the Egyptian Exchequer; that any deficiency should be reported to the Commission of the Caisse, to consist of seven members, who would arrange with the Egyptian Government how to meet it. If this involved a reduction of interest it could only be effected by an unanimous vote of the Commissioners. If they differed, the matter would be referred to the Great Powers; that the inquiry into the land revenue should be undertaken and the result brought before a meeting of the Conference in 1887.”

Your Lordships will have perceived that the last proposal of the French Government differed from ours in two respects—first, as to the mode of raising the New Loan on which both Governments were willing to arrive, and might easily have arrived at an agreement; secondly, as to the manner in which the necessary charges of the administration and the interest of the present Debt shall be dealt with. The French plan, in our judgment, would produce a normal deficit of £500,000, or, according to the Egyptian authorities, of £1,000,000 a-year, leaving to the Commission of the Caisse, whose official duty it is to represent the creditors, not the Egyptian debtors, to decide how far, from year to year, this deficiency is to be made good, thus, practically, excluding the remedy of any reduction of the interest unless, after an indefinite lapse of time, the Representatives of the Powers should agree unanimously to it. This would have given to the Caisse, not merely the addition of some useful powers of check and investigation such as was provided for in the Anglo-French Agreement; but would have given to it the complete control of the government and affairs of Egypt. It is a great misfortune that France and England could not come conscientiously to an agreement, especially as if we had done so the other Powers were ready to concur in it. No one can deplore this more than Her Majesty's Government; but I cannot altogether regret, if the disagreement was inevitable, that the Ultimatum of the French Government should be one which I believe your Lordships will unanimously be of opinion it was impossible for us to accept. I hope that this House will understand that, in saying this, I do not pretend to criticize the conduct of France in wishing to defend the rights of her subjects. Even if so large a number of Egyptian securities were not held in this country, I should entirely sympathize with the French Government in the desire that rights secured—though in different circumstances—under International Agreement to individuals should, if it were possible, be maintained. But the view which we desired to place before the Powers, parties to this International Agreement, was that, while Egypt was bound to do her best to meet the claims upon her, it was the duty of all of us to see that Egypt was placed in a position in which she could live. It has been asked whether Her Majesty's Government applied to Germany to mediate. Now, certainly, I thought it my duty to urge strongly upon the Representatives of all the Powers the hope that, in the interests of Egypt, we should receive their support. It was not likely that I should except such a Power as Germany—whose attitude towards us about Egypt has been of a very friendly character—from this appeal, or that I should conceal my belief that her influence in Europe might be of great use to Egypt in this crisis. I did not ask for the mediation of Germany or of any other Power, though I do not see what objection there would have been in doing so if there had been a chance of mediation being acceptable and accepted on a satisfactory basis. I must state how grateful we feel to Italy for the support she has given us, a support which seems to us to be based on a very friendly feeling to this country, and on an enlightened interest in the welfare of Egypt. We also appreciate the assistance given us by Turkey, as a proof that our consistent adherence to our word was not without its effect upon the Sovereign of the Ottoman Empire. I must add, that we have no just reason to complain of the neutral attitude of the great military States. Knowing that the decision of the Powers must always be unanimous, and can never be decided by a majority, and perceiving a divergence between two of the Powers, both as to facts and as to principles, it was, of course, a great temptation to avoid pronouncing an opinion which would not at the time be decisive. Be that as it may, the Conference having adjourned without an Agreement places a great responsibility upon us. We have recovered our perfect freedom of action; but it will require the most careful consideration how we shall use it. Her Majesty's Government have in contemplation a preliminary step, which I should hope to be able to describe to-morrow.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I can only heartily congratulate Her Majesty's Government in having got rid of the Conference. I believe it was founded on a misconception. It was founded on an attribution of a higher international significance to the provisions of the Law of Liquidation than that law justly deserves; and, Her Majesty's Government having unnecessarily tied their own hands, it required all these dangerous and clumsy expedients for the purpose of untying them again. There was a great danger—a danger which, I think, the event has proved—that if this Conference had come to a decision, those engagements which appear in the Anglo-French Agreement with respect to the powers of the Caisse would have developed, as we all feared they would, into a Multiple Control. The very readiness shown by the French Government to utilize and extend and expand the powers of the Caisse proved the importance which they attached to that organization; and I think Her Majesty's Government took alarm, not quite too late, but very late indeed, when they saw that, by giving the power of the purse practically to the Caisse, we gave to them the power of the Government altogether; and it is impossible not to congratulate Egypt on having escaped from the permanent dominion of the tribunal which was dissolved on Saturday, because those same Powers that met there, and were unable to agree even upon the principles of their action, would have had, if the original Agreement had been carried out, to decide again and again upon questions vital to the conduct of finance, and therefore to the conduct of good government in Egypt; and Egypt would have met in their Conference with the same inability to view her interests or duties from the same point of view that brought the enterprize of Her Majesty's Government to so inauspicious a conclusion upon Saturday. I think that we cannot distrust too much the attempt to manage details by the medium of any kind of Multiple International Control. The very circumstances on which the noble Lord has dwelt—that all the decisions of the tribunal must be taken unanimously—is in itself quite sufficient to incapacitate any such machine from any effective government of any country that is confided to it. But, my Lords, I do not wish to criticize at any length the statement of the noble Lord, which, no doubt, is as clear as could be expected under the circumstances, which are necessarily more or less complicated. I do not understand the application of the pleasant apologue which he told us from the history of Charles Fox, that if the owners did not agree the handicapper got the money. The owners on this occasion are England and France; but who is the handicapper? Who has got the money on this occasion? Obviously, somebody—some very powerful person—somebody who will not trust them—somebody who has got advantages which they have not got. I shall not mention who this is, for I have not the advantage of the noble Earl's assistance to indicate the personage who must be considered as keeping the money on this occasion. But I am afraid that in the future the truth of the noble Earl's apologue will be shown. But, after all, these are matters of the past, and I do not wish to exaggerate their importance. I am sorry that the noble Lord has thought it necessary to renew his adhesion to what I consider are the absolutely extinct provisions of the Anglo-French Convention; but I hope we may believe that, having been thrown, as the Prime Minister said, into abeyance, no authority which can exist can call them back into activity. But I cannot help being very much interested in the last statement of the noble Earl—that he was conscious that a great responsibility rested on Her Majesty's Government, and that he was about to-morrow to state the first step which they were going to take in the discharge of that responsibility. Well, we shall await that announcement with the very greatest interest, because the problem before us is one which, undoubtedly, at first sight, seems to require all the skill of Her Majesty's Government to solve. By the hypothesis on which the Conference was dissolved, the very resources which are at present at the command of the Government of Egypt are insufficient for carrying on the government of the country and paying its debts. It is not a question of there being a difficulty; there is an impossibility. According to the view of Her Majesty's Government, and owing to the manner in which they elected to close the Conference, it is impossible, while paying the Debt, to satisfy, with justice to the Egyptian people, the present exigencies of the Government. Well, but by the acknowledgment of the noble Earl again, they are not able to reduce the interest of the Debt without the consent of the Powers, which they do not possess. They are not able to reduce the cost of the government of Egypt, because that is the ground on which they have dissolved the Conference. The money must be found somewhere, and they cannot get it from the credit or resources of the English Government, because they have taken no Vote of Parliament for that purpose; and, therefore, they are at present in the condition of having found that certain money, by their own most solemn assertions, was indispensably necessary, and having, by assertions equally solemn, ascertained there are no resources from which that money can be drawn. I shall listen with great interest to the account to-morrow how they propose to solve this problem; but a discussion of the Conference itself is premature until the Papers are placed before us.

LORD HOUGHTON: With regard to the Egyptian accounts, I wish to put a Question to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, because, by some misapprehension, a rumour has gone abroad, and it is mentioned by a public print—one of the best informed upon Egyptian affairs—I wish to know whether there is any ground for any suspicion that these accounts are unsatisfactory or inaccurate; and whether the criticisms of the French or any other experts justify such statements?

EARL GRANVILLE: The Question of my noble Friend is a very natural one, because one gentleman referred to is a near relative of my noble Friend. The report was founded upon a misunderstanding or misapprehension. There was no accusation made against the form of the accounts, or the manner in which they were kept. The question as to the difference of opinion was a difference as to the estimates of revenue arising from the Land Tax, and that had nothing to do with the Accountant's office. I am glad to take the opportunity of stating that no two gentlemen could have done their work more efficiently than those upon whom the duties devolved, and their work has been performed very much to their credit with the assistance of a staff of employés which has been wonderfully diminished, and which has been almost exclusively confined to the Natives of the country.

CITY OF LONDON—THE BENEFICE OF ST. OLAVE, JEWRY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in rising to ask, Why the benefice of Saint Olave, Jewry, in the City of London, of which the Lord Chancellor is the patron, has been left vacant for two years, notwithstanding the repeated prayers of the parishioners for the appointment of some godly clergyman as rector? said, that on this site there had been a church for over 700 years, and now a scheme had been set on foot to unite the parish to that of St. Margaret's, and to secularize the church. The church was built by Sir Christopher Wren, and hundreds, perhaps thousands, of City worthies lay buried in its vaults. The inhabitants were prepared to use almost any means to prevent the desecration of the dead which the sale of the site would entail. In some cases, no doubt, it was inevitable that this should take place; but the inhabitants of the parish denied that this was the case here. If the scheme were carried out, one church would have to serve for seven parishes. It was true that the congregation had been extremely small; but that had been owing largely to the fact of its rector having been an absentee for many years, and clergymen of neighbouring parishes had found themselves able to fill their churches. The population of the district was increasing, and it was probable that a large amount of dwellings for the working classes would be erected in it. He thought that this was not a time to deprive the City of an interesting relic such as this church. In conclusion, he begged to ask the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that he would not have permitted a union of those two parishes to take place, if it had not appeared to him that a strong and clear case for it had been made out. The two parishes of St. Margaret and St. Olave had happened to be vacant at the same time, and it had been suggested to him that it would be desirable to take the opportunity for their union. The suggestion had come from the Bishop of London, and it had also been supported by persons deeply interested in the welfare of the Church and its efficiency in that part of the City, and who had contributed largely out of their own means towards those objects. The aggregate population of both parishes was about 650. The Church of St. Margaret, which was the larger and better in all ways of the two churches, was within a stone's throw of St. Olave's, and in it there was ample accommodation not only for the whole united congregations, but for considerably more people. As to the architecture of St. Olave's Church, opinions might differ; but, from what he had heard, he should by no means think that it was either one of the most interesting or most beautiful of those built after the Great Fire. He had carefully inquired into the matter, and had come to the conclusion that there was a strong case established for the union, provided the necessary consents were obtained. That had been done, according to his own view of the law applicable to the case, which was confirmed by the Law Officers of the Crown. The clergyman whom he had appointed to St. Margaret's had undertaken the duty on the understanding that if the union took place he would accept the charge of the united parishes. The whole, or nearly the whole, of the endowments of St. Olave's would be devoted to the erection and endowment of a church in some other district where it was really wanted.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that Parliament had sanctioned the general principle of the Act under which this arrangement had been carried out 24 years ago, and he had only acted in this case upon the principles which Parliament had so sanctioned. This appeared to him to be exactly one of those cases which the Act was intended to meet. The church with which it was proposed to unite this one was within a few minutes' walk of St. Olave, Jewry. When there were at least 30 churches needed in Metropolitan districts which were for the most part unable to provide places of worship for themselves, it was desirable that when a church was no longer required the endowments should be applied in supplying needs which were very great and urgent. At a Vestry representing the united parishes the scheme was approved, with only two dissenting voices.

INFANTS BILL.—(No. 237.)

(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD FITZGERALD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the principle of the Bill was to recognize the mother's right, in the event of her surviving her husband, to be the guardian of her children either alone, if he had appointed no guardian, or conjointly with any guardian appointed by him. By the Common Law, the father's right to the custody and care of his infant children was fully recognized. It was subsequently, to some extent, affected by statute, especially the Infants Protection Act, 1873, and controlled by the Lord Chancellor, representing the Queen as Parens Patrie, where infants had been made wards of Courts in respect of their property. It was not intended to interfere with that branch of the law as it now existed. By an Act passed in the 12th year of the Reign of Charles II., the father was enabled to appoint guardians of his children, who after his death were clothed with very large powers over the infant children, their education, and their property, to the entire exclusion of the surviving mother. If the father did not appoint guardians, then the mother became guardian for nurture during the period of nurture; but full guardianship could only be obtained through the medium of Chancery. The surviving mother had no power to appoint a guardian to act after her decease. When the Statute of Charles II. was passed, the rights of a married woman and the claims of a mother had but small recognition in the law. Now, with the light of advancing civilization, the situation was entirely altered. The last relics of feudal barbarism in ignoring women's rights were rapidly disappearing. Under that Statute power was given to the father to appoint guardians to act after his death. Great cruelty was too often practised on the surviving mother, and it often happened that, although she was blameless in conduct and of unblemished character, her infant children were taken from her and committed to the charge of strangers during that period of life when they most required that maternal care and maternal love for which there could be no compensation. Their Lordships could not fail to recall to memory, even within the last few years, some instances of the greatest cruelty arising from this state of the law. The great object which the present Bill sought to effect was to redress that crying grievance. Accordingly, the effect of the 2nd clause would be to constitute the surviving mother guardian of her infant children in conjunction with any guardian appointed by the father. The 3rd clause permitted both parents to appoint guardians to act jointly after the decease of the survivor, and enabled the father to appoint a guardian to act with the surviving mother; and by the 4th sub-clause power was given in certain grave cases to the mother to apply to the Court during her husband's lifetime to appoint a guardian to act after her decease in conjunction with her surviving husband. The remainder of the Bill consisted of procedure, but of an important and valuable character. It clothed the Court with new and full powers to take order for the welfare of infants on the application of the mother during the life of the father—

“Having regard to the welfare of the infant, the conduct of the parents, and the wishes alike of the father and of the mother.”

It gave a new jurisdiction to the County Courts, but rendered safe by a right to each party to have the case at once removed to Chancery, coupled with a summary right of appeal from every order made by a County Court Judge. He had only further to add that the Bill did not interfere with the right of the father during his life, or with the rights of property, and left wholly untouched the burning question of religious teaching. He hoped it might be possible to pass the Bill this Session.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^d.”
—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

EARL CAIRNS said, this was a Bill which unquestionably made the largest change in the law of this country relating to families that had been seen for the last 200 years. He desired to point out to their Lordships that the Bill had been printed and circulated only on Saturday afternoon, and that on Monday they were asked to assent to the principle by reading the measure a second time. Considering the circumstances in which they were placed at that late period of the Session, he thought this was rather hard on their Lordships. Various Bills had been relinquished on the ground that they would lead to a great deal of debate; and as he was certain this Bill would lead to a considerable discussion he did not think it possible to do otherwise than to refer it to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House. Every sentence of the Bill would require the greatest consideration. He should like to abstain from offering any opinion as to whether he agreed to the necessity for an alteration of the law; he would say nothing about that; but he held a very strong opinion that it would be utterly impossible to pass this Bill in its present shape. The proposals which it made would lead to squabbles on all the families in the country. It proposed to give a complete blank cheque to the County Court Judges to act in all cases where the guardians of the children differed. In conclusion, he explored their Lordships, before they made a change in the law, to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought that the principle of the Bill was sound, and that the objections to its provisions were capable of sufficient answers. The existing law in regard to the rights of the mother respecting her children was unjust and unsatisfactory, and ought to be amended in the direction which the Bill proposed to alter it. He contended that the mother had natural rights as strong as those of the father, and there were many things in which she was more competent to decide, especially as to daughters under age. Why should not the natural equality of her rights be recognized, while both parents were living, or if she were the survivor? And, when both were dead, what ground was there, in nature or in reason, for refusing her all voice and power in the selection of those who should then take care of the orphan children, some of whom might be girls of tender years? Was it not fair that the widow should be the guardian, if her husband had appointed no guardians, and if he had, that she should be a joint guardian? As to squabbles, and interference of County Court Judges, he could not conceive why the harmony of any families, in which there were at present no squabbles, should be disturbed by a legal recognition of the mother's natural and moral rights; and, as some Court must have authority, in cases of difference, the poor as well as the rich must be able to go to one. But as the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns) considered that it would be impossible to discuss it satisfactorily this Session, it would, of course, be useless to proceed with it.

LORD BRAMWELL expressed his entire concurrence with everything which had been said by the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns). The Bill might be made the means of a great deal of mischief. The law with respect to the guardianship of infants needed some amendment; but it was a most difficult and delicate subject, and required the greatest care.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he had hoped that he should have been able to remove all the objections which his noble and learned Friends had raised to the Bill in Committee. He thought he had done no harm in eliciting that discussion; on the contrary, he had assisted in attracting public attention to a great and admitted grievance. In view of the statements of noble and learned Lords, he considered he would best do his duty at present by not pressing the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading discharged.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—FAIR RENTS (SIR RICHARD WALLACE).

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that, in the agreements for fair rents settled out of court by Sir Richard Wallace with his tenants, a proviso is inserted binding the tenant, in addition to the stated rent, to pay court leet and all other customary dues; whether this, in some cases, if enforced, would make the new rent higher than the old; whether the agent is in the habit of not enforcing these additional payments, save in cases where tenants may make themselves obnoxious to him; and, whether such agreements are legally binding upon the tenants?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. Tre-VELYAN): The Land Commissioners state that in some agreements for fair rents lodged with them from Sir Richard Wallace's estate, it has been stipulated that leet and other customary dues should be paid in addition to the fixed rent. The Commissioners would have preferred that the whole rent should have been stated in one sum; but as the agreements, with the consent of the parties interested, ran in a different form, the Commissioners did not feel justified in rejecting them. They are legally binding in their present form. The Commissioners were informed by Sir Richard Wallace's agent that the leet money on the estate was only 8*d.* from each head tenant, and 4*d.* from each cottier tenant, and there would be this addition to the rent if enforced.

SIR RICHARD WALLACE: I would wish to supplement this Question. It is asked whether the effect of this agreement was to make the new rents higher than the old? My answer is, decidedly not. [Cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. GRAY: I rise to Order. I did not ask the hon. Baronet a Question.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet is not entitled to answer a Question which has already been answered by a Member of the Government.

SIR RICHARD WALLACE: I wish to make a personal explanation.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet can make a personal explanation.

SIR RICHARD WALLACE was understood to say that the new rent could not be higher than the old rent. The amount was too trivial, the leet money being 8*d.* for each head tenant and 4*d.* for each cottier tenant—the agent never made any difference between the tenants. He (Sir Richard Wallace) was convinced that his agent was too straightforward a man to have laid himself open to such an unwarrantable charge.

MR. GRAY: The explanation of the hon. Baronet may have been, no doubt, satisfactory to himself; but I did not hear a word of it.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELY DISPENSARY—USE OF BUILDING FOR PARTY PURPOSES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether anything has been done in reference to the use of the Ely Dispensary, Derrygonnelly, as an Orange Lodge?

The Solicitor General for Ireland

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for MR. TREVELYAN): The Board of Guardians have appointed another Committee to inquire into the matter, and for that purpose to meet the Committee of Management of the Ely Dispensary on Monday the 18th instant. As this day is so far distant, the District Inspector of the Local Government Board has been instructed to obtain, if possible, information as to the facts of the tenure of the dispensary building.

IRELAND—THE VISIT OF THE LORD LIEUTENANT TO BELFAST—DISPLAY OF FLAGS.

MR. BERESFORD (for Mr. CORRY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it a fact that Mr. George H. Thorman, licensed publican, living in Ballymacault, Belfast, had suspended from his windows for ten hours, on the 12th July, a Union Jack and a Stars and Stripes without any interference on the part of the authorities, and that at about eight o'clock the same evening, at the request of a sergeant of Constabulary, he immediately had them removed; but, notwithstanding his prompt action, a summons was issued against him at the suit of Head Constable Reilly; was the summons issued by the directions of or with the consent of the District Inspector of Constabulary; is it a fact that for several years licensed publicans in Belfast have exhibited flags on various occasions without any prohibition or criminal prosecution; is it a fact that, on the occasion of the recent visit of the Lord Lieutenant to Belfast, a publican at the corner of York Street and Donegal Street had suspended several flags, and also had an arch extended from his premises across the latter street, and, if so, was he remonstrated with, or has he been prosecuted for the offence; is it a fact that, on the same occasion, the same, or similar, flags for which Mr. Sherman was summoned were suspended from the police barracks in Ballymacault; and, is it the intention of the Executive that, for the future, loyal publicans in Ireland shall be prohibited from indicating their loyalty by any flag or symbol?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for MR. TREVELYAN): The facts are stated with substantial accuracy in the Question. In the case of Mr. Sherman, the summons was issued by direction of the District Inspector, who was not at the time aware that the flags had been so promptly removed when objected to by the police. The magistrates, in consideration of this promptitude, did not convict, but adjourned the case for a year—which is tantamount to a dismissal. With regard to the general question, it is right to observe that the display of flags from police stations and public-houses cannot properly be considered as on the same footing. The display of non-Party flags from a police station is not illegal; but from a public-house the display of any flags or emblems, not the usual sign of the house, is. [6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 38, s. 8.] The whole case forming the subject of the Question is under the consideration of the Inspector General, and further inquiry is being made into the action of the police, with which the Inspector General is not satisfied.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—DRAINAGE OF THE RIVER BARROW.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary, If he will lay upon the Table the report of the Surveyor of the Board of Works, Ireland, respecting the drainage of the Barrow, without waiting for the Report of the Valuator; and, whether he can say approximately at what dates the Valuator is expected to finish the district from Monasteravan to Athy, and when he expects to be able to commence with those of Rosenallis, Phillipstown, and Rathangan severally?

MR. COURTNEY: The final Report of the Chief Engineer to the Board of Works cannot be made until the valuation has been completed; but I can undertake to lay a preliminary Report, giving the general facts of the case, with an approximate estimate of the costs, before the House on Thursday next. As regards the valuator's work, we are constantly urging expedition; and we hope that the heaviest part of the work of the entire district will be completed by the end of September next.

EGYPT—THE PRESS LAW.

MR. HEALY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, on the demand of the British authorities or otherwise, Nubar Pasha is engaged in elaborating a Law against the liberty of the press in Egypt; if not, why has Nubar sent a circular to the Consuls General representing the Powers, asking their support in this sense; whether the proposed press measures are mainly directed against The Bosphore Egyptien, and The Pyramides; and, if it is the fact, as stated in The Fortnightly Review for August, in an article on Nubar Pasha, that previously Sir Evelyn Baring refused the demand of Mr. Clifford Lloyd to use his influence with M. Barrière to allow the Bosphore to be suppressed?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The attention of Her Majesty's Government was called by the Egyptian Government to the difficulties under which they laboured with regard to Press offences, owing to the immunities enjoyed by foreigners under the Capitulations, and to the refusal of some of the Foreign Representatives to co-operate with them in enforcing the Press Laws in the case of newspapers conducted by their co-nationalists. Her Majesty's Representatives at the principal capitals in Europe were instructed last month to bring the matter before the Governments to which they are accredited. There is no ground for the statement in The Fortnightly Review quoted by the hon. Member.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—GLIN PETTY SESSIONS—CASE OF DANIEL M'COY.

MR. SYNAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Daniel M'Coy, of Ballyhahill, in the county of Limerick, a member of the late Land League and of the National League was, on the 24th instant, sentenced to a month's imprisonment, upon a charge of being drunk and disorderly, by Captain Hatchell, at Glin Petty Sessions, without the option of a fine, as is usual, and without examining the evidence against the charge; whether on the same occasion he sentenced two other persons for the same offence, which they admitted, to a fine of 2s. 6d. and 10s. respectively; and, whether he will recommend His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to commute said imprisonment to a fine, or to remit or reduce said sentence, and enable the said Daniel M'Coy to return home to save his harvest?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): Daniel M'Coy was sentenced to a month's imprisonment for being drunk and very disorderly while in charge of a horse and car at Glin, where a number of people were assembled on the occasion of a regatta. The other fines referred to in the Question were imposed for simple cases of drunkenness. There does not appear to be any reason to question the propriety of the exercise of the magistrate's discretion; but it is, of course, open for M'Coy, or any person on his behalf, to appeal to the Lord Lieutenant for a mitigation of the sentence.

THE MAURITIUS.

Mr. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Is it the intention of the Government to grant the people of Mauritius the same privileges in responsible Government as promised to the people of Jamaica?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: The Secretary of State has announced his readiness to sanction the elective principle being introduced into the Legislature of Mauritius, and is awaiting detailed proposals which will then be considered by him. The detailed provisions will be, however, probably somewhat different from those in Jamaica. I would point out that the wording of the Question conveys an inaccurate impression, because in neither case is it intended to introduce responsible government as established in the self-governing Colonies.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — STEWARDSTOWN NATIONAL SCHOOL.

Mr. BERESFORD (for Mr. MACARTNEY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Roman Catholic National School, Stewardstown, county Tyrone, has been used for a considerable time as a place of practice by a so-called Nationalist Band; whether this has been done with the knowledge of the Patron and schoolmaster; and, whether it is in accordance with the rules laid down by the Commissioners of National Education?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) (for Mr.

TREVELYAN): Over two months ago, when the Commissioners discovered that the band had been permitted to play in the schoolroom, they at once, on the 30th of May, wrote to the manager—

“Expressing their regret that the manager should have permitted the school-house to be used for purposes leading to serious local controversies, and requesting him to take immediate steps to have the Commissioners' rules faithfully complied with in future.”

The manager, on receipt of this letter, assured the Board that the breach of the rules would be entirely discontinued.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — DR. MADIGAN, MEDICAL OFFICER.

Mr. SYNAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Dr. Madigan of Dromcolagher, in the county of Limerick, was removed as Medical Officer of the Constabulary at Springfield Castle and Clonmore in said county, and another doctor appointed, although the latter lived over eight miles from the stations, and Dr. Madigan was resident within two miles; whether the reason given by the Inspector General was that the stations were not in Dr. Madigan's dispensary district; whether the Constabulary station of Mount Kennedy is in Dr. Madigan's dispensary district, and why another doctor has been appointed medical officer to it; and, whether Dr. Madigan is a Catholic, and the doctors appointed by the Inspector General are Protestants?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): Dr. Madigan was never appointed by the Inspector General to be medical attendant of the Springfield Castle and Clonmore stations. But in 1882, when these stations, which are merely protection posts, were established, he was allowed by the County Inspector to act temporarily in that capacity pending a regular appointment. In conformity with a section of the Code then in force, but afterwards repealed, the appointment was given to the dispensary doctor of the district—Dr. Bolster, who holds a dispensary quite close to the two protection posts. With regard to the Ballykenedy station, it is true that it is in Dr. Madigan's dispensary district; but the section of the Code above referred to, and which gave dispensary doctors a prior claim to these appointments, was cancelled last year, as it was found not to work satisfactorily. This occurred before the Ballykenney appointment was made, and it was given to Dr. Malony, who resides about two miles off, instead of Dr. Madigan, who resides nine miles away. The religious profession of the several gentlemen is as stated in the Question; but in no way influenced an appointment.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—ISLAND OF LEWIS—CONVICTION FOR ASSAULT.

MR. DIOK-PEDDIE (for Mr. J. W. BARCLAY) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the following report of legal proceedings in Lewis:—

Late on Monday night, nearly the whole police force of Lewis, accompanied by John Fraser, sheriff officer, Stornoway, proceeded to Borge, 17 miles from Stornoway, in two conveyances. They returned yesterday morning, having in their custody two women, one of them very infirm looking and stated to be upwards of 70 years of age. The two females, who were surprised in and forcibly removed from their beds during the night, were accused of being concerned in the deforcement of a sheriff officer and several Lewis estate officials, while attempting, on 6th May last, to pull down a house alleged to have been built by Roderick Graham, son of Murdo Graham, crofter, Borge, on his father's lot, without the consent of the estate officials. The elder woman, who is the mother of Roderick Graham, was accused of assault and breach of the peace by throwing dirty water upon the estate officials, whilst the other woman, named Christina McLeod or Nicholson, was accused of assault. Mrs. Graham pleaded not guilty, while Mrs. Nicholson admitted having handed Mrs. Graham a pail of dirty water. The accused stated, in defence, that MacFarquhar, the district ground officer, had consented to the house being built. The Sheriff found Mrs. Graham guilty of assault, and fined her forty shillings, with the alternative of eight days' imprisonment. She went to prison. Mrs. Nicholson he dismissed with an admonition. Mr. John Ross, deputy procurator fiscal, prosecuted. The women were undetended;—

whether he is aware that John Ross, who prosecuted as procurator fiscal, is also law agent, or partner of the law agent, for the sole proprietrix of Lewis, also chief official for the management of the whole of the Island; and, whether, considering that it is alleged on behalf of the crofters that authority was granted to build the house in question, that the warrant granted for its demolition was irregular, he will order a special and independent inquiry into the circumstances of this case and the administration of justice in Lewis?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have seen the report referred to. I have already stated, in answer to previous Questions, that Mr. John Ross, Procurator Fiscal, is a member of a firm who are local law agents for the proprietrix of the Island of Lewis, but that he is not factor or land agent for the estate, which I suppose is meant by the expression "chief official for the management of the whole of the Island." I do not find any irregularity in the legal proceedings, or any ground for suggesting that there has been any miscarriage of justice, and I do not see any occasion for ordering further inquiry.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND)—NEW REVISION COURT, MONAGHAN.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, At whose instance was the order appearing in last Gazette made, appointing Clones as an additional Revision Court for Monaghan; who suggested the division of the districts given in the Schedule; can he explain why, although continual applications have been made to the Lord Lieutenant for similar facilities in County Dublin, they have always been refused; and, what means must now be taken to procure the additional Courts required for the Metropolitan county?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): The order was made in compliance with a Memorial signed by a large number of the inhabitants of the polling districts of Clones, Newbliss, and Rockcorry; also by the Lieutenant of the county and several magistrates residing in the district. The County Court Judge reported that the change would be a great accommodation to the residents of the district. With regard to the county of Dublin, it is true that on the 21st of August in last year Memorials were received, praying to have additional Revision Courts appointed for the county; and the applicants were informed that, having regard to the late period at which the application was made, and to the fact that the Quarter Sessions had been then fixed by the Recorder, and to the probability of legislation on the subject, it was not then considered advisable to make any change. The matter stands differently now. The subject of the Memorials is now receiving attention, and it is hoped that any changes necessary will be made.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — TYRONE ASSIZES — “QUEEN v. BEATTY.”

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of assault entitled the “Queen v. Beatty,” tried at the last Tyrone Assizes; whether, on the trial, a complete alibi on behalf of Beatty was proved, and whether the learned Judge who tried the case, after hearing the evidence, directed the jury to acquit Beatty on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the charge; whether this Beatty is the same person who was returned for trial by Captain Whelan on the charge of the murder of Francis M’Glone, and whether such charge was subsequently withdrawn by the Crown, and the charge of assault on O’Neill, the companion of M’Glone on the night of his death, was the only charge upon which Beatty was tried at the Assizes; whether Francis M’Glone made a deposition before his death, and therein stated that he was so drunk he could not blame any person; whether the coroner’s jury which inquired into the death of Francis M’Glone was composed of six Protestants and six Catholics, and returned a verdict that deceased came by his death by brain fever brought on by a blow or fall, but expressly stated that they could place no reliance on the evidence of the witness O’Neill; whether this O’Neill is the same witness upon whose uncorroborated evidence Captain Whelan, R.M., returned Beatty for trial, and whether, on such examination, Captain Whelan refused to hear any evidence tendered on behalf of Beatty, and also refused to admit Beatty to bail; whether the learned Judge on the trial reflected on the magistrate who sent forward such a case, and said he ought to have received evidence tendered before him on behalf of Beatty; and, whether, having regard to the fact that Beatty is a young man of most respectable character, the sole support of his parents, and has been detained in jail without any evidence to warrant such detention for upwards of five months, and has been obliged to pay the expenses of his trial when deprived of the means of livelihood, the Government are prepared to recommend any compensation to him in consequence?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) for (MR. TREVILYAN): It is true that in the assault case the Judge directed the jury to acquit Beatty after hearing the evidence for the defence. This evidence was not before the magistrates who returned him for trial. He is the same person who was returned for trial by Captain Whelan for the murder of Francis M’Glone. That charge was not withdrawn by the Crown; but the Grand Jury ignored the bill for manslaughter, and, consequently, it was for the assault on O’Neill that Beatty was tried. Francis M’Glone made an information before his death, in which he stated that he went into a public-house in Dungannon with Arthur O’Neill, and a strange man, afterwards identified by O’Neill as Beatty, but that he did not remember anything after that, as he was drunk. The Coroner’s jury was composed of an equal number of Protestants and Catholics, and they found a verdict that M’Glone died from inflammation of the brain brought on by a fall or a blow. They did not add that no reliance could be placed on the evidence of O’Neill. He was corroborated by several persons as to Beatty having been in the public-house on the occasion; but there was a discrepancy in some points between his evidence and that of other witnesses. When Captain Whelan returned Beatty for trial, he did not refuse to examine witnesses for the defence. On the contrary, he did examine one witness who was about proceeding to America, and Beatty’s solicitor said he would reserve his defence for the Assizes. The Government are not aware that the learned Judge who tried the case made any reflection on the magistrate who sent it for trial, or made the statement referred to. The District Inspector, who was in Court, reports that he heard nothing of the kind said. Beatty is not the sole support of his parents, as his father is in service. It is believed that local subscriptions have been made to defray his expenses; but, whether that be so or not, the Crown are not prepared to recommend any claim for compensation.

SUNDAY CLOSING (IRELAND)—ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS, &c.

MR. WARTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the recent Return [headed "Arrests for Drunkenness, &c. (Ireland)," and numbered 259], at what hour Sunday, for the purposes of that Return, is supposed to begin; and, whether such hour is not that of eight of the clock in the forenoon, or how otherwise?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): For the purposes of the Return, Sunday was calculated as beginning immediately after 12 o'clock on Saturday night and ending at 12 o'clock on Sunday night.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—PATRICK FARRY—COMPENSATION MONEY.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why it is that Patrick Farry, who was so seriously injured when on Protection Duty at Castle Island in December 1880, as to be obliged to leave the Royal Irish Constabulary, and who was awarded, on the 1st of June last, the sum of £400 compensation under the Crimes Act, to be paid to him in three instalments, the first instalment to be paid to him forthwith, has not been paid one farthing of the money due to him?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): The money cannot be paid until it is collected. The collection of the first instalment in this case has just been completed, with the exception of a few shillings considered irrecoverable. The amount collected—namely, £131 18s. 10d., will be paid over to Farry in a few days.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why it is that, in cases where compensation money has been awarded by order of the Lord Lieutenant, under the Crimes Act, to persons who have suffered from outrages in Ireland during recent years, the money awarded is not paid over at once to those who may be entitled to it; whether he is aware that great hardships and sufferings are inflicted upon the injured persons, and that the action of the law is brought into contempt by this delay; and, whether the Government will consider, during the Recess, the propriety of paying the sum awarded to injured persons without delay, and in one lump sum?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): The money awarded cannot be paid over at once, as is suggested in this Question. It cannot be paid over till it has been collected. The collectors are members of the Constabulary, and are proceeding with the collection as rapidly as they can; and in any cases where the persons awarded compensation make a proper case for being paid whatever portion of the award has been collected, the Government ascertain the amount from the collectors and pay it over without waiting for the completion of the collection. Where no such application is received, the collection proceeds uninterruptedly until he has received the entire sum or instalments, if the collection be by instalments. The Government has no fund at its disposal out of which it could advance the compensation awarded, which is the only mode by which what is suggested in the final paragraph of this Question could be carried out.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—BALTINGLASS UNION.

MR. M'COAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, at the late election of a Poor Law guardian at Rathdangan, county Wicklow, Mr. Dagg, the clerk and returning officer of the Baltinglass Union, declared the result of the voting to be 72 valid votes for Cecil and 71 for Kenna; whether, at the subsequent inquiry held by Dr. M'Cabe, by order of the Local Government Board, Cecil was still found to be entitled to 72 votes, but Kenna to only 69, the reduction in his case resulting from new evidence which had not been before the returning officer when he credited him with 71; whether the vote of the Board of Guardians to raise the salary of Mr. Dagg, as clerk of the Union, from £95 to £110 a-year, was supported by guardians representing a valuation of £17,000, and was opposed by only four guardians, representing a valuation of £400; and, whether, in view of the fact that the salary of the late clerk, Mr. Cooke, was £140, and that the Local Government Board objected at the time to the reduction of this amount after his death, ten years ago, the Board will now sanction the small increase of the reduced salary which has been recently voted by so preponderant a majority of the guardians to the present clerk?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): The facts are correctly stated in the first and second paragraphs of the Question. The proposal to raise the clerk's salary from £95 to £110 per annum was carried by a majority of 17 Guardians to four; but the Local Government Board have no Return showing the valuation of the property of these gentlemen. The question of sanctioning the proposed increase is at present under the consideration of the Board.

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL AND ZULULAND.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have now received any definite information concerning the enrolment in May last, in the Colony of Natal, of a body of Volunteers for military service in Zululand; whether he is aware that this force was organised by means of advertisements in the newspapers and of printed circulars; and, whether he can inform the House why the Natal Government did not take steps to prevent the breach of the Neutrality Laws of the Colony thus threatened?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The enrolment referred to was ostensibly, at any rate, not for military service in Zululand, but for service in the Reserve, "for the protection of the property of White residents and others from Usutu marauders," to use the words of the printed Circular referred to. Sir Henry Bulwer has been informed by the Secretary of State that the issue of such an advertisement was improper, and that the proceeding was clearly an interference with his responsibility for the protection of the Reserve as Special Commissioner for Zululand, and that of Mr. Osborn, as Resident Commissioner; that it had naturally given rise to misapprehension; and that he should take such measures as might prevent its recurrence. I may add that the force collected numbered only 10, and was dispersed in a fortnight.

Mr. M'Coan

ARMY—PAY DEPARTMENT—QUARTERMASTERS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the Army Quartermasters, who, until lately, were eligible for and frequently appointed to Regimental Paymasterships, have been excluded absolutely and permanently from the Army Pay Department; if so, on what grounds; whether it is the fact that they held these Paymasterships to the advantage of the Public Service; and, whether it is intended to recoup them in the amount which they have lost by being deprived of the appointment of Paymaster, with its substantial advantages in pay and retired pay?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: In reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that since the formation of the Army Pay Department in 1878, the qualification for appointment has been the holding of the rank of captain in the Army. As I stated in reply to the hon. Member's Question on Friday last, the revised Pay Warrant rather facilitates than otherwise the admission of quartermasters into the Pay Department by reducing the qualifying commissioned service as combatant officers from ten to seven years, and admitting lieutenants as well as captains. My answer to the hon. Member's second Question is that some of the quartermasters who were appointed to be paymasters in former times gave very good service; and, in answer to the third, I have to say that it is not intended to recoup the quartermasters, since it cannot be recognized that they have sustained any loss by the recent change in the Regulations for appointments to the Pay Department.

THE ANNUAL ESTIMATES.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will give to this House greater facilities for controlling the normal expenditure of the Country by causing all the Annual Estimates to be prepared upon the system adopted in the Naval Estimates for the present year, in which the items of a current year's original Estimate are shown in comparison with the corresponding items of the previous year's original Estimate, by the latter being placed in juxta-position to the former;

the items of a similar nature voted in any Supplementary Estimate for the year being shown separately below the original item, and accounted for in a separate sub-total, as in the Navy Estimates. The estimated increase or decrease of any item and any vote being shown as the difference between the original Estimates, and not the difference between the original Estimate of the current year and the total of the original and the Supplementary Estimates of the previous year?

MR. COURTNEY: Perhaps my hon. and gallant Friend will allow me to answer. Directions will be given that, in future, the summer Supplementary Estimates, which are now included in the comparison of the new Estimates with the Estimates for the previous year, shall, in future, be distinctly and separately marked as "Supplementary." It is impossible to include the spring Supplementary Estimates also, as they are not voted at the time the annual Estimates are made up; but it may be said generally of them that they are balanced by savings, and involve no real addition to the Annual Expenditure.

THE CHURCH IN THE COLONIES— GRENADA.

MR. PICTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there has been received at the Colonial Office a Petition to the Colonial Secretary, from inhabitants of Grenada, asking for his interference in regard to a vote of £260 for repairing an Anglican parsonage in the town of St. George, such grant having been carried against the votes of a majority of the unofficial members of the Legislative Council, and being in violation of the Act which disendowed the Anglican Church in the Colony; and, whether any, and what, action has been or will be taken in the matter by the Colonial Secretary?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Such a Petition has been received. I already answered a Question as to this on the 2nd of July, and have little to add. We had already at that date sent a despatch to the Governor, asking on what grounds the Colonial Government considered itself bound to undertake the repair of this parsonage? No reply has as yet been received.

EGYPT (OPERATIONS IN THE SOUDAN) — THE ROYAL MARINES.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (for Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Officers and men of the Royal Marines, recently employed in the Soudan, will receive their gratuities according to the Prize Scale laid down in the Admiralty Instructions in which their corps is included?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This is not a case of prize money, and we are, therefore, not bound to any prize scale; but the Army Prize Scale will, as in the case of 1882, be followed in distributing the gratuities to the Marines who served with the Army in the Soudan.

GIBRALTAR—THE SANITARY COMMISSION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If the Governor of Gibraltar has been yet able to induce civilians of position and standing to fill the vacancies in the office of Commissioner; and, if Her Majesty's Government are prepared to rescind some of the changes which have proved objectionable to the civilian population?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; the Governor of Gibraltar has been instructed to rescind the chief provisions of the law regulating the Sanitary Commission to which objection was taken by the Commissioners who represented the ratepayers. It is expected that these gentlemen will now resume their functions; but there has not yet been time to receive information to that effect.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— DANIEL MAHONY.

MR. DEASY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If it is a fact that the Grand Jury of the Bantry, county Cork, Quarter Sessions, found a true bill against a man named Daniel Mahony, who was charged with housebreaking and robbery; whether it is a fact that, through some alleged informality in framing the indictment, the accused was not brought to trial, but liberated unconditionally; and, whether it was in consequence of the said Daniel Mahony having been a crown witness at the Cork Summer Assizes of 1883 that he was set at liberty?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): Daniel Mahony was committed for trial on a charge of larceny of £10—not housebreaking, as stated in the Question. The informations did not state whether the woman from whom the money was stolen was a married woman. If so, the name of her husband should be given. When the indictment was prepared a blank for the name was left, and, unfortunately, it was afterwards overlooked by the officials, and was not discovered in time. The prosecution fell through on account of this informality; but the charge remains intact, and a fresh bill will be sent up to the next Quarter Sessions. There never was any intention of abandoning the prosecution; and the suggestion that Mahony was set at liberty because he was a Crown witness at the Cork Summer Assizes is wholly without foundation.

SOUTH AFRICA (ZULULAND)—THE RESERVE TERRITORY.

Mr. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any truth in the statement in The Times of July 21st, to the effect that—"The present condition of the Zulu Reserve is described as being deplorable. About 1,000 rebels have collected there, centred in Inkandhla, under Dabulamansi. These roam about as they please, simply evading the troops when in movement against them, by passing round them. The Usutus seem to consider the Imperial forces to be sent there more for their protection than for that of the loyalists whose numbers are fast diminishing."

or in that of The Times of July 31st, which states that Usutu refugees in Natal have lately attempted to raid into the Reserve; and, in that case, whether he can corroborate the statement of the President of the Board of Trade, that—

"The chiefs with whom we entered into engagements can come into the Reserved Territory, and find security there?"

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: I must certainly decline to endorse the expression "deplorable" introduced into the hon. Member's Question as applicable to the condition of the Zulu Reserve. Papers about to be presented will, I think, satisfy the hon. Member as to this. The "1,000 rebels" mentioned must be a réchauffé of the attack made by the Usutus on Mr. Osborn some time ago, before any steps had been taken to restore order. We have no information of any Usutu attack threatening on the Natal side. There is no reason to doubt that any refugee Chiefs will find effectual protection in the Reserve under the Residents and the troops.

Mr. GUY DAWNAY asked whether there was any room in the Reserve Territory to allocate land to any considerable number of refugees?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: That is impossible to answer, because what the hon. Member may mean by "considerable" I do not know. If the hon. Member will give me any number I will make inquiries.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CON. STABLE BERNARD KING.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the circumstances of the death of Police Constable Bernard King, who was stationed in Larkfield, county Longford, and was doing duty in Grannard in that county, on Monday 14th July, on which day, after returning to his station, he suddenly fell ill; whether it is true that he was not visited by a doctor until Sunday July 20th, and was not removed into hospital (where he died) until Tuesday July 22nd; and, whether he will cause some inquiry to be made in order to see if negligence on the part of any one contributed to the police constable's death?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): I am informed that the constable complained of feeling unwell on the 15th July, but appeared on parade as usual on that day and the next. On the 16th he reported himself sick, and he was visited by the doctor on the 17th, 19th, and 20th. He was certified to be suffering from a bilious attack and headache. On the 20th the doctor recommended his removal to hospital, and he was taken there by two of his comrades on the 22nd. He died in hospital on the 25th, of meningitis. The district officer reports that no man could be more carefully looked after than the deceased constable was while in barrack by his comrades and the sergeant's wife, and there is no doubt that he was properly treated in hospital.

There does not appear to be any ground for attributing negligence to anyone.

IRELAND—STATE-AIDED EMIGRATION.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that a woman named Jane Kenny, who had been frequently convicted of robberies, was, with her illegitimate son, sixteen years of age, about to be sent from Limerick Female Prison to Canada; that she was a native of Carlow, and registered in the workhouse there as a Catholic; that she became a Protestant in Limerick; that the Governor of the Limerick Prison wrote letters and sent telegrams, with pre-paid reply, asking Carlow guardians to give money to buy clothes for the son; that, on refusal, the woman returned to Carlow Workhouse and became a Catholic again; whether it was out of the public funds that the expenses of the telegrams were paid, and if public funds were to have been applied to pay the passage money of these people; by whose authority the Governor of Limerick Prison sent this application, and offered to pay the boy's fare to Limerick; and, whether State-aided emigrants sent to Canada are largely drawn from such classes?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): Jane Kenny, when received into Limerick Prison, was registered as a Protestant and a married woman. The Prisons' Board have at their disposal a charitable fund called "Barbara Tut-hill's Fund," bequeathed to enable them to assist cases needing aid. Jane Kenny's case was considered a suitable one to assist by means of this fund. It was believed that if she was separated from her old associates the woman would do well. It was therefore proposed to send her to Canada with her son—the fare to be paid out of the charitable fund referred to. The Governor of the Prison, by the authority of the Vice Chairman of the Prisons' Board, wrote to Carlow to ascertain if the Guardians would provide clothes for the boy. One letter was sent at the public expense. It is not the fact that telegrams—pre-paid or otherwise—were sent at the public cost, or that any public expense would have been incurred if the proposal for emigration had been carried through. When the Carlow Guardians refused to provide clothing for the boy, Jane Kenny returned to Carlow. I am not aware whether she then professed herself a Roman Catholic. As I have already intimated, it was not proposed to send this woman out as a State-aided emigrant, and it is not the fact that State-aided emigrants are drawn from such classes.

TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE 44—THE JEWS IN ROUMANIA.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that the number of Jews in Roumania rendered destitute by the new edict against hawking is 20,000, and not 2,000, as stated in the Despatch of Her Majesty's Representative, dated Bucharest, June 29; whether he is aware that the Jews and their families thus reduced to destitution by the action of the Roumanian Government are unable to leave Roumania for the purpose of earning their living elsewhere, from the fact that the Roumanian Government will not, even in the case of those who have been domiciled in the Country for generations, grant them the necessary passports, on the ground that they are not Roumanian subjects; whether this action is not a distinct violation of Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin; whether he is aware that Article 7 of the Roumanian Constitution, made subsequent to, and on the basis of, the understanding by which Roumania was granted her independence by the Great Powers, is used as a means of evading the express stipulations of Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, as one of the Signatory Powers at the Treaty of Berlin, will alone, or in conjunction with the other Powers, make representations to the Roumanian Government on the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In a despatch dated July 21, a copy of which has been supplied to the hon. Member, Her Majesty's Minister at Bucharest intimated that the number of Jews in Roumania affected by the new edict against hawking "is much more considerable than the 2,000 mentioned in his previous despatch." It seems doubtful whether this edict is at variance with Article 44 of the Treaty of Berlin. Inquiry will, however, be made as to the statement that Jews are prevented from leaving Roumania, and until an answer is received I can make no further statement.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — MR. GEORGE BOLTON, A BANKRUPT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as the Report for George Bolton's salary was obtained by accident, he can now announce the decision of the Government?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) (for Mr. TREVELYAN): The Irish Government had been advised that the Treasury Circular providing for the suspension of a civil servant when he becomes a bankrupt or enters into a composition with his creditors in the Bankruptcy Court does not in its literal terms apply to Mr. Bolton in his character of Crown Solicitor; but the Lord Lieutenant, nevertheless, has come to the decision, considering the admitted financial position of Mr. Bolton and the interest of the Public Service, that he ought to be dealt with by analogy to the Circular, and accordingly it has been decided that Mr. Bolton shall be suspended. The same decision will apply to his position of Solicitor to the Valuation Office.

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES—THE ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE.

MR. BARRAN asked, What course the Government propose to take in consequence of the decision of judges on the recent competition for the design for the New Admiralty and War Office; and, whether the building will be commenced at once?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I have informed Messrs. Leeming and Leeming, the authors of the successful design in the recent competition, that, subject to the approval of Parliament, they will be employed as architects for the building of the New Admiralty and War Office, and that the Government will submit a Vote to this House for the commencement of the building. As there is not time for Members to form a judgment on the design in what remains of the present Session, I shall defer submitting a Vote till next year. In the meantime the architects will be in communication with my Department with a view to making such modifications and improvements in the plan as may be suggested to them, so that it may be laid before the House next year in as perfect a shape as possible.

THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the First Commissioner of Works, with reference to the statement made by him some time ago to the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire, Whether he can now fully state what arrangements have been made respecting the future site of the equestrian statue of the illustrious Duke?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The removal of the statue of the Duke of Wellington to Aldershot will commence on Thursday next. An Ordnance store will be made ready to receive it there pending the final decision as to the site for its erection, on which the military authorities have to be consulted. The site will probably be the centre of the parade ground in the North Camp. A suitable pedestal will then be erected for it out of the money contributed to the Prince of Wales's Fund. The statue will be put together and erected again by the artificers of the Royal Engineers.

ARMY (INDIA)—QUARTERMASTERS.

MR. T. THORNHILL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can state why Quartermasters of the British Army, serving in India and holding the rank of Captain, have only received the allowances of that rank from October 1st 1882, instead of, as in the case of other grades of non-combatant Officers, from July 1st 1881?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I am not aware what other grades of non-combatant officers are meant; but I may state that the Royal Warrant of 1881 did not accord the Indian allowances of captains to quartermasters in India. These allowances were sanctioned by the Secretary of State for India in Council in September, 1882; and, in accordance with custom, retrospective effect was not given to the Orders which sanctioned them.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of India respecting the arrears of non-effective Army charges is now complete, and when it will be laid upon the Table, in accordance with his promise on the 26th of May?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: When I answered the hon. Member on May 26, I was in hopes that an agreement would speedily be arrived at regarding the method of paying for the non-effective Army Charges in future. In this, however, some delay has occurred, and I will therefore make no objection to the production of the Correspondence to March 31 last, relating to the payment of the arrears, if the hon. Member will move for it.

CENTRAL ASIA — DELIMITATION OF THE AFGHAN FRONTIER.

Mr. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Under whose protection the Commission recently appointed to fix the Afghan Boundaries will be; will the Amir be represented; if so, by how many officers; what will be the duties of the Commission, and what orders have been given to them; in case of difference of opinion between our officers and the Russian officers, or those of the Amir, to what Government will our officers refer; is the escort to be provided to consist entirely of Native Troops; and, what arrangements have been made for constant communication between our officers and either the Home Government or the Government of India?

Mr. GLADSTONE: On inquiry I find that communications are still going on with the Russian Government with regard to these various points, and I am not as yet in a position to give an answer.

Mr. ONSLOW: Will the right hon. Gentleman say if it is true that our Mission is to start in October, or, as reported in The Times, that it is to be put off to the spring of next year? Perhaps this Mission is one of the most important that has ever been sent out from India; and I hope before the House adjourns we shall have some further information.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I agree, Sir, as to the importance of this Commission. All I can say is that I have not heard anything of the suggested postponement.

Mr. ONSLOW: I shall put a further Question on the subject next Monday.

Mr. BOURKE: I beg to give Notice that on the Appropriation Bill I shall call attention to the whole of this subject.

Mr. ONSLOW: That being the case, I will put my Question down for Thursday.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will use his influence with the First Commissioner of Works to induce him to reserve for Grand Committee Rooms, and other extensions, the ground to the west of Westminster Hall lately occupied by the Law Courts, so that the Hall may be again, as it was originally, the centre of the Palace of Parliament?

Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked whether, having regard to the great objection that existed to the present scheme, and the impossibility of its being properly discussed during the present Session, it was not desirable to postpone the whole question till next Session?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to put that Question down on the Paper. I should not like to give an answer to it before first communicating with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Commissioner of Works. I believe that a certain amount of accommodation, available for one Grand Committee, is included in the plan as it now stands, to which the Government intend to ask the sanction of Parliament. Beyond that I do not think that my right hon. Friend is prepared to go. The hon. Gentleman asks me to use my influence with the First Commissioner of Works. Well, of course, the Treasury has a certain control over the Office of Works; but, at the same time, that Department must be allowed a certain amount of independence and judgment on a matter on which it is more competent than the Treasury to form an opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: Before the Vote is taken will the First Commissioner of Works allow Members of the House to visit the locus in quo?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I will give orders that any hon. Member who desires to see the west front of Westminster Hall shall be admitted within the inclosure at any time to-morrow. Indeed, I shall have great pleasure in personally explaining to any hon. Member what is proposed to be done there between the hours of 3 and 4 o'clock to-morrow.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government have come to any decision as to the future employment of Mr. Clifford Lloyd?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am obliged to the hon. Member for having postponed this Question, in order to enable me to communicate with the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland. The hon. Member is aware that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was called on public grounds from an employment in Ireland to employment of a higher grade in Egypt. He will no longer prosecute that employment in Egypt. The Irish Government cannot give any positive pledge that he will not resume his post as Resident Magistrate in Ireland; but they hope to make some more adequate and suitable arrangement.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware of the statement made by the Secretary to the Treasury a few nights ago, that Mr. Clifford Lloyd would not be appointed in Ireland?

MR. COURTNEY: I think I said he would not be one of the five persons receiving extra pay.

EGYPT—SLAVERY—THE CONVENTION OF 1877.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether effect is to be given in Egypt Proper to the existing Convention of 17th August 1877, and Khedivial Decree in accordance therewith, under which the buying and selling of human beings is prohibited, under severe penalties, from the 17th of the current month; and, if he will give an assurance that, whether or not the further measures recommended by Lord Dufferin for altogether abolishing slavery be immediately effected, Her Majesty's Government will, as recommended by Lord Dufferin, press the Egyptian Government to give the fullest possible effect in Egypt Proper to the existing Convention and its Annexes?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have no reason for doubting the intention of the Khedive to give due effect to his Treaty engagements in regard to Egypt Proper.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

They lose no opportunity of pressing upon the Egyptian Government the necessity of observing their engagements in regard to the treatment of the question of Slave Trade and Slavery, and I would refer the hon. Member to the despatch of Sir Evelyn Baring, dated February 25, 1884, in Slave Trade No. 2.

THE AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES—CONFEDERATION.

MR. BLAKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, in view of the fact that four out of seven of the Australasian Colonies have agreed to proceed at once to confederate in an Australasian Dominion, and of his statement that no business will be taken in the Autumn Session except the Franchise Bill, it may not be possible to introduce and pass an enabling Bill before the end of this Session, so as to obviate the loss of a whole year, which will otherwise occur in giving effect to the decisions of the Colonial Parliaments? The hon. Member also asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to introduce a Bill in the Autumn Session?

MR. GLADSTONE: I can give no pledge at the present time with regard to the Autumn Session in deviation from what I have already stated. Of course, what I have stated will not bind the House or the Government in connection with causes at present unforeseen and of a sufficient magnitude to require that we should deviate from the policy already laid down; but at present there is no such cause before us. The Question which is upon the Paper asks whether this important object of enabling the Australasian Colonies to confederate might be accomplished by the introduction of an enabling Bill in the present Session? What I have to say in answer is that it would not be right to introduce such a Bill and then to withdraw it. That would not be respectful to the Colonies, nor would it be likely to be understood in a favourable sense. Neither would it be right to introduce such a Bill if it were to become the subject of differences of opinion; and to continue sitting until a Bill, if it were opposed, could be passed would be contrary to the pledge which the Government have given to the House not to proceed with contentious Business at this period of the Session. But if we could be assured that the House would give its unanimous assent to a Bill for the simply enabling purpose described in the Question, even at this moment I would agree to its introduction.

MR. BLAKE: Would the right hon. Gentleman be so kind as to test the feeling of the House by introducing a Bill? I think I may promise, on the part of my Friends in this part of the House, that we would not offer any opposition to such a Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend has evidently not observed what I stated. He proposes that I should introduce a Bill to test the feeling of the House. But I observed that it would not be respectful to the Colonies and would not wear a friendly aspect, were I to introduce a Bill and then to withdraw it. Either the Government or the House would be open to some criticism in the Colonies. I understand the hon. Member to speak confidently for the quarter of the House with which he is connected, and so far I am well satisfied. I could not, however, at this moment, as growing out of a Question, inquire from right hon. and hon. Members opposite what their views are; but I think it probable that in the course of the evening they may have the kindness to make their views known to us. If it appears that there exists such a unanimous disposition as would alone justify the introduction of the Bill, Notice of the Bill might be given this evening, and it might be introduced to-morrow.

EGYPT—ARMED STEAMERS ON THE NILE

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he can inform the House what number of armed steamers are now engaged in patrol duty on the Nile, above and below the First Cataract, and whether all are under the command of British Naval Officers; further, to inquire if he can state what number of steamers are under the control of General Gordon; and, whether suitable craft are being prepared for the purpose of opening up communications with Dongola, Berber, and Khartoum during the rise of the Nile?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There are four steamers engaged in patrol duty on the Nile, and they are all under the command of British naval officers. There is no certain information as to the number of steamers under the control of General Gordon. Certain preparations have been made for passing some steam vessels up the Second Cataract.

EGYPT—POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will give the House an opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government, with regard to the affairs of Egypt, on Thursday next?

MR. GLADSTONE: There is something rather unusual in the form of the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, because I apprehend the different stages of the Appropriation Bill will give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of discussing the policy of the Government at his option, and without application or reference to me. But I have another remark to make which is more to the present purpose. When the right hon. Gentleman put a Question to me on Saturday, I put a construction upon it which, perhaps, was not quite accurate. I understood him to ask whether I could then name a day on which I could explain to Parliament the measures which we intended to adopt in Egypt, growing out of the recent failure of the Conference? The consideration of those measures, I had said, would require some time, and I replied accordingly that I could not name a day for that purpose. There is, however, a step of some importance which the Government contemplate, and which I hope to be in a condition to announce to-morrow. I should prefer not answering the Question now put to me until I am in a condition to make that announcement to the House, and I think it might possibly be more for the convenience of the right hon. Baronet and other Gentlemen opposite if that course were followed. I think they would be then able to form a judgment in a manner more satisfactory to themselves as to any course they may think fit to take. I am under the impression that it would, in any case, be thought desirable that Supply should be allowed to terminate before we enter into a discussion of a general character with regard to Egypt.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Of course, I am willing to put the Question to-morrow. Like the right hon. Gentleman, I am anxious to see Supply finished; but, at the same time, I think it much more important that the Egyptian Question should be discussed while it is still fresh.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not say that it is more important Supply should be finished, but only that it would be more convenient in the first place that Supply should be finished, merely in respect to the economy of time.

ITALY—ROME—THE ENDOWMENTS OF THE PROPAGANDA.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government still adhere to the declaration contained in the Despatch of Lord Kimberley to the Governor of Gibraltar, dated the 16th of January 1871, that—

"The deep interest which is felt by many millions of Her Majesty's subjects in the position of the Pope renders all that concerns his personal dignity and independence, and freedom to exercise his spiritual functions, fit subjects for the notice of Her Government. . . . Her Majesty desires me to state that this subject will continue to receive the careful attention of Her Government;"

whether he is aware that the endowments of the Propaganda, contributed by all the Catholic nations of the world, including a large section of Her Majesty's subjects, are strictly applied in the exercise of the spiritual functions of the Pope in connection with the Catholic missions throughout all regions of the world; and, if he will take, without delay, any steps which may be requisite to prevent any portion of these endowments from being converted by force to the secular uses of the Italian Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member, I think, cannot have been in his place when a former Question on this subject had been answered. So far, at least, as regards the practical part of his inquiry, I may say that, with respect to the despatch of Lord Kimberley, from which the hon. Member has quoted a passage, I cannot admit there is anything in that despatch from which Lord Kimberley would desire to recede at the present time. The character of the endowments to which the hon. Member refers has repeatedly been the subject of description in this House on the part of the Government, and I do not propose to go over the ground again. With respect to any steps that may be requisite to prevent any portion of these endowments from being diverted by force to the secular uses of the Italian Government, I must ask myself whether the matter is one within the legal jurisdiction of the Italian Government. If it be within the legal jurisdiction of the Italian Government—as I have always understood it was—I am not prepared to undertake to interfere with their legal jurisdiction. What Her Majesty's Government has repeatedly said is that they have instructed their Ambassador to be on the watch for any favourable opportunity for exercising an influence in the direction indicated by the hon. Member; but no such opportunity has presented itself to any of the Powers, several of whom are even more interested than the British Crown in the matter.

MR. GRAY asked the Prime Minister whether he would state the Powers which he deemed to be much more interested than England in this question.

MR. GLADSTONE replied that he had not spoken by way of experiment. Certainly, he should imagine that the Powers would be interested in this question in some sort of proportion to the Roman Catholic population. England, no doubt, had a large interest in the matter; but he did not stand upon that distinction.

MR. GRAY said, he had no desire to raise a controversial question upon the right hon. Gentleman's remark; but if the right hon. Gentleman indicated such countries as France, or Austria, or Spain, he would ask him whether he was aware that the funds of the Propaganda were only used for the benefit of missionary countries, and that those Catholic countries were not missionary countries, and had no interest in the funds?

[No reply.]

SUPPLY—RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON—VOTE OF CREDIT.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any expedition for the relief of General Gordon is contemplated; and, whether a Railway is to be made from Suakin to Berber or any part of the road to Berber; and, if so, whether a Supplementary Estimate will be presented to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is my intention to-morrow to propose a Vote of Credit to enable Her Majesty's Government to undertake operations for the relief of General Gordon, should they become necessary, and to make certain preparations in respect thereof. I believe there is in the Diplomatic Vote to-night an item which might become the subject of discussion in connection with the state of affairs of the Soudan. If that item of the Vote be chosen for the discussion, I should propose the Vote of Credit to-morrow at such a time as I could, because there is already in contemplation an arrangement for the first Vote to-morrow, and we are also very desirous, if we can, to bring on the Report of the Constabulary Vote. But, perhaps, it might be more convenient to the House, and to Gentlemen opposite, that they should found the discussion on the Vote of Credit, and in that case passing over the subject to-night, I should be ready to propose the Vote of Credit as the first Vote in Supply to-morrow.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked whether the proposed Vote of Credit, and the interesting statement which the right hon. Gentleman was to make to-morrow, formed one and the same subject.

MR. GLADSTONE: No; the two things are quite distinct. I did not say that I intended to make a statement of some interest. What I stated was that Her Majesty's Government contemplated a step of some importance, which I hope to be in a condition to announce to-morrow.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked whether that Vote would be a Vote of Credit or a Vote for the Diplomatic Service?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is not a question of a Vote for the Diplomatic Service, but of a Vote of Credit properly so called, and I propose, if the House should deem it a convenient course, to take any discussion that may be raised upon the Vote of Credit to-morrow. In that case, I should propose to take the Vote of Credit as the first Vote to-morrow. If, on the contrary, the discussion were taken to-night, for which there will be abundant justification on the Diplomatic Vote, I should bring on the Vote of Credit whenever I can.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I do not think the House exactly understands what this Vote is. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is to be a Vote of Credit for a considerable sum to purchase the supplies for an Expedition for the relief of General Gordon? It would be a great advantage to the House to know definitely what is the proposal.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have read to the House the purpose for which the Vote is to be taken.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state it again?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is

"A Vote of Credit to enable Her Majesty's Government to undertake operations for the relief of General Gordon, should they become necessary, and to make certain preparations in respect thereof."

MR. PULESTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman state the amount?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will not enter into any further explanation until I make the Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to introduce the Appropriation Bill this week?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is observed in this neighbourhood that I have not the gift of prophecy, and I cannot venture upon a prediction which might possibly tend to defeat itself.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Is there any precedent for taking a Vote of Credit without previous Notice of the amount?

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall give the Notice in the regular form, so that it will appear on the Paper.

MR. BOURKE: I should like to ask, as a Question arising out of the right hon. Gentleman's statement with regard to to-morrow, whether the announcement will involve a Motion on the part of the Government which will give the House an opportunity of judging of the policy of the Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot give any information about this announcement until I make it. I would have done so to-day, but it was not in my power; I made a great effort on Saturday to communicate the information, and the right hon. Gentleman may rest assured that I shall act on the same principle, and will not lose a moment.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I am afraid I am extremely stupid; but I cannot make out what is to take place to-morrow. All I want to know is when the Vote of Credit will be proposed?

MR. GLADSTONE: If the discussion on the Soudan and the case of General Gordon should not be taken to-night, then I should be prepared to propose the Vote of Credit as the first Vote in Supply to-morrow. If, on the other hand, the discussion on the Diplomatic Vote were taken to-night, then I should propose the Vote of Credit to-morrow at such an hour as I can bring it on.

MR. J. LOWTHER: In the event of a discussion being taken to-night, will Government be prepared to make a statement?

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I believe there is a misconception on another point. I understood my right hon. Friend to state that he would give Notice of the Vote of Credit to-night, and that the amount would be stated at the time.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I should like to ask the Government whether it is intended to propose an appropriation in Ways and Means in regard to the Vote of Credit?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): That is a Question which should be asked when the Vote of Credit is proposed.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked why, if the amount of the Vote was to be laid upon the Table that night, it could not at once be stated to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have given my Notice in the usual course, and I have said quite as much as is usual in giving Notice.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I would suggest that we had better take the discussion on the Vote of Credit and not on the Diplomatic Vote.

CENTRAL ASIA — DELIMITATION OF THE AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it was intended that the English Commissioners for the demarcation of Afghanistan should meet the Russian and Afghan Commissioners this year or next?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE replied, that it was very difficult to make partial statements while a matter of this kind was proceeding. He should require Notice of the Question.

MR. ONSLOW said, he had put Notices on the subject on the Paper already. He now gave Notice that, in future, he should address his Questions to the Prime Minister.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.
SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £157,975, (including a Supplementary sum of £35,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, the Papers had already been laid upon the Table in relation to the prohibition by the Egyptian Government of the landing of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt in Egypt. As those Papers had only been laid upon the Table that day, many hon. Members might not have had an opportunity of reading them. He would therefore state as briefly as he could the nature of their contents, and he would then ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to explain the reason why Her Majesty's Government had taken the course they had in the matter. Mr. Blunt had been before the country for a long time in connection with Egyptian matters. It would be remembered how, in 1882, he had warned the Government of the natural result of their policy in Egypt; and if they had accepted that warning, they would have been in a very much better position than that which they occupied to-day. Indeed, if there was one man to whom more than another the whole of the country and Her Majesty's Government were indebted, it was Mr. Wilfrid Blunt; and there could be no doubt that the political prisoners would have been executed but for the efforts of Mr. Blunt. Mr. Blunt had certainly rendered great service to the Government. Last autumn Mr. Blunt determined to go out to India, and he stopped in Egypt on his way. He did not engage in any political mission there, the political questions in which he had been engaged having been thoroughly threshed out, and Mr. Blunt could do no more in regard to them. He merely called there, and, having called there, he was treated as any other English gentleman would have been by Her Majesty's Representatives, who entertained him and entered into communications with him. He then left Egypt and went to India, and after remaining in India for some time, he returned, but was not allowed to land in Egypt again. All he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had now to do was to state the reasons given in the Papers laid before the House that day why Mr. Blunt was not allowed to land. It must be remembered that these reasons had been indorsed and approved by Sir Evelyn Baring and Earl Granville. All that was material as to the action of Egypt in the matter, so far as preventing the landing of an English subject, would be found on page 3 of the Papers which gave the letter of Cherif Pasha to Sir Evelyn Baring. That letter opened out the whole business. Cherif Pasha said—

"You are doubtless aware of Mr. Blunt's relations with Arabi and of the campaign undertaken by him in London to cast upon His Highness the odium of the massacres at Alexandria. I have no intention of reverting to past events, but I shall confine myself to acquainting you in a few words with the attitude adopted by Mr. Blunt during his recent stay in Egypt. On his arrival at Cairo he immediately entered into communication with the families of the rebels and with several other persons compromised in the recent events."

Now, he did not suppose that anybody knew there was a law in Egypt, or in England, that nobody was to confer with the families of rebels; but he was informed by Mr. Blunt that all the stories about interviews prolonged far into the night were untrue; that while in Egypt he was in bed regularly by half-past 9 or 10 o'clock; but that on one occasion he had received an invitation to dine with the officials connected with the British Embassy. The next thing stated in the letter was that—

"In his walks in the Bazaar he was continually conversing with the merchants with regard to Arabi."

That was the second charge. The third was that—

"Having learnt that a certain Abdel Rajah was detained in prison as implicated in the matter of the anonymous letters, he presented himself at the Zaptieh for admission to see the prisoner."

What really took place was, that Mr. Blunt asked Sir Evelyn Baring "to obtain permission for him to look over the prison," but receiving no answer, he walked in and saw this man, no one interfering. Certainly there was not much harm in that. Mr. Blunt was next charged as follows:—

"Having met with a refusal on the part of the police officials, Mr. Blunt endeavoured to evade the orders, but not having succeeded he departed, abusing the guards and boasting that he would shortly return with an order from Her Majesty's Representative which would open all doors to him."

Mr. Blunt stated that there was no truth whatever in that charge, that nothing of the kind occurred, and that he spoke to and abused nobody. The fifth charge was—

"Mr. Blunt further employed himself in starting a newspaper, the intended object of which was to create popularity for Arabi, and to weaken the authority of the Khedive. On his being informed that in order to publish a newspaper in Egypt the sanction of the Government must previously be obtained, he is reported to have replied that, if necessary, he would obtain that sanction from London."

Mr. Blunt informed him (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that he never had such an idea in his mind, and that he never thought of starting a newspaper in Egypt. The sixth charge was—

"You are further aware, my dear Minister, of the ideas he tried to disseminate in the country with regard to the foundation of an Arab Empire, and the imbecility of the present system of government."

Mr. Blunt said that he pleaded guilty to the charge, with the exception of not having advised the foundation of an Arab Empire. He certainly thought the Government of Egypt most imbecile, and had said so on many occasions. The right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), indeed, two of the Members for Lincolnshire, and the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) went up and down this country calling the Members of Her Majesty's Government imbecile, but they were not banished, for nobody cared a bit what they said. As far as he could make out from reading the Papers, these were the sole charges against Mr. Blunt, on account of which he was not allowed to land in Egypt; and he should be much surprised if the Committee were to arrive at the conclusion that this was a proper way to treat a British subject. It was monstrous that a Liberal Government should act in the way the present Government had acted towards Mr. Blunt. He did not suppose that Mr. Blunt was particularly anxious to go to Egypt at the time he was refused permission to land, and he did not think that Mr. Blunt sustained any serious amount of inconvenience. A gross indignity, however, was put upon him, simply because he had told the truth; and the matter threw a flood of light on what was going on in that country. It showed that they were in Egypt for nothing more than to bolster up a system of cruelty and oppression, and to stifle freedom of opinion. Unless the Government could give a better reason than they had yet given for this extraordinary proceeding, as explained in the Papers laid before the House, he should certainly feel disposed to move the reduction of the Vote in order to see whether the Committee would be inclined to join him in protesting against the odious, dangerous, and unjust policy which Her Majesty's Government were encouraging in Egypt. He should like very much to hear what the Government would have to say in defence of the extraordinary course they had taken.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that he was, on the whole, glad that his hon. Friend had called attention to this subject, because it would enable him to bring out the real facts of the matter. Hon. Members would probably have read the Papers which had been presented, and he wished they could have been presented sooner; but, owing to want of time, it had been impossible. It would at once be seen that the whole of the question lay in a nutshell. As to the main facts, there was no dispute. His hon. Friend said humorously that Mr. Blunt had been refused permission to land in Egypt, because on his former visit he had been in the habit of sitting up late at night; but that it was owing to the hospitality kindly extended to him by the members of Her Majesty's Mission, and that sitting up late at night under such circumstances was not likely to do much harm. But he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) could not help thinking the Committee would see, on reading the Papers, that that humorous version of Mr. Blunt's proceedings was scarcely borne out. The whole case, in reality, turned on two things—in the first place, on the right of the Egyptian Government; and, secondly, on the facts stated in the letter of Cherif Pasha to Sir Evelyn Baring on the 8th of October. As to the right of the Egyptian Government, and the legal aspect of the case, there could be no doubt at all. It was a matter of the right of self-preservation, which all Governments at times were obliged to exercise in periods of great difficulty. Occasionally, the exercise of a strict legal right did appear to interfere with that complete liberty which, as a rule, it was the desire of every civilized State to extend, not only to its own subjects, but to those of other nations. Mr. Blunt, exercising his rights, which nobody would question, some time ago did take a leading part in Egyptian affairs; but, having chosen to take a certain line, he must also take the consequences. Mr. Blunt, to use an old proverb, could not claim to "eat his loaf and to have it also." He could not claim to express opinions hostile to the Egyptian Government, or to conspire against them, and then claim their assent and protection. Mr. Blunt claimed that those who had been in active rebellion against the Government were in reality patriots, whose names were held in honour by the country, and when they entered into a conspiracy against a Government of which they disapproved, he seemed to imagine that they ought to be protected by that Government. Now, it was necessary to take a clear line in a question of that kind; no man could be on both sides. He could not claim the protection of the Government, and also to be allowed to enter into agreements and conspiracies against it. His hon. Friend said that Mr. Blunt did admit one charge, and the admission was an exceedingly important one—namely, that, while in Egypt, Mr. Blunt did attempt to disseminate ideas which nobody could deny were hostile to the existence of the Government of that country.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked where that admission was to be found?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, it was what the hon. Baronet had said himself. His hon. Friend had controverted Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 in Cherif Pasha's letter; but, on referring to the last paragraph, he had understood him to say that Mr. Blunt did not dispute the allegation contained in it.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON explained that what he had said was this. That Mr. Blunt distinctly denied having tried to disseminate ideas in favour of the foundation of an Arab Empire; but what he did not deny was that he had spoken of the imbecility of the Egyptian Government.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that was Mr. Blunt's way of putting it; but his hon. Friend would be aware that when a gentleman of Mr. Blunt's great talent and ability, with excessively strong and decided opinions, went about and was constantly denouncing the imbecility of the Government, he was not, perhaps, very far off from desiring to put something in the place of that Government. They all knew that Mr. Blunt had hostile ideas with regard to the Government of Egypt, which he had urged with very great ability, and therefore it seemed to him (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) that his hon. Friend's admission on behalf of Mr. Blunt covered what he had said. He thought it must be acknowledged that the statements made by Cherif Pasha in regard to Mr. Blunt were justified. Under those circumstances, all he had to examine was the further question—what were the rights of the Egyptian Government in the matter? It was the right which every Government was bound occasionally to consider—the right of saying under what conditions strangers or foreigners should be admitted into the country. In this case, the Egyptian Government came to the conclusion that it was dangerous to the security of the State, and the peace and maintenance of public order, to allow Mr. Blunt to remain in Egypt, and accordingly they proceeded to take the steps which his hon. Friend had described, and which the Committee would find detailed at full length in the Papers. The only step which Her Majesty's Government took, as distinguished from that of the Egyptian Government, was to refuse to interfere. He would ask hon. Members to ask themselves this question—whether, considering that the Egyptian Government was not only a friendly Government, but a Government which Her Majesty's Government were pledged in a particular degree to maintain, it would have been right for Her Majesty's Government to intervene? It must be clearly understood that the steps against Mr. Blunt were not taken at the instigation of Her Majesty's Government, but that they were taken by the Egyptian Government on their own responsibility; and that the only step which Her Majesty's Government took was to refuse, when appealed to, to interfere. His hon. Friend had quoted from the letter of Cherif Pasha of October 8; but the case did not rest simply upon the statement of Cherif Pasha, whom some persons might imagine to take an unfavourable view of the proceedings of Mr. Blunt, owing to Mr. Blunt's knowledge of the affairs of Egypt in past years; but when Nubar Pasha came into Office without any prejudice upon the question, and was appealed to, at the instance of Mr. Blunt, who thought he would reverse the order of Cherif Pasha, Nubar Pasha, so far from reversing it, confirmed it. Therefore, when hon. Members found two Ministers of the ability of Cherif Pasha and Nubar Pasha agreeing in the same policy, it would be hard to say that their well-considered verdict was wrong, and that they were not justified in thinking that the continued presence of Mr. Blunt in Egypt was a source of danger. These were the whole facts on which this controversy had turned. As he had already said, the facts were very few, and the whole matter lay in a nutshell. He thought the Committee would be of opinion that Her Majesty's Government had exercised a wise discretion in not interfering in the matter.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he did not know what the opinion was of hon. Members who sat immediately behind the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as their opinions were generally made for them; but he was satisfied that hon. Members who sat below the Gangway would be of opinion that Her Majesty's Government had exercised an unwise discretion in the extraordinary tyrannical and unjust course they had adopted. There was a most curious incident in connection with this visit of Mr. Blunt to Egypt—far more curious than the general public had any idea of. If hon. Members would turn to page 9 of the Papers laid upon the Table, they would find a letter from Mr. Blunt to Earl Granville, dated the 1st of May. At the bottom of that page, in the third paragraph from the bottom, he would invite the attention of the noble Lord to a passage in which Mr. Blunt made these remarks—

“Having abandoned all active interest in Egyptian politics, I was encouraged last September, in the highest official quarter, again to visit Egypt, with a view to consulting with Sir Evelyn Baring as to a possible development there of English policy.”

He (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought that passage would provide a much better elucidation of this unfortunate occurrence than that which the noble Lord had endeavoured to give. Many hon. Members would be aware that Mr. Blunt had strong views of the revolution brought about by Arabi and of the future of Egypt. Probably, few Members would be found who would agree with him upon those points; but he did not think there was a man in the House who would be prepared to say that Mr. Blunt was not a gentleman of the highest honour and integrity, although he had come prominently before the public in relation to Egyptian affairs. Although Mr. Blunt held strong opinions, and did not hesitate to put them forward in the strongest possible manner, no one, not even an official of the Government, had ever questioned or treated with suspicion his integrity, veracity, or high honour. Therefore, when he saw a statement of that kind in the Papers laid before the House, that Mr. Blunt had abandoned all active interest in Egyptian politics, and had been encouraged last September, in the highest official quarter, again to visit Egypt, with a view to consulting with Sir Evelyn Baring as to a possible development there of English policy, he had thought it right to put himself in communication with Mr. Blunt, in order to ascertain what was the explanation of that passage. Mr. Blunt informed him that he was visited in September last by a gentleman, notoriously enjoying the friendship and the confidence of the Prime Minister—Mr. Knowles, the editor of The Nineteenth Century. That gentleman informed Mr. Blunt that the moment was well chosen for his again revisiting Egypt. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) did not vouch for these statements himself; but Mr. Blunt made them, and nobody yet had questioned the honour or veracity of Mr. Blunt; and he (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought the case was of such a nature that it ought to be put before the House of Commons. Mr. Blunt stated that Mr. Knowles went to him, and suggested that the moment was auspicious for again revisiting Egypt, with a view of ascertaining whether there was any probability of the revival of the National Party, and whether there was any probability of arranging some method by which Arabi Pasha might be restored to his native land. In the interview, as Mr. Blunt states, Mr. Knowles made a very free use of the Prime Minister's name. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] He had no doubt that if the Prime Minister would get up at the Table and deny that statement, the Committee would accept his denial; but, according to the representation of Mr. Blunt, Mr. Knowles made a very free use of the Prime Minister's name. Was that so? [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] Mr. Knowles would not have thought proper to make a direct use of the Prime Minister's name without direct authority, and Mr. Knowles was a gentleman who worthily enjoyed the friendship of the Prime Minister, and would not be presumed to use the name of the right hon. Gentleman without authority. Mr. Blunt, who was an enthusiast, took fire at that suggestion that there was a chance of the National Party in Egypt being recognized by the English Government, and he placed himself in communication with no less a person than the Prime Minister's Private Secretary, Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Blunt communicated to Mr. Hamilton what had passed between himself and Mr. Knowles. He stated to Mr. Hamilton that he was encouraged by what had reached him to make a journey to Egypt on his way to India, and he communicated fully to Mr. Hamilton the exact steps he meant to take when he got to Egypt, and the parties with whom he intended to communicate when he arrived there. If he (Lord Randolph Churchill) recollected rightly, Mr. Blunt had two interviews with Mr. Hamilton some time before he started, and unless the Prime Minister contradicted him, he should decline altogether to believe that Mr. Hamilton, who, as everybody knew, was one of the most excellent and intelligent Private Secretaries any Minister ever had the good fortune to possess, did not communicate to the Prime Minister the result of those interviews, knowing well, for a long time, what great interest the right hon. Gentleman had taken in the affairs of Egypt. Mr. Blunt alleged that he never saw the Prime Minister himself. He started on his tour in the month of September, and at that time the Prime Minister was taking that little yachting voyage to Copenhagen, which all remembered. The day before Mr. Blunt left for Egypt, he received a letter from Mr. Hamilton, begging him to call upon him. Therefore, Mr. Hamilton, knowing that Mr. Blunt was going to Egypt, sent for Mr. Blunt to call and see him before he went. Mr. Blunt proceeded to Downing Street, where he found Mr. Hamilton installed in the Prime Minister's apartment, and exercising, no doubt, more or less Ministerial authority. Mr. Hamilton questioned Mr. Blunt very closely as to the proceedings which he intended to take, and gave him to understand that he would be favourably received in Egypt by Sir Evelyn Baring. Mr. Hamilton acquainted himself with the whole of Mr. Blunt's proposals, for Mr. Blunt was not the man to keep anything back, and Mr. Blunt then took a farewell of Mr. Hamilton, and departed for Egypt, feeling certain that Mr. Hamilton must have communicated all that had passed to the Prime Minister. If there had been anything very objectionable in the course Mr. Blunt proposed to pursue, he felt certain the Prime Minister, either then and there, or immediately afterwards, the moment he heard of the contemplated proceeding, would have undeceived Mr. Blunt in the strongest possible manner. But nothing of the kind took place, and, from that day until the day Mr. Blunt was forbidden to land in Egypt, no line, word, or communication of any sort reached him. Was it probable, then, that the Prime Minister was not aware of Mr. Blunt's journey to Egypt, or that he disapproved of it? Mr. Blunt having arrived at Cairo, at once waited upon Sir Evelyn Baring, and, as hon. Members opposite who were not particularly prejudiced in favour of English officials in Egypt might imagine, Sir Evelyn Baring was horrified at Mr. Blunt's presence and Mr. Blunt's proposals. He did not sympathize with them at all; he put his foot down upon Mr. Blunt at once, and declined to give him any assistance of any shape or kind. So much was this the case, that Sir Evelyn Baring actually refused to get permission for Mr. Blunt to visit a gentleman who was confined in prison in Cairo, not upon any charge, but simply upon suspicion. Mr. Blunt asked Sir Evelyn Baring to procure him permission to visit this gentleman, and Sir Evelyn Baring peremptorily refused. There was hardly a country in the world in which such a course would have been taken in reference to a prisoner confined only on suspicion, against whom no charge had been brought. In any other country such a man would have been allowed to see his friends; but in Egypt, under the wise and enlightened Administration of Her Majesty's Government, political prisoners did not possess that advantage, and therefore the Representative of the British Government refused permission in Egypt for Mr. Blunt to visit a friend who happened to be confined in prison. Mr. Blunt, however, saw other friends in Cairo, and ascertained that there was no danger whatever at that moment of any movement being made in favour of the National Party, or even of the admission of the idea that there was a National Party, and, least of all, that there was any feeling in favour of the restoration of Arabi Pasha. Having ascertained that through his friends, and without any proceeding which partook of the nature of conspiracy, Mr. Blunt left Egypt for India, having nothing more to do. He had gone to Cairo and seen these gentlemen. His journey to Cairo had been suggested in the highest official quarters. He had done nothing wrong. He had asked to see a gentleman who was in prison. He had been rudely refused permission, and he then reverted to his original idea of proceeding to India, and of abandoning Egyptian affairs altogether. While in India, Mr. Blunt received an intimation that he would not be allowed to land in Egypt on his return. Now, that was very hard treatment indeed, whether the person subjected to it was an Englishman, a Frenchman, a German, an Italian, or the subject of any other country. Surely, it was a hard measure of justice to prevent a man from landing in Egypt against whom no charge whatever had been brought. The hardship and injustice of it became far greater, however, when they considered the circumstances under which Mr. Blunt went to Egypt, and his conduct while there. He came now to the conduct of Cherif Pasha. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State had informed the Committee that Cherif Pasha had acted upon his own motion. No doubt, the noble Lord fully believed that that was so. Very likely the noble Lord only believed the information furnished to him from certain sources in Egypt; but he (Lord Randolph Churchill) took leave to disbelieve that statement altogether, and to repudiate it as utterly worthless. The Government of Cherif Pasha had no existence except through the action of Sir Evelyn Baring, and nothing would induce him (Lord Randolph Churchill) to believe that Cherif Pasha, of his own motion, dared to forbid the landing of a British subject in Egypt. The idea was too ridiculous to be stated except in the House of Commons. It was said that Cherif Pasha took this course of his own motion, and that he said the return of Mr. Blunt to Egypt would be fatal to the Government. The charges made by Cherif Pasha against Mr. Blunt were extremely amusing. Among other things, he said that Mr. Blunt employed himself in starting a newspaper, the intended object of which was to create popularity for Arabi, and to weaken the authority of the Khedive. That was the first charge. But why was a newspaper started in Cairo to create popularity for Arabi to be prohibited, while the proprietor of a scurrilous journal called The Bosphore Egyptian was allowed week by week to appear in Cairo? The reason was that The Bosphore Egyptian was kept up in the interest of the French Consul (M. Barrière), and was directed to oppose the best English interests. For that reason Her Majesty's Government were very bold in dealing with a British subject, while they displayed the utmost timidity where the interests of a Foreign Power were concerned. At all events, Her Majesty's Government had adopted a very different policy in regard to The Bosphore Egyptian from that which they had adopted in the case of Mr. Blunt. So much for the newspaper question; but he thought it was a point upon which the noble Lord ought to give an explanation to the Committee, to show why there was one measure of justice for a Frenchman and another for an Englishman. There had been some talk about stopping The Bosphore Egyptian; but it had, nevertheless, been allowed to go on. Cherif Pasha proceeded, in his charges against Mr. Blunt, to say—

It would be perceived that Mr. Blunt's great crime lay in the last sentence—the ideas Mr. Blunt tried to disseminate in regard to the imbecility of the present system of government, and that was the reason why Mr. Blunt was to be kept out of Egypt. He wanted to know why The Times Correspondent had not also been turned out, because ever since the Egyptian troubles begun he had sounded one trumpet only—namely, the imbecility of the Government, Native and British, unable to decide which was the most imbecile. The imbecility of the Government was not only the talk of the Bazaar, but of everybody in Egypt, the burden of the song in which every foreigner, high and low and rich and poor, joined. All concurred that it was impossible to produce anything except in the shape of disunion. Why was everybody allowed to talk about the imbecility of the Government of Egypt, while Mr. Blunt, who went out in a blameless and harmless capacity, was to be the one exception to the rule, and not to be allowed to criticize a solitary act of the Government? Mr. Blunt, a British subject, had been forbidden by Sir Evelyn Baring to land in Egypt, because he had expressed a strong opinion as to imbecility of the Native Government. Surely this was a nice state of things, under a Liberal British Government and a Liberal Prime Minister. Cherif Pasha says—

“We feel ourselves all the more justified in acting thus in the present case, because, thanks to the calm which has fallen upon all minds, and to the perfect tranquillity which reigns throughout the country, His Highness intends to order the immediate suppression of the Special Commissions and of the Court Martial at Alexandria, in order thus to enter upon an era of peace and concord.”

Mr. Blunt was kept out of Egypt in order that he might not interfere with the calm which had fallen upon all minds, and the perfect tranquillity which reigned throughout the country, in order that an era of peace and concord might be inaugurated. That was in the month of October. Three months later, Cherif Pasha and all his tribe were kicked out of Egypt by Sir Evelyn Baring in order to preserve the tranquillity which reigned throughout the country, and the era of peace and concord which had been entered into. The Prime Minister, to use his own picturesque language, said that he had shattered the Native Government. But it was in order that the Native Government should not be shattered that Mr. Blunt was prevented from landing in Egypt. So much, then, for Cherif Pasha. He now came to Nubar Pasha. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State made a great point of the action of Nubar Pasha. He said that not only Cherif Pasha, but Nubar Pasha, a new man, had adopted the same course of action in regard to Mr. Blunt. But why was Nubar Pasha put into the Government at Cairo? It was solely because he was likely to be a passive instrument in the hands of Sir Evelyn Baring. Cherif Pasha had at times displayed a little tendency to insubordination and to independent opinions. Cherif Pasha was therefore dismissed. As to the statement that he had kept Mr. Blunt out of Egypt of his own motion, there might just be a possible scintilla of truth attached to it; but with Nubar Pasha there was no possibility of that. Nubar Pasha only excluded Mr. Blunt from Egypt in response to the demand of Sir Evelyn Baring. Sir Evelyn Baring wrote to Nubar Pasha to know if he shared the views in regard to Mr. Blunt entertained by his Predecessor. Nubar Pasha knew what the views of Cherif Pasha were; but he knew also how he had come into Office, and he was not likely to express any disagreement with Sir Evelyn Baring. Therefore, he wrote to say that he fully concurred in the views of Cherif Pasha. He wrote to Sir Evelyn Baring—

"I have to inform you, M. le Ministre, that the Government of His Highness find themselves obliged, to their great regret, to adhere, as concerns Mr. Blunt, to the decision formerly arrived at by His Excellency Cherif Pasha."

As to the statement of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State that that made the case worse against Mr. Blunt, that argument was really worth nothing at all. The only complaint was that Mr. Blunt had been unfairly and unjustly excluded from Egypt. He had already pointed out that there was nothing in the circumstances of Mr. Blunt's case to justify his exclusion, and that if there were circumstances about Mr. Blunt's visit which did justify it, the same measure ought to be applied to hundreds of other persons who were at the present moment in Cairo. The real fact was—and it was the explanation of the whole matter—that Mr. Blunt had property in Egypt which he had held for some time, and the Egyptian Government had taken advantage of his absence to plunder it. They had made exorbitant demands upon him for Land Tax and other matters, amounting to £105, hoping, no doubt, that in Mr. Blunt's absence the matter could not be attended to, and that they would be enabled to retaliate upon Mr. Blunt by seizing his property. Fortunately, Mr. Blunt had a friend in Cairo who settled the demand. But would it be believed that, owing to the action of Sir Evelyn Baring, Cherif Pasha, and Nubar Pasha, Mr. Blunt was not only unable to land at Suez, but he was forbidden to see his agent from Cairo who had been looking after his property. He was forbidden to land by the British Agent, although he had gone to Cairo originally, under the sincere belief that he was acting with the knowledge and approval of the Prime Minister himself. Mr. Blunt did no harm in Cairo. He left Cairo, abandoning all his ideas, and on his return, thanks to the discourtesy of Sir Evelyn Baring, he was forbidden by a low official—the lowest official who could be possibly found to do the work—in the rudest manner, to land, and Mr. Beaman, his agent, was prevented from going on board the vessel to communicate with him. In Mr. Blunt's letter to Earl Granville, he positively stated that pressure was put on Mr. Beaman to prevent his meeting Mr. Blunt on board the China.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE:
What is the date?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL
replied that Mr. Blunt's letter was dated May the 1st. He knew that Sir Evelyn Baring stated that, as far as he was aware, no pressure had been put on Mr. Beaman to prevent his meeting Mr. Blunt on board the China; but the fact remained that Mr. Beaman was prevented from seeing Mr. Blunt, and as the people at Cairo only acted on the authority of Sir Evelyn Baring, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) declined to accept the disclaimer of Sir Evelyn Baring in a matter of this kind. It was a matter which ought to receive the direct attention of the House of Commons, in order to decide whether Her Majesty's subjects had a right to go to Egypt. If all persons who were distasteful to the Egyptian Government were to be excluded from that country he did not know where the matter would end. He knew of no country where such an arbitrary course had been adopted except Russia. [An hon. MEMBER: And Ireland.] He did not know that it was the case in Ireland; but Russia was, he thought, the only country in which such a thing could occur. He believed there were people who had been kicked out of Russia; but it must be borne in mind that this course was taken in Egypt in an era of peace and concord, with perfect tranquillity reigning throughout the country. In order to show how low and miserable a thing a British subject was, it was only necessary to refer to the treatment accorded by the Egyptian Government to Mr. Wilfrid Blunt. He thought that Mr. Blunt was entitled to ample reparation at the hands of the Egyptian Government for the injury which had been done to him.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he thought that the facts of this case were very remarkable. Without exaggerating them, what were they? Mr. Wilfrid Blunt was a well-known gentleman, who had taken a great interest in Egyptian politics, and who had certain views of his own in regard to them. Mr. Blunt had always stated those views in this country. He went to Ceylon to visit Arabi and other exiles, and he was then told that he would not be allowed to return to Egypt. That decision was taken, not by the desire of Sir Evelyn Baring, but by that of Cherif Pasha, and it was subsequently confirmed by that of Nubar Pasha. It came, therefore, practically to this—if they examined the charges it would be seen that no overt act was complained of on the part of Mr. Blunt. No doubt, spies accompanied him, who watched him during the night, and told absurd stories of his having been seen talking to certain people; but if hon. Members would carefully examine the despatches they would see that the real reason why Mr. Blunt was not permitted to land in Egypt again was on account of the views he had expressed in his writings in this country in regard to Egyptian policy. What did it amount to? We had really spent a large amount of money for the benefit of Egypt; and we had, therefore, a distinct interest in the good government of the country. If a Frenchman, or a German, or an Austrian were to go to Egypt, was it pretended for a moment that the Egyptian Government would have ventured to prevent him from landing in consequence of anything he might have written in regard to Egypt in his own country, or because he had been to Ceylon and had visited Arabi? Therefore, it came to this—that from the mere fact of our spending money in Egypt, and having an Army there, any Austrian, Frenchman, or German might land, but an Englishman could not land, unless he was in accord with the Egyptian Government as to the way in which the Government should be carried on in that country. If he were to go there during the Recess, with his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—[An hon. MEMBER: Go.] "Go," said the hon. Member; but they could not go. If they did, they would certainly be stopped at once. There was nothing Mr. Blunt had said which he and his hon. Friend had not said, and they had even said much more. But if they went to Egypt it would only be to find spies put upon them and to get in difficulties with the Government. Thousands of persons in this country entertained the same views as Mr. Blunt. There was one thing he should like to know definitely. It was no use talking about the authority of the Egyptian Government. It was the authority of Her Majesty's Government. Nothing could be done without our authority; and he wished to know if it had come to this pass in Egypt—that every Englishman was to be stopped from landing whose views did not tally with those of some Nubar or Cherif or other Pasha, who was the dummy, for the time being, of the English Government?

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had asked himself, while listening to the debate, whether some hon. Members who had spoken regarded with proper weight the condition of things in Egypt, and had any real desire to ameliorate the condition of that country? If the House of Commons was to be deluded by the speeches to which they had just listened they would imagine that Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, as an Englishman, was one of the most harmless persons possible. Whatever the views of Mr. Blunt might be—and to some extent he had always shared them—[Cries of "Oh!"] Yes; he had certainly shared the desire of Mr. Blunt for the advancement of the Native cause in Egypt; but he had never been able to associate himself with the means Mr. Blunt had adopted in carrying them out. [An hon. MEMBER: What means?] If hon. Gentlemen would allow him to proceed he would endeavour to make his statement as short and as succinct as he could. Mr. Blunt's great offence was this—that his policy had not succeeded, and that Her Majesty's Government had determined not to adopt it; but, on the contrary, had decided to maintain the authority of the present Khedive, and to assist him in fulfilling his duties towards Egypt. The Khedive had shown courage that would have been remarkable in any man, but which was peculiar in an Egyptian. He was accused by Mr. Blunt of many shocking crimes—crimes which would have disgraced a common malefactor. It was Mr. Blunt who instigated the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) in bringing forward charges against the Khedive in that House, which he had utterly failed to prove. [Cries of "No!"] He appealed to the conscience of the nation and to the good sense of the House of Commons, who had come to the conclusion that the noble Lord's statements were reckless and without foundation. Well, the noble Lord, having been instigated by Mr. Blunt to make these statements, now came forward in the House of Commons and spoke of Mr. Blunt as though he were a person who could do no mischief, and who desired to do no mischief in Egypt. Mr. Blunt's presence in Egypt at a moment when he was returning from a visit to Arabi Pasha in Ceylon could do nothing but injury to the cause of order in Egypt. The Egyptians could never be relieved from oppression by putting them in opposition to the governing power of the country. No doubt, they had been oppressed; but they would not continue to be oppressed as soon as there was a capable Government established in the country. [Ironical cheers.] Surely the efforts of the present Government were directed towards the establishment of good order and freedom in the country. It was all very well for hon. Members, some of whom had never visited Egypt, to make a jest of this statement; but nations like Egypt were not to be compelled into freedom all at once. Even some Members of the House of Commons, at a critical moment, did not always know how to act with complete propriety. He could only trust that Her Majesty's Government would interrupt everybody, whoever he might be, who endeavoured to disseminate opinions which they regarded as inimical to the good government of Egypt; and he hoped that further experience would teach even Members of the House of Commons that well-regulated liberty depended on the observance of good temper. He trusted that, in the present state of affairs in Egypt, having at heart the good of the Egyptian people as well as any hon. Member of that House, the Home Government would assist the Egyptian Government in keeping out of the country, at the present moment, all those who wished to depose the Khedive. [Cries of "Oh!"]

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he did not think the circumstance whether Cherif Pasha or Nubar Pasha was the real agent in the matter was a feature which called for the judgment of the House. The responsibility would have been the same, and the course pursued would have been quite as justifiable, if Sir Evelyn Baring himself, as the chief power in Egypt, had, for reasons best known to himself, pronounced that Mr. Blunt was a dangerous British subject, who had once been admitted into Egypt, but who ought to be excluded in future. For the very reason that English interests were paramount and must be regarded, Sir Evelyn Baring might, under certain circumstances, have been justified in excluding him. At the same time, he could not help thinking that a grave indignity had been inflicted upon this country and its interests in excluding an Englishman in the position of Mr. Blunt from Egypt at the mere bidding of Cherif Pasha or Nubar Pasha, when such a course would never have been dreamt of in the case of any person entitled to the protection of the French or German Government. He could not undertake to pronounce an opinion whether Mr. Blunt ought to be excluded from Egypt. If he were a bad subject; if he were engaged in fostering rebellion; if he were acting contrary to the policy of the nation which was protecting Egypt, he admitted that under such circumstances it would be justifiable to exclude Mr. Blunt, but not upon the fiction of putting forward creatures such as Cherif Pasha and Nubar Pasha must be conceded to be to bear the responsibility. He held it to be a serious matter, and contrary not only to British but to International Law, that any nation, without assigning a good and proper cause, should endeavour to prevent a British subject passing along the high road of the world from calling at any particular place.

MR. GLADSTONE: After the reference which has been made to me by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), I feel it incumbent on me to say a few words. The noble Lord appears to have been led into some error. He thinks that Mr. Blunt ought not to have been excluded from Egypt, and he further thinks it a peculiar hardship that Mr. Blunt should have been excluded from Egypt considering the circumstances under which he went there, those circumstances, according to the noble Lord, being that the journey was suggested by Mr. Knowles, who is a gentleman well known to me, who possesses my confidence, and, therefore, that the visit of Mr. Blunt to Egypt had my approval.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I said that it raised a presumption.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord now says that the circumstances raised that presumption. The noble Lord connects my name with that of Mr. Knowles, and says that Mr. Knowles led Mr. Blunt to believe that the journey which he recommended would command my approval. Now, so far as Mr. Knowles is concerned, I have had some pleasant intercourse with him, and I hope, under favourable circumstances, to have some more. I am not at all ashamed of the association with Mr. Knowles in which the noble Lord places me; but any account of Mr. Knowles is idle without mentioning the fact that he is editor of The Nineteenth Century, and he is no doubt wise, being editor of The Nineteenth Century, to make the most of that position. Indeed, he is the editor of it from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. In every day, and in every hour of his life, whenever you find that Mr. Knowles has had an interview with—be it Mr. Blunt or anybody else—you may rely upon it that the upshot and aim of that interview are wholly The Nineteenth Century. I may tell the noble Lord a little more. If Mr. Blunt had gone to Egypt and had satisfactorily executed his purpose, and returned to this country, Mr. Knowles would have gone to him and said that nothing could be more interesting than an article by Mr. Blunt in The Nineteenth Century. That is the full explanation of the course taken by Mr. Knowles. At one time I used to see a great deal of Mr. Knowles; but since I came into Office my opportunities have been very limited indeed, and I do not recollect to have exchanged any opinions on Egypt with Mr. Knowles, except, perhaps, a few words of the very slightest importance. I now turn to a more personal matter. As regards Mr. Hamilton, the question is rather more serious, for Mr. Hamilton is not the editor of a magazine, and he has no purely literary purpose in view. I am very glad that the noble Lord, in referring to Mr. Hamilton, did justice to his character as a Private Secretary, and to his claims, which cannot be too highly estimated, upon my gratitude for the services he has rendered to me. It is merely a question of memory between Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Blunt; and although we may presume that both gentlemen are incapable of the slightest wilful misrepresentation, there is a fundamental difference in the account they give. I have in my hand a little memorandum which Mr. Hamilton wrote for me on this subject a couple of months ago; but I never read it until within the last few weeks, when I learned that Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Blunt had been friends. I will not say that they are not personal friends now, but they had been personal friends; and Mr. Hamilton, considering the part Mr. Blunt had taken in Egypt, discontinued, not in an unfriendly, but in a conventional manner, his intercourse with Mr. Blunt when the difficulties in connection with that country arose. He writes as follows—

"I heard that he was going abroad, and as I had purposely avoided seeing anything of him for a year I felt some reproach to myself that he should go away again without my saying good bye to him, and I therefore wrote to say that I should like to shake him by the hand before he left England."

Therefore, according to Mr. Hamilton, this interview was simply an act of friendly courtesy and a kind of reparation for the absence of an intercourse which had been more frequent, and the entire suspension of which might appear to be an unkind act. He says that he never heard of the story about the intended visit of Mr. Blunt to Arabi until Mr. Knowles mentioned it. Mr. Hamilton then goes on to deal with the story that he discussed the projects of Mr. Blunt with regard to Arabi. He says that he does not believe they were ever made known to him until two or three days before his memorandum was written. He then goes on to speak of the interview to which the noble Lord has referred. He observes that Mr. Blunt freely admits that he was deceived about me, and Mr. Hamilton says—

"My own distinct recollection is that our short parting conversation was limited to friendly conventionalities. This accords with the line I have invariably pursued with regard to him ever since the Egyptian War—namely, that the vexed question of Egypt was to be avoided between us, especially as our previous communications had been liable to be misunderstood."

The noble Lord will, therefore, see that Mr. Hamilton's recollection of the nature of his communications with Mr. Blunt is utterly at variance with that of Mr. Blunt. I now come to the suggestion that Mr. Hamilton made an important communication to me. Mr. Hamilton's recollection and my own are that he never made any communication to me whatever on the subject of Mr. Blunt's visit to Egypt. So much for that vexed question. With regard to the subject in dispute, there are two matters at issue. One is whether Mr. Blunt should have been admitted into Egypt, and the other is, who is responsible for his exclusion? In my opinion, although I am extremely sorry that any restriction should be placed upon the free movement of any of my fellow-countrymen, it was perfectly justifiable to exclude Mr. Blunt from Egypt under the circumstances of the case. I have no charge to make against Mr. Blunt; but I fully agree with my hon. Friend the Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), when he says that he shares Mr. Blunt's views to a certain extent, inasmuch as he heartily desires the maintenance of national feelings in Egypt, and has always been disposed to do the best in his power to assist them. But Mr. Blunt had relations with Arabi, and assumed to be cognizant of Arabi's movements, which undoubtedly made it inexpedient, on public grounds, until Egypt was again restored to its normal condition, that he should visit Egypt again. Therefore, while fully agreeing, much as I regret the necessity, in the reasonableness of Mr. Blunt's exclusion, I have no motive whatever for casting the responsibility upon the Egyptian Government; and I am disposed to say that we accept the responsibility of this exclusion, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, as much as if our responsibility was direct and immediate. That, I think, is quite clearly understood; not that I have any charge to make against Mr. Blunt, but because we are bound to have regard to the nationality of Egypt, and to the restoration of the authority of the Khedive. Having said this much, I must now say a few words with respect to the tone which has been adopted in this debate in reference to the Egyptian Government. When my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) spoke of the Government of Egypt as in any sense a reality, he was met with scoffs and jeers by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) and the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett).

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: I neither scoffed nor jeered.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The jeers came from the other side.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord really moves with such rapidity that at my period of life I am unable to follow him. Those jeers were in perfect conformity with the views which I know prevail in certain parts of this House, and they excited no surprise whatever on my part. Those jeers are perfectly natural when they come from hon. Members opposite, and they embrace a desire to prove the utter nullity of any authority now exercised by the Egyptian Government, with a view to the putting forward of that which they really desire—namely, the establishment of British dominion in Egypt. That is perfectly intelligible, and I quite understand all those jeers. I fully accept them, coming from that quarter. They are impartial in their nature. There is a motive power in them which is aimed at the realization of certain views. But the noble Lord just now observed, and observed with perfect truth, that the jeers were not confined to that side of the House. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) joined in those jeers; and I wish to say a serious word to my hon. Friends. Do they wish to realize the prospect of the establishment of British dominion in Egypt? [SIR WILFRID LAWSON: No.] They do not. Then I will only tell them that the words they use, and the jeers they make use of, apply with all the force they possess towards the establishment of that state of things. I have ventured to express that opinion before to my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). And having some means of forming a judgment, I tell him now, from this Bench, that those who desire the establishment of British dominion in Egypt have no more effective ally than hon. Members who scoff and jeer the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), when he says that he desires the maintenance of the authority of the Egyptian Government, and to see it converted into a reality. It is known to the House, and I freely admit that the position of England in Egypt at this moment, and the heavy responsibilities with which she is charged, have required, in our view, that we should assert a title to interpose in matters connected with the government of Egypt where we consider it absolutely necessary in the circumstances in which we stand. But that is not the annihilation of the Egyptian Government. I admit it freely, that if we were acting in a spirit of disparagement towards the Egyptian Government, and that if our object was to undermine their credit and dignity, it would be in our power to do so. But what we seek is to limit our power of interference; and, therefore, I own, it is a matter of grief and astonishment to me, whatever may be the indications which come from other quarters of the House, to hear from Gentlemen like my hon. Friends the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who profess—and I must believe in the sincerity of their professions, notwithstanding appearances and the danger of what they say and do in this House—to entertain a desire that the practical domination of England shall not become permanent in Egypt—it is a matter of grief and astonishment to me to hear the jeers with which they greeted the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). I have thought it necessary to say this, because it is with us a sacred duty to respect, as far as the necessities of our position will permit, the independence and dignity of the Khedive. I admit that it is a qualified independence, and that every opportunity is taken for disparaging that independence; but, still, I affirm that our sole purpose is to maintain that independence and dignity as far as it is in our power to permit of their being maintained. And I must say that we are entitled to look for assistance, and not discouragement, in the prosecution of that object, from my hon. Friends the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and those who think with them on this and other matters, who have at all times professed a warm desire, under the circumstances which have heretofore existed, to limit the scope of English intervention, and to shorten its duration. I may assure them that they can only accomplish that purpose by endeavouring to cherish and foster something like liberty of action on the part of the Khedive, and I confess that I should have expected support and encouragement in that work from that quarter of the House, rather than derision and jeers.

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I hope I may be allowed to say a few words by way of explanation. I stated, in the first instance, that I did not put forward the statements of Mr. Blunt as my own. I never have done so. I said that I was here to state Mr. Blunt's case as well as I could; but I never intended to put it forward as my own. But there appeared to me to be nothing at all improbable in the idea that Mr. Blunt's case was correct as it had been given to me, because everybody knows that the sympathies of the Prime Minister are in favour of freedom of nationality; and it occurred to me that as Mr. Blunt went out to Egypt at a very difficult moment indeed, it was not improbable that the Prime Minister, acting as another great man once acted before—Louis XV.—was really bent upon carrying on a little diplomacy on his own account, unknown to Sir Evelyn Baring or Earl Granville. I was certain that his opinions were on the side of the National Party, and I thought I might support them by trying to take a step in the same direction. The right hon. Gentleman has rebuked me for having laughed at the idea of the existence of Native government in Egypt. He said that it was only natural that I should receive such an idea with jeers. If the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me, the jeers came from his own side of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg the noble Lord's pardon. I said it would be natural that jeers should come from certain quarters of the House; but I think I admitted that they came from this side also.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Personally, I have never said a word in favour of the annexation of Egypt, and if I have lately advocated the extension of British power in Egypt, it was because I thought that it was only by such means that a real National Government could ever be established. I think that annexation is to be avoided by every possible means, and I have always hesitated to recommend it; but, at the same time, I have considered it my duty to place the interests of the Egyptian people far and beyond those of the Egyptian Government. These have been my views ever since the Egyptian difficulty began. The Prime Minister, I noticed, did not defend the exclusion of Mr. Blunt from Egypt, the special feature of that exclusion being the difference of treatment meted out to Mr. Blunt to that meted out to French officials, or the subjects of any other nation.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: As everything that is said by an Englishman in reference to Egypt is liable to be misinterpreted, I want to make one matter quite clear. It is only a small point. What I said in regard to the charge against Mr. Blunt, of having interviews with the rebels, which were prolonged far into the night, was that the only time he was up late at night was an occasion when he was dining with the attachés of the British Embassy at a table d'hôte. Upon another point the charges brought against Arabi are certainly not true. He has been charged in this House of having been guilty of the massacres at Alexandria; but when an inquiry was made the Government officials wrote home to say that a very good case for defence might be made out. But now, when the Government of Egypt is attacked, no inquiry into the charges made against the Khedive dare be made. I must say that I regret the course taken by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), in bringing up the communications of Mr. Blunt with Mr. Hamilton, because I do not think they have any bearing upon the real question at all. What I wish to say is this—that the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State has put the question upon a very serious footing. He said distinctly that Mr. Blunt, having been opposed to the Government of Egypt, and having been a friend of Arabi, and having expressed strong opinions, must take the consequence of those opinions. The Prime Minister appears to take the same line, because he has endorsed the opinions of my hon. Friend near me, the despot from Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who says boldly and plainly that we ought to trample out everything that is antagonistic to the Government of Egypt.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I did not say anything of the kind.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Well, then, what was it that my hon. Friend did say?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: What I said was, that in the interest of those who were charged with the Government of Egypt, I desired to keep out a man whose policy had utterly failed, and whose return would simply lead to further difficulties and complications. For that reason, I objected to the reopening by Mr. Blunt of questions that have been settled.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Exactly so; keep all the opposition out. Anybody who happens to hold an opinion which is opposed to that of the reigning Government is to be kept out.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: No.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON: Well, it amounts to that, and I am surprised to find hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench quarrelling with me for contesting the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) on that matter. In bygone times we used to hear something of the Civis Romanus sum doctrine. We hear very little about it now. What has become of it? I have been very much abused for the opinions I presume to entertain; but I think there is enough of the Civis Romanus about me to convince me that I should not be allowed to land in Egypt as long as I presume to hold opinions contrary to those of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. I am sorry that I shall feel compelled to take the opinion of the Committee on this matter. What I want to know is, whether people are to be excluded from any country in which we possess influence, and by our own act, simply because they hold opinions contrary to those of the reigning Government? It seems to me that if we endorse that view it may become a very serious matter, and that everyone who dares to say a word in favour of a poor, suffering, down-trodden, and oppressed people may find himself persecuted in consequence. For these reasons I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £100.

Mr. O'DONNELL rose to Order. He had given Notice of his intention to move the omission of an item of £7,000; and he wished to know how the proposal of the hon. Baronet would affect that Motion? He was sure the hon. Baronet had no desire to shut out any subsequent discussion; and the point of Order he (Mr. O'Donnell) wished to raise was that the hon. Member might be proposing a Motion which would interfere with the further discussion of the Vote upon important and substantive matters. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had himself given Notice of his intention to move the omission of a certain item in the Vote; but the hon. Baronet now proposed to reduce it by a much less sum; and he wished to ascertain whether, under the circumstances, the proposition of the hon. Baronet would have precedence?

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

THE CHAIRMAN: What is the proposition of the hon. Baronet?

Sir WILFRID LAWSON: What I intended to propose was the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100; but it was simply with the object of taking a Division. If in consequence of that Motion the hon. Gentleman will be precluded from taking a Division upon any more important question, I should be very sorry to stand in his way, and I will withdraw my Motion.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: I think I am entitled to ask my hon. Friend why he proposes this particular reduction, or whether his real reason in abandoning it is that he thinks the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) would not back him up?

Sir WILFRID LAWSON: I have no reason to suppose that the noble Lord would not back me up.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is—

“That a sum, not exceeding £157,976, (including a Supplementary sum of £35,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad.”

Mr. O'DONNELL: I should like to know, Sir Arthur Otway, what your ruling is on the point of Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have no ruling to give. I understand that the hon. Baronet has withdrawn his Motion.

Mr. BOURKE: There is one question of great importance which I desire to mention—namely, the legal aspect of the question in regard to the right of excluding a subject of Her Majesty from the dominions of a friendly Power. Some of the Great Powers have always asserted diplomatically their right to exclude particular individuals even when the exclusion has been applied to a British subject. It is quite clear, however, that this very point did arise in Sir Evelyn Baring's mind, because he says, on the 13th of October, that he is—“Doubtful both as to the precise powers possessed by the Egyptian Government to prevent him (Mr. Wilfrid Blunt) landing, and as to the modus operandi which should be adopted in the event of your Lordship agreeing with me that he should not be allowed to land. Can the Egyptian Government, acting through its own officers, prevent an English subject from landing in Egypt, or must they act through the Consular authorities?"

Nubar Pasha seems to have declined to express an opinion, probably because he felt a doubt as to his legal position; and, therefore, Sir Evelyn Baring referred the matter to Her Majesty's Government at home. Now, Her Majesty's Government have never replied to the legal question which was raised by Sir Evelyn Baring; but by not interfering and acting as they have done they have given their sanction, as it were, to the principle adopted by the Egyptian Government, without absolutely expressing any opinion for or against its legality. Considering the position of all British subjects, not only in Egypt, but in all parts of the world, I think it is very desirable indeed that the Law Officers of the Crown should give us an opinion as to the legality of the position taken up by the Egyptian Government with respect to the exclusion of Mr. Blunt. I have no doubt whatever that this exclusion of Mr. Blunt will be used as a precedent in the future; and I look upon the consequences, therefore, with great apprehension, when British subjects hereafter find themselves excluded from a country, as they sometimes are, by an arbitrary Government. My own impression is that the course which has been taken in this case is likely to injure our diplomacy very much, and to be used as a precedent against us in future. It becomes all the more important when we know that the case has occurred in reference to Egypt, where we all know that the Egyptian Government is acting practically under the authority of the British Government. And, further, the position taken by the Egyptian Government is fortified by the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has himself taken over the whole of the responsibility, and that the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman will be quoted in future wherever a British subject is excluded on account of some supposed political offence. Under such circumstances, I should like to know what is the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the subject, and whether, in their opinion, the Law Officers of the Crown have acted upon their strict rights; if so, what is the authority upon which they acted; and, if they have not acted upon any strict right, what justification there can be for Her Majesty's Government sanctioning the proceeding in any way whatever?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Of course, Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere in the internal affairs of a foreign country; and, whatever the law of that country may be, so long as it is applied equally to all foreigners this country would not complain. But if a subject of this country were refused arbitrarily, and without any sufficient reason or cause, admission to any foreign country, and a complaint were made to the Government in that sense, the Government would make a complaint in the proper quarter; but if they came to the conclusion that the foreign country had acted with good faith, and had applied the law in it generally and without any regard to a particular person, then Her Majesty's Government cannot scrutinize too minutely the reasons which led that Government to carry the law into operation. Therefore, all we ask is that foreign countries should not arbitrarily, and without any foundation, treat the subject of one country differently from that of another. Therefore, it is clear that in this case the Egyptian Government have not acted arbitrarily and without sufficient cause. The reasons which have been given by Nubar Pasha for the exclusion of Mr. Blunt are reasons sufficient to justify the English Government in saying they could not interfere with the exercise of their discretion in the matter. If no sufficient reason had been given, on the other hand, and if the Egyptian Government had said that they would not admit a person without giving any reason whatever for so doing, the English Government would have been placed in a different position, and the matter would then be one for serious consideration. I may mention, however, that this case does not stand alone. A similar course to that which has been pursued in the case of Mr. Blunt has been taken with regard to a French subject in reference to whose movements the Egyptian Government felt called upon to interfere.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: When and where?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): My noble Friend will give the details.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The case was that of a Frenchman who wished to join the Mahdi, but who was prevented from doing so by the Egyptian Government, who interfered with his movements in a manner which was certainly quite as liable to excite observation as anything that has been done in the case of Mr. Blunt. The occasion of the interference was when the movements of Mr. O'Kelly were attracting some attention in the House. I was asked a Question about it at the time, and I stated that this French gentleman—a newspaper Correspondent—was proposing to accompany Mr. O'Kelly when he was stopped. Only to-day I stated, in reply to a Question that the Egyptian law, which enables foreigners to act in a certain manner in reference to newspaper articles, was being seriously considered with a view to its alteration. The whole condition of the Press Law in Egypt has attracted the attention of the Egyptian Government; and a Circular upon the subject has, I believe, been addressed to the European Powers. No doubt this has been the result of the impunity which has hitherto enabled foreigners to set at defiance the remonstrances of the Executive Government.

Mr. M'COAN said, he thought the memory of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State was at fault when he described the case of the French Correspondent as one which was analogous to that of Mr. Blunt. It was the case of a newspaper Correspondent who desired to join the Mahdi in company with Mr. O'Kelly. The Egyptian Government stopped both of them, but did not expel either from Egypt. Consequently there was no parallel whatever between the two cases.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) had anticipated a remark which he was about to make. It was perfectly certain that there was only the most remote analogy between the case of the stopping of Mr. O'Kelly and the French Correspondent at Dongola, and that of Mr. Blunt. The Government, in this instance, had placed themselves in a thoroughly ridiculous position. It was evident, from the statements of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill)—statements which had been made with great force and truth—that the treatment of Mr. O'Kelly and the Frenchman bore no comparison with that of Mr. Blunt by Sir Evelyn Baring and the Egyptian Government. There was nothing novel, however, in the facts which had been adduced. Parliament was accustomed to see British subjects insulted and trampled on, their interests despised, their rights set at defiance; while foreign subjects, backed up by their own Governments, were allowed any amount of immunity. He wished, however, to call the attention of the Committee to the remarkable inconsistency of the statement of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman informed the Committee that Mr. Blunt was stopped because his entry into Egypt would be dangerous to the order and peace of that country. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) desired to say, in the first place, lest the few remarks he had to make might be misunderstood, that he was not a believer in Mr. Blunt's views with regard to Egyptian policy. He thought the noble Lord had well described the views of that gentleman as those of a sentimentalist and an enthusiast; well meaning, no doubt, but mistaken in their aims. But when the Prime Minister gave, as a reason for the interference with the movements of a British subject in Egypt, that that interference was necessary for the protection and safety of the country, he would ask them why on earth they had been so unwilling to send a telegram to that gallant and unfortunate officer, General Hicks, forbidding him to proceed? Such a despatch would have had the effect of saving that officer and his army of 13,000 men, and an immense amount of subsequent ruin and bloodshed. [A laugh.] The Prime Minister laughed. He did not know why the right hon. Gentleman should laugh. Perhaps he was about to repeat the statement he had made once before, in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, that he had heard enough of General Hicks. It was perfectly notorious that if that unfortunate officer had acted upon his own views, he would not have started upon his ill-fated expedition; and a single telegram sent to Egypt by Her Majesty's Ministers would have stopped him, with the result of saving his life, and securing the safety of the 13,000 men who accompanied him. Therefore, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) said that to defend the action of the Government in the case of Mr. Blunt upon the necessities of Egypt, and to refuse intervention on the same ground in the case of General Hicks, was a contradiction of terms. He had placed a Motion on the Paper for the reduction of the salary of Sir Evelyn Baring. It had been his intention, upon that Motion, to have entered, with some detail, into the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government under the advice of Sir Evelyn Baring; but the statements which had been made that night in regard to another debate, that was to take place shortly, would prevent him from carrying out his original intention. He thought, however, that he might fairly complain of the want of consideration the Prime Minister had shown in this matter towards some Members of the House. He had asked the right hon. Gentleman if he did not think it would be better to postpone this debate until Tuesday, and to bring it forward then upon the Diplomatic Vote; but the right hon. Gentleman gave no hint that the Vote was to be taken before the debate came off. It was with great personal inconvenience that he had been able to be present that day, and he had pressed for an answer so that the inconvenience to which he had referred might have been avoided; but the Prime Minister gave the House no intimation whatever that an important Vote relating to Egypt was to be taken on Tuesday. This had caused considerable inconvenience not only to himself (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), but to other hon. Members. Perhaps that might be a matter of congratulation for the right hon. Gentleman; but, heretofore, the Government had been accustomed to consider the feelings and convenience of the House generally. For some time the Prime Minister had been pressed to fix definitely the day on which the Diplomatic Vote would be taken; but he had avoided doing so. There was now only one statement which, in view of the debate to-morrow, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) would make in regard to that part of the Vote which applied to the salary of Sir Evelyn Baring, and that was that the policy which that gentleman had recommended to Her Majesty's Government had been, in the main, singularly unfortunate. It was owing to his advice that the Prime Minister had been led to make his extraordinary statement at the Guildhall last year that our Forces in Egypt were to be reduced; that Cairo was to be evacuated, and that orders to that effect had already gone forth. It was unnecessary to remind the Committee how very far from being carried into effect that statement was at the present moment. He believed that Sir Evelyn Baring was largely responsible for the existing state of affairs in Egypt, and for the enforced evacuation of the Soudan, which took place in November and December last. One word of justice to Cherif Pasha. He had been attacked by the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) as being incapable of giving any advice that was contrary to the views of Her Majesty's Government. In that assertion the noble Lord did Cherif Pasha great injustice, because Cherif Pasha had shown himself not only willing to act contrary to the advice of the British Government, but he had actually resigned his high Office of Prime Minister of Egypt, rather than carry out the orders of Her Majesty's Government. His last words were—

"Nothing shall ever induce me to abandon the Soudan to the misery of the Madhi's rule. Time and posterity will judge between me and Mr. Gladstone."

This policy of evacuation, which Sir Evelyn Baring had recommended in December last, had caused untold misery to hundreds of thousands of human beings; it had caused the loss of some 30,000 lives, and the expenditure of millions of money, and which, so far as they could see, only represented the beginning of a new epoch of bloodshed and expenditure with regard to the Soudan. The announcement made on Saturday last showed that the Government had not advanced one stage towards that end which they professed themselves so anxious to achieve—namely, the restoration of order in Egypt and the evacuation of the country. Although they were now, through the collapse of the Conference, able to congratulate the Ministry and the country on the failure of the most mischievous proposals ever made by a British Government, they could not, at the same time, free the Ministry from responsibility for the advice which had led to those misfortunes. He thought there was ample justification for moving the reduction of the Vote by the amount of a portion of Sir Evelyn Baring's salary, although he admitted that there would be far more justification for moving a reduction in respect of the incomes of the Ministers themselves. Sir Evelyn Baring had in this matter played only a subordinate part, taking his cue from Downing Street. He had not dared to initiate that independent policy which ought to have commended itself to his judgment. There was evidence in the Papers that Sir Evelyn Baring recommended that an expedition should be sent to relieve General Gordon as early as March last, although he had previously written against it. The chief charge against Sir Evelyn Baring was, as he had pointed out, that he took his cue from Downing Street. Finally, he asked the Committee to consider the extraordinary reasons given to them for not despatching an expedition to the relief of General Gordon. In drawing attention to this point, as he had already stated, as there was to be a debate on Egyptian affairs, he did not intend to go into the question at large. The reasons, or rather the excuses, put forward by the Government for not taking action in this matter were so unworthy, and he ventured to say so discreditable, that they deserved special attention from hon. Members. The statement had been made by several Ministers that General Gordon had, at a certain moment, changed his policy, and that he had developed a policy of going out of his way to attack the Mahdi. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) admitted that it might have been wiser if General Gordon had concealed his intention in those periphrastic mystifications which the Government so well knew how to employ for the purpose of concealing their meaning; but General Gordon was a soldier, and said exactly what he meant. That phrase "smash up the Mahdi" meant nothing that was not necessary, in his judgment, to be done for the peace of Egypt. General Gordon, for obvious reasons, actually tolerated slavery; he waited till he was besieged in Khartoum until he took any measures of force. To say that he had changed his policy or attitude was a gross injustice to General Gordon and a perversion of his meaning. He asked Her Majesty's Government what else they were doing but endeavouring to smash up the Mahdi's followers? What were the British Forces doing at Wady Halfa and Assouan, and what were their officers at Sukin and other places doing, but smashing up the tribes which followed the Mahdi? He would not move the reduction of the Vote in view of the larger debate of to-morrow; but he hoped that Members who were anxious to begin to discuss the tactics of the Government with regard to General Gordon would not find that they had been deprived of the opportunity of doing so by the unsatisfactory way in which the Government had arranged the Business of the House. He trusted that the Prime Minister would bear in mind the statement made by him on Saturday, that the Vote for the relief of General Gordon and for the restoration of order in the Soudan would be put down for to-morrow. The right hon. Gentleman had promised that a special Vote for General Gordon would be put on the Paper, distinct from any other Vote which the Government might have to bring forward, in order to pay for the destruction of property at Alexandria, or on account of the other blunders they made in Egypt upon that special Vote. He hoped that a clear statement would be made by Her Majesty's Government as to this question of relief or non-relief of General Gordon.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he was hardly disposed to sympathize with Mr. Blunt; but there were, no doubt, many Members of that House who would agree that his exclusion from Egypt was, at least, very extraordinary. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that some years ago Lord Palmerston introduced into the House a Bill called the Conspiracy Bill, which had for its object to obtain powers for excluding from this country persons deemed to be dangerous conspirators. Now, the measure which had been adopted by the Government of the Khedive, and which had received the direct sanction of Her Majesty's Government, savoured of the nature of that Conspiracy Bill, because the worst that anyone had said of Mr. Blunt was that he was a person who was intriguing against the Government of the Khedive; and for that reason he had been, no doubt, excluded from Egypt, not by the Government of the Khedive; but by the direct action of Her Majesty's Government. He did not know whether any previous speaker had called attention to the details in the Papers laid upon the Table; but they certainly seemed to be worthy of attention. If the Government of the Khedive, considering that the action of Mr. Blunt was of a dangerous kind, had endeavoured to prevent him, by warning or otherwise, from coming back to Egypt, it would not have been open to them to take that step; and however much the Government of this country wished the exclusion of Mr. Blunt, they would have entered a protest against the action of the Egyptian Government. Sir Evelyn Baring, believing there was some illegality on the part of the Egyptian Government, telegraphed to Earl Granville for instructions as to the course he was to take; and the answer which he received from the noble Earl was singularly diplomatic; it said nothing, but meant a great deal. "You may abstain," said Earl Granville, "from opposing the action of the Egyptian Government;" which was the same as saying—"We do not think you should sanction it; but we think you should take the responsibility of objecting to it." But, after that, another despatch had been sent by Sir Evelyn Baring to Earl Granville, saying that he proposed to forward a copy of Nubar Pasha's letter to Mr. Blunt, and should be glad to receive instructions as to whether the letter met with the approval of Her Majesty's Government. Well, the answer to that was in terms equally extraordinary; instead of replying that the action of Nubar Pasha was sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government, Earl Granville said—"Act as you propose in your telegram with regard to Mr. Blunt." But, as a matter of fact, Sir Evelyn Baring had made no proposal at all with regard to Mr. Blunt. He would leave that matter to the consideration of the Committee. He maintained that this question was not merely one as to the exclusion of a British subject by the arbitrary act of a Foreign Government, an act which the Attorney General said was always to be regarded with the greatest suspicion, and to be guarded against with the greatest care—it was the exclusion of a British subject with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government, and as such the Committee ought to regard it. The position of the Government in this matter he held to be mischievous and absurd. He thought the case was even worse than that which he had brought forward in that House on a former occasion. This action of the Government could only compare with their action in the case of the crew of the Nisero and with their abandonment of General Gordon. It appeared that the Government had failed to recognize the Constitutional principle that a British subject was entitled to the protection of the British Government.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked for some explanation of the law stated by the Attorney General with reference to the exclusion of Mr. Blunt from Egypt. He had always supposed that when a Government acted beyond the law it acted arbitrarily. That was precisely what the Egyptian Government had done in this case. But they had done more than that—they had acted directly contrary to the law. The hon. and learned Gentleman asked, What law? The answer was the Capitulations. By the Capitulations every foreigner had a right to land in Egypt, to trade and live there, and to be judged by particular tribunals. Therefore, if this case had occurred to any other foreigner, that foreigner would only have had to go to his own Government and claim that they should interfere in his behalf in accordance with the Capitulations; and Mr. Blunt had just the same right as any other Englishman to go to the Foreign Office, and to ask why in his case the Capitulations were not to be enforced. Mr. Blunt had a Treaty and legal right to land in Egypt; and when the Egyptian Government refused to allow him to do so, they acted contrary to law, and in an arbitrary manner.

Mr. M'COAN said, he could speak with personal knowledge on this matter. He had a very intimate acquaintance with the Capitulations; and he begged to say that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was perfectly right in the statement he had just made. He knew that by the Capitulations which were in operation in both Turkey and Egypt any Englishman had full right to land in any part of the latter country, and to live and trade there as long as he liked.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his statement had been that his recollection of the Capitulations was that every English subject observing the law of the country had a right to remain in the country. Therefore, if there were no objections to Mr. Blunt's conduct, he would have a cause of complaint against the Egyptian Government, which he could put forward through the Consul General in Egypt. But, as to whether Mr. Blunt had made any complaint, he knew nothing. Nor did he know whether there was sufficient ground for the exclusion of Mr. Blunt, although, as to the principle on which his right to land in Egypt rested, he thought there was no question whatever. Sir Evelyn Baring had consulted Mr. Cookson, the man who in all Egypt was best qualified to advise on the subject; and it was after Mr. Cookson's advice had been received that Sir Evelyn Baring took the course which he had pursued.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he did not think it right that the Attorney General should hold up Mr. Cookson to cover his deficient knowledge of the law.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that Mr. Cookson had been consulted, and that there was no justification for saying that Mr. Cookson concurred in the view put forward by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) and the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan).

MR. M'COAN asked if the noble Lord would take upon himself the responsibility of saying that Mr. Cookson was of opinion that under the Capitulations Mr. Blunt was not entitled to land in Egypt? He had known that gentleman for many years at Constantinople; he knew the extent of his authority in a question of this kind; and while he might, without presumption, set his own experience against that of Mr. Cookson, he ventured to affirm that Mr. Cookson could never have advised that Mr. Blunt had not a right under the Capitulations to land and attend to his affairs in Egypt. If he could give such advice, he was little fit for the office of Consul and Judge.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he believed that Mr. Cookson had been consulted by Sir Evelyn Baring with regard to the subject generally. Similar powers to those exercised by the Egyptian Government it was well known had been exercised in Turkey, foreigners having been excluded from that country in exactly the same manner as Mr. Blunt had been excluded from Egypt. The position under the Capitulations was that certain rights were given to foreign subjects; but they were contingent upon the rights not being abused. It was improbable that any Government would give a general power to foreigners to land and abuse their laws. No State could exist for any length of time with such a law in operation. There were in Egypt certain well-recognized rights of foreigners who enjoyed the benefit of the Capitulations, on condition that their privileges were not abused. If a man thought he had been unjustly treated he had a right to appeal to his Consul; but the Consul was not under an obligation to extend his protection to foreigners who abused their rights.

MR. BOURKE said, that the case put by the noble Lord was that if a foreigner landed in Turkey or any other country and abused his privileges he was not entitled to protection from his Consul; but that was not the case with Mr. Blunt, who had been prevented from landing, and had, therefore, had no opportunity of abusing his privileges. There could have been no abuse of privileges by Mr. Blunt; and he gathered from the Papers that he was excluded from Egypt not on account of anything he had done there, but for something he had done in England.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, it could not have been clear that Mr. Blunt was properly excluded from Egypt, because Sir Evelyn Baring wrote to Earl Granville in these words—

"Can the Egyptian Government, acting through its own officers, prevent an English subject landing in Egypt, or must they act through the Consular authorities? I am unable here to obtain any satisfactory answer to this question, and I beg your Lordship will be so good as to furnish me with instructions as to how I am to act."

If the Capitulations were so clear, Sir Evelyn Baring would have been able to ascertain in Egypt whether Mr. Blunt could land or not.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I said Mr. Blunt had no right to plead the Capitulations when he had abused the privileges conferred upon foreigners under them.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought the subject of Mr. Blunt's exclusion from Egypt had been well threshed out; and, therefore, he would ask a question of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on a subject of more importance. He referred to the Slave Trade in Egypt, and he asked the noble Lord whether the execution of the Convention with regard to it was coming into effect on the 17th of August, 1884? He had already addressed a very plain question on this subject to the noble Lord; but the answer which he received had somewhat obscured the position. The proposition of the Earl of Dufferin not only declared that slavery should be prohibited, but that it should be altogether abolished. Sir Evelyn Baring was of a contrary opinion, and he expressed himself to that effect in a despatch which the noble Lord had referred to. But the question he had put to the noble Lord on a former occasion was as to whether it was intended by Her Majesty's Government to press upon the Khedive of Egypt to give effect not to the proposal of the Earl of Dufferin, to which Sir Evelyn Baring was unfavourably inclined, but to the original Convention now standing, and the Decree of the Egyptian Government, by which the trade in human beings would become unlawful, and prohibited under the severest penalties on the 17th of August, 1884. He expressed an earnest hope that the noble Lord, in the answer which he gave to this inquiry, would not throw any doubt on the state in which the law in Egypt would be on that date in reference to slavery. He hoped the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would be able to assure them that the answer he had previously given did not imply a doubt that the British Government would be less zealous than they would have been if they had not been in Egypt at all. He trusted the noble Lord would be able to assure the Committee that Her Majesty's Government would impress on the Khedive of Egypt the obligation which rested on him, under the Decrees which would come into force on the 17th of the present month. Referring to the subject, the Earl of Dufferin had stated that, with regard to Egypt Proper, under the Convention of seven years ago, the selling of slaves from family to family would cease on the 17th of August, 1884; and then, assuming, as a matter of course, that the Convention would come into effect, the Earl of Dufferin went on to say that we should press the Egyptian Government to inflict the heaviest possible punishment in case of a violation of the Convention. He (Sir George Campbell) had only now to ask the noble Lord if it was intended that the Convention and its Annexes would come into force in Egypt on the 17th of the present month; and if the Government were prepared to press the Khedive of Egypt to give full effect to the Convention? This was a question of the utmost importance in the interests of humanity; by the Convention a great step was taken towards the abolition of slavery. They were now in a position to press the execution of the Convention upon the Khedive with greater authority and power than they would have been were they not in possession of the country; and therefore he hoped the noble Lord would at once tell the Committee that his words were not intended to derogate the authority of this Convention.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell) who had asked the question that night about the subject of slavery, and who had now re-introduced the subject, had done public service in bringing forward this great question of slavery in connection with Egypt; but if the hon. Gentleman expected that Her Majesty's Government were going to do anything to diminish slavery in Egypt, or to do away with it altogether, he would be grievously disappointed. He would be put off with vague phrases and promises. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) thought the country would notice with surprise what he ventured to call the hypocrisy of two of the Ministers of the Crown, not in that House, who attended the great anti-slavery meeting at the Guildhall the other day, and made fine speeches in favour of the abolition of slavery all over the world, while the Government had been doing their utmost to encourage slavery of the most cruel and abominable kind throughout the whole of the Soudan, and to tolerate it in Egypt. How many thousand persons had been subjected to cruel slavery and outrage in consequence of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government during the past two years? The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs might possibly say these were vague observations; but he would give the strongest possible proof that the policy of Her Majesty's Government, with regard to Egypt and the Soudan, had promoted, and would continue to promote slavery, although Earl Granville and the Earl of Derby attended the Guildhall meetings, and talked clap-trap about doing away with it. He would call attention to a despatch from General Gordon to Sir Evelyn Baring. General Gordon was sent out to the Soudan with insufficient resources, and it was no fault of his that he was obliged to issue a Proclamation when he arrived in the Soudan, countenancing, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, the existing slavery in that country. By their subsequent despatches and policy, Her Majesty's Government had shown most clearly that they endorsed that action of General Gordon. General Gordon, writing to Sir Evelyn Baring on the 21st of February, stated that, in answering questions regarding the liberation of slaves, he had said that the Treaty of 1877 for its abolition could not be carried out by him; and Sir Evelyn Baring, writing to Earl Granville on the same date, said—

"It was obvious from the first that the revival of slavery in the Soudan would be the result of the policy of abandonment."

That despatch of Sir Evelyn Baring was in the hands of Her Majesty's Government five months ago; but no protest was made by the Government; so that, in addition to all the other human misery the Government had caused, the revival of slavery was to be laid at their door. That was a fact which ought to be kept before the country as constantly as it could. The inconsistency, and he did not hesitate to say the hypocrisy, of two Ministers of the Crown, who were responsible for the revival of slavery, attending anti-slavery meetings to denounce slavery, when they had not the slightest intention of doing away with it, warranted the strongest expressions of condemnation. It was evident from the Blue Books, and what hon. Members knew of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, that their Egyptian policy had not only caused an immense expenditure of blood and treasure, but was leading to a revival of this infamous traffic.

MR. M'COAN said, that as the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had charged him with making reckless statements, he would ask the indulgence of the Committee while he vindicated himself from the charge by reading from Hertelett's Treaties the actual text of the Capitulation which settled the point, and in full recollection of which he had expressed the opinion disputed by them. The Capitulation in question was renewed, slightly modified, in the Treaty of the Dardanelles between this country and Turkey; and its very first Article was to the effect that every English merchant, and all other merchants sailing under the English flag, might freely land, travel, or reside in any part of the Ottoman Empire—of which Egypt was still a Province—and, in the undisturbed possession of their privileges, have full liberty to attend to their affairs. He had merely contended that, according to the Capitulation quoted by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), Mr. Blunt had a clear right to land in Egypt, and the Egyptian Government had no right whatever to prevent his doing so. If the words he had quoted from the text of the Capitulation had any meaning at all, this was beyond argument.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he did not wish to revive the controversy about the Capitulations, but simply to say that it did not seem to him that what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. M'Coan) had just said proved the accuracy of his former statements. The hon. Gentleman had not attempted to answer the arguments of the Attorney General or himself (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice)—namely, that the Egyptian Government had rights which overrode the rights given by the Capitulations, and that a condition of the enjoyment of the privileges of the Capitulations was that foreigners enjoying them should not abuse them, and that if foreigners did abuse them they must take the consequences. With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), he could only say that he could not understand that by his answer at Question time he could in any sense be understood as announcing on the part of Her Majesty's Government any intention to recede from supporting the rights which had been given in regard to slavery by the Khedival Decree, which came into force on the 17th of this month. Sir Evelyn Baring's despatch, as he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) understood it, was to the effect that he did not make any express declaration to support the views of the Earl of Dufferin. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) did not know that it was absolutely necessary to indulge in any such express declaration, while in regard to the positive statement, which he understood the hon. Member had found in the despatch, and which, to a certain extent, had disturbed his mind, all he could say was, speaking from recollection, that there was nothing in the despatch at all to show that there was any desire or intention to suspend the operation of the Khedival Decree. All that Her Majesty's Government could do was to impress on the Egyptian Government to do whatever was possible under the circumstances; and his hon. Friend might be perfectly certain that whatever could be done by the Government towards the abolition of slavery would be done. It was not likely that in the year that this country had been celebrating the jubilee of the abolition of slavery there would be any laxity on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers in using whatever influence they had upon Foreign and Colonial authorities to secure an abolition of those practices, which were so repugnant to every Englishman, no matter to what Party he belonged. He could only express regret that upon such a question as this of slavery the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was not able to resist the temptation to indulge in a violent attack on the Government. The hon. Gentleman had used the word "hypocrisy"—[Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Hear, hear!]

—and now he cried "Hear, hear!" Surely, after all, the hon. Member must know that in regard to this question of slavery there was no division of Party at all; and when he accused the Government of hypocrisy in this matter—[Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Two Ministers.]—well, two of the most important Ministers—Earl Granville and the Earl of Derby—he could not seriously mean what he said. Earl Granville and the Earl of Derby had both exerted themselves in every way to promote the abolition of slavery. If it were in Order for him so to do, he could with perfect ease show that during the time Earl Granville had presided at the Foreign Office, he had exerted himself in the cause of the abolition of slavery in a way which entitled him to the gratitude of every man.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL explained that his mind was not at all disturbed by the despatch of Sir Evelyn Baring; but it was disturbed by the answer which the noble Lord gave him earlier in the evening; and it was somewhat more disturbed by the observations the noble Lord had just addressed to the Committee. The Question he had asked was whether the Convention was to be put in force on the 17th of August or not, and the noble Lord had said Her Majesty's Government would do the best they could in the matter; a plain answer was not returned to a plain question. He merely asked, and he hoped the noble Lord would answer him, "Yes" or "No," was it or was it not the intention of the Government that the Convention solemnly entered into in 1877 was to come into force, as arranged, on the 17th of August?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The question is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he wished to take the advantage of this Vote to call attention to what he considered the singular neglect of Her Majesty's Government and of the Ambassador of Her Majesty's Government in Italy to safeguard to the best of their ability the international rights of the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty involved in the unfounded spoliation of the Propaganda. Now, on a consideration of this question, they must bear in mind two very different and distinct matters—namely, the position of the national Catholic institutions in Italy, and the position of the international Catholic institutions in Italy. Now, to take an example of the former, let them take at once, say, the monastic institutions established in Italy on Italian soil for the special service of Italian people, and supported and endowed out of Italian funds, and for local Italian objects. Like every Catholic, and he hoped like every honest man, no matter what his religious belief might be, he held that the confiscation of national religious institutions was none the less robbery though it might be done according to certain Parliamentary forms. With regard to the national Italian institutions, he could not help thinking that the way in which they had been robbed by the Italian Government was most unjustifiable and iniquitous in the extreme; but the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty made no claim on Her Majesty's Government to interfere in respect to Italian national institutions, even though of a religious character. Their spoliation was considered by Catholics a great shock to religion in Italy, and directed against religion at large; but they freely acknowledged that Catholics in England and Ireland and elsewhere throughout the British Empire had no claim upon Her Majesty's Government to interfere for the protection of Italian Catholics on a question of Italian national religious institutions; but it was an institution of a totally different description which had been assailed by the Italian Government of late—it was an institution partaking of the international character of the Papacy which had been assailed. The institution of the Propaganda was not, and never had been, merely or mainly concerned with the Catholic religion in Italy and for Italians—it had been mainly concerned with the Catholic religion throughout the world, in the British Empire as much as elsewhere, and, in fact, in the British Empire more than in, perhaps, all the other nations of the world. It was an institution, in the first place, for promoting the missionary enterprise for the conversion of the heathen; and, in the second place, an institution for carrying on, and aiding the carrying on, the Catholic religion in all countries. Its funds had been supplied by the contributions of Catholics throughout the whole world, the endowments were formed, and the securities for their productive investment were taken and established entirely with a view to its international character. The Propaganda was founded, in a geographical sense, on Italian soil, which was now under the established Government of the Sardinian dynasty; but the creation of a temporal Government in Italy in no way took away the international character of the great institution which long preceded the Sardinian dynasty in Italy. It was necessary for the world before the Sardinian dynasty was established, and it was just as necessary for the world to-day; it was an institution which in an especial degree concerned the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty in the British Empire, and that simply arose from the fact of the enormous Colonial Empire ruled by Her Majesty. Throughout India, throughout large portions of the British Empire, in consequence of the historic circumstances at home, millions of Catholics had been and were vastly dependent upon the discharge and full liberty of the teaching functions of their Church—upon the complete liberty of the institution of the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda. Now, the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) brought this question forward in the House on two occasions in February last, and called the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the gravity of the proceedings that were about to take place in Italy; and, in reply, the Prime Minister expressed himself with a certain amount of that large and copious language which, perhaps, was the most useful kind of language for giving expression to opinions that, for one reason or another, it was not desirable too definitely to express. But, at any rate, one promise was made by the Premier on the 18th of February last—namely, that the British Ambassador in Italy would take every opportunity to maintain and support the claims of the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty's Government. On that occasion, the right hon. Gentleman said that—

“Sir John Lumley will be instructed to use his good offices in the matter, in case he should see any opening for that purpose.”—(3 Hansard, [284] 1200.)

Whether openings for that purpose had occurred or not, there was issued the other day a Decree of the Italian High Court bringing the construction of the Propaganda under the ordinary law with regard to Ecclesiastical Corporations in Ireland. That Decree had been in operation ever since, and at any time since the British Government was aware of the strength of feeling of all Catholics on the subject the British Ambassador could and ought to have made serious representations on the matter. Instead of any representations having been made, the Premier to-day reiterated, but in a somewhat different form, the answer he gave last week, the gist of which was that the British Ambassador had, down to the present, done no single thing whatever towards safeguarding the rights of the Catholics at large, and of British Catholics in particular, on the international question of the international institution of the Propaganda. To-day the language of the Premier certainly displayed an improvement upon his former answers, because to-day he distinctly expressed the opinion that the whole question was an Italian legal question; his answer implied that the whole importance of this institution of universal Catholicism was dependent upon a private local law of one particular nation — namely, the Italian nation. Why, following the view expressed by the Premier to-day, if the Italian High Court chose to bring the Papacy itself, which was undoubtedly a Corporation sole, under the law regarding Ecclesiastical Corporations in Italy they could do so. They would just have as much legal claim to come to an opinion of that sort with regard to the Papacy itself, as they would in regard to this necessary and inseparable portion of the Papacy, the institution of the Propaganda. The very first function of the Church was to teach all nations, and the College of the Propaganda was specially an institution for that universal and world-wide purpose; and if the Italian High Court could do what it pleased with the College of the Propaganda, it could, with exactly as much legal right, declare that the Papacy was an Italian Corporation, that the Pope was an Italian Bishop, and the complaints of the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty, against even the most violent interference with the direct spiritual authority of the Pope, might be answered by some future Premier that that was an Italian legal question. That was the position against which Catholics protested, and he begged to remind the Premier that there were no divided counsels in this matter amongst Catholics. The question had been raised by Catholic Members of the House, who sat amongst the usual supporters of Her Majesty's Government; and only a few days ago the Party who followed the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) passed, in the most emphatic and solemn way, a request to that hon. Member to bring forward this question on behalf of their Body; so, whether Catholic Members sat on the Opposition or the Ministerial side of the House, there was absolute unanimity upon the gravity of this question affecting Catholic interests throughout the British Empire. He (Mr. O'Donnell) quoted to-day from a despatch which, in reply to a Petition of the Vicar Apostolic at Gibraltar, was sent by the Earl of Kimberley to the Governor at Gibraltar, on the 16th of January, 1871. Just before that date Rome had been seized by the Italian troops, and the Vicar Apostolic at Gibraltar had sent in a Petition to

Her Majesty's Government for some assurance with regard to the freedom and security of the Papal functions. The Earl of Kimberley, in his reply, distinctly acknowledged that—

"The deep interest which is felt by many millions of Her Majesty's subjects in the position of the Pope renders all that concerns his personal dignity, and independence, and freedom to exercise his spiritual functions, fit subjects for the notice of Her Majesty's Government, and they have not failed to take such steps as are in their power to afford to the Pope the means of security in case of need."

So far did Her Majesty's Government go in 1871. It was impossible to conceive anything more essential to the freedom to exercise the Pope's spiritual functions than the security of the Propaganda, and the declaration of the British Government in 1871 absolutely and entirely covered the security of the Propaganda. Now, only 13 years after that declaration contained in the despatch of the Earl of Kimberley, they had the Premier stating that this infinitely grave question of the Propaganda was a mere Italian legal question; and, so far from there being any acknowledgment that it was a matter which required the notice of Her Majesty's Government, they were told that during all the months that had passed the British Government had not seen an opportunity for calling any attention whatever to the matter. Of course, he did not wish to use any language to which the Premier might reasonably object; he intended to confine himself strictly to exposing the important facts of the case. At the same time, there was a remarkable difference between the declaration of Her Majesty's Government 13 years ago, that everything affecting the freedom of the Pope to exercise his spiritual authority and functions was of the utmost concern to Her Majesty's Government, and their present declaration that their Ambassador had not found an opportunity of uttering even a word of protest in this most important matter of the Propaganda. There was a vast and, apparently, inexplicable difference between the two declarations. He did not know whether that difference could be at all explained by the course recent delicate negotiations had taken. If he remembered aright, the Premier had admitted that the solitary European Government which supported him in the recent Conference fascio was the Italian Government. ["And the Turkish!"] But the Premier would be the very last man to admit that the Turkish Government could be considered an important European Government. He (Mr. O'Donnell) confined himself to the Italian Government, which, properly speaking, was, after all, the only European Government which could be quoted in that connection. The complaint Catholics had to make was that if the Government of King Humbert claimed to deal with the property of the Propaganda, as a religious Corporation, they might just as legally claim to deal with any other portion of the property administered by the Papacy. He did not go at all into the question of the amount of loss that had been inflicted, or that might be inflicted upon the Propaganda by the measures of the Italian Government. He was content with arguing the question on principle. He found that an Italian High Court, interpreting an Italian local law, had ventured to declare that that Italian local law dealt with the endowments of an institution of universal Catholicism, and he protested against such a declaration. The carrying out of that declaration would be fatal to the freedom of the Catholic Church in all its parts and functions. If the Propaganda could be despoiled at the domination of the High Court, the High Court might put forth an Italian secular claim to all the contents of the storied halls of the Papacy. It was for these reasons that he had taken the opportunity, on the Vote which included the salary of the British Ambassador at Rome, to call attention to what was undoubted neglect on the part of the Government of the Ambassador—he left it to them to settle between themselves whether it was the Government or the Ambassador who was the more at fault in the matter. The Committee could not close their eyes to the fact that a Catholic institution, in no way local, in no way merely national, in no way merely territorial, had been, with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, who were bound to guard the religious interests of all the subjects of Her Majesty, made liable to the application of an Italian local law, and might have its property dealt with in this fashion today and in that fashion to-morrow. When the Government admitted the claim of the Italian Law Court to deal with this universal institution of the Church, they destroyed the value of the declaration which, even as late as 1871, they made to a spokesman of Her Majesty's Catholic subjects that everything that concerned the free exercise of the spiritual functions of the Papacy was, and must remain, a subject for the notice of Her Majesty's Government. He had to propose the omission from the Vote of the item which represented the salary of the British Ambassador at the Court of Rome, who, bound on behalf of his Government to protect the interests of all British subjects, had most glaringly failed to discharge his duty with regard to the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty, in a matter of the most vital importance to their religion. This was a subject in which all parties were interested. Personally, he should be just as emphatic if an institution of universal Protestantism, or a universal missionary enterprise, established and endowed by the contributions of sincere Protestants throughout the world, were ceased or confiscated by a Government, no matter which. Every institution must have some local basis, must be under some roof, and within some walls. This was a question of universal justice—it was a question of universal religion. Nothing more was required by any Catholic subject of Her Majesty than that Her Majesty's Government should maintain the international character of the Propaganda, and distinctly refuse to consider that that international institution was to be confounded with the more local and more national institutions such as local Bishops or conventual establishments, against whose spoliation Catholics might justly protest; but which spoliation differed very widely from the grave injury inflicted on the Sacred Institution of the Propaganda.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £7,000, for the Salary of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Rome, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Mr. MOORE said, that they, the Catholic subjects of Her Majesty, 10,000,000 in number, had every reason to be thankful to his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) for having brought this question forward. They had had to be thankful to the hon. Member on other occasions, although, perhaps, his words were not always acceptable in every quarter. This was probably owing to the fact that his words were sometimes armed, like a dart, with barbs, and carried consternation into the ranks of his opponents. He (Mr. Moore), for his own part, could only admire the great ability and great thought the hon. Member always brought to bear on these matters. It was a great matter of regret that no Cabinet Minister thought it worth his while to be present on this occasion; but, no doubt, the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would give them whatever consolation was in his power, but they had a right, when a question of such importance as this was under discussion, to expect a proper answer from a Cabinet Minister. If there was no prospect of their being favoured with such an answer, it might be necessary for them to move to report Progress. What he (Mr. Moore) wished to say was that in the early part of the Session the Prime Minister pledged himself that Her Majesty's Minister in Rome would use every effort which lay in his power, and would avail himself of every opportunity which presented itself, to exercise influence upon the Italian Government in the interest of the Catholic subjects of the Queen. What they wished to ask now was, whether these good offices had been used, and whether anything had been done to protect or safeguard the interests of British Catholics? Was the noble Lord in a position to lay any Papers on the Table, or to give any information on the subject? He should like to know, in particular, what was going to be done with the property of the Propaganda—was it going to be converted into State bonds, objectionable as they were, or was the "conversion" only an euphemistic phrase by which a more extensive process of confiscation was covered? As he was informed, or, rather, as he had found in the columns of The Times one morning, this process of conversion amounted in reality to a process of confiscation. Early in the month of February there appeared in The Times details as to how the process of so-called conversion was carried out. The Correspondent wrote—

"The manner of proceeding is this. It was first decided that a special duty, for preliminary expenses of 30 per cent, should be imposed on the mass."

That was to keep the lawyers in a good humour—

"To this 30 per cent was added a transfer duty of 4 per cent, from which mortmain property had been exempt, and 6 per cent for land tax, making in all 40 per cent. Then a progressive duty has been imposed for the benefit of the Governmental Ecclesiastical Fund—a duty beginning with 15 per cent on 10,000 francs revenue, and amounting up to 40 or 50 per cent on larger sums."

Well, they could judge whether the term "confiscation" was justified—whether it lay with him to use such a term as a true description of what was taking place in Italy—when they read the remainder of this paragraph. The Times Correspondent went on to say—

"The result is that a Bishopric of 40,000 francs has been reduced to 12,500 francs, a second of 60,000 francs to 18,000 francs, and a third of 150,000 francs to 24,000 francs. The Governments interested in the 12,000,000 or 15,000,000 francs of the Propaganda think that this conversion much resembles a confiscation, and wish to be informed on the subject."

Had the Government adopted any means to ascertain what was taking place in Rome in regard to this institution—in which the Irish Members were so deeply interested? Before he left the question of finance he might add that, supposing the transaction he had described took place, these religious bodies would be paid in State paper—paper inscribed "Nelle grau libro del debito d'Italia," whatever that might mean—belonging to the Italian Consolidated Fund. The value of this paper was pretty well known. The Italian people were ground down to the full extent they could possibly bear; and if Italy should at any time be involved in a war, or any internal eruption, the bonds would at once decrease in value 50 or 60 per cent. They were not to be paid in cash, and were to be inscribed in the "Grand Book of the Debt of Italy." A very "grand book" it was! The position of the Irish Members in this matter, and why they claimed the protection of the House of Commons for the Catholics of the country and the protection of the Government to whose Revenue they contributed, was this. They numbered—Her Majesty's Catholic subjects—10,000,000, and the Propaganda was the direct means of communication between these and the Holy See. As a matter of fact, for the spiritual subjects of the Holy See in this country the Propaganda was no missionary institution. It was the absolute and direct medium of communication between the Holy See and its spiritual subjects, and as such had been assured to them by the Memorandum of the 8th of September, 1870, received from M. Blanc, of the Italian Foreign Office, and forwarded to Earl Granville by Sir Augustus Paget. All the ecclesiastical business between the Catholic Bishops of this country and the Holy See was transacted through the Propaganda—and transacted absolutely free of cost to Her Majesty's subjects. Questions of discipline, questions of Church management, and a great many other questions were referred to the Propaganda; and the assistance of lawyers, translators, printers, and skilled experts were obtained through it free of cost. If the property of the Propaganda were confiscated, these costs would in the future be thrown upon Her Majesty's subjects, in distinct violation of their rights and freedom of association with the Holy See. This could not be too clearly understood. Apart entirely from its relations with England and Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in these countries, the Propaganda was also the great focus and centre of missionary enterprise. His hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) had spoken, eloquently enough, of the interest which every civilized nation in the world justly took in this institution; but no country had a greater interest in the preservation of these pioneers of civilization than England, the greatest Mahomedan country—taking into consideration their Eastern Possessions—in the world. The Propaganda sent forth missionaries, and to the valuable services of these men he could testify. He had seen a man broken down in health, worn out with intermittent fever, returning to Rome after a residence of 30 years in equatorial Africa, with the people of King John of Abyssinia. This man had been turned out of the country at a moment's notice, and had been compelled to travel all the way from Abyssinia to Khartoum without equipage or escort of any kind. But the missionary aspect of the question was one which, perhaps, would have less weight with the Foreign Office than that involving the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects. The question was a very plain one. As he had said, for his co-religionists the Propaganda was the Holy See—their direct means of communicating with the Papacy. The Memorandum received from M. Blanc, and forwarded to Earl Granville by Sir Augustus Paget, contained these words—

"The Italian Government guarantees on its territory. (a.) The liberty of communication between the Sovereign Pontiff, and Foreign States, clergy, and peoples. (b.) The Italian Government engages to preserve all the institutions, offices, and ecclesiastical bodies, and their officials existing at Rome. The Government engages to preserve entire, and without subjecting them to special taxes, all the ecclesiastical properties whose revenues belong to ecclesiastical charges, offices, corporations, institutes, and bodies having their seat at Rome. These Articles would be considered a public bi-lateral contract, and would form the subject of an agreement with the Powers having Catholic subjects."

The Memorandum contained an account of the various negotiations which had taken place as to the settlement of the question of the temporal power, and gave a résumé of the points which had been from time to time considered. The terms of the document distinctly, absolutely, and fully covered liberty of communication between Her Majesty's Catholic subjects and the Propaganda. Nothing could be more clear than the promises of the Italian Government to Her Majesty's Government, or the fact that they had guaranteed the security of the property of this institution, and had distinctly declared in the document to which he referred that Her Majesty's subjects should not suffer. And yet that guarantee had been allowed to be set aside, and the obligations solemnly and voluntarily tendered by the Italian Government had been directly infringed. He did not know what answer the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State would be able to give. He was sorry to hear the Prime Minister say that no European or other Power had moved in the matter. He believed the right hon. Gentleman was labouring under some misapprehension on that point. Certainly, there had been a Resolution of Congress, and the American Government had moved in the matter. He also understood that the German Government had been moving; but whether that was so or not it was not so easy for one who was altogether outside the diplomatic world to say. This much was quite certain, that in the Memorandum presented to the Representative of this country in 1870 a distinct arrangement was entered into by which the Italian Government proposed to guarantee the security of the property of the Propaganda, and to undertake that it should remain, as heretofore, one of the ornaments of the country and of the Catholic Church. He hoped and trusted to hear from Her Majesty's Government that, at least, their interests had been guarded; that the fullest possible information would be given to the Committee on the subject; and that the Committee would be thoroughly re-assured that, whatever might be contemplated, steps would be taken with the object of preventing the revenues of this most ancient College from being confiscated for secular purposes.

MR. MARUM: I wish to supplement the observations which have already been offered. In addition to the despatch of the Earl of Kimberley, which has been referred to by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), I desire to read to the Committee the observations of a former Prime Minister, of strong Protestant proclivities and of strong hand—I mean the late Lord Palmerston. They will be found in the Correspondence and the Reports furnished to this House, in 1849, of the Correspondence with Lord Normanby and the Prince Castelcicala, containing three important propositions. 1st.—That England, on account of her Roman Catholic subjects, could not view with indifference what was passing in the Roman States. 2nd.—That she desired that the Pope should occupy an independent temporal position, in order that he might not become the political instrument of any one European Power. (See also Portalis Discours Sur l'organisation des cultes Paris, 1845.) 3rd.—That the position of the Pope differed from that of the Sovereigns, as he was elected by the College of Cardinals, a Body neither national in its constitution, nor in its membership. I invite the British Government to study these propositions laid down during the existence of the Temporal Power, and the Earl of Kimberley's despatch applies to the present usurpation interregnum. I lay down this proposition of International Law, which will be found amply sustained by Sir Robert Phillimore in the chapter upon "Intervention" in his Treatise upon International Law (Ed. 1882), and also by Sir

Travers Twiss in his work upon the same subject, published this very year, 1884—namely,

"That international endowment made with the assent of the Sovereign Pontiff during the Temporal Power, and maintained from the period of Gregory XV. by absolute Sovereigns de jure, if attempted to be confiscated by a subsequent Sovereign nuper de facto et non de jure, constitute legitimate subject-matter for Ambassadorial function."

We ask no intervention as to Italian property, or Italian institutions, but only in reference to international property acquired and maintained under the dynasties of absolute Sovereigns de facto et de jure—the most ancient and venerable in the world. As Lord Macaulay puts it—

"The proudest Royal houses are but of yesterday as compared with the long line of Supreme Pontiffs."

This view is set forth in a Rescript issued this year by the Propaganda, and signed by Cardinal Simeoni, Prefect of the Institution, and the Archbishop of Tyre, from which I will read an extract with the permission of the Committee—

"Most Illustrious and Reverend Lord.—Your Lordship is aware of the judgment pronounced on the 29th of January last by the Supreme Court of Cassation, in full session, on the convertibility of the property of this Sacred Congregation. According to that decision, which has been already sufficiently judged by public opinion, the Propaganda is placed on a level with purely local ecclesiastical institutions, and is therefore subjected to the operation of the law for the conversion of the patrimony of such institutions existing in the Roman Province (Law 1873).

"Now, as your Lordship is already aware, the nature of this institution, most undoubtedly international, is altogether different, whether we regard the character of the mission entrusted to it, or the source of the funds which constitute its patrimony. The Act of Foundation by which Gregory XV. of holy memory commenced the magnificent work, the glory alike of the Holy See and of Italy, and the series of Pontifical Constitutions issued with regard to it during the two and a-half centuries of its existence through the most violent European crisis, has made it sufficiently clear to the whole world that the Popes established this institution for the sole purpose of making it the instrument for the efficacious exercise of their Apostolic Ministry of propagating the Faith over the whole face of the earth, and to this end they conferred on it the most ample and extraordinary powers. To secure to it full liberty in the exercise of so sublime an office they themselves were the first to furnish it with pecuniary means, and with this same view the faithful of all nations contributed to increase its patrimony, which was destined not for the advantage of one nation only but for the good of the entire human race.

"It is, therefore, clearly evident that the above-mentioned judgment does not strike at the property of a particular institution, but injures the capital destined exclusively to the exercise of the Roman Pontiff's Apostolic Ministry of converting the nations to the light of faith and civilization. It causes this injury as well as by exposing the Propaganda to the danger of seeing, some time or other, the total or partial loss of its property, in consequence of eventualities which are not improbable, as also by making the payment of its funds dependent on the will of the parties in power, and therefore a matter of the most deplorable uncertainty, but, above all, by depriving it of the free disposal of its capital, a freedom which is absolutely necessary to it, on account of its essential character of initiating religious movements, and of the frequent occasions on which it has to meet the extraordinary needs of divers missions.

"The Holy Father, most deeply grieved by this new and fierce attack on the imprescriptible rights of his Apostolic Office, and foreseeing the sad consequences that will arise from the conversation of the actual patrimony of the Sacred Congregation—a patrimony, moreover, already alienated for the greater part of the Government, pendente lite—feels it his duty to provide in the best possible way for the future security of so deserving an institution. To obtain this security he has deigned to command me to declare, as I now do by this circular, that henceforth the administrative seat of the Propaganda for all donations, legacies, and offerings, by which the piety of the faithful may wish to meet its continual and heavy expenditure, is transferred out of Italy. And in order to provide for the greater general convenience it has been decided to establish in different parts of the world Centres or Procurations, where the offerings of the faithful may be put out of all danger, and be at the free and independent disposal of the Sacred Congregation for the benefit of the Missions. These Procurations are indicated in the annexed list, with which, as well as with the present Circular, your Lordship will make all the faithful confided to your care acquainted. I shall send you further instructions when necessary. The Sacred Congregation, however, cherishes a strong hope that this new blow struck at the Church, far from weakening the piety of Catholics, will, on the contrary, stimulate them to meet, with ever-increasing generosity, the needs of the Mission—needs which are becoming day by day more imperative and more numerous.

"In the meantime I pray God to preserve you, &c.

"From the Propaganda, March 15, 1884.

"D. ARCHBISHOP of TYRRE, Secretary."

The Pope, in his last Allocution to the Cardinal, denounced, in vigorous terms, the recent violations of the rights of the Church, demanded the restitution of the Temporal Power, and protested with marked warmth against the judgment given by the Italian Courts concerning the property of the Propaganda. His Holiness said he foresaw fresh attacks upon the Papacy; but he would ever uphold with firmness the rights of the Holy See. The United States' Minister in Rome has telegraphed that the recent judgment of the Italian Court of Appeal, regarding the conversion of the real property of the Propaganda into Rente, does not affect the American College, which, as a building used as a seminary, is expressly exempt from the operation of the judgment. Now, the Pope exercises spiritual jurisdiction over millions of Her Majesty's subjects in her Realm, "upon which the sun never sets," and, as premier Bishop of Christendom, he is even Bishop of Westminster Diocese, wherein Her Majesty resides; and it is absolutely essential for the full and complete exercise of the universal Roman Catholic religion that the institution of the Propaganda be preserved. In fact, the principle of universality is involved, and it is now assailed by the Italian Government, no doubt designed to destroy Catholicism. We call upon Her Majesty's Government to sustain us, and to protect our property in Rome, now being plundered with sacrilegious hand by the rapacious Italian Government to supply an Exchequer, beggared by the oppression of the populations, held down by huge Military and Naval Forces, and ground to powder by taxation. We are not mere volunteers, as the following document exhibits:—

"At a meeting of the Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, held in Maynooth College, on the 2nd of July, 1884, it was proposed by the Most Rev. Dr. Nulty, Bishop of Meath, seconded by the Most Rev. Dr. Logue, Bishop of Raphoe, and resolved—

"That we request Irish Members of Parliament, of all political Parties, to use their influence with Her Majesty's Government in support of the letter which we have addressed to Mr. Gladstone, requesting him to take all the effective steps in his power to prevent the threatened spoliation of the property of the Propaganda, in which so many of Her Majesty's subjects have a deep interest.

"To E. Mulhellen Marum, Esq., LL.B., M.P., J.P."

Now, what is the Italian Government? The arch-brigand, Garibaldi—a political Jack Sheppard—was expelled from Rome by the French nation exercising European police. Yet, upon the same state of facts and International Law, the unscrupulous Count Cavour and the convicted Carbonaro, Panizzi, and his comrades—mere Italian Invincibles—proceeded to usurpation, sacrilege, confiscation, and robbery. No declaration of war was made, or even a Manifesto, which, according to the overwhelming weight of authority, constituted a distinct breach of International Law. In Kent's Commentaries upon International Law all the authorities are cited upon this point. Puffendorf, Ermignon, and Vattel are clear upon the subject, and even Grotius and Bynkershoek agree that a Manifesto at least is requisite. I am sorry to see that neither the Prime Minister nor a single Minister of the Crown is present—no one left to answer us but an Under Secretary for State—not a single Law Officer—English or Irish—is present to reply to us. This, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Moore), complains, is bad treatment, and shows a foregone conclusion which I protest solemnly against.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am well aware of the interest which the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) excites among Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects. The document which the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) referred to as having been circulated among Members of the House shows the importance which Roman Catholics attach to the question. I make this admission, because I feel how totally impossible it is for me to make any additional statement to that which was made at Question time to-day by the Prime Minister. The position of the question is this—that Her Majesty's Ambassador at Rome was instructed to take any opportunity that might offer of making a friendly representation in connection with this subject. It was, however, felt by him—and Her Majesty's Government have no reason to doubt the wisdom of that view—that it would not be wise in him to take the first step; but rather to associate himself with any action that might be taken by one of the Continental Powers—one of those Roman Catholic nations which may be said to be more immediately interested in the question, although, no doubt, it is a question in which Her Majesty's Government, on behalf of Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in every part of the world, are bound to take deep interest. Nevertheless, it has been thought more prudent that the first step should be taken by one of the other Powers; and, as far as Her Majesty's Government have been informed, at this moment, no steps, so far, have been taken. I speak, however, under some disadvantage, because I am aware that to-day, about the time I left the Foreign Office, a despatch had arrived from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Rome; but I have not had an opportunity of reading that despatch, although I have been informed that it gives the views of Her Majesty's Representative, and explains the reasons why he has hitherto not been able to take any step in the matter. It has been suggested, in the conversation which has occurred, that Papers might be laid upon the Table; but, of course, I cannot undertake, without consulting the Secretary of State, to say what Papers can or cannot be laid upon the Table. I will, however, as it will be my duty, communicate to the Secretary of State the wish which has been expressed by hon. Members, that the Correspondence which has taken place upon the question shall be laid, as far as possible, upon the Table.

MR. MOLLOY: Will the noble Lord be able to give us the contents of the despatch he has referred to, to-morrow?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I will do the best I can to give the House all the information that it may be in my power to give. At the same time there are some points which have been raised by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) which I think I am at liberty to touch upon now. He wants to know whether this is an absolute measure of confiscation, or whether it is merely that the College of the Propaganda is merely to be under the obligation to invest the proceeds of the sale of its lands in the Italian funds? As far as I understand the question there has been no absolute confiscation, but merely a change of investment. I understood hon. Members to indulge in some merriment at the expense of the credit of the Italian Government, and it has been said that the securities in which the College have been required to invest the proceeds of their sales of land are not good investments; but I am bound to say that, so far as I am aware, the credit of the Italian Government has been steadily rising of late years; and if the College of the Propaganda Fidei is obliged to invest the proceeds of its sales of land in Italian securities, it will have been compelled to invest them in very good securities. As I have said, the commercial credit of the Italian Government has been steadily rising; the Italian Stocks have been increasing in value; Italian paper has reached par, and not long ago the Government succeeded in withdrawing their paper currency from circulation, and substituting specie payments. All these things go to the credit of the Italian Government, and they show that the condition of things in Italy is steadily improving. On the other hand, hon. Members say, and it is perfectly true, that in some portions of Italy there has been a heavy taxation upon the land; but if the College of the Propaganda is compelled to sell its landed property, and to invest in the general securities of the Italian Government, it does not appear to me that the change of investment will be very injurious to the College. The word "international" has been freely used in the course of the discussion; but is this institution really international, in the full sense of the word? Has it been fully recognized as an international institution by Treaties and Conventions, and are Institutions to be regarded as international that are only so considered upon notions based rather upon international morality than International Law? Of course, I do not feel myself capable of competing with the hon. Member who spoke last in that knowledge of civil and canonical law, of which he is so great a master. I shrink, therefore, from engaging either in an ecclesiastical argument with the hon. Member. All I will say with reference to the alleged international character of the College of the Propaganda is that I cannot think it is quite correct to say that it is an uncontested fact. No doubt, it has an international character, in one sense—namely, that many nations are interested in it; but the term "international character" is rather a fine-drawn expression. I will not, however, dwell too much upon that point; but all I will say is that I will prefer to wait until I have read the despatch, which, I understand, has arrived to-day, before giving any more definite information. If, after I have read it, I find that I can give hon. Members further information, I can only say that I shall be most happy to do so.

MR. HEALY said, the matter before the Committee was one of very considerable delicacy; and he scarcely thought it right that it should have been met by the noble Lord by an assertion that he was unable to give satisfactory assurances, because a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador had only reached the Foreign Office that day, and he had been unable to read it. At the same time, it was only right to say that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who had been requested by his Party to bring forward this question, had only been stopped from doing so by reason of a communication which had reached him from very distinguished members of the Catholic Church, who informed him that it was not considered desirable the question should be raised in the House of Commons until further information had been received. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), who was not in possession of that information, and who was not acting with the Party of which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was the Leader, had, however, chosen to raise the question on his own responsibility; and, of course, a debate had arisen in consequence under circumstances of some inconvenience. He believed it to be the case that the Foreign Office, in their action in this matter, had allowed themselves to be guided altogether by the action of the other Powers of Europe. It appeared to him to be a somewhat regrettable circumstance that the Foreign Office of Her Majesty—Her Majesty's Government being, at least, a Christian Power—should have allowed their steps to wait upon the action of the other European Powers. He had no wish to say anything disrespectful to any of the Powers or Governments of Europe, because in such an Assembly as that it was desirable to observe the amenities of debate with regard to them; but this much he desired to say, at all events—that the Government of the Queen stood upon an entirely different basis in dealing with a question of this kind from that which any other of the European Powers occupied. So far as he was aware, there had never been any international conflict within the last 200 years—at least, in this country—with respect to religious questions. Religious disputes and controversies in this country had, to a large extent, died away and disappeared, and Her Majesty enjoyed the loyalty and support, not merely in Great Britain, but in the Colonies as well, of millions of Roman Catholic citizens; and the exceptional support they gave to the cause of the College of the Propaganda was on a totally different footing. Most of the heated acerbities of religious and sectarian controversy had disappeared. While there might be still some remnants of them in Ireland, so far as England was concerned, what he might term the more bilious form of them had vanished. Nobody, therefore, in this country, would have been offended in the slightest degree if Her Majesty's Government had made respectful representations to the Italian Court on this subject. In view of that fact, and seeing that none of the susceptibilities of the Protestant subjects of Her Majesty were offended, he considered that Her Majesty's Ambassador stood upon a different footing from the Representative of any other Power. Therefore, when Her Majesty's Government said that no other Power had interfered, there was no force whatever in that argument. The state of things was altogether different; and, probably, if France, or Spain, or Austria had interfered, there were arrogant and intolerant persons who, notwithstanding the fact that they were Catholic Powers, would at once have condemned the Government for the action they might have taken. That being so, and the persons who indulged in criticism and found fault being persons on whose support the Government generally depended, the Government would themselves have been stopped from taking action; but the same state of things did not apply to Her Majesty's Government. He was of opinion that Her Majesty's Government would not have been found fault with by any body of men on either side of the House if they had considered it necessary to take action in the matter. It appeared to him to be a humiliating position for Her Majesty's Government to assume that because France, Russia, Austria, or Spain had not interfered, that, therefore, this country was not in a position to do so. He believed that Her Majesty's Catholic subjects were nearly as numerous, if not quite so, if the question were to be put on a numerical basis, as the Catholic subjects even of France or Spain. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister seemed to take exception to that statement; but he believed he was correct in saying that there were 30,000,000 Roman Catholic subjects who owed allegiance to the Crown, and he considered it an extremely moderate estimate for a country upon whose vast Dominions the sun never set. The Government of Austria was a composite Government, but it certainly did not contain 30,000,000 of Catholics; the Government of France was so divided that it was impossible to tell who was a Catholic and who was not; and to say that the non-interference of the Governments of those countries was a reason why Her Majesty's Government should not interfere was certainly a remarkable event in the history of English diplomacy. But there was another point which had been pressed upon the Prime Minister, and it was that the great Congress of the free Republic of America had taken action in this matter, and that the Government of the next free Government to that of the United States ought not to be behindhand in the representations it was making to the Italian Court. Her Majesty's Government had not chosen to take that course, and, as far as he could gather, the Prime Minister appeared to be totally unacquainted, officially, with the fact that the American Government had made a protest. They knew that the Congress had passed a Resolution in reference to the Propaganda Fide, and that, in addition, huge meetings had been held in every city of America on the same important subject. He had read reports of the meetings which had been held in Boston and New York, presided over by the highest dignitaries of those States; and he was amazed that Her Majesty's Government should rely upon the non-action of some of the Continental States, and ignore the fact that the American Government had already taken action. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Is that known?] He had read it in a newspaper, which was the only form in which intelligence of this kind was open to him. He had read in the Irish American Press. He spoke, of course, under the correction of better information in the possession of Her Majesty's Government. But, at all events, he had in print a Resolution passed by the American Congress, and his statement had been confirmed by that of an hon. Member opposite.

Mr. COURTNEY: Was the Resolution passed by both Houses?

Mr. HEALY said, the Resolution to which he referred was one passed by the House of Representatives. Whether the Congress was represented by one House or not, he knew, was a matter of dispute in America. At all events, the House of Representatives had passed a Resolution. Of course, he knew that the American Senate had to be consulted in regard to Ambassadorial functions; but he had never been able to understand whether one House or both Houses acting together constituted what was called the American Congress. At any rate, the American House of Representatives had entered a Resolution on its Books on the subject; and he believed he was right in stating that the American Minister at Rome had made representations to the Court of Italy in regard to it. But in the Republic of America there were not more than 8,000,000 of Catholics, while in Ireland there were 5,000,000; in England, 9,000,000; and in their Colonial Possessions many millions more. Then, why should a Government like that of America, which professed non-interference in European affairs, in the same way that they rejected European interference in the affairs of America, be left to take the initiative? Why Her Majesty's Government should have been behindhand with that of America he could not understand. He was told that in the opinion of certain highly-informed ecclesiastics of this country it was undesirable that this debate should be raised, and that it was even inexpedient that the fact should be brought out that England had not acted in the matter, because the other Catholic countries had lagged behind. But as that fact had been brought out, however undesirable it might be to bring it out at the present juncture, it became necessary that the whole of the circumstances of the case should be stated. No doubt, it was inexpedient to raise the discussion until the full effect of the attitude of the Italian Government was ascertained; but as the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had felt it his duty to raise the question, and had done so on his own individual responsibility, seeing that a debate had arisen, it was only proper, and no individual Member could be blamed for expressing his opinion, that the views of the Irish Members should be expressed in regard to the action of Her Majesty's Government, showing that it did not meet either with their approval or with the general support of the House. If it should prove to be inexpedient for the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) to have raised the subject, he would have to incur all the responsibility. For his part, he (Mr. Healy) could only say that he regretted extremely that Her Majesty's Government should not have met the matter in a straightforward spirit, prepared to grapple with it firmly. He certainly believed that if Her Majesty's Government had expressed a strong opinion, as representing the views of the Catholics of England, the Italian Government would not have proceeded to the length they had done.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would only detain the Committee for a few minutes; but he agreed with the remarks which had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that there were now only three Powers in Europe who were Catholic in name—France, Austria, and Spain, and that it would have been dangerous for either of them to have urged this question upon the attention of the Italian Government. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said the reason this country had not interposed was that those three Catholic countries had made no sign. No doubt France, Austria, and Spain had always been looked upon as the three great Catholic Powers of Europe; but each of them would be able to give good reasons why she ought not to interfere, and why England might reasonably have been called upon to interpose. It was absurd to ask Austria to interfere to the extent of a strong remonstrance, because it would at once be asked how many men she was prepared to put in the field. The same objection applied to France, because the question would then be whether Italy would remain neutral in the next Franco-German War, which they all hoped might never come off, and, if not, how many troops she could place in the field. Then, again, if either France or Austria were to raise the question, it might have the effect of rousing Catholic feeling in those countries, and it was impossible to say what the consequences might be. Under these circumstances, neither France nor Austria could interfere at the present moment. The same observation did not possibly apply to Spain; but King Alfonso could not forget the part which his Royal Predecessor, King Amadeus, had taken in the establishment of the Italian Government. He would naturally consider the jealousy which existed between the two Royal Families, and the great mischief which might ensue from the interference of Spain. Therefore, in the present state of deadlock among the Roman Catholic Powers of Europe there was every reason why England, as a Protestant Power, might very well take the lead in bringing forward representations on the subject. Half the Roman Catholics of the world subscribed to this Fund, and if there was any International Fund in the world this was one; but the object of the Italian Government was to confiscate it, as similar property had been confiscated in France. Of course, he did not wish the Government to go to war upon this matter; but they might make some strong representation to the Italian Government, and he should be delighted if they gave any indication of any intention to do so.

MR. DAWSON said, there was a grave and clear distinction between institutions in Rome of an international character, and this Propaganda. Austria and France might interfere with regard to the Austrian or French College; but really Austria had nothing to do with the Propaganda. She was always represented diplomatically during the Temporal Power, and was now represented at Rome; but England and Ireland were not diplomatically represented, and they, therefore, stood in a different category from other countries in respect to the Propaganda. This Fund was largely an Irish fund for sending missionaries from Rome to other countries for the propagation of the Faith. His hon. Friend had said this was not now promoted by any ecclesiastical authorities; but he had received a letter from an Irish Bishop asking him to take part in this discussion, for the Fund was purely Irish money. It was their money sent into Italy just as the bondholders' money sent into Egypt was the money of the bondholders. Although the Fund might be small, this was as important a matter of justice as was the matter of the bondholders' money in Egypt or anywhere else; and he thought it was a pity that the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) should state that the Ambassador's despatch was not fully before him, at this moment, when it had been known this matter was likely to be discussed. When there was a vast Department for dealing with foreign affairs, it was a pity that the noble Lord should not be in full possession of the facts, so as to put them before the House; and if it was worth the while of Her Majesty's Ambassador to interfere at all, the information ought not to be kept back till the matter was all over. He would remind the Prime Minister that he himself had always taken great interest in any international or literary institution, and had striven to see justice done to nationalities, and to preserve the interests of literature all over the world.

He had taken very significant action in regard to Monte Casino, in order to prevent the Italian Government, shortly after its assumption of power, from confiscating and sequestrating that great Roman Catholic Library to which the world was so much indebted. This College of the Propaganda was not only a College for preparing priests for missionary work; it was not only a Propaganda of the Faith; but was also a Propaganda of literature and culture. Irish money had been sent out to be invested for these purposes, and distinguished Irish priests had been sent out as ornaments to various British Colonies where millions of Roman Catholics lived under the rule of the Queen. Therefore, he thought there were just and strong reasons for the preservation of Irish interests, and of literature, culture, and education. He remembered that a distinguished Member of the Royal Family had done his utmost to preserve a great Dominican foundation in Rome. These places were the sources of that great learning which Rome possessed, and the influence of that high personage was exercised to prevent that confiscation. If that was so, he should like to know what was the position of this Propaganda, and what would be the result of this sequestration? He thought they were justified in asking the noble Lord what was to be the effect of this action of the Italian Government upon this money subscribed for the Propaganda by Ireland, and upon these foundations in which they had a monetary interest? Why could not the noble Lord state exactly how the matter stood, so that if they could not get a very binding declaration from the Government, the Irish Bishops and the Irish people might at any rate know how the matter rested—what the transfer was, and how far it affected the funds of the Irish people?

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he thought his hon. Friend had put very well the point as to the position of this Propaganda. That had been pressed on the Prime Minister's notice that evening in a sort of irregular discussion upon Questions by the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Gray). There was a very distinct difference between the case of England in regard to this Fund, and the case of France, or Spain, or Italy. The Prime Minister had stated, in answer to a Question on this subject, that if the Government of Italy were acting in accordance with the Italian Municipal Law, it would be no business of ours to interfere, even though the interests of British subjects were being affected; but some of the incidents and facts of recent history showed that no country recognized such a position. No Foreign Government, even though acting according to its own Municipal Law, was entitled to do wrong, without another Government having the right to interfere in the interest of its own subjects. That position had been established in the case of the Alabama claims. England, of all countries, had a right to require Italy to alter her Municipal Law if it was injurious to our interests, for united Italy was the child of England, which, more than any other nation in the world, made the Italian Kingdom. That had been admitted over and over again by Cavour and by Garibaldi, and he thought the country which made Italy ought to be able to influence Italy. He, therefore, hoped this discussion would be of some use.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) says he thinks that England might well interfere in this case, as being the custodian of vested interests in general. But if we were to attempt to interfere with the Italian Government on the ground that we had invariably respected the interests and rights of Corporate Bodies, and the Italian Government were to reply by a reference to the case of the Irish Church, I should be puzzled what reply to make; and if the Italian Government were to point to those Irish Members who now urge this interference as among those who voted for and pressed with some warmth for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, I should have still more difficulty in replying. [An hon. Member: Oh, oh!] I am stating my opinion, and I hope the hon. Member will have some better means of meeting it than by crying "Oh!" I was dealing with the specific plea put forward by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, who said we ought to interfere in this matter because we are persons who have always maintained the vested rights of Corporate Bodies. That, I think, is a very awkward argument for us to advance. I will refer to another instance. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr.

Justin M'Carthy) says he has found an analogy to this case in something which he supposed to have happened growing out of the American War. He thinks that we maintained at one time that we could not meet the demands of International Law because our Municipal Law forbade it. I apprehend that it is the duty of every country to make its law conformable with International Law. This is a case of Municipal Law with regard to which the hon. Member for Longford has not endeavoured to show that there has been any great breach of International Law; and unless there has been a breach of International Law his argument with reference to America falls to the ground. Then, as I understand hon. Members, it is argued that we have a right to hold language to this effect to another country—"If your laws are so bad that they injure our citizens, you must alter them." [Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Or compensate them.] I do not think that argument could be maintained. There are a great many bad laws in the world, which inflict considerable hardship on individuals. Some of them are, perhaps, in our own country, and a great many are in foreign countries; but I am not aware that we can go to a foreign country and say that because their laws are bad, and they inflict great loss on some of our citizens, therefore we demand compensation. I do not think such a principle could be maintained. You must show that the persons for whom you demand compensation have been injured contrary to the law of the country in which they reside—[Mr. HEALY: Why did you interfere on behalf of the Egyptian bondholders?]-or in violation of some broad and universal principle which is acknowledged by all mankind. We cannot say—"Because your laws inflict injury upon our fellow-countrymen, therefore you must alter them." All these are pleas which go beyond the real scope of the case. Now, I wish there to be no misunderstanding, and I am sorry that there should have arisen, from any language of mine, anything of the kind. We have never laid down for ourselves a fixed rule that we will not interfere in these cases unless other countries interfere. I do not at all say that we have adopted any such proposition as that. The conduct of other countries is, no doubt, in point in a case of this kind; but, unquestionably, if there is to be interference, when we have ascertained what is the true state of the case, then we ought to interfere. That concession I make at once. Then it is said that the American Minister at Rome has interfered; and I can understand that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) should be very well justified, from his point of view, in taking account of what passed in the House of Representatives in reference to this matter. I cannot admit that, by any general principle of law, we can take notice of such a Resolution as was there adopted; but if the American Minister has interfered, that is a fact which is so material as to make it our special duty—and I am sure my noble Friend (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) will admit it—to examine the arguments he urged, and to make use of them, provided we are acting in conformity with the maxims of International Law. My hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) gives me credit for having attempted to interfere in the case of the ecclesiastical property in Italy, the famous Establishment of Monte Casino. I certainly recognized the expediency of doing anything that could be done for the maintenance of that Establishment, and I made representations to the Italian Government on that subject; but that was entirely in the character of a private individual, and it was only by courtesy, which I shall always gratefully recollect, that I was allowed to represent the case to the Italian Government. The interference of a Government is a very different thing, because where a Government interferes, it interferes as a right, whereas the interference of an individual, who has no right, is a pure matter of favour and gracious permission, and can create no precedent. What I miss in the speeches to-night is some distinct and sufficiently broad ground upon which an interference of this kind could be made. I miss also any definition of the kind of interference that is desired. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) says he does not desire to go the length of threatening or insisting. What I suppose he thinks is that something in the nature of an appeal ad misericordiam might be made. [Mr. HEALY: No.] Well, something founded upon right; but if he means something founded upon right, then I do not see why he should be so careful to say he would not insist. I shall be glad to be more fully informed.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: I said, it would be enough to go on the ground of right, and that there would probably be no necessity for insistence.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Then I must ask this. I have not gathered what is the distinct and definite ground of right upon which this claim is to be insisted upon. It is to be an appeal upon the ground of right, and what is the case alleged? The case alleged is, that a large amount of property had been created in Italy, and invested in Italy by means of contributions gathered from, I may say, the whole of Latin Christendom. That is very likely the case, and it is now said that much damage has been suffered from the compulsory conversion to which this property has been subjected. I have not been able to examine the facts—upon which, I think, my noble Friend offered a good argument—but I will assume that the allegations made are warranted, and that the property has been seriously damaged. But does that give a good title as a right for one nation to interfere with the internal legislation of another? Does the fact that this property has been created by contributions from abroad, from Austria, France, and Spain, quite as much as, and, perhaps, a good deal more than, from Ireland—which is always generous, but has not had very ample means—does that give a title to follow the property into the country to which the contributions have been voluntarily sent, and when invested has become subject to the actual laws of the country? There are a vast number of churches in the Colonies which have been founded by funds sent from England—I mean churches in connection with the Established Church in this country—but that does not give any title to us to protest against any legislation dealing with them, because we have chosen to send the money to found them.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, that not only was the Propaganda founded in the days of the Temporal Power, but its object was to extend and establish the Catholic Church in all parts of the world.

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. GLADSTONE: As to the argument derived from the fact that this is an institution of propagation, not having the end and aim of its work in the country where it has its seat, why, that argument applies to all the Missionary Societies in England, and to every Missionary Society in Europe. All these Societies might, on that principle, be allowed to set up pretensions against the legitimate power of the country in which they were established. The hon. Gentleman says that this institution was founded in the days of the Temporal Power of the Papedom. No doubt of it. If you tell me that that is a consideration, and that the hardship of the change effected is a consideration which may, as a matter of feeling and equity, be fairly represented in the way of what I may call an appeal ad misericordiam, then we get on ground where some observations on our part might be more practicable; but I must say that the particular institutions which are founded under the shelter of the general Government of a country must accept their fortune under the general law of that country, whereas, to warrant the interference of one Power with another, there must be matter of public law involved. So that I firmly hold to the principle that any argument advanced must be an argument of amity or comity, and that it cannot be made on the ground of law.

Mr. HEALY: How about the Egyptian bondholders?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Does the hon. Gentleman really think that by his question he has contributed anything to this discussion? Whatever the rights of the bondholders are, they were founded on the express consent of all the Powers of Europe; and, therefore, they have no relation to a case of this kind. I do not pretend to be in possession of the whole of the facts of the case, and I have only put forward a general principle, and likewise laid down certain general lines to which, in my judgment, action in this matter should be confined, if there is to be any chance of success. On the other hand, I must say that it has not been shown that there exists any just title in any quarter to attempt any interference with the Sovereign rights of the Italian State affecting directly the different properties under State control. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be content to look at the matter in that light. I fully admit that the action of other Powers in this case is not a matter for our guidance; but I say that it is absolutely necessary, for the security and maintenance of the respective rights of independent Powers, that any claim that may be made should be based on distinct and definite grounds, and not on arguments which would only recoil on those who advanced them.

MR. MOORE said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had spoken of the supporters of this Motion as being amongst those who were foremost in demanding the Disestablishment of the Church in Ireland; but he was satisfied that if anyone else had dared to compare the Disestablishment of the Irish Church with the sequestration of the funds of the Propaganda in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman, he would have received a castigation which he would have long remembered. The two cases were entirely distinct; and the present was simply the seizure of the property of peaceful citizens to aid the revenues of the Italian State. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had stated that it would be impossible to take isolated action. But France, Spain, and Austria were technically Roman Catholic Powers, and they had, therefore, no direct interest in the Propaganda, which Institution was intended to promote the interests of the Church in countries which were not technically Catholic, and was, moreover, the direct means of communication between the Holy See and the Roman Catholic subjects of Her Majesty. But he ventured to draw attention to a despatch, which he had already read before the Prime Minister entered the House, in which the Italian Government voluntarily tendered the strongest assurances that the Propaganda and similar Institutions would be protected, and which wound up by saying that—“These Articles will be considered a public bilateral contract.” Such were the assurances tendered by the Italian Government itself to the Representatives of this country; and it was upon that ground, and not by way of appeal ad misericordiam, that they founded their application.

MR. DAWSON remarked, that the Prime Minister had said there was no analogy between the case of the Egyptian bondholders, alluded to by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), and the case of the Propaganda; but his impression was that there had been a change in the Government of Egypt since the claims of the bondholders were secured. A new Khedive had been set up, and another might be set up tomorrow; but the claims of the bondholders would not lapse on that account. To his mind, the cases were parallel.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he believed that if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would put this case before the Italian Government on the ground of public opinion, or on that of equity, he would succeed in protecting these funds. He and his hon. Friends asked no more than that at present. Whether the right existed under International Law to the extent at which it would be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to force the hands of the Italian Government, he knew not; but he was satisfied that if the right hon. Gentleman were to exercise those powers of adjustment which no one possessed in a higher degree than himself, he would be successful in the present case, and conduce to the moral and religious welfare of mankind.

MR. MOLLOY hoped that some means would be used, without delay, to protect the funds of the Propaganda College.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had listened attentively to the speech of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and had gathered that the only promise made by him was that he might possibly give further information on the subject of the despatch which had arrived that afternoon at the Foreign Office. There could be no doubt of the general dissatisfaction which had been caused by the proposed action of the Italian Government. One of the proposed arrangements was that 30 per cent of the property would be taken by the State, and that Income Tax would be further taken at the rate of 15 per cent. It had also been shown that the incomes of some of the Italian Bishops would be reduced to something less than a third of their former amount. Those were the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore); but the noble Lord had thought fit entirely to ignore them. The hon. Member had further shown that the Italian Government had bound itself not to interfere with property of this kind in the Italian States, and he (Mr. Biggar) thought that that pledge of the Italian Government constituted an exceedingly good standpoint from which to object to this confiscation of the property of Catholics who were scattered all over the world. He maintained that the British Government, as the ruling power in this country, was in duty bound to interfere on behalf of Her Majesty's Catholic subjects at home and abroad; and he might remark that, in comparison with other Powers, England had the reputation of very much neglecting the interests of her subjects in foreign countries. He was informed, on excellent authority, that the other Powers, through their Consuls, had always of late very much more consulted the interests of their subjects than was the case with England. However, he believed the country had some little influence abroad, and he hoped it would be exercised in this case, without resorting to a system of underhand or underground negotiations. It would seem, from the replies of the Government, however, that their intention was, if possible, to shelve the question. He hoped the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would divide the Committee on his Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had stated that when property was invested in a State, subject to the laws of that State, and when a revolution occurred by which a fresh Government was introduced, no objection could be raised to any fate that might befall the investments under the old régime when they passed under the new régime. But surely it was possible that objections might be raised under the new régime. If in any State of Europe or Asia large investments of property had taken place on the faith of the established Government there, and that Government were overthrown by revolution, might not the universal character of the claim embolden the Prime Minister to make the strongest representations to the new Government on behalf of the owners of the property? When the right hon. Gentleman just now extorted cheers from some of his more enthusiastic followers, he had observed that he did not get an universal response to his proposition that the property of the Propaganda College must be subject to every vicissitude and every injustice which the new régime might put upon it, without any redress or remonstrance from abroad. There had been a little too much reference to International Law in the course of the discussion, and he thought equity would have been a much better basis on which to argue this question. There was no such thing as law between nation and nation; the term was essentially one of analogy, and it was by playing on it that the Prime Minister had met the objections of Catholic Members on that occasion. He did not, of course, impugn the motives which had induced the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to change his attitude on this question; but it was known that he (Mr. O'Donnell) had for months past intended to bring forward this Motion, and up to that moment not a single protest had been made against it; and only a few days ago he had seen letters from Catholics asking Irish Members to lose no opportunity of bringing forward this matter. Therefore, he was ready to take his share of the responsibility for raising the question in the House of Commons. He contended that Her Majesty's Government, in dealing with the Italian Government, should stand upon the ground of equity, and they might then put their argument into any form they chose. He altogether repudiated that appeal ad misericordiam, which the Prime Minister had suggested might be made to the Italian Government, for one which addressed itself to their sense of equity; and he believed that had Her Majesty's Government at first appealed to the Italian Government upon that ground, the complaint he was now urging would not have been made. He was certainly prepared to acquiesce in the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to press this Motion to a Division, because the conduct of the British Ambassador, although it was not necessarily the policy of the Government, had certainly not been satisfactory, inasmuch as he had allowed month after month to slip away without rendering any account of his action to the Government at home.

MR. LYNCH said, he also wished to avail himself of the opportunity afforded by this Vote for entering his protest against the conduct of the Government.

As a Roman Catholic and a Member of that House, he felt bound to take this course, and to vote in opposition to the Government; and he appealed to hon. Members on the opposite side of the House to support the cause of justice by following his example.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 91: Majority 65.—(Div. List, No. 207.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PULESTON said, it was now more than a year since an important member of the Diplomatic Service was sent out to Mexico as Diplomatic Agent, or in some similar capacity, and it would be satisfactory to the Committee to state what steps had been taken towards a settlement of the dispute between this country and Mexico. It was very desirable that they should cultivate the trade with Mexico, more especially now that close relations had been established between that country and the United States. The subject was very important, and it was one in which a very large number of people in this country took a deep interest. Some time ago, Questions were frequently asked in the House of Commons upon the subject; but, recently, it seemed to have dropped out of sight altogether. He had no doubt that the difficulties in the way of a settlement had been very great; but he had always supposed that they had in the matter stood rather too much upon technicalities. To many outside the ropes it had appeared that, recently, they had had a good opportunity of coming to an understanding. He freely admitted that he could not fully appreciate all the "ins" and "outs" of the question; but in the opinion of those who had given attention to the subject solely from a business point of view, the differences existing between this country and Mexico ought to have been settled long ago. He had no hesitation in saying, and the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) would agree with him, that they had already suffered very materially in their prestige with Mexico, in not being in the field a good deal earlier than they were. There were very special reasons why they should, without delay, come to some arrangement with Mexico, whereby their commercial relations with that country would be placed upon a satisfactory footing.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the question of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Puleston) was a very natural one; but he was sorry he could not give a definite answer at that moment with regard to the position of the negotiations with Mexico. He hoped, however, he should not have to trespass much longer upon the patience of the hon. Member. When a definite arrangement was made, he would take the earliest opportunity of informing the House. The question had not been lost sight of; the negotiations had been proceeding; and in a short time he sincerely hoped he should be in a position to make a statement on the subject. A very distinguished English Diplomatist had gone to Mexico, and a most distinguished Mexican Diplomatist (M. Mariscal) had visited England, and by that means an important step had been taken towards restoring those diplomatic relations which had been so long and unfortunately strained. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman that it was of the utmost importance to the commerce of this country that close relations should exist between England and Mexico.

MR. PULESTON: Do I understand that the noble Lord hopes to be able to make a statement before the end of the present Session?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes.

MR. M'COAN said, he would have to trespass for some time upon the attention of the Committee, while he stated the objections he felt to one item of the Vote under consideration. The item in question was that of £4,000, for the cost of the recent Mission of Admiral Hewett to Abyssinia, to negotiate the Treaty with King John, which was now before the House. He did not object so much to the amount, which was not an unreasonable one. The Mission consisted of 10 or 11 officers, and 18 days were occupied by the journey into the interior of Abyssinia. Therefore, £4,000 was not an exorbitant sum to charge. It was not, however, a question of amount; his objection would have been the same if the sum charged had been £1,000, or £2,000, or £10,000. The point to which he wished to direct the attention of the Committee was that, as a result of Admiral Hewett's Mission, they had got a couple of Treaties, which a little examination would show to be absolutely valueless—Treaties from which they could expect no substantial return either politically or philanthropically. The effect of them would be to identify us in the minds of the Soudanese with their worst and most hated enemies. The Abyssinians had always been and still were the bitterest enemies of the whole of the Arab Tribes from Darfour to the Red Sea. By these Treaties we had made common political cause with the savage, mis-called "Christian" mountaineers, and the animosity and hatred with which they were regarded by the Soudanese would, in consequence, be extended to us. Now, as to the value of the Treaties which Admiral Hewett had negotiated. They were two in number. The first had reference to the withdrawal of the garrisons from Kassala and two other places, Amedib and Sanhit, which were so small and so unimportant as not to be found on any map he had been able to consult. By the Third Article of the principal of the two Conventions, King John undertook—

"To facilitate the withdrawal of the troops of His Highness the Khedive from Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, through Ethiopia to Massowah."

He (Mr. M'Coan) did not quite understand what was meant by "facilitating the withdrawal of the troops." It might or it might not mean that King John would march a Force to the relief of the garrisons, and protect their retreat to the sea at Massowah; or it might mean that he would give them free transit through Abyssinia. Anyhow, that was the only thing which King John engaged to carry out as an equivalent for what we undertook to give to him. And what was that? We engaged to deliver up to him the large district of Bogos, a district lying immediately to the North of Abyssinia Proper, and within some 60 or 80 miles of the sea at Massowah. Now, the noble Lord (Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice) would, probably, tell the Committee that Bogos was formerly Abyssinian territory, and that its annexation by Egypt was never recognized by Her Majesty's Government, or never, in fact, effectively took place. Anticipating some such a statement as that, he (Mr. M'Coan) ventured to tell the Committee what the history of Bogos was. In the time of Mehemet Ali, it was a sort of "no man's land" between Abyssinia and the Northern parts of the Soudan. It was inhabited then, as now, by a number of perfectly distinct tribes having no tribal unity, and who recognized no common Chief. Mehemet Ali annexed the district and placed troops in it, and it became substantially a part of the Egyptian Soudan. For several years the hold of Mehemet Ali on it was a very shifting one. Sometimes he got taxation from the district, and sometimes he got none; but, at all events, the claims of Egypt upon Bogos were unbroken from the time of Mehemet Ali to that of Ismail. During the last 50 years, not even in the days of King Theodore, or any of the Chiefs who divided with him authority over Abyssinia, had any claim to it ever been made, and it was formally recognized by the Porte as Egyptian territory. In the Reign of the late Khedive, Ismail, the hold of Egypt upon Bogos was tightened. Garrisons were regularly placed in it, taxation was organized and enforced, and it became as much a part of the Egyptian Soudan as Dongola or Khartoum. That had been the territorial condition of Bogos for some 50 or 60 years, yet in Article II. of the Treaty we had, without reference to the Porte at all, taken upon ourselves to hand over the whole of this territory to the present King of Abyssinia. And, at this point, let them consider who the King of Abyssinia was. Up to a few years ago, he was simply one of the three Chiefs exercising authority over the three districts or Provinces into which Abyssinia had been immemorially divided. He was Chief of the Northern Province, and mainly owing to the cannons and rifles left with him by Lord Napier of Magdala, after the defeat of Theodore, he succeeded in subjugating to his own authority the Chiefs of the other two districts. The Negocsa Negust, King of Kings of Ethiopia—this King Johannes—was as barbarous a savage as was to be found South of Cairo, and his people were quite as savage a population as existed in any part of Africa. They continued still, as in Bruce's time, to eat the raw flesh of living animals; and though nominally belonging to the Coptic Church, their treatment of Protestants, or Catholics, or people espousing any other form of the Christian religion, was barbarous in the extreme. A recent Report of the Propaganda recounted a great number of such atrocities committed by King John. Thus, he had seized Catholic missionaries, and, failing to induce them to abandon Catholicism, had cut off their feet, hands, and legs. Yet this was the King with whom, and on equal terms of civilization and dignity, Admiral Hewett had negotiated two Treaties at a cost of £4,000. He (Mr. M'Coan) need hardly say that any engagements entered into by such a savage were not worth the paper they were written upon. Nor had any means to insure the carrying out of the Treaties been provided by the appointment of Consuls or Agents, who might supervise their execution. We relied upon the word of this savage; and on no better guarantee had surrendered to him a great district of Egyptian territory. We did not in terms give King John Kassala; but we had in effect said—"We will not give it to you; but we will not prevent you taking it." Practically, therefore, it was understood that King John should seize and hold the Kassala district, one of the most cultivated and civilized and prosperous Provinces in Upper Egypt, and the centre of a thriving trade. With the arms and ammunition he would find in Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, his power for evil over the neighbouring tribes would be alarmingly great. Strengthened by these stores, he would be able to work his savage will upon the whole. By conferring such advantages on a savage of this kind, we had identified ourselves with him, and became, in a sense, responsible for all the barbarities which, thus strengthened, he would commit. Nor was the mischief so done merely temporary. By turning Massowah into a free port for the admission of arms and ammunition, it was made permanent. For many years the struggle of the Khedive of Egypt had been to keep the King of Abyssinia from obtaining military munitions in this way. The constant desire of the King had been to get access to the sea for this purpose. Very little pure merchandize passed out of Massowah, and less passed in; but now the passage of one kind of goods would certainly be largely increased by the new Treaty. King John had been for many years one of the largest slave dealers in that part of Africa. Some 20,000 Abyssinian slaves, who were the highest-priced slaves in Egypt and Turkey, passed over the Abyssinian Frontier every year, and for each of these King John received a toll of two dollars, so that he made a large revenue from the active pursuit of this abominable traffic. To give philanthropic colour to the Mission, it had been negotiated that—

"His Majesty the Negooza Negust agrees to prohibit, to the best of his ability, the buying and selling of slaves within his dominions."

If King John were a model of honour and good faith, such an undertaking might have some value; but, being the savage he was, it had no value whatever; and all the more so, that there would be no Consular Agent on the spot. King John's whole interest would lie in continuing in the future, as in the past, to encourage the traffic in slaves, and we should be absolutely without the means of knowing whether he did so or not. For giving up the district of Bogos, which did not belong to us, and as to which we had not consulted the Sovereign Power at all, and for in effect, also, surrendering the wealthy and prosperous Province of Kassala, with all the Government stores and munitions of war, as well as those in Amedib and Sanhit, we had got, what?—an "Agreement" from this savage to facilitate the retreat of the garrisons, and a promise to discourage the Slave Trade. That was a poor return for £4,000. To his (Mr. M'Coan's) mind, the most serious part of the business was that it would have been circulated throughout the whole of the Soudan that they had made common cause with this savage King, and that they were as bad as he was. The action we had taken would, he was persuaded, intensify the Moslem animosity and hatred and distrust of us which already existed. Not merely on the ground of policy, but even on the ground of getting the worth of what it cost us, we had made a very bad bargain; and, therefore, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £4,000, for Admiral Hewett's Special Mission to Abyssinia, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. M'Coan.)

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he thought the hon. Member (Mr. M'Coan) had done good service in calling the attention of the Committee to this Vote. It might be in the recollection of the Committee that he (Baron Henry De Worms) had, not long ago, brought it under the attention of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and had asked how it was that Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit had been ceded to Abyssinia? And the answer he had received was that, so far as Articles I. and II. of the Treaty of Adowa were concerned, there was no evidence that Kassala had been ceded. It appeared to him, however, that in Article II. there was every evidence of such being the case. Article II. said—

"On and after the 1st day of September, 1884, corresponding to the 8th day of Maskarram, 1877, the country called Bogos shall be restored to His Majesty the Negooa Negust; and when the troops of His Highness the Khedive shall have left the garrisons of Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, the buildings in the Bogos country which now belong to His Highness the Khedive, together with all the stores and munitions of war which shall then remain in the said buildings, shall be delivered to and become the property of His Majesty the Negooa Negust."

What was the real meaning of guaranteeing that the garrisons should be withdrawn from Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, and should be occupied by the King of Abyssinia? It was a quibble to say that it did not mean the cession of these places to King John. In 1840 these places were taken by Mehemet Ali, and became the property of the Porte. It might be said that the question of the Suzerainty of the Porte arose on the broader question of Egypt itself; but, admitting that, it was still a question whether the Porte ought not to have been consulted before these places were handed over to the King of Abyssinia. So far as he could gather, he believed the Porte never had been consulted. If that were so, it amounted to this—that, in order to bring about an alliance with Abyssinia, they had handed over territory which belonged to somebody else. What was the object of their alliance with the King of Abyssinia? Some time ago, the Government were asked if—as it was rumoured—they intended to enter into an alliance with the King of Abyssinia? These questions were generally met by an absolute denial or an evasive answer. Hon. Members now saw what such denial was worth. There could be no question—there could be no doubt—that there was a most absolute Treaty between the King of Abyssinia and Her Majesty's Government, and that there was the most distinct connection between the cession of the towns of Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, and the relief of General Gordon. Then, as the hon. Gentleman very pertinently asked, who had they allied themselves with? They had allied themselves with a nation probably excelling in barbarity the Soudanese themselves, whom they had sought their assistance to overcome. In allying themselves in this manner, they were encouraging a religious feud, because they were employing a nation professing Christianity against a nation of Mussulmans, and they were increasing the difficulties of a situation already rendered difficult enough by their vacillating policy. As the vacillating policy of Her Majesty's Government had materially increased their expenses and their liabilities in that part of the globe, he should support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that on this question he could not at all agree with the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan). He (Sir George Campbell) had never been in the country in question himself; but an opportunity of travelling over it had been afforded recently to a gentleman, who had availed himself of it, and it seemed to him that the journey had borne good fruit. The journey he referred had been made the subject of a book of a very interesting and instructive character. The author was not a partizan, nor had the journey been undertaken in connection with this subject. This writer, Mr. James, had visited the territory in question, and, according to this gentleman's narrative, it possessed a good climate and a large population, principally Christian. There were many Christian missionaries in the country, and Mr. James gave his readers to understand that it was occupied by Egyptian garrisons, who held it as a foreign country; and it appeared to Mr. James that the country was one which might very well be given up to the Abyssinians.

MR. M'COAN: The Abyssinians never had it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the Abyssinians had certainly possessed it very recently, or, at any rate, part of it, and he should be very glad to hear of its being included within the borders of Abyssinia. At the same time, he thought the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs should explain precisely what was meant by the territory of Bogos. The Treaty with King John was somewhat obscure on that point, and was calculated to give rise to some misapprehension; and it seemed to him, from a careful study of the document, that it was not intended to include Kassala in the territory of Abyssinia. Mr. James, in his book, explained to the reader the characteristics of the country, and the interesting tribes who occupied it. Kassala was a very civilized place. Not only were there Greek merchants there, but also some manufactures; and it was, in fact, a large and important place. He (Sir George Campbell) was one of those who desired to see political boundaries correspond with ethnological boundaries, and it seemed to him that the whole country occupied by a Christian population should be handed over to the Christians. He would not go beyond that; but if they did go farther, the result would be constant disturbance and prolonged difficulty. He, therefore, hoped that Her Majesty's Government would not encourage the King of Abyssinia to attempt to conquer any territory outside the ethnological boundary. The idea he (Sir George Campbell) had gathered from the circumstantial account of Mr. James, had not been such as was suggested by the hon. Member for Wicklow, for, as he had said, this would seem to be a civilized country. No doubt, they were in a very unpleasant position as to General Gordon, who had got himself into this scrape; and it would be a matter for congratulation if they could get him out of it without unnecessary bloodshed. He should be glad to see General Gordon get out by way of the Blue Nile, or the White Nile, or any other way.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT agreed with the hon. Member who had spoken from that side of the House (Baron Henry De Worms), that the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) had raised a most important question. Of all the barbarous and cruel and pusillanimous acts that Her Majesty's Government had been guilty of in regard to the Soudan, this invasion of the territory of the Arabs by Abyssinian hordes was the worst. Could it be doing right to induce these savages, who hardly deserved the name of Christians, to precipitate themselves upon a people alien in race and religion—a people with whom they had been at feud for generations? To invite them to do this thing in the interest of General Gordon, of civilization, and of the Soudan, was utterly absurd, and an act of sheer barbarity and cruelty. The hon. Member who had just sat down had described the Abyssinians as a civilized people; but they were in reality nothing better than a horde of savages. Possibly, the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) might disagree with the hon. Member; but his opinion would have undergone a change if he had read the accounts which had come from the country in question from a correspondent of The Daily News, with Admiral Hewett. The noble Lord would have seen, if he had read this gentleman's correspondence, that the Abyssinians were little better than savages; that Sir William Hewett's Mission was, from time to time, placed in very great danger by them; and that their habits and modes of life were filthy and barbarous in the extreme. If these savages had had placed before them merely the task of wresting Kassala from the Arabs, Parliament might have looked upon the enterprise and its success with complacency; but, as a matter of fact, they would have to go through thousands of Arab tribesmen, who had been comparatively friendly to us in the Soudan, to get there. No doubt, fire, sword, rapine, and every sort of savage licence would be inflicted upon these tribes. What was the object of this invasion? As the hon. Member for Wicklow had pointed out, England could gain nothing by it. Then, what was the object of it? Nominally, it was to relieve Kassala. They knew what that meant—the absolute extinction of Kassala and most of its inhabitants. Kassala was a town of 25,000 inhabitants—a town which, according to Sir Samuel Baker, had multiplied three-fold within the past 25 years, a town of considerable prosperity and extensive trade. This town was to be handed over to Abyssinia. It was no use saying that it was not to be handed over to that country. When they invited a savage Monarch to make himself master of a place, and he told them he should retain it, and no one was sent out to act as a check on him, or to control his movements, they were practically giving it to him. The British Government had made themselves responsible for the Soudan. They had driven away an Egyptian Minister who had wanted to restore peace and order in the Soudan; they had massacred 6,000 or 7,000 Arabs there; and now they were sending a horde of 20,000 savages, the natural enemies of the Arabs and the people in possession, to seize upon a large town, and devastate and lay waste the surrounding country without the slightest restraint. If it had been intended that this march should be conducted on civilized principles, and if it had been intended to place some restraint on the King of Abyssinia, the Government would have sent Admiral Hewett, or some of his officers, to accompany the King, in order to prevent wanton bloodshed and useless destruction of property. They had been afraid to do that. Admiral Hewett had been sent on his Mission. He had gone as rapidly as he could, but had been detained on the way six weeks or two months whilst the King was at his bath. He left the King as soon as he could, and hurried away. The Government had left him to make what arrangements he chose, and to do what he liked in the matter. Surely, no course of action could have been more likely to lead to destruction of life and property—useless destruction of life and property. It was not possible to stigmatize this action of the Government in terms sufficiently strong. It was even worse than instigating the Bulgarians to attack the Mussulmen, or the Turks to make war on the Bulgarians, without taking precautions to prevent atrocities, because the Turks were more civilized than these Arabs and Abyssinians. He admitted the responsibility of this country to protect the garrison of Kassala; but it was a responsibility they should bear themselves, and their action should not be to relieve the town of the plague of the Arabs by sending a worse plague in its place. The result of this action was very likely to be, for the moment, to drive the Arab besiegers and the Egyptian garrison into union against the Abyssinian barbarians. It was said that the assistance of the Abyssinians had been invited in the interest of General Gordon; but he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) should have thought no step more disastrous to General Gordon could have been taken. It would create the greatest bitterness and the deepest hostility amongst the Soudanese. It would fill the whole of the Soudanese with the deadliest hatred to the British, when they knew how their country had been ravaged and their people slaughtered and enslaved by these Christian Abyssinians at our instigation. He was curious to hear what the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would have to say in defence of the action of the Government. He was not surprised at the Prime Minister running away—what could he say; how could he defend the ruin and bloodshed about to take place in the Soudan? That was a very awkward question for one who had talked so loudly and so pretentiously of the rights of peoples and the evils of bloodshed and rapine, at a time when not he himself, but a Minister to whom he was opposed, was in Office. No doubt, that was a very unpleasant subject for the Prime Minister, and it was not to be wondered at that the right hon. Gentleman withdrew from the debate. It would be interesting to hear what the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had to say in defence of this most cruel, pusillanimous, and unjustifiable outrage on the Mussulman inhabitants of the Soudan.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, as the evening draws on, seems to me to become, if possible, more and more extreme in his language. Early in the evening the Government were "base" and "cowardly," but now they are "cruel," "barbarous," and "pusillanimous," and I do not know how many terrible things. They have been committing outrages, and are arranging rapine and massacres. I will not attempt to follow the hon. Member in regard to his vague and general accusations, nor will I attempt to vie with him in the use of strong language. I will simply, at this late hour of the evening, refer to what I am sure he wishes—namely, to the main facts of the case. Now, this Treaty is a very short one. It is a Treaty of Seven Articles, and it may be generally described in this way—that, on the one hand, the King of Abyssinia engages to facilitate the retreat and withdrawal of the Egyptian garrisons from certain places; and he also has signed a Slave Trade Treaty. On the other hand, the Khedive of Egypt undertakes to give to the Abyssinians free access to the port of Massowah, which is of much importance to the commercial prosperity of Abyssinia; and the Khedive also surrenders the district of Bogos, which place has been already mentioned this evening. As to the First Article of the Treaty, that is, perhaps, the most important—namely,

“From the date of the signing of this Treaty there shall be free transit through Massowah, to and from Abyssinia, for all goods, including arms and ammunition, under British protection.”

Massowah is vital to the civilization of these regions. It has for years been the object of Abyssinia to get free access to it. As I mentioned in one of these debates earlier in the Session, there was a time when the King of Abyssinia said he would be satisfied with nothing short of the absolute cession of Massowah; but it has proved possible to make an arrangement with him short of that. The concession which has been made is very important in the interests of the civilization and the commerce of these regions. I can only say that even if I agreed with the description of the Abyssinians which we have heard to-night, I should deem it absolutely impossible to rescue them from that condition of warlike barbarism if Egypt continued to deprive them of the means of betaking themselves to peaceful commercial pursuits. How there is to be any development of commerce or trade in this district so long as the Abyssinians are cut off from access to the sea, baffles my comprehension. To come to the Second Article of the Treaty, it says—

“On and after the 1st day of September, 1884, corresponding to the 8th day of Maskaram, 1877, the country called Bogos shall be restored to His Majesty the Negooa Negust; and when the troops of His Highness the Khedive shall have left the garrisons of Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, the buildings in the Bogos country which now belong to His Highness the Khedive, together with all the stores and munitions of war which shall then remain in the said buildings, shall be delivered to and become the property of His Majesty the Negooa Negust.”

I should like to know what possible objection there can be to the surrender of this district of Bogos to Abyssinia? At one time it was Abyssinian territory—that is not disputed. The only question is whether it is 10, 50, or 60 years ago that it belonged to Abyssinia.

MR. MCCOAN: I said it had been taken by Mehemet Ali from independent tribes who had never recognized the supremacy of the Abyssinians.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The place has been a fruitful source of trouble in these regions, and, in my opinion, it is an unmixed advantage to have terminated the disputes with reference to it. So long as they existed, a condition of warfare, sometimes open and sometimes disguised, was certain to be prevalent in these regions. Any arrangement, therefore, that could be made which enabled the King of Abyssinia and the Khedive of Egypt to come to terms and put an end to these serious frontier disputes, must be an unmixed advantage. I think the First Article of the Treaty, which I have read, as to Massowah, is likely to bring that about. I now pass to the Third Article of the Treaty, which is—

“His Majesty the Negooa Negust engages to facilitate the withdrawal of the troops of His Highness the Khedive from Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, through Ethiopia to Massowah.”

I thought I had explained the other day what the meaning of this Article is. It seems to me that its meaning is tolerably clear. The Egyptian garrisons are to be withdrawn from these places, Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit; but only one place is ceded to the King of Abyssinia—namely, Keren or Sanhit. But I am told that the towns named in the Treaty, though not ceded to the King of Abyssinia, will be held by him.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: He says he will hold them.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am told he has declared it to be his intention to hold these places. My answer to that is plain and simple. I want to know what interest of this country is injured by the fact that these places may or may not become Abyssinian territory? It seems to me that the alarms which are promoted in the House by certain hon. Members in regard to remote questions of foreign politics are simply signs of that disposition—so dangerous in such matters—that it is the business of this country to interfere everywhere. Some people seem to think that we ought to have something to say upon every event which takes place abroad, and that we ought to interfere in matters that are not of vital interest to ourselves. What is of importance to us is to secure the withdrawal of the Egyptian garrisons, and, so far as we can, to reduce the causes of dispute between Abyssinia and Egypt. But if it then happen that in consequence of this Treaty, or in consequence of the steps which the King of Abyssinia may take, or may not take, in these regions, some further portion of a territory—the boundary of which has varied from time to time—may have to be ceded to Abyssinia, it is not a matter for this country or for hon. Members to become alarmed about. It is desirable for us to look at these things from a calm and common-sense point of view. I know very well an attempt has been made to paint this question in colours dark and gloomy. We have been accused of letting loose fanatical hordes of fifth-rate Christians on these Mahomedans. We have done nothing of the kind. The descriptions we have had of “barbarous tribes,” “Abyssinian savages,” and so on, have been grossly exaggerated; and it seems to me that the “horrible barbarity” of the Abyssinians was discovered by some hon. Members opposite about the same time that they first heard of the existence of this Treaty. I am not contending that the civilization of the Abyssinians is a high form of civilization, or that their Christianity is a very noble form of Christianity. I have heard them described as “fifth-rate Christians.” The other day I quoted from a work by Dean Stanley on the Eastern Churches, and everyone who refers to that work will see that the Abyssinian form of Christianity is not a very exalted one. But if we desire to improve the condition of Christianity and civilization in that country, the best way to do it is to give the people improved communication with more civilized races; and that we have done by giving them access to Massowah. We have done it also in another way. One of the difficulties that the people has suffered from has been the constant obstacles thrown in their way in regard to the consecration of the Aboonas, or priests, by the Coptic Patriarch. In the Fourth Article of the Treaty the Khedive undertakes that these difficulties shall no longer exist. The Article is—

“His Highness the Khedive engages to grant all the facilities which His Majesty the Negus Negust may require in the matter of appointing Aboonas for Ethiopia.”

The Fifth Article does not require any detailed notice. It says—

“His Majesty the Negus Negust and His Highness the Khedive engage to deliver up, the one to the other, any criminal or criminals who may have fled, to escape punishment, from the dominions of the one to the dominions of the other.”

The Sixth Article refers all differences to Her Majesty in these terms—

“His Majesty the Negus Negust agrees to refer all differences with His Highness the Khedive which may arise after the signing of this Treaty to Her Britannic Majesty for settlement.”

And Article VII. has reference merely to the ratification of the Treaty. There is only one other point which I need mention, and that is what was said by my hon. Friend who has now left the House (Baron Henry De Worms) with reference to the Porte. As I said the other day, it has never been shown that the Bogos territory comes within the territory of the Sultan—I see no reason to withdraw from what I then said. I think it will be seen that this Treaty is one which will not be disadvantageous to the region affected by it. In regard to the suppression of the Slave Trade, there is a good deal to be done by this Treaty with the King of Abyssinia; and I hope that, as the trade of Massowah increases, and as the British Consul who may be stationed there assumes—as he will assume—an important position, it will be found possible, as is the case in other parts of the world, to do much towards stopping that horrible trade which has led to so many of the evils which have been found to exist there.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the noble Lord had declared that he was going to be very calm, and he certainly had been, and both dull and prolix in addition. There were several points, not so much of detail as of general principle, which had appeared to him (Lord Randolph Churchill) to be of a very objectionable character. In the first place, as to the First Article of the Treaty. No doubt, everyone in the House was quite ready to concede that it was an excellent thing that Massowah should be open to the Abyssinians. The Second Article, however, was objectionable, because, in that, the British Government had ceded to the King of Abyssinia a territory which they had not the smallest right in the world to cede. That was the real point of the whole matter—that the British Government had taken upon themselves to hand over to the King of Abyssinia, who was, undoubtedly, a barbarian, a large territory over which the Abyssinians had no control, and over which the British Government could exercise no sort of authority. He wished to know why such a proceeding, which, undoubtedly, in more civilized parts of the world, would have been repudiated and denounced by the British Government, if adopted by any other Government, had become legitimate, proper, and decent, when adopted by them in this part of Africa? What right had they to give over the Bogos people to the Sovereignty of the King of Abyssinia? It was, at least, 60 or 80 years since the territory had belonged to Abyssinia, if, indeed, it had ever belonged to it. The noble Lord seemed very positive on the point; but he had failed to give hon. Members his sources of information. But supposing that this territory at one time had belonged to the Abyssinians, the fact that it no longer belonged to them, and had ceased to be their property for 50 or 60 years, was a great proof that it should not belong to them, and that the Abyssinians were not fit to hold it or govern it. He protested against the principle of the Second Article of the Treaty, which assumed that the British Government had a right to distribute the Soudan—or rather this territory with this disagreeable name—in the way in which they proposed to distribute it. Then, they came to the question of Kassala, and the territory round it. That was a much more serious matter. It was not denied that the King of Abyssinia intended to annex Kassala, and the British Government meant handing over a country filled with a Mahomedan population to the rule of a man who, in the eyes of the Mahomedans, was a heretical Sovereign. He wished to ask again what right the British Government had to treat this population around Kassala in a different manner to that in which they would treat the population of any other part of the Soudan? The great point of the Government policy in the Soudan was that the people there were struggling to be free. Why were the people at Kassala to be placed in this disgraceful position, that they of all others of the Soudan were not to be allowed to be free, but were to be placed under the rule, not of the Mahdi, but of a son d'ant Christian? Nothing more odious to the Mahomedan population in that part of the world could be conceived. The noble Lord had given no reason why these people should be treated in a different manner to the people of Darfur. What guarantee was there that the garrisons of Kassala and the places round it would be rescued by the King of Abyssinia? Would they ever know what became of these garrisons. To anyone who had read the accounts of the Mission of Admiral Hewett, it was quite plain they had been drawn entirely from Liberal sources. It was entirely owing to the enterprize of The Daily News that they had received such full accounts of the Mission at all, and yet it was clear from those accounts that the Abyssinians were an extremely savage and barbarous race. That was certainly the impression entertained of them at the time of the Abyssinian War. He wished to know what guarantee the Government had that, in return for bringing about the cession of Bogos, the garrisons of Kassala and the other places would ever be liberated, or that they would even be allowed to withdraw? It seemed to him there was no guarantee at all—that the King of Abyssinian might attack them without our having any remedy against him. There was another point which might not have occurred to the noble Lord or to the Foreign Office, but which was very remarkable. The British Government was now engaged in supervising the administration of a thoroughly Mahomedan country, and if the British Government was to have any success whatever in having this arrangement acceded to by Mahomedan subjects in Egypt, it must more or less consult their religious feelings and their religious law. Well, he knew the Mahomedans, as a rule, were not very fond of Christians. There was a deep gulf between Mahomedans and Christians, and where the question of government was concerned, that difference had been found very wide indeed. But, curiously enough, he had been told, on the authority of a very learned man now in England—an Ulema of the University of Cairo—that if there were a set of Christians on the face of the earth whom the Mahomedans loathed and abhorred more than another, it was the Abyssinian Christians. They were forbidden by their religion to make any terms with them, and wars had been going on between them for generations. There had never been any peace between them. This was a principle recognized by all Mahomedans; whether or not it was in the Koran he could not say. The Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) looked upon all this with supreme contempt—he was anxious to get to those little niggling Votes which were so dear to his heart and so troublesome to everyone else. To his (Lord Randolph Churchill's) mind, these subjects were not beneath the notice of the Committee, and it was not too much to ask that the Committee should discuss them when they came on for the first time. If the particular question now under debate was so completely beneath the notice of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, he would recommend him to follow the example of the Prime Minister, and, for the moment, leave the House. This was certain—that if Her Majesty's Government were anxious to affront and displease Mahomedans in Egypt as outrageously as they could, they would do it by concluding a Treaty with Abyssinia. Besides, there was a belief amongst the Arabs, that some day mischief would arise from the Abyssinians. These facts he gave the Committee as he had received them from a learned man from Cairo, whom he himself was inclined to believe. The Government had been most unfortunate in the course they had taken; and he did not know whether the view he had just expounded had been put to the noble Lord or the Foreign Office before. If it had not, it was not altogether unworthy of their notice. It appeared to him that the step the Government had taken had been a singularly ill-advised one, and if the hon. Member for Wicklow divided against the Vote, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) should certainly vote with him.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that the explanation of the noble Lord (Lord

Lord Randolph Churchill

Edmond Fitzmaurice), and his defence of the Government, was as strong a case as had yet been made out against them. The noble Lord had admitted that the Abyssinians were not first-rate Christians—that they were fifth-rate Christians.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I said someone else described them as such.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that even if they were first-rate Christians, we had no right to put them to this use. He agreed with what had been said by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill). The hon. Member (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had certainly used strong language, and if these Abyssinians were the brutes and savages he had described them to be, nothing could be worse than their employing them in this business. One of the things he wished to know was this—what was the meaning of this obscure Article of the Treaty—

“His Majesty the Négus Negus engages to facilitate the withdrawal of the troops of His Highness the Khedive from Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit, through Ethiopia to Massowah?”

That was the real point of their inquiry now. Did that mean that these fifth-rate Christians and first-rate savages were to be sent out into the Soudan to lay waste the country and to “assist in getting these Egyptian troops out,” or did it not? [“No!”] Then, how were the Abyssinians to assist in getting them out, if troops were not to go there? He could not understand what it all meant. When they went to war it was the custom to do all the harm they could to a country, and these fifth-rate Christians and first-rate savages were just the fellows to follow out that principle to the letter. It seemed to him that they were now in a worse position than they were some time ago. What an outcry there was when they employed the North American Indians against the Americans in the War of Independence! Chatham's most powerful speech was made against it—the speech that they used to learn as schoolboys; and here they were doing the same thing again in the year 1884. He had hoped that, they were getting beyond these horrors. First, they interfered with the freedom of action of a peaceful and laborious people in Egypt; then they went through every species of horror in slaughtering and dispersing the Arabs; and now the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made a speech in support of the employment of fifth-rate Christians in this kind of warfare. He should certainly vote for the proposal of the hon. Member for Wicklow.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he wished just to make one remark in answer to an observation of his noble Friend (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice). As he (Baron Henry De Worms) had understood the noble Lord, he had said there was no evidence in the Treaty or the accompanying documents that the King of Abyssinia intended to take Kassala, Amedib, and Sanhit. It seemed to him (Baron Henry De Worms) that there was distinct evidence in the case.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the hon. Member was not in the House when he spoke. He had stated that it was not within the four corners of the Treaty.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, it was quite clear that Admiral Hewett, who was a party to the Treaty, knew at the time he was assenting to it that it was the intention of the King of Abyssinia to annex Kassala and the other places. In his Report to Earl Granville, in the 12th paragraph, he said—

“I pointed out that he would not be a gainer by having ports of his own, and in this view he acquiesced; but declared his intention of taking Kassala from the Arabs, should it fall into their hands.”

And in a letter to the Secretary to the Admiralty on the 22nd of June, the Admiral made a statement to the effect that on the fall or evacuation of Amedib, King John undoubtedly intended to take it as a reward, and to compensate him for the trouble and expense of relieving the garrison. Was it not, therefore, clear that the contracting parties who made this Treaty with King John, knew that it was his intention to annex Kassala and Amedib? If so, the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) had made out his case.

MR. LABOUCHERE protested against money being wasted in stirring up war in the Soudan. He could not make out on what ground this Expedition had ever been sent to Abyssinia. They had heard a short time ago, from the Front Ministerial Bench, that the independence of the Soudan had been declared; and if that was the case, why should Admiral Hewett go to Abyssinia to employ the people of that country against the Soudanese? There had been no proof given, in the first place, that the garrison of Kassala wished to leave, and, in the second place, that it could not leave if it wished. They had simply given up the Soudan; and yet in the North they had made every kind of attack upon it, and had sent General Gordon to Khartoum, where he seemed to be passing his time killing and slaying the Natives, whilst in the South they sent Admiral Hewett to the King of Abyssinia to prevail on him to make a raid on the country. Why could they not let the Soudan alone, having declared its independence? They had gone on meddling and meddling, and would probably continue to do so, sending an Embassy to one place, a Christian hero to another, an Army to another, and so on. That would go on until the House protested against this abominable waste of money for such a wicked purpose as the stirring up of war in that part of the world. He hoped the hon. Member (Mr. M'Coan) would divide the Committee.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 67: Majority 35.—(Div. List, No. 208.)

Original Question again proposed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had given Notice that he would propose to reduce the Supplementary Vote by £240, expenses connected with Egypt. He had put that Motion on the Paper, because he very strongly disapproved of the arrangements made for continuing the International Tribunals for five years, for he believed that would be most disastrous. But, at this period of the Session, he could not hope for an adequate discussion, and therefore he should not propose the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE wished to obtain some explanation about chaplains. There were a good many chaplains provided for; but it was, perhaps, not generally known that there was no law which gave the Foreign Office a right to charge for a chaplain at a Legation or Embassy, but only where there happened to be a Consul. Where there was a Consul, a chaplain could be appointed; but there were several Embassies where there were chaplains, and, in some cases, £300 a-year was voted for them.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see that any of these Votes relate to chaplains, and the hon. Member will not be in Order in debating any question in regard to them.

MR. LABOUCHERE wished to obtain from the Chair a ruling on a point which was a very important one, and one on which questions were constantly being raised. Were the various items to be taken seriatim in such a manner as that if one hon. Member got up and made a proposal upon some item near the end of the Vote, no other hon. Member would afterwards be at liberty to raise any discussion upon any item that stood before it? He was not going to attack the Vote, but only to ask a question. Of course, if the Chairman maintained the ruling that had just been laid down, the matter was at an end; but it certainly was most inconvenient, and it was very desirable that there should be some definite and distinct statement from the Chair upon the subject.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Rule of the House is very precise. It is clearly laid down that, after a Question has been proposed from the Chair for the diminution of any item, no Motion can be made or debate allowed upon any preceding item. The hon. Member, therefore, cannot debate any preceding item. There is no Vote for Chaplains before us now—if there was such an item to come on, the hon. Gentleman would be in Order; but there is not.

(2.) £155,402 (including a Supplementary sum of £2,910), to complete the sum for Consular Services.

CAPTAIN AYLMEER wished to call attention to a matter in connection with this Vote. There was a very large sum put down here as fees received during the year 1882-3, amounting altogether to £45,102. That was a very large sum, and it was well worthy of the consideration of the Committee. It was very right that English subjects abroad, requiring the services of a Consul to witness documents, should be charged a fee. He did not attack that principle at all, and he was very glad that the amount was so large; but his opinion was that, considering the fees that were charged, the amount might be very much larger. There was not the least check upon these charges, so far as he could learn. An Englishman abroad, appearing before a Consul for the purpose of signing his name, getting a writ issued, or anything else, had to pay 6s., 7s., or 8s., or whatever was required by the Consular Office, as a fee; but no accounts seemed to be kept of these payments, nor did there seem to be any possible check to secure a thoroughly accurate return. He (Captain Aylmer) himself had had to pay on very many occasions, and the money had always been put in the Consul's pocket, or into that of his clerk, and there was no way in which the Government could check the amount. He had often discussed the matter with gentlemen who were travelling abroad, and the opinion generally entertained, without charging anybody with dishonesty, was that a considerable portion of the money never arrived at the English Exchequer at all. The difficulty could be very easily met by providing that a Consular stamp should be affixed, or something of that sort done; but as matters stood at present, all he could say was, that a man appeared before the Consul, the Consul witnessed the signature, the man paid a fee, the money disappeared in the Consul's pocket, the Consul made no entry and kept no account, and there was no possible check of any sort. Many Consular Offices abroad, where Englishmen had to go to sign important documents, were in a very disgraceful state. Very large sums were set down in the Votes for these Offices—£200 a-year was allowed for the Consular Office chiefly used in Paris; but to get into that Office one had to pass through a dark room without a window, and it was generally hampered with a heap of luggage, which was not at all a right or proper condition for an English Consular Office to be in. That was a state of things that was much complained of.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, these Consular Offices were regulated under the terms of an Order in Council. Every Consul or Consular officer who received fees had to make a careful account of the amount received. No doubt, in theory, the method of check might not seem a very perfect one; but the matter was receiving attention. At the same time, he was bound to think that there never had been the least suspicion of any improper conduct on the part of any Consular officer in regard to these fees. However, the subject would be looked into.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, his attention had been specially called to the matter by the remark made by a notary going out of a Consular Office, who said—“That money is going into that man’s pocket.” He (Captain Aylmer) replied—“It will be sent home.” Whereupon the notary rejoined—“You need not tell me. That is not the opinion abroad.”

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he had hoped that this Vote would not have been proceeded with that night, but would have been postponed. It was not his fault that time had been spent over another Vote of great importance. There were several points in connection with this Consular Vote which he considered it his duty to draw attention to; but as they had been engaged upon the Estimates from directly after the close of the Questions until now, he thought the Government might fairly consent to postpone this Vote. There were special reasons connected with the convenience of hon. Members why the Vote should be postponed. They were led to believe last week that the Diplomatic Vote would be postponed, as the Government wished to make a Ministerial Statement which would affect the various items. It was not fair to take away from the House the opportunity of criticizing some of these Votes, when the policy of the Government was elaborately concealed. The Prime Minister was asked over and over again last week and the week before, to fix a night for these Votes; but he delayed doing so until Friday. When they compared the consideration shown by the Government to the feelings of hon. Members from Ireland in regard to Votes, which were debated day after day and week after week, and frequently postponed to meet some secret object—when they compared all this exaggerated subserviency to the caprices of Irish Members with the conduct of the Government in regard to the Diplomatic and Consular Votes, and when they remembered that the sole opportunity which had been given to the House that Session to offer criticisms in regard to the wide Dominions of the Crown depended upon Supply, they would feel that it was unreasonable that this Vote should be pressed forward that night. Under these circumstances, and in view of the postponement of the Ministerial Statement, he was not acting unreasonably in asking that this Consular Vote should be postponed until to-morrow.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, they were always glad to hear the hon. Member for Eye, and he really did not see why that hon. Gentleman should not go on now. The Session must end some time, and there were some hon. Members who hoped it might end soon; but if they only discussed a Vote a night, they would have the Prorogation one day and the Queen’s Speech opening another Session the next. He hoped they would go on with the Vote which was now before the Committee, and he wished to ask some questions in reference to it. In the first place, he wished to ask a question about the Consulate at Kertch. He believed the Consul appointed at Kertch was a fugitive from justice. He need not enter into details on the subject; but he believed that that was the fact.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT rose to Order. Under the ruling which had just come from the Chair, it appeared that if the hon. Member raised a debate upon this point, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) would not be able to refer to any of the preceding items.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member moves to reduce the Vote on this item, then it would not be competent for any hon. Member to discuss any of the preceding items.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he thought it was necessary that the hon. Member for Northampton, under these circumstances, should say whether he intended to move the reduction of the Vote or not.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he did not intend to move the reduction of the Vote—he only wanted to know about this Kertch Consul, because there was a libel case going on about him. He would like to know whether the Kertch Consul was still receiving pay or not? Another point which he wished to raise was this—he did not want to raise any Egyptian discussion; but he wanted to know what was going on in Khartoum. Was Mr. Power, the Consul, there? He would like to hear some details about that.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that with regard to Kertch, an opportunity had been taken of making certain improvements in reference to the Consular Office, and the gentleman referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton, who was an unpaid Vice Consul, had been withdrawn. There would now be a regular Consul there, for Kertch was becoming a very important place. In regard to Khartoum, Mr. Power was merely a temporary Acting Consul, charged with Consular duties.

Mr. CALLAN wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for an explanation on one point. He wished to know on what principle these Consular salaries and duties were apportioned? He found that in the Brazils, the Consul at Pernambuco had £800 a-year and £400 for allowances, or £1,200 in all; while the fees received amounted to only £116. In another case, the Consul received £600 a-year in salary and £150 in allowances; while the fees received were £119. But in the Argentine Republic, at Rosario, the Consul received no salary, and the expenses for Office allowances were only £300 a-year; while the fees received amounted in 1882 to £320, and last year to £355. On looking back to the Estimates for previous years, he found that in 1879 the Consul at Rosario received £400 a-year in salary and £200 for expenses and Office allowances. What was the state of trade in Rosario at that time? On looking over the Board of Trade Returns, he found that the shipping from Rosario in 1879 consisted of 42 English vessels with a tonnage of 22,000 tons, and crews, giving the most trouble to the Consuls, of 696; whereas, in the past year, the shipping had increased to 153 vessels, with a tonnage of 109,000 tons. He held in his hand a Return given to him by one of the Ministers of the Republic. It was the Return of one English line going to Rosario—Lambert and Holt's Line—and from that it appeared that in 1878, when there was a Consul at Rosario, with £600 a-year, only 12 ocean steamers went into Rosario; whereas in the present year, up to the 1st of June, 29 steamers of one firm alone went there, and in all, last year, 97 ocean steamers went into the port. Taking the fees received in the Office, it appeared that in 1879 the Consul's duties were so light that only £94 13s. was received in fees; whereas, last year, the amount received and returned to the Foreign Office was £355, which was £55 in excess of the salary or allowances for the Consul's Office. In 1878 and 1879, when there was a Consul in existence, with a salary and allowances of £600 a-year, there was only one-fifth of the present tonnage or of the present official duties; but now only £300 a-year was allowed for Office expenses, and there was no salary at all. He was glad to hear that there was a Departmental Commission sitting on the subject, and he wanted to know on what principle the salary was granted—whether by the amount of fees received, the amount of shipping entering the port, or the nature and amount of the general duties performed? If the salary was fixed in reference to any one of these considerations—the tonnage, the number of the crews, the amount of business going into the Office, the amount of the fees received, or the increasing importance of the port—there could be no possible reason why the city of Rosario, which, in 1879, possessed a Consulate, should in the present year, when it had become the second port of the Argentine Republic, be reduced to a Vice Consulate. He hoped some explanation would be given to the Committee as to the principle on which the salaries were allocated, and that immediate steps would be taken to remedy this wholly unjustifiable inequality which ought not to exist. He hoped, now that the attention of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had been drawn to the matter, that he would be able to give some consideration to it before the Report.

Mr. BRYCE wished to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs about the Consulates in Asia Minor and Armenia, and also as to the allocation of places where Consuls were kept. It was said last winter, that new instructions had been given to Consuls in Asiatic Turkey that they were to bring to the notice of the Government, and especially to the notice of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, any oppressions upon the subjects. But the results had been somewhat narrow, and he wanted to know what was the real state of the case? As to the places of these Consular Stations, he found that some Consuls had been withdrawn from Asiatic Turkey where they used to be maintained. That might have been done from motives of economy; but if Comsuls were to be withdrawn at all, there were other places from which they might have been withdrawn with more advantage—places where they were less needed than some of those from which they had been withdrawn. The Committee would remember that, immediately after the Anglo-Turkish Convention, the late Government sent Military Consuls to the Armenian Frontier charged with strategic duties. They were to observe the progress of Russia, and to enable us to defend the Frontier of Asiatic Turkey. But he supposed the functions of those Consuls vanished with the Anglo-Turkish Convention itself, which was now relegated to a limbo from which it could never emerge.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Who says so?

MR. BRYCE, continuing, said, these officials never performed military duties; but they did very good work in reporting instances of cruelty and oppression, of scandalous injustice and exactions, sometimes by officials and sometimes by robber tribes. These instances of oppression were sent to Constantinople. Our Ambassador, in many cases, interfered, and in some cases there was very little doubt that some sort of check, though not complete, was imposed upon the conduct of these oppressors. Now, this force of observers had been diminished; and he would suggest to the Government that they would do better to remove their Vice Consuls from places like Broussa and Alexandretta than from places where great oppressions were constantly being exercised, and from which Reports would be of very great value. Since Turkey had done nothing, some good might be done, at any rate, by having Consuls at those places to let them know what was going on, and then the Government would have means of remonstrating with effect. Similar remarks would apply to the case of European Turkey. There were many places where they might have Consuls. They had none at all up at Bosnia, and a conflagration might break out at any moment. They ought to have a British officer in that immense district of country charged with knowing what the condition of the country was. They knew what serious results followed in 1875 and 1876 from the ignorance of this country and of the Government as to the state of European Turkey. The massacres of 1876 took them completely by surprise; but if they had had a proper staff to diffuse the information through the country a very different result might have happened. He wanted to know whether the Government could not transfer the Consuls from places where they were less needed to those places where they were greatly needed?

MR. O'SHEA said, the time had arrived when the remuneration of Consuls and Consular Agents abroad ought, in his opinion, to be inquired into; because there was no doubt that, while some of those gentlemen were well paid, others were under-paid. He would take the case of the Consuls in Spain as an instance. The Vice Consul at Santander received a salary of £100 a-year, and an allowance of £280 for Office expenses and rent, which latter amount included £200 for fees; whereas the amount of fees payable to the Government appeared to be only £134. The Committee would be aware that Santander was a very important port; and he could not understand why, having regard to the amount of British commerce represented there, the position of their Representative there should not be advanced from Vice Consul to that of Consul, and why his salary should not be raised proportionately. Again, the Vice Consul at Carthagena, a very important place, where difficult questions relating to shipping often arose, received only £200 and £100 as an allowance for Office expenses and rent. The fact that this Vice Consulate returned the large sum of £629 in fees to the British Government was in itself sufficient to show that this country ought to be well represented there. Then he observed that the Consul General at Havana, who received £1,200 a-year as salary and £600 a-year for Office expenses and rent, also received from the Spanish Government £115 a-year for house rent as Commissary Judge. He thought it was not right that a Consul should receive any money at all from a Foreign Government. Without going into further detail, he trusted the whole subject would receive the attention of the Foreign Office.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he had been very much amused at hearing the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) protest against what he called outrages in Turkey in Asia; and, generally, he was entertained with the line which the hon. and learned Member took on that point as one of the supporters, through thick and thin, of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, which had caused far more ruin and loss of life in other Mahomedan countries. ["Order, order!"] He submitted that he was perfectly in Order. Surely it was right to answer the argument of the hon. and learned Member by analogy; but, passing from that subject, he desired to have some information from Her Majesty's Government with regard to the position of the Acting Consul at Khartoum. To use the language of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that gentleman had been in a perilous position for the last four or five months. The last communications from him were dated the 23rd of March and the 7th of April, in the former of which he said—

"We are daily expecting British troops; we cannot believe that we are to be abandoned by the Government; our existence depends on England."

On the 7th of April he said—

"Khartoum is at present the centre of an enormous rebel camp; our store of food and ammunition is rather short; the situation is very critical; we are trying to run a steamer to Berber; but yesterday, owing to the rebel fire, she had to return."

That was the statement of a gentleman who, according to the noble Lord, accepted a very onerous position at great peril to himself, discharged his duties in that position with great advantage to the country, was lauded by a British Minister for having done so, and then, so far as they knew, had been abandoned to his fate. That gentleman was Mr. Power, the Consular Agent of this country at Khartoum. Now, he wished to say, on behalf of Mr. Power, that every statement which had appeared in The Times, coming from him as Correspondent, and every statement made by him to the Government, had been entirely borne out by facts; there was no important statement made by Mr. Power, and which had appeared in the public Press, or in the official records, that could be impugned. His accuracy was undoubted, and the statements he had made as coming from General Gordon himself had been proved up to the hilt by subsequent accounts published in the Blue Book. He thought the Prime Minister and the Government owed a public apology to Mr. Power for the language they had at one time used, which threw a doubt upon his accuracy. No one at that moment knew what was going to be done with him, although they might possibly hear something on the subject to-morrow. He wanted to know how long this gentleman was to be left in his perilous position, or whether, having in that position discharged his duties faithfully, he was to be abandoned by the Government? Without detaining the Committee any longer on that subject, he would pass to the position of the Consul at Tamatave. At present he appeared to have been of no advantage to this country. He had been sent out to Madagascar last November; but, so far as it was possible to judge from the answers of the Government on the subject, he had as yet discharged no functions whatever, although he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was willing to admit that he might have discharged functions of which they had no knowledge. No doubt, it was the fault of the Government rather than of the Consul that nothing was done. Now, the position of this gentleman also was one of considerable danger, because it was understood that the ill-feeling of the French towards the English had much increased of late, the resistance which the Hovas had made being attributed to the action of the British Representative in Madagascar. He wished to know what the Consul there was doing to fulfil his duties? The noble Lord had rather scoffed at the amount of trade which their Representative in Madagascar had to look after; but he could state that the amount of that trade was represented by about £750,000 sterling a-year. ["No, no!"] That was a correct statement; he had made it before, and he should repeat it again and again, until the Government showed that they were alive to the importance of this question. Last year 40 ships, sailing under the British Flag, cleared from one port in the Island alone. The depression which existed in the shipping trade was perfectly well known; and surely hon. Members had a right to complain when an important part of that trade was neglected by Her Majesty's Government. The trade with Madagascar amounted, as he had pointed out, to £750,000 a-year; but it had been almost entirely destroyed, and large numbers of planters and traders had been practically ruined, while nothing was done by the Government to protect British subjects or British interests in the Island. He did not blame the Consul; it was the policy of the Government that was at fault; and, for all they could see, those great interests were being neglected. Therefore, he said that the Committee had a right to claim on this subject from the Government a full explanation. The Government had submitted to loss of territory; they had accepted insults freely from France; they had established themselves in Egypt only to see their influence and whole policy set at naught; and yet they were actually too timorous to protect British interests in Madagascar. Before he assented to the Vote being taken, he should expect to receive a very distinct statement of facts in connection with the position of affairs in Tamatave—a clear statement as to the Government's intentions with regard to Mr. Power, and also an assurance that the Government were at last plucking up heart to make some efforts to put an end to a condition of affairs generally so seriously injurious to the interests of Great Britain.

MR. WHITLEY said, he had to ask the attention of the Committee and the Government to an important point connected with the position of the British Consul in Madagascar. It appeared, on the statement of commercial men competent to speak on the subject, that English commercial interests in Madagascar were not, and could not be attended to, owing to the fact that the Consul resided in the interior of the Island at a great distance from the port. If it were the case that the Consul did not reside within reach of those whose business lay in the import and export trade of the Island, there could be no doubt that the complaint of merchants and others that their interests in Madagascar were unprotected was a just one. He believed there was a man-of-war somewhere about the Coast; but the British shipowners felt that, at the present time, they ran a great deal of risk, and, under the circumstances, he was sure they would receive with gratitude an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that their interests would be protected. He understood that it was the intention, when the Consul was sent out to the Island, that there should be more than one Representative of British interests there; but the only Representative he knew of was the gentleman who lived in the interior, and who was described by commercial men as being no Representative at all. That was a matter of very serious importance, because he was in a position to assure the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that there was a great amount of commercial depression. Knowing that to be the case, it was felt most strongly by his constituents that the commercial interests of the country should be protected wheresoever they existed, if it were possible to do so; and they believed that if a more determined position were taken up by the Government that end would be gained. He wanted the noble Lord, who, he believed, was anxious, as far as lay in his power, to protect British interests, to represent at the Foreign Office that a very strong feeling existed with regard to this question amongst commercial men in Liverpool, and in other commercial centres.

MR. WARTON asked the attention of the noble Lord, although the point had more to do with the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, to the manner in which the accounts relating to the expenditure at Constantinople were stated. He would simply indicate, for his purpose, the items for messengers, canvassers, and for constables. The salary in each case was put down at so much, and then underneath the amount there was another amount bracketed to the amount above, without the slightest information on the face of the Estimate, or in any foot-note, as to what the extra sum was for. Besides, the salaries of the constables at 3s. and 5s. 6d. a-day were miscalculated. This irregularity showed itself in every item of the Vote, and certainly called for a clear explanation, which he hoped the noble Lord or the hon. Gentleman would be able to furnish to the Committee.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he should be glad if he were able to reply on all the points raised since the last Division. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) had called his attention to the Consular arrangements at Rosario. He was willing to say that if his hon. Friend put forward a case, and furnished the needful figures and facts, he would look into the matter; and if it should be thought that the Consular arrangements in question required revision, such revision should, if possible, be made. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) had raised, in the course of this discussion, a subject in which the hon. and learned Gentleman was greatly interested—namely, the state of affairs in certain parts of the Turkish Dominions in Asia Minor, and the alleged deficiency in the Consular arrangements there. It was true that when the present Government came into Office they made a reduction of the Staff. He believed that the Consuls appointed in the last days of the late Government were six in number, and that they had been sent to the most important places in Asia Minor, where it was thought they might be instrumental in obtaining the execution of some of the reforms promised by the Turkish Government; but after persevering for a considerable time, it was found, notwithstanding the engagements entered into between the Turkish Government and the British Government, that all their representations were useless. It was true the Consuls were able to collect a great deal of important information; but, as he had said before, their endeavours to bring about reforms were unsuccessful, not from any shortcoming on their part, but from the unwillingness of the Turkish Government to act upon their advice. Representations were made at Constantinople, but were equally without result, and the conclusion come to by the Government was that there was no longer any justification for asking the country for a continuation of the expenditure which the posts in Asia Minor required when it was impossible to show any results. The diminished staff in Asia Minor had received instructions not to lessen its activity on behalf of reform; but he was bound to say that it appeared impossible to carry out any actual reform. Inspectors had been sent out, and reforms promised; but in reality nothing was done. His hon. and learned Friend also alluded to the Province of Macedonia, from the north of which the Consular Staff had been withdrawn. But with regard to that Province and other places, the absolute necessity of having Consular officers there was very much diminished by the extension of the railway from Salonica, which, although there was only one train a-day, had done a great deal towards opening up the region and furnishing facilities for obtaining information. The Consul General at Salonica, a gentleman of great ability and energy, had used that railway as a means of obtaining information which would otherwise have been impossible for him to obtain. Then his hon. Friend the Member for Clare (Mr. O'Shea) had touched upon the salaries of the Vice Consuls at Carthage and St. Sebastian. He hoped his hon. Friend would not object to his saying that the points he had raised were such as he would like to consider in detail with him, if that course were perfectly convenient. Then he came to the questions of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), and here he was approaching a difficult task, because it tended to re-open the question of Madagascar, which was a favourite subject with the hon. Member. The hon. Member had already that Session had an opportunity of making a speech. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: There is no obligation.] In reply to the inquiry with regard to Madagascar, the Consular Staff had been strengthened, and the late Consul replaced. Trading Vice Consuls had been appointed in several parts of the Island. The residence of the Consul in Madagascar had been nominally at Antananarivo; but the late Consul, Mr. Pakenham, resided at Tamatave, and he resided there because it was considered desirable that he should be at the place where the principal commerce of the Island took place. Counter representations had been made to the effect that the Consul should reside in the central town of the Island; and he had no doubt the view would ultimately prevail that it would be more convenient, when the Island assumed a more settled appearance, if Mr. Graves were more at the capital than Mr. Pakenham was. Since Mr. Graves had been in the Island he had been travelling about a great deal; he had been in the capital, in Tamatave, and other places; but it was almost impossible to say where his permanent residence would be until the rather painful state of things now existing in the Island had passed away. Mr. Pakenham was, owing to personal reasons, in a peculiarly difficult position with regard to going frequently between the capital and Tamatave, which was the cause of his having a permanent residence at the latter place. He trusted these explanations would be satisfactory to the commercial world, and that it would not be thought that the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was correct in saying that he had at any time underrated the importance of the trade of Madagascar. The hon. Member for Eye had spoken of the trade of Madagascar as being £2,000,000. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No.] Those were his figures, and he appeared to use them as a convenient mode of expression with regard to trade in other countries; but he did not think the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Whitley), who used his figures more carefully, would be likely to fall into the same error.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the noble Lord had repeated a statement with regard to himself after he had denied it. He had never, either inside or outside that House, stated that the trade of Madagascar was £2,000,000, or any other number of millions. The statement of the noble Lord was, therefore, quite inaccurate. He challenged the noble Lord to show that he had ever stated the trade in any part of the world to be £2,000,000; so that the noble Lord had been guilty of a sheer invention, which he seemed anxious to maintain without any proof whatever. Again, the noble Lord was unjust in accusing him of wanting to raise a debate on Madagascar affairs on this Vote. It was of no use telling the Committee that there was a Consul who was going about the Island; their wish was to ascertain what that Consul was doing, and what the Government were doing to restore the £750,000 of trade which had been destroyed by the French operations in Madagascar. What were the Government doing, either of themselves or through their Consul, to get rid of the miserable state of things in the Island, which was causing considerable loss to the community. He should like to hear the opinion of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), who, at least, knew what he was talking about, on the information which the noble Lord had given him; and he would like to know whether the commercial men concerned in this trade of £750,000 were satisfied with the statement of the noble Lord? He had had a large number of communications from persons interested in this matter, and he thought he should be justified in moving that Progress be reported after the statement of the noble Lord; and, at all events, he had a right to call upon the noble Lord to withdraw the statement that he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had said the trade of Madagascar was £2,000,000, instead of £750,000, as he had said.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he could give no further information beyond what he had from time to time given. The Foreign Office had received no special information. If the hon. Member never said £2,000,000, he would at once accept that explanation and withdraw the statement he had made; but he had made it because he had seen that figure attributed to the hon. Member in various speeches during the Recess.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the point he had put with regard to Mr. Power was, whether the Government admitted the substantial accuracy of Mr. Power's statements? Considerable blame had been thrown upon Mr. Power; and what he wished to know was, whether the noble Lord had any proof in support of what he had said, or whether he was willing to admit that Mr. Power deserved general credit?

MR. COURTNEY, replying to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), explained that it was represented to the Treasury last year that it was necessary to increase the salaries of certain officials in Asia Minor, and they had consented to give an extra amount.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £25,670 (including a Supplementary sum of £11,080), to complete the sum for the Suppression of the Slave Trade.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked for some information in explanation of the large increase in the amount allowed for some places?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had already answered this question in one of the Egyptian debates in connection with the subject of slavery. Two or three changes had been made. The Home Government would now be responsible for the whole of the arrangements connected with Zanzibar, and the Indian Government for those at Muskat. Formerly, the Home Government contributed half the amount for Muscat, and the Indian Government half at Zanzibar. At the same time, the number of Consuls on the Coast had been increased, amongst those appointed being those Consuls whose names and appointments had attracted the attention of the hon. and gallant Member. The arrangement with regard to the Postal Service, which had really been a Slave Trade Service, was no longer renewed as a Postal Service, but as a Slave Trade Service. That was to say, whereas formerly the whole of the money which now appeared under the contract mentioned in this Vote appeared as a Postal arrangement, it had now been taken over by the Foreign Office, because it was, in reality, an arrangement with regard to the Slave Trade. That arrangement, it was believed, would materially contribute to the suppression of the Slave Trade in those regions.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked where were the headquarters of the four new Consuls? It was said to be on the African mainland; but that was a very wide description. It was important that the public should know where they were stationed.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE replied, that the Coast was divided into four districts, each under the charge of one of these Consuls. The Consuls would not be stationary, but would move about. That was an essential part of the arrangement.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £4,420, to complete the sum for Tonnage Bounties, &c. and Liberated African Department.

(5.) £2,005, to complete the sum for the Suez Canal (British Directors).

(6.) £20,951, to complete the sum for Colonies, Grants in Aid.

(7.) £17,300, to complete the sum for Subsidies to Telegraph Companies.

(8.) £15,000, for Cyprus, Grant in Aid.

MR. MOLLOY said, he would like to know how long this iniquitous charge was to last?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, it would last as long as the deficiency lasted. The deficiency was only £15,000.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

MR. MOLLOY said, the Vote asked for was £30,000; but the hon. Gentleman said the deficiency was only £15,000. This was a remnant of the Tory policy, for which the country had now to pay.

MR. COURTNEY said, this was the apparent deficiency in September last; but it was not so large now.

MR. WARTON said, the deficiency was at one time £90,000; but, owing to the increased prosperity of the Island under their rule, there was a prospect of the Island returning a surplus.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £13,832, for Subsidy to Castle Mail Packets Company.

(10.) £284,825, to complete the sum for Science and Art Department.

(11.) £102,133, to complete the sum for British Museum.

MR. WARTON asked whether the authorities would not arrange to let the public see this Museum in the evening?

MR. COURTNEY said, the Trustees of the Museum had considered that matter, but had not seen their way to carry out the suggestion, being very apprehensive as to the risk of fire. They had, however, to some extent, introduced the electric light into the Reading Room.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £8,500 (including a Supplementary sum of £2,500), to complete the sum for University Colleges, Wales.

(13.) £4,252, to complete the sum for Deep Sea Exploring Expedition (Report).

(14.) £255, to complete the sum for Transit of Venus.

MR. WARTON asked whether this Vote was the end of the expenses connected with this matter?

MR. COURTNEY said, he believed it was.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £18,031, to complete the sum for Universities, &c. in Scotland.

(16.) £1,700, to complete the sum for National Gallery, &c. in Scotland.

(17.) £5,000, for Scottish Historical Portrait Gallery.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. BIGGAR said, the Irish Members had not caused any serious delay in regard to the Irish Votes; and he thought the Government might consent to postpone this Vote, especially as they had made great progress in the last half hour. This was the night of the Bank Holiday, and it would be exceedingly difficult for Members to get cabs. He begged to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. COURTNEY said, he entirely sympathized with the hon. Member with regard to the difficulty of getting cabs; but if the Committee would take this Vote, he did not intend to propose the Vote for the Queen's Colleges.

MR. HEALY said, a number of Irish Members had gone home on the understanding that this Vote would not be taken that night. It seemed to him to be a fatal mistake for them to go home at any time. It had been distinctly understood, as the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had said, that no other Irish Votes would be taken that night; and therefore he thought the Government ought not to take this Vote now. It would be much better to discuss it in daylight.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought it would be much better not to discuss it at all.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was no reason to anticipate very much discussion; but the Vote was of a contentious nature.

MR. HEALY asked if the hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Vote if the Irish Members agreed to the Votes for the Endowed Schools Commissioners (Ireland), and the National Gallery (Ireland)?

MR. COURTNEY consented to withdraw the Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(18.) £470, to complete the sum for the Endowed Schools Commissioners, Ireland.

(19.) £1,441, to complete the sum for the National Gallery of Ireland.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

MR. HEALY: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to take the Report of Supply of Saturday I shall not object.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Postponed Resolutions [1st August] considered.

MR. HEALY: I should like now to repeat the question I put to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary the other evening on the subject of visits to prisoners in Irish gaols. Is the existing rule to be done away with, and is the discretionary power to be taken from the Governors of gaols? I put the question to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Walker): I have written about this matter, but, as yet, have received no information.

Resolutions agreed to.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (SUSPENSION OF ELECTIONS) BILL.—[BILL 314.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WARTON said, he must really object to this Bill being read a second time. In 1880, it would be remembered, there were several Royal Commissions appointed for the purpose of inquiring into electoral corruption. Seven boroughs were affected in the result—boroughs returning two Members each, so that 14 Members were involved. Of these 14 Members, 11 were Liberals, and three Conservatives. Bills had been brought forward in previous Sessions suspending the elections. The reason he opposed the present measure was because it was not a repetition of the Bills of previous years, as it should be. He, in his ignorance, trusting the Attorney General, had assumed that the hon. and learned Member intended to treat the House justly and fairly in this matter; but the hon. and learned Member had moved the second reading by merely formally raising his hat, implying that there was no occasion for him to make any statement. But this Bill was different from others which had been brought in before. He was not going into the Constitutional point, as that would take a long time to argue; but, shortly, he would say he doubted very much whether it was a Constitutional practice to suspend elections in boroughs without knowing what they were going to do with those boroughs. The boroughs might differ in their degrees of guilt—some might deserve disfranchisement, others might deserve partial disfranchisement; whilst it might be found consistent with justice to treat others in a different manner. There had been three Acts passed, one in 1881, another in 1882, and the third in 1883. There had been some excuse for the Act of 1881, as it was not desirable to have the elections taking place in the Recess; but desirable that Parliament should have reserved to it the right of saying, some day after the first meeting of Parliament in 1882, what should be done with the boroughs. But, as year after year slipped by, there was less and less excuse, for the Government had had ample time to deal with the boroughs. Not only could they have dealt with them if they had thought fit, but every year was an increased punishment to the boroughs, as they were all the time deprived of their legislative rights. It was, particularly, a punishment to those boroughs which were not so guilty as the others. They all knew what had happened in the case of Wigan, which now enjoyed its proper number of Representatives. With regard to the terms of the present Bill, he had thought them the same as the terms of the Bills which had preceded this measure until he had come to read them—showing how important it was to carefully scrutinize every Bill brought forward by the Government. He found a very great and important difference between this Bill and those of the three previous years. In every one of the three previous years the provision had been that the suspension was not to go beyond the first seven days of the Sitting of Parliament “next year.” The only difference in the three Bills had been the correction in the third—that of 1883—of a slight inelegance of phraseology, which the Attorney General had adhered to as long as he could. The Government, he repeated, had had less and less excuse on account of want of time to make up their minds what to do with the boroughs. Still, they had not made up their minds; and now they were not content with limiting the Bill to the next Session of Parliament—which, ordinarily, would be in 1885—but they inserted these words in the measure—“Until after the expiration of the present Parliament.” The Parliament might last until 1887. The present Government, with their usual contempt for the Constitution, had more than once suggested the idea that Parliament might last beyond six years. They might find it convenient to take a seventh Session, otherwise they might find it impossible to pass a complete Reform Bill. The present Parliament had only lasted four years and a-half, so that it was possible for it to go on until April, 1887, meeting two full Sessions after the half Session which it was intended to hold in the Autumn. This extension of time in the Bill was what he bitterly complained of. The measure should be in accordance with previous Bills. What was the motive for extending the period? If they looked at the boroughs affected by the Bill, they would find that their populations went from 14,885—which was the population of Sandwich—to 35,570—the population of Macclesfield—before the General Election. Now, if they allowed an increase of, say, 10 per cent, or even 15 per cent, for the years which had elapsed since the General Election, it was clear that none of the places would have reached a population of 50,000; and it might, therefore, be that the Government intended to disfranchise the boroughs by a side wind—by proposing in the Redistribution Bill, or some other measure, that no place of less than 50,000 inhabitants should return a Member to Parliament, or, it might be, two Members. [Cries of “Divide!”]

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. WARTON said, that, having made his point, he did not wish to take up any further the time of the House. He would merely move that the Bill be read a second time that day month.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," in order to add, at the end of the Question, the words "upon this day month."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) thought that when the hon. and learned Gentleman had the alteration in the Bill explained to him he would have no objection to the measure. In the previous Bills, the Government had simply prevented the issue of Writs for these boroughs during the Vacation. They had provided that they should not issue until seven days after the re-assembling of Parliament in the next year of meeting. This year, however, Parliament was about to be prorogued under special circumstances; and if the ordinary course had been adopted they would have interfered with the Constitutional right of Parliament to issue a Writ between October and February. If they suspended the right until October only, however, in that month, or in the Autumn Session, they might have to introduce another Bill to suspend the issue of Writs again until seven days after the meeting of the next Session. If they did that, and if a Dissolution were to occur, they would have taken away the right of the boroughs to have any return at all. All they had done had been to alter the phraseology of the measure to suit the circumstances of the present case; and they could not have done other than they had done without violating certain great principles which they were bound to maintain.

CAPTAIN AYLMER objected to the alteration from the principle of the previous Bills. Certain persons very much interested in this subject had been communicated with, and had expressed objection to the change, being of opinion that it would not be wise to go beyond seven days after the next meeting of Parliament. The principle which had been adopted by Parliament all through should be adhered to, and he trusted the Attorney General would alter the Bill accordingly. If he did not, he might experience some difficulty in passing it through Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the persons interested in the boroughs which were not fully represented in the House had been spoken to on the subject, and had willingly accepted the principle of the Bill on its being properly explained. The hon. Member for West Cheshire (Mr. H. Tollemache), for instance, had removed his blocking Notice from the Paper. The boroughs would be safer, and would have greater rights under the Bill in its present form, than under it in any other form. If hon. Members interested in these boroughs were against the principle of the Bill, he would promise to alter it.

Question put.

EGYPT—POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: May I ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is in his power to give us the information he promised as to the important step which Her Majesty's Government contemplate taking with reference to Egypt?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I stated yesterday that Her Majesty's Government were fully alive to the responsibility imposed upon them in consequence of the failure of the Conference to come to an agreement. The noble Marquess is quite right in assuming that I expressed a hope that I should be able to state to-day the preliminary step which Her Majesty's Government wish to take in this matter. I have now to state that we have obtained Her Majesty's gracious approval to appoint Lord Northbrook to go to the East in order to report and advise Her Majesty's Government as to the counsels which they should give to the Egyptian Government in the present circumstances, and also with regard to any measures necessary to be taken in connection therewith. I am happy to say that my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has consented to undertake these duties. I may, perhaps, conveniently add that Sir Evelyn Baring, after the discharge of his duties, both in this country and in Egypt, to the complete satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government, has been strongly advised by his medical adviser to take considerable leave of absence; but, with his usual public spirit, he has agreed to shorten that leave in order that he may accompany Lord Northbrook to Egypt.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

(The Earl of Northbrook.)

(NO. 212.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clauses 1 to 4 severally agreed to.

Clause 5 (Expense in excess of maximum to be illegal practice).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he rose to appeal to the Government to make some attestation in this clause, the object of which was to prevent undue expenditure in municipal elections. The object of the clause was a very desirable one; but, in order that the clause might work satisfactorily, it would not be wise to press it too far. There were certain matters connected with these elections with regard to which a moderate expenditure would be perfectly legitimate. Thus it was necessary that the names of the candidates should be made known to the electors, and that their views with regard to local policy should be ascertained. It was also necessary that a certain limited amount of money should be expended upon the hire of halls in which speeches could be made. Such matters as these would not involve very large expenses, certainly; but it was necessary that they should be incurred, or the electors would be restricted to the names of those men they knew most about, and thus the freedom of choice would be very considerably diminished. In these circumstances, he thought that the candidates should be allowed to expend a sufficient sum to enable them to bring their views before the minds and judgment of the electors, although he agreed that the sum to be spent should not be excessive, or so large as to frighten away candidates of moderate means. The House of Commons had limited the sum to be expended to such an extent that it would be almost impossible to conduct a municipal election under this Bill without infringing the law. Instead of the sum being £20 for the first 500 electors, and 3*d.* for each elector beyond that number, he suggested that the amount should be £20 for the first 1,000 electors, and a similar sum for each 1,000, or part of 1,000, beyond. The effect of this would be to raise the amount by about 50 per cent. He hoped that the noble Earl would not refuse to allow the alteration, so that the Act should properly work.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK remarked that this was rather a matter for the consideration of the other House of Parliament than for that House. In the other House the discussion on the point had been adjourned in order that Members might have an opportunity of ascertaining the views of their constituents with regard to it. The general feeling of the House of Commons, as far as he had means of judging, had been in favour of the sum as proposed in the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he was not particularly wedded to the arrangement he had suggested; but he wished, at all events, to mitigate the severity of the Bill. He, therefore, proposed to insert £25 instead of £20 in line 13, and that would have the effect of raising the sum allowed by £5. He understood that this sum met with considerable support in the other House. He thought that, even with this alteration, there would be considerable difficulty in making the Bill work.

Amendments moved,

In page 3, line 14, leave out ("five hundred") and insert ("one thousand"); in line 15, leave out ("threepence") and insert ("twenty pounds"); leave out ("each elector") and insert ("on every thousand electors or part of a thousand"); and leave out ("five hundred") and insert ("thousand.") — (The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, that he had no objection to the alteration.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 39, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 40 (Act not to extend to Scotland or Ireland).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he proposed to restore the Bill to the position it was in when introduced by the Government, by inserting "Ireland." The question of its exclusion was not even discussed in the Grand Committee; but that portion of the Kingdom was at the last moment excluded from the Bill, he supposed to pacify the extreme Party of Irish Members. He wished to know whether they were to have an absolute veto in regard to all Bills affecting Ireland? He thought that the conduct of the Government in this matter might be stated to be a cowardly surrender to a small irreconcilable clique of the falsely-called Nationalist Party in the other House.

Amendment moved, in page 23, line 23, leave out ("or Ireland.") — (The Earl of Milltown.)

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he could not accept the Amendment. If it was carried it would be quite impossible to pass the Bill this Session.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, his wish was merely to restore the Bill to its original Governmental state. He did not wish to cause the loss of the Bill, and would, therefore, withdraw his Amendment; but, at the same time, he protested against the pusillanimous conduct of the Government, who might easily restore the Bill to its original form if they thought proper to do so.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he rose to move, as an additional clause, at the end of the Bill—"This Act shall continue in force to the end of the year 1886, and no longer." He thought there was good reason for making this a temporary Bill. The Bill dealing with corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections was temporary, and, therefore, always open to revision; and this was not so perfect, nor was it upon matter they were so intimately acquainted with, that it ought to be removed from the category of temporary Bills. They had just heard from the noble Lord that an Amendment he desired to insert, and considered important, could not be introduced, because time did not permit of it; and that surely was a reason for making the Bill temporary. On general grounds a Bill of this importance, which did not concern the House of Commons only, and which was produced very late in the year, ought to be passed in such a form as to give every facility for amendment if required.

After Clause 40, moved to insert the following clause:—

"This Act shall continue in force to the end of the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, and no longer."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he was sorry he could not ask their Lordships to accept the Amendment of the noble Marquess. The reason why the Parliamentary Elections Bill was made temporary was because of the jealousy which the House of Commons rightly felt concerning legislation which affected their own Body; and for that reason the Acts of Parliament passed, providing for the trial of Election Petitions, were made temporary, so that they might from time to time consider the expediency of continuing them or not. The same reason did not apply to this Bill. It dealt with the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882, which was not a temporary but a permanent Act; and, therefore, this should also be permanent. The noble Marquess seemed to think some greater power of amendment would be gained by putting in this clause than by excluding it. He did not understand that any additional facilities would be so required; the measure would be as capable of amendment as any other Act of Parliament by a Bill being introduced in the usual way to amend it. It would, moreover, be undesirable to introduce the precedent of making Bills temporary because they came up late in the Session.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that in the 2nd clause of this Bill it was stated that corrupt practices were to mean treating, undue influence, and bribery at elections, which were defined in the 1st Schedule; and in Part I. of that Schedule was incorporated a portion of the Corrupt Practices Act, which was a temporary measure. If, therefore, that Act expired, a certain portion of the present Bill would remain suspended in the air without any meaning. It was true that if the Bill was permanent amending Bills might be introduced; but it required something more even than willingness on the part of the House of Commons to pass amending Bills. The proposal he had made was a much more simple way of settling the question.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that the noble Marquess appeared to be in error in his judgment as to what would happen if the Corrupt Practices Act were not renewed. A portion of that Act was incorporated into the present Bill for the purposes of definition; and for that purpose it was immaterial whether the Act was re-enacted or lapsed. Neither was it the fact that it would be easier to amend the Bill if made temporary, and afterwards included in an Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, for it would be impossible to engraft Amendments upon it in those circumstances, and an amending Act would have to be introduced, precisely in the same way as if the Bill were not made temporary.

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES BILL.

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

(NO. 233.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that a Committee had been appointed to consider the manner in which the Office of Public Prosecutor was carried on. It had been found that the existing system, which was tentative in its character, required considerable modification. The Public Prosecutor, although he decided what prosecutions should be taken up, took no practical part in their conduct. That duty was performed by the Solicitor to the Treasury, and the Committee had reported that it would be expedient on several grounds—among others on the grounds of expense and efficiency—that the duty of deciding in what cases the State should undertake prosecutions should be united in the same Department as that which carried on those prosecutions. The best possible plan would be to unite in one Office the present Office of Public Prosecutor and the Treasury Solicitor, and to hand both Offices over to the Solicitor to the Treasury, and that was what the Bill proposed to do.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN remarked that the present Office of Public Prosecutor was somewhat of a sinecure, and had only been created a short time. He wished to know if it was intended to give the holder a retiring allowance?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: There is no provision in the Bill to that effect.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH inquired what penalties were attached to the non-performance, by the Chief Constables, of the duty of reporting cases, as required by the Bill?

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that such a duty would entail great extra labour, seeing that there were 50,000 or 60,000 cases annually.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the Chief Constables already had to make Reports.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: If the noble Lord (Lord Ellenborough) had read the Bill, he would have seen that no penalty attached to the non-performance of the duty.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS BILL.—(No. 239.)
(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, remarked that it was based on the unanimous recommendations of a Departmental Committee, which investigated the subject of criminal lunatics about two years ago. The Bill had been amended by the Standing Committee on Law during its passage through the House of Commons in order to meet the objections raised by an hon. Member belonging to the Party opposite, and, as it now stood, it passed with the unanimous approval of the other House. The main object of the Bill was to provide for the maintenance of criminal lunatics, and also for the maintenance of persons of that class who might, after the expiration of their sentences, become pauper lunatics. The measure also made it clear how the expense of maintaining them was to be borne. The noble Earl concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he was willing to admit that the Bill made no change in the existing law, which was somewhat objectionable. One of the clauses of the Bill provided that in cases of prisoners under sentence of death the Secretary of State, if it was represented to him that the prisoner was insane, should appoint two or more medical practitioners, who should report to him in writing as to the mental condition of a prisoner, and the majority of them might certify in writing that the prisoner was insane, and in such cases he was bound to practically relieve the prisoner and cause him to be sent to a lunatic asylum. As in cases of murder the question of the insanity of the accused was, or might be, always inquired into at the trial, he objected to the clause, for nothing could be more undesirable than that a subsequent investigation of the same subject should be held in camera by the Secretary of State. Such an investigation might upset the verdict of a jury, with the result that a criminal who richly deserved the extreme penalty of the law would be committed instead to a lunatic asylum. It was easy to get two doctors to certify that any man in the world was insane. They had heard a great deal lately of the way in which a question of sanity or insanity was decided by two medical men; and he, therefore, thought that the evidence of two doctors ought not to be regarded as conclusive. Those who sought to reform the law in this respect desired, not that the evidence of medical practitioners should be rejected, but that it should be tested and weighed, and treated as evidence, not as a final and conclusive judgment. He objected also to that clause of the Bill which provided that those criminal lunatics whose term of sentence had expired, but who still continued insane, were to be treated as pauper lunatics. It seemed rather hard on the ordinary pauper lunatics that these atrocious criminals should be sent to herd among them.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that the clause referred to by the noble Earl at the commencement of his remarks was nothing more or less than a re-enactment of the existing law.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

(The Lord Sudeley.)

(NO. 236.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord Sudeley.)

LORD DENMAN moved the insertion of a clause proposed on the 23rd of August, 1881, and on the 22nd of August, 1883, only altering "widows and spinsters," to "all women not legally disqualified."

Moved, after Clause 2, to add the following Clause:—

"Provided that the Act 35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, continued as aforesaid, shall be hereby extended so as to admit all women not legally disqualified who have the same qualification as the present electors for counties and boroughs to vote for the election of Members of Parliament for counties and boroughs."—(The Lord Denman.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that such an Amendment would be out of Order, as it was not possible to amend any of the Acts included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill.

LORD DENMAN said, that if every expiring law were to be unalterable in a Continuance Bill, a dangerous principle would be established.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed.

The Earl of Milltown

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL AND REDISTRIBUTION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES), who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to say, in rising to ask, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in accordance with the strongly-expressed wish of this House and the precedents of other Reform Bills, to introduce proper provisions for redistribution in the Representation of the People Bill in the next Session of Parliament? that it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that a fortnight ago he called their attention to the only manner in which the extension of the franchise could be satisfactorily dealt with. On that occasion he had endeavoured, as far as possible, not to say anything of a Party character. He had then suggested that, as had been the case in all former Reform Bills, redistribution should be connected with the Reform Bill itself, and he believed that that was the only reasonable way of dealing with the subject. If the Government wanted to represent the people they must take care how they framed their Redistribution Bill, and see that interests which it was desirable to protect were protected. He was not at all disposed to imagine that noble Lords opposite or the Prime Minister were disinclined to introduce a fair measure, for the reputation and character of the Prime Minister in the future would be largely at stake. His own opinion was that it was desirable that proper provisions for redistribution should be introduced in the Representation of the People Bill itself. It was universally admitted that such a course was desirable and necessary, and such an admission was an admission that one Bill ought to be connected with the other. The matter must be dealt with as a whole; it was objectionable in every way to treat of it in parts, and it was most important that they should have some assurance in regard to the manner in which the Government were about to proceed. It was by the want of this Bill that the whole of the agitation against that House had been occasioned, and everyone must feel that to ask the House to pass one Bill without having the other before it was unjust to that House and inexpedient having regard to the well-being of the country. If that were so, the charges brought against that House were made on nothing less than false pretences; they did a great deal of harm, and caused a great deal of discontent towards the Constitution of the country. It was reasonable that they should have some assurance from the Government; because if they had not been able to make up their minds as to what the scheme of redistribution should be, they ought not to complain that their Lordships also desired to suspend their judgment, and if they had it would be most useful for the Government to make a declaration of their intention now, so that the House might know what it had to meet on re-assembling.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he sympathized most heartily with the object of the noble Earl; and if he thought a favourable answer awaited him would not have interposed in the discussion. But doubting, as he did, that an affirmative answer would be given to the question, he could not think it desirable at present to press the Government to state definitely what course they had decided upon taking in October. The attempts which had been made at conciliation had failed, and they were now in an agitation which, however much it might be deprecated, was not wholly on one side. There had been great demonstrations in London, in Manchester, and in Birmingham on one side; but he was credibly informed that there would be in the course of this week a counter-demonstration of 30,000 men at the Pomona Gardens, at Manchester, and he knew as a fact that on the 23rd of this month 100,000 Yorkshiremen would be brought together to support the action of their Lordships' House. Therefore, it was quite evident that public opinion was very much divided; and, under these circumstances, he believed it was not desirable for the Government at the present time to commit themselves to any course hostile to conciliation or compromise. There were, he thought, still elements afloat which might, when Parliament re-assembled in October, lead to a reconsideration by both sides of the position in which they found themselves. The Government might then be induced to adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl, or some other plan might be devised which it would be not only constitutionally right, but patriotic for the Government to follow. Under these circumstances, he hoped the noble Earl would not, by forcing a declaration from the Government, shut the door against all possibility of compromise.

LORD LAMINGTON said, that the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss) had again played the part of the candid friend of both sides; and, according to him, black was not so very black, nor white so white as it appeared. The noble Earl had alluded to possible demonstrations in the future; but he (Lord Lamington) must say that these demonstrations, whether on the one side or the other, were very much to be deprecated. This was a question of too much importance to be disposed of in the way suggested by the noble Earl. He (Lord Lamington) was of opinion that the only way to solve the difficulty was by the Government bringing in with the Franchise Bill a Redistribution Bill. He had as much respect for the rights of the House of Commons as for those of that House; and he had reason to have, for he had spent a large portion of his life in the Lower House. But their Lordships' House ought to have a chance, as they had a right, of considering the whole scheme. He was also strongly of opinion that this was a question on which the country should be consulted. They should not forget that the Bill was one for the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 of the people, and that the question had been described by a Member of the Government as the greatest that had arisen since the Revolution of 1689. It was said that the question had been decided at the last election; but if that had been so, why, in the name of fortune, did not the Government introduce their Franchise Bill in 1880, 1881, 1882, or 1883. But they did not do so, though they now complained that some 2,000,000 of electors were being kept out of the franchise. This was the first time that he had spoken on the subject; but he must say it was a most extraordinary thing that the Bill should have been delayed for the back end of this Parliament when it was, as the Government said, so absolutely essential. That House ought to have fair time to consider the whole question. This was the time for the Government to say what course they would take, and thus clear up the matter and prevent this disgraceful agitation going on.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am afraid I cannot boast of being in the position of my noble Friend opposite in not having spoken on this subject before; but I find myself in a very embarrassing dilemma. I am required to meet the wishes of two noble Earls. One noble Earl asks me a question, and very naturally expects me to give an answer to it, while the other noble Earl asks me not to answer it, and gives his reasons for offering that advice. I think, perhaps, that the best course for me to take in this dilemma is a middle course—namely, to say that I have really nothing to add to the statements that have already been made in both Houses upon this subject.

LORD DENMAN: No one is more interested in the question of Reform than I. In 1821, on the transfer proposed from Grampound to Leeds, household suffrage for those paying "scot and lot" was preferred as the more Constitutional franchise, and Lords Althorpe and Milton, Attorney General Scarlett, and Mr. Denman, voted with some others in opposition to Lord John Russell's £10 rental; but neither succeeded. In the same year Mr. Lambton got printed in Hansard's Debates his Reform Bill. It contained a blank Schedule for redistribution. In 1859 a suffrage for counties and boroughs, with an equal £10 rental, was proposed. There was also a redistribution of seats. But the Resolution of Lord John Russell, which was almost impracticable, destroyed the Bill on the 31st of March. On the 12th of August I blamed the Ministry—who came in upon Reform—for not having brought in a Bill, and engaged, in the presence of the noble Earl, now Secretary of State for India, to bring in the same Bill, which was capable of any modification and amendment, and I commend the speech of Mr. Disraeli, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to the consideration of your Lordships. It foretold the delay which occurred between 1859 and 1866. I said I had not latterly agreed to the Amendment of Earl Cairns because I thought it unnecessary, as the Bill of 1859 showed an earnest desire to assimilate the franchise in counties and boroughs. But the question slept for seven years, and in 1866 two Bills were brought in, and the Government went out upon the Redi-tribution Bill. The present Premier boasted of his measure, which was a very trumpety one, letting in small shopkeepers, and not giving the franchise—as proposed in 1821 for Leeds—to householders, who knew, in the words of the Earl of Malmesbury, in 1867, that they had a Queen. I am against Autumn Sessions, for the one in 1820 for the Bill of Pains and Penalties was a disastrous failure, and the one as to cloture failed, for 40 Members might at any time defeat it. My Motion for the second reading after six months appeared to me the best course. There was no time for a Conference, much less for a free Conference, on the Franchise Bill; and the Bill was, as against the House of Lords, quite stereotyped, from the refusal in "another place" of any Amendment. In 1832, my father, on addressing the voters at Nottingham, was greeted with hisses, groans, and imprecations. Halts were exhibited round men's necks, and there were loud shouts of "No Denman!" "Burke him!" "Bristol him!" The same expression is in an interesting work called A Stroke of an Afghan Knife. Some culprits said of themselves they were outlaws living with halts round their necks; they must keep together or be slain. At Derby a gentleman proposing the House of Lords was compared to Cæsar, quoting, "Because he was ambitious, I slew him." This proposer was Premier in an amateur debating society in Derby; but when the question of the abolition of the House of Lords was debated, this Premier was in a minority, and had to resign. The present Government, though beaten on the visitation of secret societies by the police of Ireland, and on the Affirmation Bill, refused to resign; and it appears to me that though on each of these occasions they might have called for a Dissolution, yet they would have no right, if again in a minority, to press their advice for Dissolution on the Crown. Three measures were all despatched on the 10th of July, which The Times and The Morning Post proclaimed beforehand!! Resolutions have no force, and law must prevail.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) said, that the noble Earl opposite had given no answer to his Question, which was, whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce proper provisions for redi-tribution in the Representation of the People Bill in the next Session of Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE: In reply to the noble Earl, I may state that it is the intention of the Government to reintroduce the Franchise Bill in the state in which it is now in this House.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): Then all I can say is that if that is the intention of the Government, it amounts to a most deliberate proposal to keep up an unfair and unjust charge against this House, in order, I suppose, to serve some Party purpose. To say that they will bring in again in the same way the Bill which this House has refused this Session to consider because it was an imperfect measure—to say now that they will take care only to introduce the same imperfect measure, is only to invite this House to take the same course it did on the last occasion.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It is to be hoped that this House will think before it takes the same course. This matter may be stated in a few words. The Government, who are responsible for the conduct of Business, are of opinion that the proper and only practicable way of accomplishing the two objects in view, both of which they have at heart, is to take the course which they have taken. The House of Commons, by an enormous majority, is of the same opinion; but your Lordships, by a smaller majority, are of a different opinion. When those who entertain the opinion of your Lordships are responsible for the conduct of affairs, no doubt they will act on the opinion they entertain; but, as long as we are responsible for the conduct of affairs, we must claim the right of acting upon the opinions which we entertain.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The doctrine of the noble and learned Earl, as I understand it, is that whenever Ministers of the Crown and the House of Commons are agreed, the House of Lords is bound to yield. As the House of Commons is always agreed with the Ministry, and must, from the very nature of the case, always be so, we have come to this condition of things—that there is only one Legislative Body, and the whole government of the country, executive and administrative, is in its hands. To that doctrine, laid down by a Minister of the Crown, I hope your Lordships will never yield; and whatever may be the course you may think it right to take, I hope that you will never allow it to be influenced by the manifest and almost offensive attempt at dictation which the particular procedure selected by the Government indicates.

EARL GRANVILLE: I can only enter my protest against the converse doctrine—that the House of Commons is always to yield whenever the House of Lords thinks differently.

LORD BRABOURNE said, he did not think it wise to apply the word unfair to Her Majesty's Government. He protested, however, against the language used by some of Her Majesty's Ministers out-of-doors. He wished to draw their Lordships' attention particularly to the language reported in that morning's papers as having been used yesterday by a Cabinet Minister, which, he believed, was much more ill-appropriate and much more unfair than anything which had been said that night. That Minister was reported to have said—"The Tories are afraid of the franchise. They only wish for redistribution in order to defeat the franchise." When a Cabinet Minister used language of that kind to his fellow-countrymen, it showed that they were only at the beginning of an agitation to which the Government were lending themselves, and of the consequences of which they could have no idea.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the latter part of the speech of the noble Lord removed all expectation of his support which the opening sentence might have led him to form. The right hon. Gentleman, to whose speech the noble Lord had adverted, would, no doubt, feel very sensible indeed of the reproof which had been administered to him, and would take notice of it.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, that if the Government would adjourn Parliament to some time in October, and in the meantime take the necessary steps towards, and consider the question of redistribution, then the Franchise Bill, which was not dead, and the Redistribution Bill could be considered, if not passed together in one Session. Pursuing such a course would show that the Government were sincere in their intention to dispose of both portions of the question.

PUBLIC HEALTH—DRAINAGE OF LONDON.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FORBES, in rising to call attention to the drainage of London, referred to the presence of cholera near our shores, and to the desirableness of some steps being taken by the authorities to carry out the best practicable scheme of drainage they could. He appealed to their Lordships to take action in the matter, not only for their own sakes, but particularly for the sake of the toiling masses in London, who were necessarily confined to the City for the greater part of the year, and whose home surroundings scarcely ever changed. At this time of the year, when the wealthier classes were leaving the City for the country, he thought their Lordships could not do anything better than show their sympathy for the large masses of the people who were left behind in the town, by endeavouring to secure for the Metropolis a better system of drainage than it now possessed. The House of Commons had recently formed a small Committee to investigate the subject of the ventilation of that House, and the cause of certain inodorous smells which had been found to prevail in the House for some time previously. The Committee had reported to the effect that the smell was owing to the burning of bricks at Battersea. Their Lordships would remember that during the debate late at night on the Franchise Bill a disagreeable smell had prevailed in their Lordships' Chamber; and, however it might be accounted for, whether from the burning of bricks, or from any other similar cause, he believed the real source of the mischief was the defective drainage of London. He would now call attention to the condition of the Thames. It had been stated on competent authority that the sewage which was poured into the river was beginning to make its way up the river in a sort of permanent form. The state of the Thames in its lower reaches was, in his opinion, simply horrible, and was the result of the present system of drainage, which consisted simply in pouring the sewage into the Thames at a time when the tide was running out; but it had to be remembered that a large portion of the sewage was brought back by the inflow of the tide; and it must be evident to all those who considered the question that this system of drainage, always objectionable, could not, in any sense, be accepted as a solution of the question. It was computed that 164,000,000 gallons of liquid sewage were poured into the river daily, and, in order to deal effectively with such a problem as this, some remedy was certainly needed. He had heard of two schemes by which the sewage of London might be dealt with—the Hendon scheme and the Aylesbury scheme. The Aylesbury Company had made an offer to the Metropolitan Board of Works to take over the sewage of London for the purpose of dealing with it in as innocuous a manner as possible; but that offer had been curtly refused. He thought the refusal of the Metropolitan Board of Works was worthy of their attention, and called, to some extent, for a remonstrance. By the method adopted at Aylesbury, the sewage was deodorized before entering the river, and poured in in a purer state than the River Pollution Commission required. In his opinion, the Aylesbury scheme possessed enormous advantages over any other in dealing with the difficulty felt; and it seemed to him to offer a perfect solution of the question of how the drainage of our large towns should be dealt with.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he must compliment the noble Lord on the zeal, ability, and research, which he had brought to bear in the treatment of this question, and also on the ability with which he had called the attention of their Lordships to the question. He was glad to have this opportunity of assuring the noble Lord that Her Majesty's Government were fully alive to the dangers to which he had referred, and that the Metropolitan Board of Works were anxious to bring about some amelioration of the state of things which at present prevailed. The question of the pollution of the lower Thames by sewage from the outfalls at Crossness and other places was first brought under the notice of the Secretary of State on the 19th of January, 1882, by the Port of London Sanitary Authority, who asked the Secretary of State to take (under the Metropolis Local Management Act of 1858, c. 104, s. 31), immediate remedial measures in the matter. On receipt of this complaint the Secretary of State called upon the Corporation Sanitary Committee to furnish the evidence upon which their complaint was based. In reply, the Corporation forwarded a printed Report of their Sanitary Committee, containing analyses of samples of the water, and stating that—

“The river in the vicinity of the outfalls was always in a condition most unsanitary, and that in times of drought and great heat its very prejudicial effect upon the public health was obvious.”

This Report was immediately forwarded by the Secretary of State, together with the first letter of the City Corporation, to the Metropolitan Board of Works for observation, February 10, 1882. On the 6th of March the Metropolitan Board reported that they had referred the matter to a Sub-Committee for inquiry and report. On the 29th of March the Town Clerk asked, for the information of the Port of London Sanitary Committee, what had been done. He was informed by the Home Office that they were in communication with the Metropolitan Board, and his letter and the reply were sent to the Board as a reminder. On the 4th of April the Metropolitan Board wrote to say that they were not able then to make a complete reply to the case, as they wished to continue investigations during the hot weather, when the river was alleged to be at its worst. But they were already of opinion, so far as they had gone, that the complaints as to the pollution and effect on public health were, if not totally unfounded, greatly exaggerated. This reply was communicated to the Port of London Sanitary Authority. A fortnight elapsed, and the Secretary of State then wrote, April 18, and demanded a definite answer from the Board within a fortnight from that date, so that he could come to a decision as to the question. To this the Metropolitan Board replied on the 5th of May making various comments on the criticisms offered, and winding up with the request that “any inquiry which might be determined upon might be postponed till the month of October.” The Secretary of State did not comply with the request of the Metropolitan Board for a postponement of the inquiry till October. He immediately decided, after consulting with the Local Government Board, to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter. On the 29th of May this step was communicated to the Metropolitan Board. The first Report of the Commission was forwarded by the Secretary for presentation to Parliament on the 1st of February, 1884. In July the attention of the Secretary of State was called to the state of the river; and he accordingly consulted Lord Bramwell, the Chairman, and asked him for his views. On the 12th of July, the Chairman of the Royal Commission reported that he and four other Commissioners examined the river—

“It was in such a state as to be a scandal and disgrace to the Metropolis and civilization. There were ten miles of sewage, more or less.”

A very strong letter was thereupon addressed by the Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board, inclosing a copy of Lord Bramwell's letter. The Secretary of State pointed out that the first Report of the Commission six months before had pointed out that the main cause of the evil was the discharge of the sewage in its crude state without any attempt to render it less offensive by separating the solids or otherwise; and he also reminded the Board that when they obtained their powers to deal with the main drainage there was a distinct understanding that such deodorization would be provided. The Secretary of State, therefore, asked to be informed without delay what measures the Board had taken to fulfil these pledges, and threatened that he would be compelled to take action under the statute of 1858. On the 12th of July the Erith Local Board requested the Secretary of State to urge on the Metropolitan Board the importance of deodorization pending the inquiry by the Royal Commission. The Secretary of State said in reply that he was strongly impressed with the danger of the present state of things, and forwarded a copy of the Correspondence to the Metropolitan Board. On the 21st of July the Metropolitan Board replied that they quite recognized the responsibility devolving upon them, but that for some weeks there had been a reduced flow of water in the river and a high temperature combined, which had produced an exceptional evil. The Board had difficulty in obtaining an immediate supply of deodorizing chemicals; but they had now made arrangements for manufacturing them themselves, so as to be independent of the trade. The official Report by the Royal Commissioners on their visit of inspection was sent to the Home Office on the 23rd of July; and, in forwarding it to the Metropolitan Board on the 30th of July, the Secretary of State observed that the responsibility which the Board now admitted had been most imperfectly discharged during the present year and former periods. The existing state of things was neither new nor unprecedented, and yet for two years the Board had been contesting facts which could not be denied; and in the month of June the Board, being unprepared, found it a practical impossibility to deal with the evil for several weeks. The Secretary of State had called for inquiry as to how far the measures taken by the Board since the 10th of July had had the effect of curing or mitigating the evils complained of; and he insisted, in conclusion, on the necessity of placing things on a permanent footing, so as to prevent the possibility of a recurrence of the danger. The Secretary of State consulted the Local Government Board, who said that the letter of the Metropolitan Board did not give sufficiently definite information to enable the Local Government Board to pronounce as to the efficiency of the measures taken, but that, if desired, they would send an engineering inspector to visit and report. To this the Secretary of State assented. On the 28th of July the Local Government Board sent on a complaint from the East and West India Dock Company as to the great increase of sewage in the river, and its foul condition. This letter was sent on to the Metropolitan Board. The Secretary of State had called officially on the Royal Commissioners and on the Sanitary Authority of the Port of London to report on the efficiency of the measures taken by the Metropolitan Board to purify the river, and had also instructed the River Police Authorities to report daily to him as to the state of the river. The latest information he had received testified to a slight improvement. The Papers on the subject would be presented to Parliament to-day.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he had been pleased to read in the papers of that morning that at the outfall the nuisance was so far abated that they might eat their fish dinner in comfort; but his experience upon a recent annual occasion, well known to their Lordships, when the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) was one of the party, was quite the reverse.

Lord Forbes

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES—DESIGNS FOR THE NEW ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to call the attention of the House to the designs for the new Public Offices, said, he did not understand whether the agreement entered into with the successful competitors would prevent Parliament from having an opportunity of expressing its opinion of the designs. From what he had seen of the elevation of the new buildings they were not architecturally in harmony with the other Public Offices, and would crowd the space between the Admiralty and Spring Gardens. He thought the Government ought to suspend their action in proceeding with the execution of the plans until they had before them all the particulars of the competition; or, perhaps, it would be better if they were to withdraw their present arrangement, and to enter into a larger scheme for the improvement of the Public Offices.

LORD SUDELEY: The noble Lord who has brought forward this subject (Lord Lamington) has criticized most severely the designs which the judges have selected for the new Offices. He, however, says that he has not seen the plans in Spring Gardens, and only judges from some sketches he has seen in the papers. Now, my Lords, this criticism may be just or it may be unjust; but of this there can be no doubt, that there has never been a competition for public buildings carried out with greater fairness and impartiality. The First Commissioner took great pains, and the selection was made with the names of the competing architects absolutely secret, and the arrangements made precluded the possibility of the names leaking out. The architects, subject to the approval of Parliament, will be Messrs. Leeming and Leeming, nevertheless it does not follow that the actual design will be carried out in its entirety. During the Autumn the design will be considered most carefully, and such modifications will be made as may be found necessary. The noble Lord is afraid that the Horse Guards will be swamped, and he implies that this consideration has not entered into the minds of the judges. I can assure him that this was very carefully weighed. If, however, this is likely to prove the case, it will be very easy to leave out or alter the position of the campanile tower, 260 feet high, and make modifications. As regards the point mentioned by the noble Lord, that the consideration of these Offices ought also to include the widening of Great George Street and the erection of other Public Offices. I will only say that experience of past years has proved the utter impracticability of undertaking any general scheme for the erection of a series of Public Offices. No one is better aware of this than the noble Lord himself, who, when Chairman of the Committee on the subject, gave the matter up as hopeless, and the Committee only left the matter to the Government. I trust the noble Lord, before he leaves town, will be able to go to Spring Gardens and see the plans, and I am sure he will come away much more satisfied in his mind as to those designs.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS asked whether the modified or the original designs would be shown on the models?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The modified designs.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL thought Government should pause and suspend the execution of their scheme.

EGYPT—THE PORTE AND THE SOUDAN.

QUESTION.

LORD STRATHNAIRN asked Her Majesty's Government, What right, now that the Sovereignty of the Porte over Egypt Proper had been acknowledged, England had to advise the Khedive to abandon the Soudan without obtaining the consent of the Porte?

EARL GRANVILLE: We have never questioned any rights which the Sultan has over Egypt; but, as far as the Egyptians themselves are concerned, they not having an Army or money sufficient to reconquer the Soudan, we advised them not to go on with an undertaking which was impossible.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, that as the answer of the noble Earl was most unsatisfactory, he should take the earliest opportunity of again calling the attention of their Lordships' House to the subject.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock,

PUBLIC BILL—Considered as amended—Third Reading—Cholera, &c. Protection * [303], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—NATIONAL SCHOOL, BELFAST—USE OF SCHOOLROOM FOR PARTY PURPOSES.

MR. HEALY asked, Whether it is the fact that on Thursday evenings the Whitehouse National School, Belfast, is used as an Orange band room, and that Party tunes offensive to the Catholics of the village are constantly played; and, whether this is with the sanction of the Commissioners of Education?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): A temperance band meets every Thursday evening in the Whitehouse schoolroom. By its Rules it is non-political, and the playing of Party tunes is absolutely forbidden, either in the schoolroom or elsewhere. It was upon the pledge of the Members to obey this Rule that the manager, who is a Presbyterian minister, gave the use of the school; and so long as the Rule was observed, the school being non-vested, there was no violation of the Regulations of the Commissioners. It, however, now appears that about the 12th of July the band on some occasions broke that Rule. The Commissioners will not permit this, and are in communication with the manager on the subject.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT, CLAUSE 58.

SIR JOHN HAY asked Mr. Solicitor General, Whether, referring to his statement that—

"The Naval Discipline Act declares that the number of officers composing a Court Martial must not exceed nine, but it need not be more than five,"

is in accordance with Clause 58, subsection 16, where the officer appointed to preside at the Court is directed to summon all the officers of the rank next in seniority to himself to the number of nine, or such number not less than five is attainable, is complete; and, whether, therefore, a Court Martial constituted of five officers only, where more are present, is a legal Court Martial?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL), in reply, said, that the statement made by him was, no doubt, that although a Court Martial must not exceed nine and be not less than five, there was no absolute obligation that it should consist of nine. No doubt, under the section to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman referred, and to which he also referred at the time, all the officers were to be summoned; but the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would find in the Admiralty Instructions a provision that even if the officer who was to preside had been chosen, leave of absence might be given by the officer summoning the Court Martial or the superior officer present to officers who would otherwise be bound to attend. He knew his right hon. and gallant Friend was under the impression that those Instructions referred to proceedings under the Act of 1861, and that the legislation had been changed since; but he would call his attention to the fact that the Act of 1861 was in precisely the same terms as the Act of 1866. Those Instructions were issued in 1862, and had been in force ever since; and, therefore, the provision which he had in his mind when making the statement had been in force since 1862 under the old Act, which was in precisely the same terms as the present.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he will state what reason is assigned for selecting an Admiral Superintendent of one of Her Majesty's Dockyards to preside at a Court Martial on the Captain of Her Majesty's ship Defence, contrary to the spirit of the Naval Discipline Act, Clause 58, Section 16, when other Flag Officers were available for that duty?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The section referred to exempts certain officers from the ordinary obligation to serve upon Courts Martial, in order, it may be presumed, to prevent their being disturbed in the discharge of their important duties. But it excepts any occasion on which they may be specially directed to sit by orders from the Admiralty. In this case the Admiral Superintendent was so directed, being the only available Flag Officer at the Port besides the Commander-in-Chief.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—ORDER IN COUNCIL, 1876.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will, during the Recess, consider the desirability of improving the position of the Civil Service writers by a modification of the Order in Council of 12th February, 1876?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the Order in Council to which he refers has nothing to do with writers, except the 19th section, which provides that they are to be paid by piece work, at rates fixed by the Civil Service Commissioners, with the consent of the Head of the Department and of the Treasury. I have not heard that there is any difficulty in obtaining competent writers under this system.

DEFENCES OF THE EMPIRE—COALING STATIONS, &c.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his observations on the projects for the defence of coaling stations and chief mercantile ports of the Empire, Whether he will place upon the Table any Reports or Memoranda by the Responsible Military Advisers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Report of the Commission on the Defence of the Coaling Stations and Colonial Possessions abroad was considered a confidential document. There was certainly a great deal in it which it would be extremely inexpedient to make public. He had always regarded the Report of his Advisers as equally confidential. He had not had time to consider whether those Reports, or any part of them, could, without inconvenience or danger, be made public; but he would consider whether any part of those Reports could be presented to the House. With regard to the mercantile ports of the Empire, the Report of Lord Morley's Committee had not yet been fully considered by the War Department. He had received Reports from the Inspector General of Fortifications and the Inspector of Artillery, and those proposals awaited the consideration of the Defence Committee. Until the opinion of that Committee had been received, he could not say whether it would be possible to lay the Report of the Committee or of the Military Authorities before the House?

EGYPT (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—REPORT ON THE BOMBARDMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in reference to the reports and conclusions which have been communicated to the public through the agency of the Attaché of the United States of America present in Egypt, he will lay upon the Table the Report on the Bombardment of Alexandria, made in accordance with the orders of the Secretary of State?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: This Report is of a highly confidential character, and cannot be presented to Parliament.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—HEAD CONSTABLE IRWIN.

MR. HEALY asked, How many policemen have been promoted within the last three years on the recommendation of ex-Detective Director and County Inspector French; was Head Constable Irwin one of these; was he constantly about Mr. French's office in the Castle; by whose recommendation or instrumentality was he appointed to Wexford; why did he leave Wexford on the 24th June, and remain away nearly a month; after how many years' service is the rank of head constable conferred; how many years had Irwin served, and when he was promoted; and, what records had he?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Nine promotions were made within the last three years, all in 1882, on the recommendation of Mr. French. There is no reason to doubt that they were all of them proper promotions. Head Constable Irwin was not promoted on such recommendation. Mr. French had nothing whatever to say to his promotion, nor is it a fact that he was constantly about the Detective Director's Office. He never was employed there, except upon one occasion for a month during a press of business. Upon his promotion to the rank of Head Constable he was allocated to Wexford to fill a vacancy at that station in ordinary course. He was absent on special police duty for a month in the West of Ireland. There is no fixed period of service after which the rank of Head Constable is attained. Irwin had served eight years. He had two first class favourable records, and no unfavourable records.

MR. HEALY: Is it true that he is the youngest Head Constable in the Force?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I will inquire.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: What vacancy did Mr. Irwin fill up? For I am informed there was only one Head Constable stationed at Wexford for many years.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): If the hon. Member puts the Question on the Paper I will make inquiries into it.

BRIDGES (IRELAND)—DRUMHERIFF BRIDGE—COUNTIES LEITRIM AND ROSCOMMON.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked, Whether it is a fact that the duties of the Drumheriff Bridge Committees, appointed by the grand juries of the counties of Leitrim and Roscommon, were confined to the approval of a plan and specification of a bridge, and the acceptance of tenders and declaration of a contractor for same; if it is not likewise a fact that the county surveyor of Roscommon has objected to Mr. Irwin, the assistant county surveyor of Leitrim, acting as county surveyor for the said county (this office being now vacant), although Mr. Irwin was appointed by the county Leitrim grand jury to inspect and report upon, for approval or otherwise, of all county presentments, and, when necessary, issue summonses in cases of default, and that the said Mr. Irwin has in the most emphatic manner condemned the materials made use of by the contractor in the construction of the abutments and piers of Drumheriff Bridge, the specification having been deviated from in many respects; and, if, under these circumstances, and as the best means of safeguarding the interests of the cesspayers of the county Leitrim, will an order be given to enable Mr. Irwin to act pro tem. as county surveyor, or some other steps taken to protect the interests of the cesspayers?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It may have been proposed to limit the duties of the Committee, as stated; but the Act of Parliament contemplates the carrying out of the work under the direction and management of the Committee. I am informed that it is a fact that the county surveyor of Roscommon and the assistant surveyor of Leitrim differ in respect of the materials to be made use of by the contractor generally as to the work; and, as was stated in reply to a former Question, the joint Committee of the Grand Juries is the proper tribunal to adjust these differences. It is very questionable whether the Grand Jury of Leitrim had any legal authority to delegate to Mr. Irwin the powers mentioned in the Question. The vacancy in the office of county surveyor will be filled up as soon as the examination required by law before the Civil Service Commissioners can be held. It will be commenced on the 12th instant.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. JOHN M'MAHON, OF BALLYBAY, CO. MONAGHAN.

MR. HEALY asked, Whether Lord Dartrey, Lieutenant of Monaghan, has forwarded to the Lord Chancellor the influential memorials and resolutions asking for the appointment of Mr. John J. M'Mahon, of Ballybay, to the Commission of the Peace; and, if so, what decision has been arrived at?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The Lord Chancellor informs me that no such memorial was forwarded to him by Lord Dartrey; but that within the last four or five days the name of Mr. M'Mahon was brought to his notice by the Rev. Canon O'Neill, of Ballybay. This application will be duly considered.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CROSSMAGLEN PRISONERS.

MR. HEALY asked, On what grounds have the Government refused to allow Mr. Alfred Webb, T.C., Dublin, to obtain a sight of the so-called Mullabawn and Crossmaglen books, required by him in the preparation of the Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant on behalf of the Crossmaglen prisoners?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Mr. Webb applied to be allowed to inspect the books given in evidence in the Crossmaglen trial, alleging as a reason that he was looking into the case of the prisoners. There is no precedent for permission being granted after a trial for any person to examine the documentary evidence used and produced at the trial, and I do not think such a precedent should be established. When a Memorial is presented, the books will be carefully considered, along with all the other circumstances.

MR. HEALY: Would the Government consider this an exceptional case, and allow Mr. Webb a look at the documents?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): When the Memorial is presented will be the proper time.

MR. HEALY: But Mr. Webb is preparing the Memorial, and how can he prepare it unless he sees the documents?

[No reply.]

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, CARMEN DIVISION, COOTEHILL UNION—THE INQUIRY —MR. VAUGHAN MONTGOMERY, J.P.

MR. HEALY asked, What decision has been come to by the Law Officers as to the prosecution of Mr. Vaughan Montgomery, J.P.; and, will the Papers be laid before the Lord Chancellor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The Attorney General for Ireland has not notified his final decision in this case, as he is absent in Sligo. It would be premature to make any communication to the Lord Chancellor before he does so.

MR. HEALY said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. TIPPING, J.P.

MR. BIGGAR asked, Whether Edward Tipping, of Bellengan, Dundalk, is a Justice of the Peace for the county of Louth; whether it has been brought to the notice of the Lord Chancellor, that Mr. Tipping petitioned the Irish Bankruptcy Court in 1883, offering his creditors five shillings in the pound; and, if so, whether the Lord Chancellor proposes to take any action in the matter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): The allegations contained in this Question have not hitherto been brought to the notice of the Lord Chancellor. It would appear, on inquiry now made, that proceedings for an arrangement by Mr. Tipping with his creditors were for a time pending in the Court of Bankruptcy. They have, however, been discharged therefrom, apparently with the proper consent of the creditors; but further inquiries will be made on this point.

THE NORTH SEA FISHERIES— “COOPERING.”

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is now able to give any information with reference to the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the Netherlands relative to the floating drink-shops in the North Sea; and, whether the Government will, without further delay, urge the Netherlands Government to communicate with the Governments of the other Countries who were parties to the North Sea Fisheries Convention, with the view of some agreement, either by an International Conference, or otherwise, being come to on the subject? The hon. Gentlemen asked further, in support of some action being taken, whether the Under Secretary's attention had been called to a telegram in The Times of to-day, from Berlin, giving an account of an attack on one of the vessels referred to in the Question?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Governments of Her Majesty and of the Netherlands are agreed that the best means of dealing with the subject to which the hon. Member has called attention will be to convoke for this purpose another meeting of the International Conference, which met at The Hague in 1881. No date has yet been fixed for its meeting; but this question is regarded by both Governments with much interest, and the Netherlands Government has been asked to issue, as soon as possible, the necessary invitation for the meeting. I cannot at this moment give an answer with regard to the further Question; but if the hon. Member will put it down I will reply to it.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—QUARANTINE ARRANGEMENTS AT MADEIRA.

MR. CAINE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true that the authorities at Madeira have refused to allow thirteen British sailors, whose vessel had foundered at sea twenty-one days from Newport, to land at Funchal; if it is true that there is no lazaretto or other means of performing quarantine of observation at Madeira; and, if the Foreign Office is taking any steps to secure such accommodation as may be necessary?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Consul at Madeira has reported the case stated by the hon. Member. Quarantine arrangements at Madeira appear to be very defective; but I am not able to give exact details with respect to them. Earl Granville is in communication with the Board of Trade on the subject, and when their views have been ascertained a representation will be made to the Portuguese Government.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— THE BOERS.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to his statement that, so far from the rule of the Boers being a brutal and barbarous rule as concerned the Natives under their Government, it must have been a very much better and milder rule than the Natives have been accustomed to, otherwise they would not have gone in enormous numbers into the Transvaal, Whether he has any reason to doubt the accuracy of Mr. Shepstone's account of his interview with the Native Chiefs at Pretoria on August 2nd, 1881, as detailed in No. 24, of C. 3,098, and of the piteous appeal of the various Chiefs against their being again subjected to the Boers, “who treated them as dogs and beasts of burden;” and, whether he can say on what authority he stated that Natives have gone in enormous numbers into the territory of the Transvaal; and when this immigration is supposed to have taken place, and into what portion of the Country?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he had no cause whatever to doubt the accuracy of Mr. Shepstone's account of his interview; but he thought it would be unwise to accept as absolutely conclusive the evidence of the piteous appeals of any Chiefs whatsoever with reference to a matter in which they might be considered to be interested and to have grievances against the Boers. As regarded the second Question, the early history of the Transvaal was contained in the Blue Books before the House; and, so far as his memory served him, it was contained in some of the despatches of the late Sir Bartle Frere. Originally the Transvaal was inhabited by a Bechuana Tribe. This Bechuana Tribe was practically driven out by a tribe of the Zulus. After the Boers had attacked this tribe of Kaffirs and destroyed them, then the Bechuanas in their turn came back and re-migrated in large numbers to the Transvaal. There were now about 750,000 of them. This immigration took place in all parts of the Transvaal, but principally in the North.

CORRUPT PRACTICES (SUSPENSION OF ELECTIONS) BILL.

In reply to Mr. RAIKES,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the Bill was intended to be merely suspensory in its operation.

COLONIAL NAVAL DEFENCE ACT, 1865 —COLONIAL WAR VESSELS.

Mr. BLAKE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Government of Victoria had, before the departure of their vessels of war, Victoria, Albert, and Childers, from England on the 14th of February, fulfilled all the requirements of the Admiralty, so as to entitle them to the privileges accorded to Colonial vessels of war, under section three of "The Colonial Naval Defence Act, 1865;" whether the Government of Victoria had also, in accordance with section six of the same Act, placed the said vessels at Her Majesty's disposal; whether the Law Officers of the Crown have advised the Admiralty that such vessels, on being placed at Her Majesty's disposal, are to be deemed to all intents vessels of war of the Royal Navy, and would be entitled to fly the white ensign; whether the Agent General for Victoria was informed on the 13th of February, and was requested to inform the Commandant of the squadron, that the necessary formalities to obtain the Orders in Council having been fulfilled, he might safely proceed on his voyage; whether Orders in Council, under sections three and six of the said Act, were passed at the Council of the 4th of March; whether, on the following day, the 5th of March, the Admiralty requested that the vessels might be ordered to the seat of war at Suakin; and, whether this was not an acceptance of their services?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I venture to refer my hon. Friend to the answers given regarding the status of the vessels by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies and myself on the 19th of February last, and to the statement by the First Lord of the Admiralty which appears in the daily newspapers of the 2nd instant. I would only supplement that statement by pointing out that in order that the vessels should have the status, given under Section 6 of "The Colonial Naval Defence Act," they must be not only "placed at Her Majesty's disposal," but "accepted by the Admiralty." The services of these vessels were not accepted, but were declined with an expression of thanks, and with full recognition of the spirit of the offer; and although the Commanding officer was instructed by the Agent General for the Colony, with the concurrence of the Admiralty and Colonial Office, to communicate with Sir William Hewett on his way down the Red Sea, it was hardly anticipated that the Admiral would require the services of the vessels, nor, as a matter of fact, was it found necessary to accept them.

NAVY—DOCKYARD RE-ORGANIZATION —THE NEW SCHEME.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (for Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he will obtain and present to Parliament evidence from the foremen of the yard and assistant constructors selected from them, as regards the effect of the reorganization scheme on their prospects, seeing that they have had no opportunities of making their statements before the Committee?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY, in reply, said: The witnesses examined by the Committee on Constructors included several officers well acquainted with Dockyard administration. The case of the foremen of the Yard is thoroughly understood at the Admiralty, and further evidence of a formal character is unnecessary. Every desire exists to open the door of promotion to men of the practical ability for which the foremen of the Yard are distinguished. The selection of individuals according to their qualifications must lie with the Controller of the Navy and the professional advisers of the Board.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—"WYOMING AND THE CATTLE DISEASE."

MR. ALBERT GREY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in The Times of the 31st ult. :—

"Wyoming and Cattle Disease.

"We understand that the following are the precautions which the territory of Wyoming will take at once to protect vessels against outside disease :—

"Inspection of all animals crossing the Missouri River and coming from any place east of the Alleghanies. Every animal entering Wyoming from any state or territory which, in the opinion of the Privy Council, contain centres of infection, shall be quarantined on our frontier for any period the Privy Council think fit; such quarantine can be, and will be, imposed at any time by the governor of the territory on the receipt of a cable from London.

"Every animal passing from Wyoming (or any Western territory that may be removed under Clause 3 from the Schedule) into Canada by the Lake Route for export, shall be certified under the seal of the state or territory to belong to that territory. The Canadian inspection bureau at Buluth will examine every animal, and report that the brands, earmarks, &c. on such animals are the brands certified by the governor of the territory as belonging within his jurisdiction, and as recorded in the record offices of the various county record offices in the state or territory.

"An official representing the English interest in this matter will be welcomed in the North West, and he can satisfy his Government that in all respects our stocks maintain their bill of health, and that the provisions of the law are in all respects complied with ;"

and, whether, under these circumstances, there are any objections to the exercise of the powers conferred upon the Privy Council by the third section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1884 ?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, the conditions mentioned in The Times were submitted to the Privy Council by Mr. Moreton Frewen, who stated that he did so on behalf of the authorities of Wyoming. The cattle are proposed to be brought through Canada and shipped at a Canadian port. This renders it necessary to ascertain the view of the Canadian Government upon the subject. A communication has, therefore, been addressed to the Government for that purpose.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—THE COLLISION IN THE THAMES.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can give the House any reliable information regarding the cause of the collision and loss of life which occurred on Saturday night on the Thames, two miles below Gravesend, between the Dions and Camden steamers; and, whether he can state the tonnage and number of able seamen carried by the passenger ship ?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Until the result of the inquiry which is being held is made known I should not like to express any opinion on this case. I am informed that the passenger ship has a gross tonnage of 782 tons, and that the total number of the crew, exclusive of the master, was 18, of whom five were engaged as able seamen.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—THE NEW REGISTER.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering that it is estimated that the Register of 1884 contains 41 per cent. of electors who were not on the Register of 1880; that the Register now in preparation will contain over 50 per cent. of new electors as compared with 1880; and that the Register of next year will contain over 60 per cent. of new electors, he will refuse the Return, of which notice has been given on this question, intended to verify the figures; and, whether it has been brought to his notice that the Return would not involve much expense ?

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, said: A searching comparison of the two Registers would have to be made in order to ascertain with regard to each several elector whether he was or was not on the Register in each one or other or both of the years specified. This would give a vast amount of trouble to the Local Authorities, and would in many cases—that is, where the electors have common names, or have changed their residences, or where the lists are not even alphabetical—probably be impossible. The expense would also be considerable, as the Local Authorities would, no doubt, have to employ extra clerks to make the searches.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—AGE OF CHILDREN LEAVING SCHOOL.

Mr. W. J. CORBET asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If he will give a Return of the average age at which children leave school in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland respectively?

Mr. MUNDELLA: I am unable to give the Return for which the hon. Member asks; but if he will refer to page 13 of the Report of the Education Department for 1883-4, he will find a paragraph showing the number and the percentage of children in England and Wales who left school after passing the Fourth and Fifth Standards in 1882. The hon. Member will find a similar paragraph as regards Scotland at page 14 of the Report of the Scotch Education Department for 1883-4. From this it appears that 42 per cent of the scholars in Standard IV. leave school after passing it, while 58 per cent of those in Standard V. leave school after passing that Standard. In Scotland 23 per cent of the scholars in Standard IV. leave school after passing it, and 53 per cent of those in Standard V. As the Standard of total exemption in Scotland is Standard V., we may reasonably expect that under the operation of the Act of last year the number of children leaving school before passing that Standard will diminish. The Question, so far as it relates to Ireland, should be addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

INDIA (MADRAS)—FLOGGING—CASE OF MARIAPPEN.

Mr. BIGGAR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will cause inquiries to be made into the statement made by Mr. C. Pritchard, barrister-at-law, Salem, to the honourable the Judges of the High Court, Madras, in his Letter to them bearing date 16th February 1884, that a lad named Mariappen, aged 10, was sentenced by Dr. Maclean, district magistrate of Salem, on 26th September 1882, to receive twenty stripes, though on the day previous, viz. 25th September, he, Mr.

Pritchard, as counsel for the lad, had procured an adjournment of the case; whether he will cause inquiry to be made into Mr. Pritchard's statement, in the same Letter,

"I was somewhat surprised at the superintendent of police rushing into Court, and saying that it was the wish of the district magistrate that the under-trial prisoners should be detained to witness the thrashing of a little boy, the above Mariappen;"

and, whether it is customary that persons not yet convicted should be forced to witness a flogging?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: The India Office has no information beyond what may be derived from the newspapers as to the letter referred to in the hon. Member's Question, or the circumstances with which it deals. The letter appears to have been addressed to the Judges of the High Court in January of last year; and as that Court has, therefore, had an opportunity of considering the statement which it contains, it does not appear to be necessary to call on the Government of Madras for a Report. I have no reason to believe that it is customary that persons not yet convicted are forced to witness floggings; and Mr. Pritchard, in his letter, expressly states that in this instance the prisoners were not detained to witness the flogging.

EGYPT—THE CONFERENCE—THE MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Prime Minister was likely to be able to make his promised statement before the Orders of the Day were called on?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend has full intention of making the statement he promised yesterday, and I have every reason to believe that he intended to make it before the Orders of the Day were called on. We have, however, got through the Questions somewhat more rapidly than usual; and as my right hon. Friend is not in his place at present, but will be in a very few minutes, it might be for the convenience of the House that the Speaker should leave the Chair for a few moments, in order to give my right hon. Friend the opportunity of being in his place.

Mr. GLADSTONE, who at that moment entered the House, said: I must apologize to the House for the inconvenience caused by my absence, which is due to the fact that I anticipated that the Questions would have occupied the usual time. I just wish to make a statement, which I intimated yesterday that I hoped to make to-day. It will be a simple and a short one. It is to this effect—that we are very conscious that a serious responsibility devolves upon us in consequence of the failure of the recent Conference of the European Powers upon the Financial Affairs of Egypt. To assist us in meeting this responsibility, Her Majesty has been pleased to approve of our proposing that the Earl of Northbrook should proceed to Egypt in order to report and advise the Government upon the counsels which they should offer to the Egyptian Government in relation to the present situation of affairs in Egypt, and also in relation to any steps which it may be requisite to take in connection therewith. The Earl of Northbrook has accepted this Commission, and he proposes to leave England in the course of the present month for that purpose. Sir Evelyn Baring, whose services have been, in the judgment of the Government, highly valuable, and whose labours have been, both in their nature and length of period, extremely onerous, is absolutely in need of, at any rate, a short vacation; but, still, he relies confidently upon being able to accompany the Earl of Northbrook to Egypt. He will continue to hold the Office he has held now for some time in Egypt; and I need hardly say that he holds it with the entire confidence of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I do not quite understand the statement which the right hon. Gentleman has made. I do not quite understand the capacity in which the Earl of Northbrook is to proceed to Egypt. The right hon. Gentleman described his functions as being those of being deputed to advise and report to Her Majesty's Government on the advice which they should give to the Government of Egypt. I should like to ask whether there will be any special instructions given to Lord Northbrook; and whether his position will give him any power or authority in Egypt either with reference to the Egyptian Government or with reference to our own Representatives in Egypt? Will the Earl of Northbrook's Mission in any way affect the position of Sir Evelyn Baring; and can the right hon. Gentleman inform us what his title will be; and whether his Mission will be for a limited period, or one involving the resignation by the Earl of Northbrook of the Office which he at present holds, and any consequent change in the Administration at home?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not sure, Sir, whether I shall be able to follow the right hon. Gentleman accurately in what he has said. There will be no change at all in the Earl of Northbrook's tenure of Office; and the Office which he has, with great public spirit, consented to give himself is an office of an essentially temporary character, and his office will be confined to the purposes I have described—namely, inquiry and advice. His office will not, I apprehend, directly interfere with the ordinary duties of Sir Evelyn Baring, any more than the office of the Earl of Dufferin about 18 months ago—I think that was about the time—interfered with the office of the Consul General of that day. The Earl of Northbrook will go with a Commission from Her Majesty's Government; he will not, however, go with any special instructions; being a Member of the Cabinet, in perfect accord with us and in association with us in all our proceedings, he knows that which will best enable him to give effect to the general views and principles on which the Cabinet desires to act. He will have, however, a Commission; and the right hon. Gentleman is well aware that at various periods, both in the Colonies and in States otherwise related to us, as well as in foreign countries, Commissioners have been sent by the Crown for a special purpose, when a critical or special state of affairs appeared to require a measure of that kind.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the particular appellation to be given to the Earl of Northbrook? If he has not a particular appellation he may be refused permission to land, as Mr. Wilfrid Blunt was. Will the right hon. Gentleman say what appellation, diplomatic or otherwise, will be given to the office which is to be undertaken by the Earl of Northbrook?

MR. GLADSTONE: The precise appellation to be given to the Earl of Northbrook is a matter which I consider as appertaining rather to the form of the Commission given than as one to be determined in substance on the first stage of the affair. I think the function of the Earl of Northbrook would correspond in substance with that which has been generally designated by the title of High Commissioner. I presume that will be the title given to the Earl of Northbrook on the present occasion.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: Will Parliament be made acquainted with the Commission and the terms of it, in the same way as it was made acquainted with the terms of the Commission which the right hon. Gentleman himself fulfilled when he went to the Ionian Islands?

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, certainly; the terms of the Commission will be laid before Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the practical result of the appointment of the Earl of Northbrook will be to produce considerable delay, I think we have a right to ask what are the particular subjects connected with Egypt, about which the Government feel their ignorance, and about which they would like advice? I should like to ask whether it is on the subject of finance that they require further information; or whether it is on the subject of the internal administration of Egypt? I think it must be plain—but perhaps I have no right to make any comment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have nothing to add to the statement I have already made. It is quite evident that the inquiry might include finance and internal administration as well—that is to say, we have asked the Earl of Northbrook to report and advise upon the counsel which we ought to offer to the Egyptian Government, and to advise as to any steps which it may be requisite to adopt in connection therewith.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he supposed that full and complete information with regard to the Egyptian finances would be laid before the House. The information laid before the Conference, the French Representatives contended, was essentially defective.

MR. GLADSTONE: No information on the internal administration of Egypt has been laid before the Conference.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: And on finance?

Mr. Gladstone

MR. GLADSTONE: The information on finance has been communicated to the House, and it will be for the Members of the House to consider whether it is defective or not.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Would the right hon. Gentleman inform the House whether there are any steps connected with Egyptian affairs, financial or other, which the Government contemplate taking before they receive the Earl of Northbrook's advice?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is impossible for me to bind myself, to give an answer on that subject. It might depend on necessities which might arise spontaneously. I can only say our object is to have the advantage of the Earl of Northbrook's inquiry and advice on the general situation.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The object of my Question is this. Some months ago the Government informed us that the financial affairs of Egypt were in such an urgent state as to demand a Conference at once. That Conference has spent some months in its deliberations, and no result has arisen from them. What I want to know is, whether the Government will take any steps in connection with the financial position of Egypt before Lord Northbrook has been able to report and advise?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I must still say that it would be very difficult for me to answer that Question. I admit there is a very urgent state of financial affairs in Egypt; and I can conceive it to be quite possible that application may be made to the Government on the subject, with which they will deal in the best manner they can, pending the inquiry and Report. But undoubtedly it is not our intention to take any step of a definite character which can be avoided, but to reserve the situation, as far as possible, entire until the completion of the inquiry.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD: Has any reference been made, on the part of the Government, to the Ottoman Porte?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a question of great importance, on which it is quite impossible for me to enter at the present moment. This and other questions will come within the scope of the Earl of Northbrook's inquiry, and any answer on the point would necessarily be premature.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: If the Government has not consulted the Porte, by what right do they send a High Commissioner to make inquiries into the condition of a portion of the Porte's Dominions? When the right hon. Gentleman was sent to the Ionian Islands it was under a Treaty, which enabled us then to appoint such an official.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has referred to the case in which I was High Commissioner. I do not wish to point to his assertion with regard to the bearing of the Treaty on which that appointment was made; but he is quite premature, and has mistaken me in saying that we have not consulted the Porte, inasmuch as on that subject I have made no communication whatever to the House.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON (VOTE OF CREDIT).

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £300,000, be granted to Her Majesty, beyond the ordinary Grants of Parliament of 1884-5, to enable Her Majesty to undertake operations for the relief of General Gordon, should they become necessary, and to make certain preparations in respect thereof."

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the statement which I shall have to make in proposing this Vote of Credit, which you, Sir, have already read from the Chair, will be, I hope, not a very lengthened one, will be simple in its character, and, I trust, not involving any highly contentious matter. The purpose of the Vote of Credit is described in general terms upon the face of the Paper which has been placed in the hands of Members, and I will refer a little more particularly to the basis upon which our proposition rests. Sir, the Committee is well aware that we are under pledges as regards General Gordon to aid him by military means in a certain contingency. Perhaps it may be desirable that I should refer particularly to the nature of those pledges, though I believe they are generally in the recollection of the Committee. They are to be found in telegrams that are in the possession of the House, dated April 23 and May 17, and they are to be found in various declarations made by myself in this House, and by Earl Granville in the other House of Parliament. But, Sir, they are to be found especially—as I am now addressing the House of Commons, and the House of Commons, perhaps, pays the greatest attention to what is addressed by responsible Ministers of the Crown to itself—they are to be found especially in a speech delivered by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) on the 13th of May, when he dealt more fully with this portion of the subject than any of his Colleagues had done on any previous occasion. I am quoting from Hansard, May 13, page 233; and I will, first of all, refer to certain sentences. My noble Friend then stated that, before an expedition for the relief of General Gordon could be ordered or announced, it was necessary to have the clearest proof of its necessity. He stated that such an expedition would not be justified for the purpose of enabling General Gordon to smash or overpower the Mahdi; nor for the purpose of giving a satisfactory Government to the inhabitants of the Soudan; nor for the purpose of enabling the garrisons of the Soudan to march out with the honours of war; and my noble Friend went on to say, in a passage which I will now quote—

"We must be satisfied, as far as it is possible for us to satisfy ourselves, that such an expedition is necessary to secure the safety of General Gordon, and of those for whose safety he has made himself responsible. It is necessary that we should be satisfied that the original view as to the possibility of evacuation is now impossible of execution. General Gordon will not be called upon by the Government to do anything which will be derogatory to his honour or to his character. Those who have trusted themselves in his service, those who have fought for him, who have increased the perils in which they stood before by entering his service, no doubt, General Gordon is responsible for, and cannot desert; but there is no reason to believe that, if escape is possible for him, it is not also possible for those who stand towards him in the relation which I have described."—(3 Hansard, [288] 233-4.)

The telegram, which is before the Committee, and which is dated May 17, was conceived in the spirit of those expressions. And now I think I need not enter into any minute description; but I will rather remind the Committee of what has taken place; and, not seeking in any degree either to extend or contract those pledges, I think I may assume that the Committee is fully aware that we have given pledges to aid General Gordon in a certain contingency. Next, I am bound to say that we consider that these pledges, in a general sense, were approved by Parliament. Some may, perhaps, have thought they went too far, and some may have thought they did not go far enough; but, speaking of the general body of the Committee, we are under the belief that these pledges were approved, and that I need not now argue in support of the principle on which they rest, or go back upon a field which we have traversed to a sufficient extent on former occasions. Well, now, Sir, we and the country have been under very considerable embarrassment from the want of direct official communication with General Gordon. That difficulty has beset us, and to no inconsiderable extent perplexed us for a time which is now approaching no less than four months. But, although there has been this want of official communication with General Gordon, yet, in the absence of such communication, there has been a series of reports which has reached us, and which, although they cannot be placed upon a footing with direct and responsible accounts, yet, when taken together, may be held to have considerable importance, and undoubtedly, I think, have acted a good deal more upon the mind of the public, who are so deeply interested in the safety of General Gordon. These reports have not been altogether uniform in their character. For instance, upon a particular occasion—namely, the 4th of July—one of the London journals—and in referring to the London journals I may say that, as far as I am able to judge, all those varied reports have been perfectly impartial, and have not been altered or modified for the purpose of supporting any particular view—at one time the reports in one journal had been more favourable or more unfavourable and at other times the reverse; but in quoting from them generally I quote without the slightest reference to anything, except to the fact that such a telegram has reached this country—

well, I think it was on the 4th and 5th of July that reports in The Daily Telegraph, which had previously had some reports of a very favourable character, came to convey the darkest view of the case that was brought before us with respect to Khartoum and General Gordon. On the 4th of July we were told that the town had been captured without difficulty by the Mahdi; that no massacre had taken place, however; and that General Gordon was safe, but that he entirely declined to quit the place. On the 5th of July there was also a statement to the effect that Khartoum was in possession of the Mahdi; but when we came to look at the sources we found that the report of the 4th came from the insurgent Army itself, which represented that Khartoum had been captured; and the reports of the 5th of July from what are described as Native sources. But, Sir, speaking generally, such has not been the tenour of the reports that have been received. On the whole, they have—some may think to a very high degree, some may think in a lower degree, and upon that I do not enter at all; but in some degree or other they have converged towards certain points. The points to which they have converged have been what may be termed the safety of General Gordon, in the sense in which that term is applicable to a man who is in a country where fighting is going on, and in a town foreign to him, and likewise to his power to remove from Khartoum, if considerations of honour or prudence, or whatever motives may govern the mind of that heroic man, should dictate such a course. I may just quote in support of what I say two reports, which came from The Daily News' Correspondent on the 30th of June. On the 30th of June that journal—and perhaps other journals; but I do not know—that journal gave a report which was brought by certain pilgrims to Suakin, and their report was to the effect that the town of Khartoum was all right on the 23rd of May, and that food was plentiful there. They had also a report of pilgrims who had arrived at Tahkrova, and who gave the very same account which came from another place, that all was well at Khartoum on the 23rd of May, and that food and water were sufficient for its supply. I quote this as an illustration of the way in which reports that are not official or responsible, yet concurring with each other when arriving from different places, support one another to a certain extent. On another day, the 29th of July, The Daily News and Reuter's Agency gave a report from a Greek merchant who had come from Kassala. He reported that he had seen a letter from General Gordon, dated the 11th of June, and reporting the presence of rebels, but saying that he was confident of being able to destroy them on the rising of the Nile. By "destroying" them, I suppose him to mean overcoming them. I do not suppose we are to interpret the word as meaning the annihilation of all these people. The letter further reported that General Gordon was quite safe, that the soldiers were in good spirits, and that provisions were plentiful. That was the report of the Greek merchant with respect to the letter which he said he had seen, and which was dated the 11th of June. Then, Sir—this is rather curious as regards those unofficial reports—on the 18th of July, The Standard and The Daily News gave a report, brought also by pilgrims to Suakin. The effect of this report was that General Gordon was well about the 21st of June, and keeping the enemy in perpetual fear by successful land and water sorties, and it mentioned likewise that his messengers had been killed. That, the Committee will observe, was an unofficial report on the 21st of June. Well, but then that unofficial report of the 21st of June is now in a certain degree confirmed by what may be called in a certain sense an official report, for we heard some time ago that a letter had been received by the Mudir of Dongola from General Gordon himself. That letter is in the hands of the Committee, and in it General Gordon states that Khartoum and Sennaar were in a good state of defence. He inquired of the Mudir of Dongola what reinforcements of troops were forthcoming, and he mentioned certain other particulars. When that letter arrived there were certain circumstances connected with it which might have led to a momentary doubt of its authenticity; but since the arrival of Major Kitchener at Dongola, we have received communications from him from which we have no longer any doubt of his having seen that letter, and that it is a genuine document. I do not say that it is a document with regard to which we can be altogether free from mystery, because it is not easy to understand, taking the document alone and at first sight, although it may be explained by testimony which may hereafter reach us, why General Gordon should put to the Mudir of Dongola questions about any anticipated reinforcements or military succour, and why, at the same time, that letter to the Mudir of Dongola, which he had an opportunity of sending, should not have been accompanied by any letter to the British Government. But all that is a matter which may be fully explained by subsequent intelligence. These particulars, Sir, I have laid before the Committee, they being selected from what is really a very large and promiscuous body of evidence, some of it of a slight character, and other parts of it of greater effect and substance, and which has reached us since the middle of the month of May. But the general conclusion to which they bring us is this—that, undoubtedly, we are not in a condition to say that the contingency anticipated by my noble Friend in his speech of a clear necessity for sending military aid, and for undertaking military operations with the view of sending aid to General Gordon—we are not in a position to say that that contingency has arrived. But, although it has not arrived, it was all very well for us to wait for fuller intelligence while Parliament was sitting, because at any moment we could come down to Parliament and obtain the judgment of Parliament, and ask for the decision of Parliament, as to any duty which might seem to be incumbent upon us. We are now, however, reaching the time when Parliament is about to be prorogued. Under these circumstances, it has appeared to us to be clearly our duty to place ourselves in such a position that if, during the Recess of Parliament, that contingency should arrive, we might be enabled to meet it in the way in which we think Parliament would wish. That is the main and proper object of the Vote of Censure—[Laughter].—I mean the Vote of Credit. My mouth is not accustomed to enunciate the latter phrase, but the phrase "Vote of Censure" is extremely familiar to me. The main object of the Vote, as a Vote required beyond the ordinary Grants of Parliament, is to enable Her Majesty to undertake operations for the relief of General Gordon should they become necessary. Besides that, we hope we shall thus obtain the direct authority of Parliament to certain preparations connected therewith. Well, Sir, these preparations are preparations which are to be explained by the condition and circumstances of Egypt, and the condition of season and climate under which communications may be carried on in that country. They are preparations as distinguished from operations. [Laughter by Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.] Perhaps the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) may have a better mode of description; but I think I convey a tolerably clear idea to the minds of the Committee when I speak of preparations as distinguished from operations. The Vote in itself is rather, perhaps, a Vote of principle than anything else—I mean to say, rather a Vote of principle than the representation of an exact figure. A figure we must present, and we must regulate it by what appear to us to be the dictates of good sense; but it is impossible for us, until this contingency arises—and God forbid it should arise!—a sentiment in which, I hope, we all join—but until this contingency should arise, it would be impossible for us to form an accurate estimate of the demands that may be made upon us. What I look at is the assent of Parliament, such as we conceive it to be, to the pledges—I might even say as regards a great portion of the Committee—but, at least, to those pledges into which we have entered as respects General Gordon, and the authority which we feel was placed in our hands to act according to the dictates of prudence and justice upon those pledges under cover of the Vote which we ask Parliament to give us. With respect to the particular preparations, I think the Committee will feel with me that it would not be for the public interest that I should enter into any explanations whatever. In our opinion, it would be of no advantage even to the object of those who sought information, inasmuch as the information must at present necessarily be partial, and, to a certain extent, therefore, misleading. What we feel is this—it is impossible for us to judge, unless and until the contingency arrives, in what way, by what specific means and form of action, that contingency ought to be met. It is plainly, therefore, our duty to reserve to ourselves, subject to our responsibility to Parliament, a full discretion in the choice of the best, the most prudent, and the most effective methods of proceeding. Any explanations that might now be entered into with respect to preparations would tend to limit that field of action, and, I may also say, it might have other inconvenience in Egypt itself of a character more direct and more immediately bearing on the purpose which, if the occasion arises, we should have in view. I believe I have now stated to the Committee all that it appears necessary to state in order to convey the double purpose of this Vote—the major purpose, to obtain the authority of Parliament, for acting, as circumstances may require, upon our responsibility; and the secondary and subsidiary purpose of taking such steps as may appear to my noble Friend and his advisers, with the sanction of the Cabinet, in the way of military preparation, as prudence may appear to require, when the matter is considered in connection with the peculiarities of Egypt, and what may be required by the seasons of the year, or in order that we may not be taken unawares, should the time come. On these grounds, I hope it will be found by the Committee that there is no novelty of principle in the proposal we now make; that it is simply an attempt on our part to place ourselves in a condition to redeem the honourable engagements under which we have come to Parliament and to the country, in view of circumstances when Parliament itself would have been prorogued, and, therefore, when we should not have had a direct and immediate means of obtaining its authority by the summary method of an immediate application. Under these circumstances, I beg to present the Vote of Credit which has been placed in your hands.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he did not understand the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to have asserted that universal assent was given to the pledges he had mentioned when they were made in the House. He did not think anyone would contest that when those pledges were given, it was upon the full and distinct understanding that General Gordon was acting in accordance with his instructions, and the orders given to him. But he apprehended, on reading the Papers which everyone had had an opportunity of reading, that General Gordon had not only not fulfilled his instructions, but had acted in complete disaccord with them. What were those instructions? They were contained in the letter of Earl Granville to Sir Evelyn Baring, and pointed out the best way of effecting the evacuation of the Soudan, and of securing the safety of the garrisons. That was why General Gordon was sent out; but when he arrived in Egypt, without the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government, he accepted the position of Governor General of the Soudan, and started for Khartoum. This fact would be found recorded in the Blue Books a few days later than Earl Granville's letter in a telegram from that noble Earl to Sir Evelyn Baring to ask if General Gordon had accepted any position under the Egyptian Government. General Gordon had then started for Khartoum, and hon. Members knew what then occurred. He wrote home despatches, to the effect that the people were all entirely in favour of his Mission, and that it would be exceedingly easy for the garrisons to retire. Then he demanded that Zebehr Pasha should be sent to the Soudan, and he also made the Mahdi the Sultan of Kordofan. But as soon as he found that the Mahdi refused to accept the position of Sultan of Kordofan, General Gordon immediately changed his tone, and said he would smash the Mahdi. Ever since, so far as he could understand from the obscure reports received from the Soudan, and from the Blue Books, General Gordon had been determined to revenge himself upon these unfortunate Soudanese because they did not accept him as an inspired prophet. That was what General Gordon had done. The Prime Minister said that when General Gordon stated he was in hopes of destroying the rebels, he did not really mean to annihilate them. But his (Mr. Labouchere's) impression was that he did mean to annihilate them. It seemed to him that that was nothing more than General Gordon had done in the last few months. He had remained at Khartoum, and had sallied forth whenever an opportunity came, and had attacked these Soudanese, whom he was pleased to call "rebels," although Her Majesty's Government, who had sent him out, had absolutely recognized the independence of the Soudan. More than that, he told all his followers, who wished to leave Khartoum, that they could retire, and, according to the Blue Books, everyone who was able to leave, did leave at the commencement of General Gordon's Mission, the rest remaining to fight with him. But he believed, at the present moment, that General Gordon was determined not to give way, but had got some vague plan in his head—like a sort of Egyptian Jingo—of inducing the Egyptians to retake the Soudan, and of forcing our hands to send reinforcements to support him in establishing some sort of rule which was not the rule of the Soudanese. Under these circumstances, accepting the pledges in their fullest sense, he hardly thought they were bound to send an English Army to bring back General Gordon from Khartoum. They had heard from Mr. Stanley, and he was an authority in the matter, that there was nothing easier at present than for Gordon to get away from Khartoum, and to bring away all those who were acting with him. But no; he remained there, issuing a species of paper money to be paid for by us or by the Egyptian Government, and sallying forth day after day to destroy what he called "the rebels." General Gordon could fulfil his instructions and get away. That, however, was not his policy, and he stopped there because he chose to stop there. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not see why money should be spent and lives lost merely to please General Gordon. He was, at that moment, Governor General of the Soudan; and why was this country to pay for him? It was the Egyptian Government that ought to pay. Egypt had plenty of money; and the only reason why there was some difficulty in getting money was that an exceptional and unfair amount was taken away from Egypt for the bondholders. The only persons in favour of England paying for it were the bondholders, who objected to have their interest reduced. If the right hon. Gentleman suggested that the money should be advanced as a matter of kindness to Egypt, the matter would be very different; but he gathered that the taxpayers of Great Britain and Ireland were to pay for this expedition as they had to pay for this expedition to Suakin. What did they gain from the Suakin Expedition? It cost a number of valuable lives and a large amount of money. The present Vote was only £300,000; but if an expedition for the relief of General Gordon, was undertaken it would cost very much more than £300,000—£300,000 was a mere sop. Parliament would next Session be asked to agree to a Vote of £3,000,000, and would be told that they had already assented to such expenditure by agreeing to the present Vote. The Prime Minister himself stated that it was a Vote of principle; and it was precisely because it was a Vote of principle that he objected to it. The principle was whether they ought, or ought not, to do their best to get General Gordon back? The principle was that they, and not the bondholders, ought to pay for the expedition which had been made necessary owing to the misdeeds of the Egyptians themselves in the Soudan. General Gordon was sent out to bring away the garrisons by peaceful means if he possibly could, and he had had ample opportunities of doing so. He would not detain the Committee further; but he should certainly take the opinion of the Committee upon the Vote.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he felt himself to be in a very great dilemma as to the vote which he ought to give. He had no objection to a definite sum of £300,000, or two or three times £300,000, in order to enable Her Majesty's Government to get General Gordon out of Africa, and put him in some safe place from which he would not be likely to break out again; but, as the Prime Minister had just said, this was not a Vote of £300,000, but a Vote of principle, which might involve the necessity of their entering into a campaign in Central Africa, and it was perfectly evident that if they were to enter into a campaign in Central Africa, £300,000 would be a mere drop in the ocean. The Committee might find, when they came back in October, that they had committed themselves to an expedition which might cost £10,000,000 and many thousands of lives. That was the question upon which he wished to have a clear answer, and he was afraid, if he were to be guided by the words of the Prime Minister, the answer would be that they would be committed. At all events, he wanted to know whether, if the Committee voted this sum of £300,000, Her Majesty's Government would agree not to incur any more expenditure than this £300,000 would cover, before Parliament re-assembled in October? If he were to understand that they were only voting to Her Majesty's Government a definite sum, and that no increased expense would be incurred until Parliament was called together again, he would be prepared to assent to the Vote; but he was not prepared to agree to a Vote which would be practically in the nature of a blank cheque, placed in the hands of the Government to be used without restraint. He trusted to the good sense of Her Majesty's Government to prevent a great campaign; but he was unwilling to subject them to the pressure, which he knew they would be subjected to, in regard to undertaking a campaign. Although he believed that General Gordon was very much in fault himself in regard to the position in which he was now placed, still he admitted that they were bound to relieve him if it could be done on reasonable terms. With him (Sir George Campbell) it was very much a matter of amount. Looking at all the circumstances, it seemed to him that there was a danger of entering into an enormous campaign in the deserts of Africa which must necessarily cost them thousands of lives, and in regard to which Mr. Stanley told them that their soldiers would die like flies, while the cost would amount to many millions of money. He could not conscientiously vote for a war of that kind, and certainly not at the present moment, until it was known that General Gordon had exhausted every other means of escaping by way of the Nile, or by the means which Mr. Stanley pointed out. The great difficulty was for General Gordon to take away with him the Egyptians who had trusted him. As to the number of Egyptians who were likely to follow him, there might be many who would prefer to make their own terms with the rebels, instead of going with General Gordon. The experience had hitherto been that whenever an attempt was made by a garrison to come to terms with the enemy, no massacre had followed. But he agreed with some of his hon. Friends below him, that General Gordon had entered upon a line of action in which he could not reckon on the military support of the country; and, therefore, he (Sir George Campbell) would end as he had begun, by saying that, in any case, he was ready to vote £300,000 as a definite sum, but he would not vote for it if it were to commit the country to immeasurable liabilities before Parliament reassembled in the month of October.

MR. BOURKE: I need not say that it is not my intention to oppose this Vote. On the contrary, I believe that it will receive general support on this side of the Committee. But it does appear somewhat hard upon me and my Friends, and especially upon me, to have to support a proposition of this kind. It is five months ago since I ventured to say, in this House, that I thought the sending out of General Gordon would probably result in the Government being compelled to send a Force to relieve him. We are now within a measurable distance of that step. But, notwithstanding the folly of the Government in sending him upon that Mission, it is our duty, I think, to do our best to relieve General Gordon and those who have stuck to him. The strictures of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) on General Gordon are most undeserved. Notwithstanding the folly of the Government in sending out General Gordon, when they were certainly not in a position to know exactly what he would do, no Englishman can refuse to General Gordon a tribute of admiration for the manner in which he undertook this Mission and carried it out. I believe now, as I did at first, that the task before him was an impossible one, and one which no man could reasonably be supposed to succeed in accomplishing; but General Gordon has certainly not only performed the duty he undertook to perform with great gallantry and great devotion, but at the same time he has, I think, done many things which may be of use to this country hereafter with respect to the Soudan. He has, I am quite sure, impressed upon the natives of the Soudan the power of England and the devotion of an Englishman to the British cause. I am certain, no matter what the direct result may be of General Gordon's Mission, the good name of England will have been exalted by the manner in which he has performed the work he undertook. At the same time, I cannot help remembering that General Gordon's own opinion is that Her Majesty's Government have inflicted indelible disgrace on England by the way they have treated him. But that, as I said before, is no reason why we should not assist the Government in relieving General Gordon. Those measures which it is now proposed to take ought to have been taken many months ago for his relief; but although they are taken at the last moment, I hope they may not prove to be too late. On the 13th of May, the Secretary of State for War mentioned the contingencies that must arise before the Government could take steps for his relief. The Prime Minister does not now say that any of those contingencies have arisen. On the contrary, he seems to indicate that they have not arrived. I should like to know what contingency Her Majesty's Government expected to arrive? What contingency, save the death of General Gordon, could the Government be waiting for? Every other contingency arose long ago. But it is clear that General Gordon is in the utmost peril. I do not believe that there is any Government in Europe which would have treated its Ambassador or Commissioner in the way that Her Majesty's Government have treated General Gordon. Nothing can be more disgraceful than the conduct of the Government in this respect. General Gordon wrote to the Mudir of Dongola, because he felt himself deserted by the Government. But, although the present Vote is brought forward very tardily and at the last moment, I can assure the Government that I am most happy to give them my most earnest support; and, further than that, I may say that throughout all the evils which were predicted from this Bench, and which are now likely to happen in respect of General Gordon, I am quite sure that any measures which Her Majesty's Government may propose for the safety of General Gordon and the devoted persons with him, will be cheerfully supported by hon. Gentleman on this side of the Committee.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I am not at all in the dilemma of my hon. Friend on my right (Sir George Campbell), as to how I shall vote in this matter. I am very clear in my opposition to this Vote.

First, of all, I feel bound to consider what was the object with which General Gordon was sent out. There is no doubt about that, because we were told in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne that General Gordon had been sent out—

"To report on the best means of giving effect to the resolution of the Khedive to withdraw from the interior of the Soudan."

He went out on this Mission entirely at his own risk, knowing the danger and prepared to take the consequences. There is no doubt about that, because the Secretary of State for War distinctly stated that in this House, on the 3rd of April, and explained that—

"General Gordon left this country with a most distinct and clear understanding, repeated over and over again by himself, that the Mission which he was going to undertake was one which he was prepared to undertake with such resources as he might find on the spot; and he distinctly understood that it was not a part of the policy of the Government, in despatching that expedition, to risk having to send a fresh expedition for the relief of Khartoum or any similar garrisons."—(3 Hansard, [286] 1115.)

It is quite clear, therefore, that General Gordon went out knowing that he was not to have an Army sent to his rescue under any circumstances. That being the case, and that being the clear intimation given by the Government to the House, I want to know what has happened to induce the Government to change their course of action? What has caused them to come down to the Committee now for an expedition, when they distinctly told the House that no expedition would be sent out for his relief? An expedition must necessarily involve a fearful slaughter of brave men; and what, therefore, has happened to put Her Majesty's Government in a different frame of mind from that in which they were when General Gordon was sent out? Of course, many things have happened. We have been told that General Gordon was obliged to ask for the Suakin Expedition; and although the Government did not give a warm approval to it, they did nothing to express their disapproval of the proposal, and sent out an expedition which committed a fearful amount of slaughter. Another change of policy was that Gordon had sent word home in one of his despatches that he considered it to be his mission to smash the Mahdi. Nothing more unjust than this desire on the part of General Gordon to smash the Mahdi has ever been heard of in modern times. What did General Gordon himself and Baker Pasha say about the Soudan? Both of these eminent authorities have admitted that it was the horrible state of things in the Soudan which made the people rebel. And both have contended that the Soudanese were perfectly justified in doing what they were doing. For that I have even a higher authority than Gordon or Baker—namely, the Prime Minister himself, who described these people, in this House, as "rightly struggling to be free." I, for one, if nobody else does, will certainly vote against this money being spent to carry out this enterprise, if it is only to prevent, at any rate, an attempt on the part of Gordon to smash the Mahdi. Why should Gordon smash the Mahdi? Why should we go about the world smashing people? I think we have had enough of this smashing business. We smashed Cetewayo; what good came out of it? We smashed Shere Ali and Arabi; and what good came of it all? The country surely must have found by this time that it does not pay, for we suffer most by it ourselves. We are now called upon to vote £300,000 for an enterprise which was commenced and will be continued to smash the Mahdi. Smash him if you like, but that will not get rid of the difficulty. Other Mahdis will spring up like mushrooms. Mushrooms and reformers and rebels spring up because of the sufferings they have to undergo from bad government. Smash the Mahdi, and smash as many of them as you like, and they will spring up again if the bad government be not improved; and all your expenditure will have been in vain. Now, what has happened in this country? Some people say that we ought to rescue Gordon because he is a Christian hero. (Mr. R. N. FOWLER (Lord Mayor): Hear, hear!) The Lord Mayor cheers that. I do not dispute that Gordon is a Christian hero. I dare say Gordon is doing his best, according to his lights, but he has a curious way of showing Christian heroism. The Lord Mayor admired General Gordon's previous career. For myself, I do not see very much to admire in it. First of all, he spent a long time in putting down the Taepings. What right had he to put them down? They were just as good as the Chinese Government, as far as I know. He killed hundreds and thousands of these people.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Then he went to the Soudan, and his expedition there was all a sham, for Gordon himself has told us that slavery is just as bad now as ever it has been. I do not believe in Christian heroes going about the world cutting people's heads off, and quoting Scripture as they do it. As for the Vote of £300,000 for putting down the Mahdi, I would rather vote £300,000 to enable the Mahdi to put down General Gordon. ["Oh!"] Yes; and I have the Prime Minister to support me there. The Mahdi and his followers have been described by the right hon. Gentleman as "people rightly struggling to be free." The Mahdi is the leader of these people; and instead of voting £300,000 to put him down, I say that it is a shame that the Committee should be called upon to vote this money. If Gordon is the Christian hero you talk about, the Government insult him by sending out people to be slaughtered for his sake. A Christian hero would rather suffer himself than let others suffer. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh; but what do you do when you send out an Army for his relief? Talk about massacres!—why, the only massacre, which was that which occurred at Tokar, took place entirely in consequence of our own proceedings. I shall, therefore, vote against the Motion. I support the policy of the Secretary of State for War—the policy of not sending any expedition—a policy to which Gordon himself agreed, which the country understood at the time, and from which a new and mischievous departure is now proposed by the Government.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he thought that if the observations of the hon. Member who had just addressed the Committee were to be taken seriously, it might be worth while to reply to them. But he must protest against a misrepresentation of Gordon's words, which the hon. Baronet had made. Gordon did not say that "his mission was to smash up the Mahdi." The phrase "smashing up the Mahdi" had been very unfairly used against him, and in no instance more unfairly than by the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, who added the words which implied that Gordon had said that it was his "mission" to destroy the False Prophet. General Gordon, after taking a full survey of the position of affairs at Khartoum, and seeing the danger that surrounded him and those he was sent out to save, put in plain and unmistakable language the position of things. He said that there would be no peace in the Soudan and no peace for Egypt till the Mahdi was smashed up. That was a statement in which every soldier and statesman in Europe would agree—a statement which Her Majesty's Government, in sending out an expedition to Suakin, had confirmed, and a statement which the Vote proposed that night completely indorsed. What satisfaction he had derived from the speech of the Prime Minister consisted very much in the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had abstained from repeating that most unfair and unjust charge which, without the slightest evidence, had come from the Benches opposite, that General Gordon had changed his policy, and had evinced a desire and an intention of smashing up the Mahdi. General Gordon went out to endeavour to carry out a pacific mission. As the Government knew perfectly well, he had exhausted all the pacific means in his power. He had even gone so far as to endorse the existence of slavery, and had endeavoured to negotiate with the Mahdi. Indeed, it was not until he found that all his overtures had been rejected, and rejected with scorn—until he received an insulting message from the Mahdi, and found himself attacked, beleaguered, and in great peril at Khartoum, that he said it was a necessity to resort to military operations. What would the hon. Baronet and other Members who had used the expression about smashing the Mahdi, and turned it so unfairly against General Gordon, have had General Gordon do in the position in which he was placed? Would they have had him lie down in the face of the Mahdi's fanatics, and be speared? It might, under some conditions, be chivalrous to submit to certain death, and General Gordon would probably have been prepared to do so, if his own fate only was concerned. But Gordon went out to save 20,000 soldiers and civilians, and he felt bound to leave no stone unturned in order to accomplish his mission. General Gordon had, no doubt, stated that in order to secure peace in Egypt it might be necessary to smash up the power of the Mahdi. Was there any honest man in the Committee who would get up and say that General Gordon had changed his policy, or was not justified in everything he had done? In the mouth of the Government there might be a great inconsistency in these expressions; but the hon. Baronet, however extraordinary, inconceivable, and almost unimaginable his views on these subjects were, at the same time was, to some extent, consistent in the matter. But for Ministers to cavil at smashing up the Mahdi, and to use it as a charge against General Gordon after they had sent out the fruitless expedition of General Graham to Suakin, which smashed up 6,000 Arabs without any result whatever—for them to reproach General Gordon with this phrase of “smashing up the Mahdi,” was not only unjust, but in the last degree inconsistent. He would take up the words of the hon. Baronet, and ask why the Arabs at Dongola and Assouan had not just as much right to struggle for freedom as the Arabs about Khartoum? It was ridiculous to describe these savage fanatics as martyrs—“peoples rightly struggling to be free.” These wild Arabs had no appreciation whatever of liberty; their sole idea of freedom was massacre, outrage, and rapine, and they destroyed everything they came across. Hitherto, that had been the inevitable result of their struggle to be free. The Committee had had that night two most extraordinary attempts to hold back information—two most extraordinary attempts at delay. They had been told, on the one hand, that a Cabinet Minister was going out as High Commissioner to deal with the difficulties in regard to Egypt. But Her Majesty's Government had known the difficulties in regard to Egypt for months and years; but they had actually been proposing to Europe a plan to deal with some of these difficulties, without having any alternative policy whatever. Now, face to face with the failure of all their projects, they found themselves obliged to send out a Cabinet Minister to Egypt, in order to get a little more time. The same course was now being pursued in regard to this Gordon Expedition. The Prime Minister, it was true, had asked for a certain Vote of money; but he had taken away much of the effect and all the benefit of that request and of that Vote, by making it seem to the Committee and the country that the old vice of indecision and vacillation still prevailed in the Councils of the Government. The Premier said—

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

“If the necessity arises.” When, in the name of Heaven, would the necessity arise if it had not arisen now? What further danger or peril could General Gordon be in, except that which had led to the destruction of the other garrisons of Sinkat and Berber, and the destruction of General Hicks's army? Of course, General Gordon could be in no peril beyond the same kind of peril that had led to the destruction of the other garrisons. If they were to wait until he was in extremis, of what advantage would this Vote of Credit be? They were too late to relieve Sinkat, Tokar, or Berber; they brought back General Graham's Force when it might have saved Berber; and now, as far as he understood the statement of the Prime Minister, it was announced that, as far as they could achieve it, the Ministry were going to be too late in trying to relieve Khartoum. How long were British troops to be kept dangling about the Nile, in unhealthy positions in the neighbourhood of Assouan and Dongola? It was known that the Nile would soon begin to fall; that the climate would then become unhealthy, and that British troops, if retained there, would suffer considerable loss. Under such circumstances, would it not be wiser to undertake adequate and sufficient operations at once for the relief of General Gordon, who was undoubtedly expecting assistance from them? The Prime Minister had expressed surprise that General Gordon had addressed himself to the Mudir of Dongola, and not to Her Majesty's Government; but he forgot that General Gordon had told the Government that, as they had abandoned him, he would have nothing more to do with them, but that he would go to work on his own plan, and act upon his own judgment. For that reason, Gordon had sent the message to the Mudir of Dongola, the only person in the neighbourhood who had proved himself to be a man with resolution and courage. General Gordon had declined to have further intercourse with Her Majesty's Government, and nobody could blame him for it. Before he sat down, he wished to say a few words with regard to the fall of Berber and the massacre of its garrison. It was a matter which had several times been brought before the House. The Government were altogether responsible for the massacre, according to the best information in the possession of the House. It was a massacre of 3,500 human beings, and their responsibility was so direct that it could not be evaded. The Committee would remember that early in April, and throughout the month of April, very serious and reliable information reached this country from the Governor of Berber, who sent telegram after telegram pressing for aid, begging for reinforcements, and stating that his position was one of the direct peril. Those telegrams were made known to the country through the public Press, and they were also made the subject of Questions in that House. On the 24th of April, the Prime Minister made a deliberate statement to the House. He thought it was worth the while of the Prime Minister for a moment to notice what he was saying on this subject, because it very closely concerned the reputation and honour of the right hon. Gentleman. The Prime Minister was asked in that House whether there was any danger of Berber sharing the fate of Sinkat, and the right hon. Gentleman stated that as far as the Government knew there was no such risk. That was on the 24th of April, and yet on that day, and for a fortnight previously, the Prime Minister and the Government had been in possession of these telegrams from the Governor of Berber, stating that he was in the most dire and imminent peril. The Committee was now in possession of those telegrams, which came from the highest authority—from an official on the spot—on the 7th, 16th, 20th, 21st, and 23rd of April, gradually increasing in urgency, and every one pointing out that the danger of destruction and massacre was as imminent as it possibly could be. Under these circumstances, he thought he was justified in saying that the Government had ample warning of what was coming both from the Egyptian Government, Nubar Pasha, and Sir Evelyn Baring. Nubar Pasha absolutely advised that reinforcements should be sent, and yet the Prime Minister kept that information from the House, and took on himself the responsibility of stating that there was no risk of Berber sharing the fate of Sinkat. That was a very great responsibility indeed; and when the Prime Minister was asked if it was the fact that orders had been given by the British Government to prevent the Egyptian Government from sending the reinforcements they wished to send, the right hon. Gentleman said—"No, Sir; I have no information to that effect." Nevertheless, from the British Foreign Office the day before had gone out distinct instructions that no reinforcements or help should be sent to the Governor of Berber. He did not believe the Prime Minister could have made that statement if he could have had it in his own memory at the time that such a despatch had been sent out. But the right hon. Gentleman had seated by him at the time the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the rest of his Colleagues, and it was impossible that some of them should not have known that the statement of the Prime Minister was as inaccurate as any statement could possibly be, and it was their duty to have corrected him. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The Prime Minister shook his head. Would the right hon. Gentleman kindly state which of his (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's) statements he disputed, and give him chapter and verse for it? [Cries of "Oh!"] He had no wish to weary the Committee; but the sentence to which he had referred was an extremely short one, and he did not think his reading it would be seriously objected to. On the 25th of April, the day after the Prime Minister had stated that he had no reason to believe there was any risk of the garrison of Berber sharing the fate of that of Sinkat, the right hon. Gentleman was asked whether it was the fact that the Egyptian Government had abandoned the expedition on which they had decided for the relief of Berber, and that they had abandoned it by the direction of the British Cabinet? In reply to that Question, the right hon. Gentleman stated—"No, Sir; I have no information to that effect." Yet, on the 23rd, this despatch went out from the Foreign Office to Mr. Egerton—

"We cannot sanction an attempt to send troops to Hassan Pasha; no immediate assistance can be given."

Under those circumstances, he maintained that Her Majesty's Government were responsible for the massacre of the garrison of Berber. Two Egyptian battalions might have been sent to save the garrisons and the brave Egyptian Governor, who had so nobly done his duty. He had read a report from two British officers, who had received accounts from reliable merchants that entered Berber shortly after the capture, and saw the streets piled up with dead bodies. Major Kitchener had stated that he had not the slightest doubt that Berber was taken by a coup de main early in June, and that all the male inhabitants were slaughtered. What steps had Her Majesty's Government taken in regard to the women and children? None whatever. No efforts had been made to rescue them from slavery and a life of misery and degradation. It was well known that the British Ministry did nothing to rescue or ransom the women taken at Sinkat, and subjected to outrage and slavery by Osman Digna's fanatic soldiers. He had not the least doubt that the same fate would befall those who had been captured at Berber, although there were among them the wives and families of Egyptian and even of Europeans merchants. All of them would be subjected to horrible treatment, and, as far as he knew, Her Majesty's Government had made no attempt whatever to rescue them, or purchase their safety. Yet, while this was going on, and while thousands of unoffending people were being massacred in the Soudan owing to the shirking of responsibility by the British Government, they had two Cabinet Ministers going down to the Guildhall, and using very grandiose language about anti-slavery, and professing great abhorrence of the Slave Trade. He would not repeat what was said last night—the word of opprobrium which could alone describe such conduct; but he would leave hon. Members to imagine it. He did not intend to oppose the Vote; but he thought the Government were pursuing a course which was most unsatisfactory with regard to Egypt. The Prime Minister had made use of uncertain and ambiguous phrases—extraordinary phrases about Votes of principle. He should like to know why the Vote of £300,000 was described as “a Vote of principle.” And he should further like to know what was the difference meant by the right hon. Gentlemen between “preparations” and “operations?” [Cries of “Oh!” and “Divide!”] He did not intend to be intimidated by hon. Members opposite. He admitted that their interruptions were disagreeable; but he was very far from being intimidated by them. If hon. Members wished him to finish quickly, they had better hear him. He supposed that the difference between the “preparations” and “operations” of the Prime Minister was very much like that between “war” and “military operations.” He thought they had a right to ask from the Government that they should admit the necessity had arisen not only for preparations, but for efficient operations to be undertaken at once for the relief of General Gordon. Her Majesty's Government were undertaking the work in the slowest and most costly way possible. They were sending out small detachments of troops, and making little snatches at preparation, and were yet doing nothing that would bear actual fruit. The cost, in the long run, would be three-fold to the country if they continued to pursue this kind of half operation, and there would either be no result, or, at any rate, a less satisfactory result than there would be if the Government would undertake at once an adequate expedition. He urged on the Government, before the debate closed, to make some more reassuring statement than that of the Prime Minister's, and to admit that a necessity for immediate action undoubtedly existed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The proposed Vote will not require much discussion on the part of the supporters of the Government, or the majority of the Members of the House; but one or two remarks have been made by my hon. Friend on my right (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) to which I desire to make some allusion. As regards those that are to the disparagement of the character of General Gordon, I think General Gordon's character will take care of itself. I have very little doubt as to what will be the opinion of my fellow-countrymen in general, and probably of even the hon. Baronet, when the veil is raised, and the action of General Gordon during the last few months turns out to have been a series of acts of heroism. Let me turn now to one or two facts. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) seems to think that General Gordon was not appointed Governor General of the Soudan with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government. [MR. LABOUCHERE: Hear, hear!] Nothing can be further from the truth. General Gordon was requested to accept from the Khedive the position which was offered to him—the position of Governor General—and to obey any Firman of the Khedive, and he was as much appointed by her Majesty's Government Governor General of the Soudan as it was possible to be. He was not merely an Envoy; he was sent with responsible duties to perform, and the Government have never, in the slightest degree, disowned him. It was as the servant of the Government that he undertook these responsibilities. I am very glad indeed that this Vote is proposed. I do not think it was possible for the House to separate without it; and I was exceedingly glad to hear the strongest parts of the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War on Thursday last repeated by the Prime Minister. If, however, the Vote had been proposed some weeks or months ago, I think it probable that the very fact of its proposal might have obviated the necessity of the proceedings which are now to be taken. The only further remark I will make is that it is satisfactory to know that the Government are now sensible of their responsibilities, and of the fact that, without relief, the position of General Gordon might become a great calamity and a great disgrace to this country. Let us consider the position General Gordon is in. We have no positive knowledge as to what despatches have been received by General Gordon from Her Majesty's Government. The last information which has been given is the telegram of the 10th of April, in which he states that he had not received an important telegram of the 17th of March. From the latest intelligence received by General Gordon, we do not know that he has received the telegram containing Earl Granville's instructions of the 11th of March, or the telegrams, showing a change of policy, of the 13th and the 17th. The telegram of the 11th of March told him to hold on to Khartoum, and not to go in the direction of the Equator, and that telegram he may have received. In that case, his last instructions were that he was to hold on to Khartoum, and not to think of going to the South. There was another telegram, sent a day or two afterwards, telling General Gordon that he was at liberty to remain at Khartoum, if he saw any prospect of establishing a settled Government there. We have, therefore, reason to believe that if General Gordon has received any communications from the Government, those communications are telegrams telling him to remain at Khartoum, and, if possible, to establish a settled Government in that place.

MR. LABOUCHERE: By peaceable means.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Surely, every Member of the Committee must have read the Blue Books sufficiently to know that, having made the greatest efforts to bring about a settled state of things by peaceable means, he could not do it. When he telegraphed to Sir Evelyn Baring that, having found peaceable means unavailing, he must now show that he was going to use force, he was not discouraged by the Government. The Government must, therefore, be held to support the line of action adopted by General Gordon. Can my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) imagine that a man sent out as General Gordon was could do absolutely nothing—that being instructed to secure the free departure of the garrisons and surrounded by enemies who would use every effort to destroy him, he, under the circumstances, could do nothing, and would feel himself justified in abandoning them? That is the simple position. General Gordon is at Khartoum, as far as we know, ordered to hold on to that place. At any rate, he was not informed that his Mission is at an end. He was then attacked by the Mahdi and by the forces of the Mahdi, and he has, I imagine, been holding his own with very great courage and vigour. One difficulty which appears to attach to General Gordon's position is this—there is nothing more likely than that we shall find out that, though feeling himself—I do not want to make a complaint against the Government by using the word “neglected”—but almost unaided, having only two English officers with him, he has been rallying the people around him, getting them to fight with him, and thereby incurring obligations, which the Prime Minister has acknowledged, to those who have fought for him. General Gordon, no doubt, may hold his own for some time yet; but the time will come when the river will fall, when he will be unable to make use of his steamers, when his ammunition will be altogether inadequate; and unless he has relief, and is able to get the better of his enemies during the summer, there is almost a certainty that he will be in a position of the greatest possible danger, and a fearful calamity might happen if the Government did not send relief.

SIR JOHN HAY remarked, that a rumour had gone abroad that a considerable portion of the Vote was to be spent in subsidizing Abyssinian forces. He sincerely hoped that the Abyssinians were not going to be engaged in any expedition at the cost of Her Majesty's Government; and he therefore trusted that there was no truth in the rumour. He would be glad, however, to hear from the Government what the facts of the matter were. He quite admitted that the Government were entitled to be reticent as to the forces they were about to employ, and the nature of the operations they proposed to undertake—whether by river, by way of Suakin, or by a Southern approach to Khartoum. He fully recognized all that, and he did not ask for any information upon any such point. He thought the Government were right, in a matter concerning warlike operations, to be reticent, and not to afford to other persons the information which would be supplied if they were to answer such questions. But he hoped the Government did not intend to give money to the Abyssinians, for the purpose of getting that savage race to perform duties which they ought to perform themselves. He did not propose to go over the ground which had been so well occupied by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) in respect to the conduct and character of General Gordon; but there was one point on which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would, probably, give him some information. It had reference to the services of General Gordon against the Taepings in China. Either the noble Marquess or Sir George Lewis was Secretary of State for War at the time, and Colonel Gordon was at Shoeburyness at the time he received his appointment. He had always understood that it was by the wish of the Government, at the distinct desire of Viscount Palmerston, who communicated direct with Colonel Gordon, that he consented to proceed to China in order to put down the Taeping Rebellion. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was altogether mistaken in suggesting that General Gordon went out on his own accord. He went out in obedience to the wishes and commands of Her Majesty's Government. He had considered it necessary to say this, because the hon. Baronet seemed to imply that General Gordon had been seeking for distinction in foreign employment, and was not acting by the command of his own Sovereign. That was an entire mistake, and he (Sir John Hay) was able to correct it, because he had full cognizance of the real facts of the case. He hoped to receive an answer from Her Majesty's Government as to the employment of Abyssinian troops.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he hardly thought his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was serious when he asserted that the Vote was asked for in order to smash the Mahdi. Anyone who had followed the career of General Gordon must admit that there was no officer in the service and pay of the Crown who more fully and completely acknowledged his responsibilities; and he thought the hon. Baronet could have been hardly serious in suggesting that General Gordon went out of his own will to China. Nor could he (Mr. Arnold) agree with the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) in desiring to make the Vote a definite one. It was, as it had been described by the Prime Minister, a Vote of principle; and the Committee would establish a very bad precedent if they were to consent to tie up the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and allow them to expend the exact amount of this Vote, but nothing more. The hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) said that, as this was to be a Vote of principle, Her Majesty's Government no longer asserted that General Gordon had departed from the objects of his Mission. No expression of that sort had fallen from the Prime Minister, nor could there have been, because the facts were plain and palpable to all the world. His right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not seem to be aware of the fact that the last telegram sent to General Gordon by the Government enjoined him to consider measures for his own removal, and the removal of others who had suffered with him, by whatever route he might think best.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, there was no evidence that General Gordon had ever received that telegram.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he thought there was good reason to believe that the telegram had reached General Gordon. It was dated March 17, and it stated that as the original plan for the evacuation of Khartoum had been dropped, and as aggressive operations could not be undertaken with the countenance of Her Majesty's Government, General Gordon was to consider, and either to report upon, or, if feasible, to adopt, at the first proper moment, measures for his own removal, and for the removal of those Egyptians who had been suffering with him in Khartoum. That showed that General Gordon had received distinct orders from Her Majesty's Government to leave Khartoum as soon as he could. ["No, no!"] There was nothing to show that any distinct route had been given to him; but the despatch showed that the instructions given to General Gordon were to leave Khartoum as soon as he could. He wished to congratulate the Government on the tone of the only speech which, as yet, had fallen from the Front Opposition Bench—the speech delivered by the right hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke). When he remembered what the right hon. Gentleman had said on the subject a few months ago, and compared it with the speech which had just fallen from him, he thought Her Majesty's Government could desire no stronger testimony as to the judicious policy they had adopted. ["Oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman had certainly uttered no word of complaint, either as to the amount of the Vote or to the steps the Government proposed to take in the matter. Believing that Her Majesty's Government had acted with wise and prudent foresight in the matter, he should certainly support the Vote.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had stated that this expedition was necessary in consequence of the original policy of sending General Gordon out to Khartoum. There was, however, another part of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman to which he wished to call attention—namely that the Vote was necessary for "preparations." But the right hon. Gentleman then went on to say that it was impossible to determine, at present, what the nature of the preparations would be. He wanted to know how could the right hon. Gentleman say that he was going to make preparations if he did not know what preparations were to be made? What had the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues been thinking of for the last six months? It was evident that this proposition was not meant to be seriously acted upon, but was to be used as an electioneering cry during the Recess. It was simply intended that the Government and their supporters should be able to go to the country at the end of the Session and be able to say, in the event of any disaster, after putting the question off so long, that they had asked Parliament to grant them further powers. At the same time, he did not believe they intended to use them if they could help themselves, especially after the apathetic policy they had employed so long. They had sent out General Gordon alone; they had neglected him ever since; they had allowed garrison after garrison to be massacred; and now, for electioneering purposes, they proposed to render aid to him. In his humble opinion, it would be proved in October, when the House reassembled, either that General Gordon had been massacred, or, if he had succeeded in leaving Khartoum, that he had done so unaided.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It would hardly have been necessary for me to trouble the Committee at all with any observations but for the question put by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), who said he entirely approves of the Vote, which he expects to be expended in warlike operations, but, at the same time, he has heard a rumour that a portion of this money is to be sent to the Abyssinians for the purpose of subsidizing them in relieving General Gordon. I may say, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that this is the first time they have heard that rumour. Although it would not be possible for us to enter into details as to the mode in which we propose to spend the money, I have no difficulty in saying that such an employment of the money would not be within the purpose of the Vote. The noble Viscount who has just sat down, has mistaken what was said by my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend did not say that we should not make such preparations as might be necessary, though he intimated that it would be impossible to say what form our preparations might assume, until we knew whether there would be a necessity for active operations. I cannot agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), that General Gordon was disobeying the instructions given him. There is no proof whatever of that, though some rumours which reached us from time to time about General Gordon seemed inconsistent with his instructions, and were difficult to understand, and we asked for explanations. But there was certainly nothing whatever to prove that General Gordon has in any way departed from the original object of his Mission, which was to withdraw by peaceable means, and if not, if he found it necessary, to employ armed force. It is true that we heard lately that General Gordon was engaged in active operations. How much of that is true or not, it is impossible to say. But it is quite reasonable, and very probable, that the only means that General Gordon might find for maintaining his own position at Khartoum, and withdrawing the garrison, was to assume offensive operations. My hon. Friend also said that General Gordon was endeavouring to induce Egypt to reconquer the Soudan. Whatever may be the minor inconsistencies of General Gordon, that is a most improbable conclusion. We know that if General Gordon had one conviction stronger than another, it was that the whole Soudan had been brought into its present position by the domination of Egypt. It is probable that General Gordon, before retiring from Khartoum, might desire to establish some settled form of Government. That, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, would be exceeding his instructions. ["Oh!"] His Mission, and his primary object, were to evacuate the Soudan. Certainly no instructions were ever given to General Gordon to establish a settled form of Government. At the same time, there is not the slightest doubt that he has undertaken a most beneficial and salutary work. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke) thinks it hard to be called upon to support this Vote, because he opposed the Mission of General Gordon originally, and prophesied that it would involve us in an expedition for relief. I cannot recollect that the right hon. Gentleman indulged in that prediction; but I can well believe that, as the right hon. Gentleman is not inclined to take a favourable view of anything done by Her Majesty's Government, he spoke disapprovingly of the Mission of General Gordon. But, nevertheless, a strong opinion was very generally entertained that it was extremely probable, such was the influence he had shown himself to exercise over the Native races, that he would be better able, than any other man, to secure by his personal influence, unaided by any material force, the withdrawal of the garrisons from the Soudan without bloodshed, and without further loss of life. The right hon. Gentleman also says that General Gordon long ago reproached us with having cast indelible disgrace upon the British name. We discussed those telegrams two months ago, and I have no wish to reopen the question; but what I want to point out is, that General Gordon, as far as the Government know, never addressed any request to them for the assistance of a British Force to rescue him and those with him. He did suggest that if Zubeir was appointed Governor of Khartoum, a small force in connection with that appointment should be despatched to Berber; but he never, to the knowledge of the Government, recommended, or suggested, as part of the requirements for rescuing him, that the despatch of an Army was necessary. Whatever the obligations of the Government to General Gordon, and they are very great and onerous, General Gordon is the last man in the world to suggest the employment of a British Force to insure his own personal safety. The right hon. Gentleman has discussed the probable position of General Gordon. It is very difficult to know what messages General Gordon may have received, and what he has not received. There is every prospect, however, that in a very short time more authentic information will be received about General Gordon, the policy which he is pursuing, and his ability to hold out at Khartoum, or the probability of his withdrawing with that portion of the garrison which is desirous of withdrawing with him. Major Kitchener is, it appears, in communication with tribes apparently not under the influence of the Mahdi; and it is possible that he may, by means of negotiations which are going on with powerful tribes, be able to establish communications with General Gordon. When such communications shall have been established, the Government and the country will be in a better position than they can be now to judge what measures are necessary for the fulfilment of the obligations which they have undertaken.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I must say a very few words in consequence, principally, of what has fallen from the noble Marquess, and partly in consequence of a remark made just now by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold). The hon. Member was mistaken in supposing that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke), who is unfortunately not in the House at this moment, but who has told me the substance of what he said, and I am so well aware of his views that I feel perfectly certain the hon. Member was mistaken in supposing the speech of my right hon. Friend was an acknowledgment of the propriety of the conduct of the Government with regard to General Gordon. My right hon. Friend had no intention of entering into a general discussion of the policy of the Government in regard to General Gordon, nor did he think that this was an occasion on which it was desirable to enter into such a discussion. What the Opposition desire to do by supporting the Vote of Credit is to express their sympathy with General Gordon, and their desire to rescue him from the position in which he is placed, partly by the conduct of the Government, and partly by his own gallant spirit and his own gallant conduct. The noble Marquess said that he considered the policy of the Government in sending out General Gordon had received the approbation of Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House. That is not a correct statement. We sympathized with and wished well to General Gordon, and believed that if any man was to do that which was suggested, he was the best man for the purpose. But I am bound to add that we believed that the Government, after sending him to perform so very difficult and almost hopeless a task, would support him in a manner that would enable him to get through his Mission. If we were called upon now, which I hope we are not, to review the whole conduct of the Government in relation to General Gordon, I am afraid that we could not agree that it has been of a satisfactory character. On the contrary, the Opposition hold that the conduct of the Government has been excessively blameworthy, and that the Government are largely responsible for the difficulties in which General Gordon was placed, and for not having, as the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) has pointed out, taken at an earlier stage the step which they are now taking, and which, if taken sooner, might have prevented the mischief which has happened. But we cordially agree with the indications they are now giving that they do think the time may be at hand—at all events, that the time may come—in which they will arouse themselves, and do something to rescue General Gordon. We are anxious to give them the means of doing something for General Gordon. If I may make a complaint of anything, it would be that we were not told with sufficient distinctness what the Government meant by "the contingency that might arise." The noble Marquess spoke of communications being made through Dongola; but there exists no certain reason for thinking that that would be the case. A great deal of time has already been spent, and we have no information to encourage us to think that communications of that kind may be restored. I trust that the Government have formed some plan in their own mind, by which they will be able clearly to ascertain what is the exact position of General Gordon, and to afford him support and bring him away. The country ought to be pacified and left in a satisfactory state, the pacification of the country being one of Gordon's main objects. It was not General Gordon's only object to bring away a certain number of troops from the Soudan. What was thought was, that by the influence of his character he would be able to bring the garrisons away with safety to himself, and without leaving a condition of anarchy behind. Everybody believed that if the garrisons were hastily withdrawn, they would leave behind them a terrible state of confusion and anarchy. I cannot refer to the Papers now, and I am speaking from memory; but I say that I see in the earliest communications of General Gordon that he was endeavouring to restore or provide for a system of peaceful government in the country which must now be abandoned. It was, however, one of the main objects set before him in his instructions, and his communications with the Government show that he believed it to be his task. The question before the Committee, however, is not the discussion of the general principle of the Government in regard to the Mission of General Gordon. I have no intention of entering into such a discussion. What we have now before us is a proposal that some provision should be made for the rescue of General Gordon, whenever that can be effected. I do not at all complain of the Government for being reticent as to the particular mode they propose to adopt. I think I understood what the Prime Minister meant when he said that this is a Vote of principle. It permits the Government to see that the work is properly carried through, if it can be carried through, for the sum mentioned; but should more extensive operations be necessary for the rescue of General Gordon, Parliament would, of course, feel it necessary to support the Government in the matter. If the work can be carried through for the sum mentioned, of course, it would be highly satisfactory.

MR. WILLIS said, that looking at this matter, and exercising his own judgment, he thought that General Gordon had failed in the Mission he had undertaken. He had not procured the return of the garrisons, nor had he given up to the Chiefs of the tribes the government of the country as was proposed. General Gordon went out to effect the abandonment of the Soudan which had been governed by intrigue and cruelty; but it appeared by the telegram on page 115 of the Blue Book, that he had changed the whole course of his policy and decided to postpone the evacuation of the district. He desired to have Egyptian and British troops sent to him for the purpose of maintaining himself in the position of Governor General, when, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) must know, he had gone out as Governor General of the Soudan, without the expectation of receiving any assistance in men or money. Even when General Gordon drew up a plan for a successor whom he named, that successor was not to receive either men or money for the purpose of maintaining his position. He contended, therefore, that the Mission of General Gordon had failed, and that it was the duty of the Government to determine that Mission, and to see that no part of the money now asked for should be used for the purpose of maintaining General Gordon in the Soudan. He maintained that General Gordon had by no means proved himself to be a great hero. On the 27th of February, in his Proclamation of that date, he declared to the people that British troops were coming to Khartoum, and he (Mr. Willis) said that General Gordon had no ground whatever for making that statement. Again, he had endeavoured and actually proposed to destroy the troops of the Mahdi, who was endeavouring to relieve the country from the cruelty and oppression under which it had so long suffered. If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would give the assurance he asked for, that none of the money should be applied to maintain Egyptian, or other rule, in the Soudan, he should offer him the assistance of his vote; but, if not, he should feel it his duty to vote against the Motion before the Committee.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he wished to draw attention to a statement made by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. A few minutes ago, the noble Marquess, whose words he had taken down, said that General Gordon would have been exceeding his instructions in endeavouring to establish an organized Government in Khartoum. Now, he (Baron Henry De Worms) distinctly stated, on the authority of the instructions given by Her Majesty's Government to General Gordon, that those instructions were entirely at variance with the noble Marquess's statement. The instructions to General Gordon contained this passage—

"We trust Your Excellency will take most effective measures to establish an organized Government in the different Provinces of the Soudan, for the maintenance of order and the suppression of the incitement to revolt."

He would ask how those instructions, given to General Gordon when he was sent on his absurd Mission, could be reconciled with the statement just made by the noble Marquess, when he said that General Gordon would be exceeding his instructions in endeavouring to establish an organized form of Government in Khartoum?

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, it was now four years since the bombardment of Alexandria took place; but the history of events during that period could not have been very gratifying or encouraging to Members in any part of the House, for it had been, on the whole, a history of misfortune and vicissitude. He was one of those who, at the outset, deprecated interference in Egypt by means of that bombardment, and he had also voted against the rewards and pensions given to two officers in respect of the naval and military proceedings which took place. It was said that the Committee were not called upon on that occasion to enter into the question of the general management of the Government in that part of the world, but that they were asked to support a Vote of £300,000 for the relief of General Gordon. They had some satisfaction from the utterances of the Prime Minister that the money would not be wanted except in case of certain contingencies arising; and he (Mr. Illingworth) had only risen to say that, having himself taken no part in the matter, he intended to remain neutral. He admitted that no responsibility rested on the Government in their relationship with General Gordon; but he quite understood that the object of the money asked for was to secure the retirement and withdrawal from the obligations which he had taken upon himself. It was too early to enter upon the point as to the way in which General Gordon had carried out his Mission. In his opinion, he had from the first entered upon an almost impossible task; and it would not be surprising to him if he should signally fail in doing that which he led many to believe he would be able to do if the Government sanctioned his Mission. As to the money he asked for, he sincerely hoped that any enterprise undertaken would be a very narrow one, and that it would not be made a precedent for further operations. There was a point to which he would like to call the attention of the Committee. Doubt had been expressed as to whether General Gordon had received a telegraphic answer sent to him by Earl Granville; but he ventured to think that there was no ground for believing that the despatch had not reached him. It laid down the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and called upon him to retire from the Soudan as soon as possible, and to bring away those persons who were able to leave Khartoum with him. He trusted that that was still the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and that they intended to carry it out. He would only add that he did not regard General Gordon as anything like a safe instrument to be relied on by the Government in carrying out their work in Egypt. He believed that hereafter it would be found that their interference in that country was altogether unnecessary, and that they might have safeguarded their interests without making themselves responsible for the government of Egypt and getting themselves entangled in its ruins.

COLONEL MAKINS said, it seemed to be the general wish of hon. Members that the promises made to General Gordon should be fulfilled. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) found himself in a great dilemma with regard to this question. He implied that he should not mind the promises being fulfilled, provided it could be done cheaply; but that he should object to their fulfilment if the cost exceeded by 1*d.* the amount which he considered proper. For his own part, he (Colonel Makins) wished the Vote were for a much larger sum, for the reason that, as a Vote of Credit, it would not have been necessary to use the whole amount, while it would have had a very much larger effect. It would have shown the Mahdi and those who advised him that the Government and people of England were really in earnest, whereas he would now be very likely to think that the proposal of the Government was only a small Party move, and that the paltry sum asked for could not be really intended for the purpose of putting him down; and probably he would be encouraged in his opposition rather than the reverse. But, small as the Vote was, he was glad to see it asked for, because it showed that the Government had some regard for their Representative in the Soudan; and upon that ground he should feel it his duty to support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR HENRY TYLER reminded the Committee that the reason why the military expedition to Suakin had no result was because it was not followed up, as it should have been, by the construction of a railway from Suakin to Berber. The line could have been constructed with comparative ease, and the brave Arabs who had been so fruitlessly slaughtered would have been better employed in making the railways than in fighting, and when taken into British pay they would have been its best protection. Had that railway been constructed to Berber, the difficulties of the present position would have been very much lessened; and Her Majesty's Government would, at the same time, have done a good work by opening up the commerce of Central Africa, and conferring a permanent benefit on the world.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 174; Noes 14: Majority 160.—(Div. List, No. 210.)

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £452,627, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland."

Mr. MOLLOY asked the Secretary to the Treasury to be good enough to state the order in which the Irish Votes would be taken.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the understanding was that if they got through the Vote of Credit at a reasonable time they should go on with Classes VI. and VII.; if they were disposed of by half-past 11 it was intended to take the Constabulary Vote.

Mr. MOLLOY said, that the statement of the Prime Minister was that the Constabulary Vote would not be taken without due Notice.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he was desirous of ascertaining what was to be done with regard to the claims of the teachers in Convent Schools in Ireland. As neither the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary nor the Solicitor General for Ireland, who could speak on behalf of the Irish Government, were present, he should be glad if some Representative of Her Majesty's Government would state whether or not they had, up to the present time, come to any conclusion with regard to the proposal to increase the emoluments of nuns in view of the good work they were doing and had done in times past. Some time ago the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had been drawn to this question, when he said that he was formulating a plan by which he proposed to increase those emoluments. It would seem that the right hon. Gentleman had put the matter off; and he (Mr. Biggar) had supposed that when the Vote for Education in Ireland came forward the right hon. Gentleman would have been in a position to state his views on the subject. He hoped that someone on behalf of the Government would state what it was really intended to do. He did not propose to go into all the grievances of which the nuns complained; but it could not be denied that, while they had produced a tangible result by the example which they set to the people, they were under great disadvantages in respect of emoluments inasmuch as they received no pensions and no salaries.

Mr. COURTNEY said, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland was not present—a fact which he regretted, because probably he would be able to give some information to the Committee in relation to the views of the Government in this matter. He might say that, in his opinion, no conclusion had been arrived at, because he apprehended that, had the Irish Government decided upon the course they intended to pursue, they would have applied to the Treasury to sanction an order for payment. No application had been made or sanctioned, and, therefore, he concluded that the proposed arrangements of the Irish Government had not reached their final stage; but how far they had gone he was not in a position to state.

Mr. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked what the Government proposed to do with regard to the question of National School teachers, in view of the Division of Friday night? He need not repeat to the Committee the arguments he had made use of on that occasion, but would simply ask if the Government could see their way to introduce a Supplementary Estimate.

Mr. COURTNEY said, that would be rather too rapid a procedure. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had stated fully the other night what were the intentions of the Government in this matter, and had said that legislation would be introduced to deal with it next year.

Mr. HEALY said, he did not quite catch what the hon. Gentleman had said with regard to next year; but he had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to say that he would bring in a Bill. He asked whether that was the sum and substance of the intentions of the Government in this matter, because, if so, it must really give rise to a long discussion. He had watched closely to see whether, after the vote of Friday last, the Government would come forward and make a more substantial statement on the subject. The Treasury had pocketed no less a sum than £200,000, by reason of the Unions not having contributed the moiety, which, when the Act was passed, it was contemplated they would pay; but the Unions had not become contributories, because they declined to pay money towards a system over which they had no control. There was no fault to be found with that; but he complained that the Government knew that the money would not be paid. That was a very important element in the case, and one to which he thought the Government ought to address themselves at once. At all events, the Government must admit that the expectations which the National School teachers had been allowed to cherish had been frustrated. The teachers were led to expect that they would receive a certain annual sum from the State and another annual sum from the Unions. That was clearly an admission that the teachers were to receive the money; but, owing to the clumsy plan proposed by the Conservative Government, it had happened that the teachers had practically got nothing at all from the Unions. It was admitted that a plan had been proposed by the Government to remedy this; but that plan had not come into operation, and he desired to know whether the Government were going to throw overboard the intentions of the Conservative Government in 1875. The position of the teachers was this. The National School teachers of Ireland only received £58 a-year on the average, as compared with double that sum which was received by the teachers in England and Scotland; the teachers were entitled to a sum in addition to that which was now received. A plan had been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but that plan had failed, and, owing to its failure, the sum of £250,000 had not been disbursed, as it was expected it would have been, amongst the teachers. That being the state of the case, the question was, what were the teachers to receive in consequence? It was no answer to the unfortunate teacher who received only £70 a-year to throw the blame on the Unions. The teacher said the State had allowed him to form certain expectations, that he had indulged in those expectations, and that he had been disappointed, because the machinery brought into operation by the State had not proved satisfactory. And while it was no answer to the teacher to refer him to the Unions, he (Mr. Healy) said that the simple proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to bring in a Bill for compulsory education was something entirely beyond the question. Pledges had been given to Irish Members last year which had not been fulfilled, and the pledges with regard to next year would doubtless meet the same fate, because it was not at all likely that next Session the House would be in any frame of mind to go into the question of compulsory education in Ireland. He hoped they should hear from the Government a much more satisfactory statement than they had had that evening. The House had very nearly adopted the Resolution moved on Friday last by his hon. Friend (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy), on which occasion the Government escaped by the merest majority a vote ordering them to do what was wanted. Surely the representations of Irish Members on this question were deserving of some consideration. He believed that it was only a question whether the Government could get a single Irishman to follow them into the Lobby, and he believed they had not one single Irish supporter except the Solicitor General for Ireland. The opinions of hon. Members who voted in the minority on that occasion were entitled to respect. Were they to be informed, when they brought forward their grievances for redress, that those grievances were to be redressed by the kindly wand of British legislation, and were they afterwards to find themselves left in the lurch? They had that evening already voted £300,000 for the relief of General Gordon; but this was a question of far more importance than the government of the Soudan, which country the Government were going to abandon. When they voted with a light heart sums of money like this, and for such a purpose, were they to be told that it was too late in the Session to do anything tending to improve the state of education in Ireland? He thought that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the manner in which the Government had met this complaint, after having in view the much larger sum they had obtained from the Committee for a less important purpose.

MR. BERESFORD said, on Friday last he had unfortunately missed the Division, or he should certainly have voted with the minority. He believed that the National School teachers in Ireland were justly dissatisfied with the position in which they found themselves, which had been shown to be unremunerative as compared with the position of teachers in this country. He had been recently speaking with some National School teachers in the North of Ireland, and he could assure the Committee that they were a most deserving class of men, and that the work they had to do they performed in a most efficient manner. He trusted the Government would take their position into consideration, and do something in their behalf.

MR. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had raised a very ingenious argument to show that the Treasury ought to increase the salaries of National School teachers. The hon. Member had said that the right hon. Gentleman to whom this work was entrusted contemplated, when it was originally introduced, that the Unions should contribute one moiety of the expense; and he contended that, the Unions not having done so, the Treasury should make good the amount to the teachers. It was quite true the Treasury had not disbursed the money; but he was afraid that all he could say in this matter was that, although the local taxation had not been levied, he could not admit that any claim arose upon the Treasury. Then the hon. Gentleman advanced an argument which, in a Parliamentary sense, was even more defective than the ingenious arguments which preceded it. He pointed to the fact that there had been a very narrow Division on Friday night, in which the Government barely escaped defeat. No doubt that was a very important fact; but, at the same time, those Members who resisted that Motion, and those Members who were not present to resist that Motion, must pay some attention to the character of the demand. What was the demand? It was submitted, in the first place, that the salaries of the school teachers were inadequate. Assuming that to be so—admitting, for the moment, that the salaries were inadequate and insufficient—then the question arose, by whom should the deficiency be made up? Who should be called upon to supply an adequate amount? In comparison with the salaries obtained by school teachers in England and Scotland, no doubt those in Ireland were small. Whether they were relatively less was still a matter open to considerable debate. Undoubtedly they were less in amount; but the proportion of money drawn from the Imperial Exchequer for Ireland was infinitely greater than that drawn for England or Scotland. That being so, the deficiency, it seemed to him, must be made up from local sources, and not at the cost of the Exchequer. Of course, Irish Members would urge that the deficiency should be made up by the Exchequer; and he knew of no part of the country which, in such a case, would not prefer that the Exchequer should make up what was required. He found it so in Wales, and elsewhere. Everyone wanted their deficiencies to be met by the Imperial Exchequer; and it was, therefore, not surprising that the plea for making up the deficiency in this case from the Imperial Exchequer should be supported by all the Irish Members, including the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Beresford). Even the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was willing to join in "looting" the Treasury. He could not admit that the combination of Irish Members in support of a demand on behalf of the Irish teachers at the expense of the Exchequer was an overwhelming condemnation of the existing state of things; and when this matter was being considered, regard must be had to the fact that an immensely greater amount of money was granted for Ireland than for England or Scotland. However, next year, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) intended to bring in a Bill which would deal with the whole question of public education in Ireland, and not the least of the effects of that Bill would probably be the improvement of the salaries of school teachers.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY said, the Secretary to the Treasury had not fairly met the question at issue; and he maintained that if the Government undertook this work of education they must do it well and thoroughly. If they insisted upon governing Ireland, it was only fair that they should carry out the work of education in that country properly and cheaply. Irish Members, of course, protested against the whole system upon which the English Government administered the affairs of Ireland; but as long as they insisted on carrying on that administration it was the duty of himself and his hon. Friends to put forward and press these claims. It in no way touched the question to say that more was given to Ireland from the Imperial Exchequer than to England or Scotland, because their contention was that the amount was not sufficient. If English and Scotch teachers were content, that was their own affair; but Irish teachers were not at all content with the miserable pittance doled out to them, and their Representatives felt bound to protest against the insufficiency. That should be considered an overwhelming argument. With regard to the Division on Friday night, most of those who took part in it were not Irish Members, but English Members of various shades of politics; and he fancied that if there had been that fuller House to which the Secretary to the Treasury had confidently referred, it would have been found that a large number of those who were absent would have gone with the minority against the Government. If a proposal to adopt a Supplementary Vote was so easily accepted by the Government when it concerned the relief of General Gordon, he thought it might as readily be accepted when it concerned the much more serious case of the Irish National teachers, who had suffered a long time, and whose interests were quite as important as those of General Gordon.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT said, he was not in the habit of taking part in Irish debates; but in this case he must say that had he been present on Friday night he should have voted with his hon. Friends below the Gangway, in the same way as the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Beresford) would have voted with them had he been present. Then, he would like to know, where would the majority of the Government have been? The question, as he gathered from the speech of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), was that the Irish teachers were paid in a most insufficient manner, receiving only an average of £57 a-year. It was not a question of where the money came from. If these teachers were employed and entrusted with the important function of educating the population, they must be paid properly, and not such starvation salaries as they now received. If the Irish Members now went to a Division he should support them.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY observed, that the Secretary to the Treasury admitted their grievance, but did not agree in their remedy. He said the liability for making good the deficiency must rest with the localities, and not with the Treasury. The Government had put forward a scheme by which the teachers were to receive larger remuneration; but that scheme broke down, and the question now was, what should be done? The hon. Gentleman said there must be a re-adjustment of the whole matter, and another scheme at some other time; but, in the meantime, what was to become of these starving people? The Government had not shaped their scheme; it could not come on that Session or during the Autumn Session, and probably it would not have the slightest chance of coming on in the Session of next year. Then there might come a General Election; and while all these things were taking place year after year, what was to become of these teachers with their £57 a-year? While the Government were preparing their scheme and arranging what they were going to do, he thought they should take from the Treasury enough money to keep these people from starving; and having done that they would be able, with an easier conscience, to enter upon their larger scheme for paying the teachers without taxing the localities too heavily, and without taking too much from the Treasury.

MR. KENNY said, the Secretary to the Treasury had advanced arguments which had nothing to do with the question, his argument being that the sum allowed for Ireland was larger than the amount granted for either England or Scotland. They all knew that; but the state of things in Ireland was absolutely different from that in the other parts of the Kingdom. In England the Local Authorities had control over these matters; they had compulsory rates, and they had School Boards; but in Ireland that was not so. The Secretary to the Treasury had, in fact, made no defence of this treatment of the Irish teachers. The hon. Gentleman could not deny that the teachers had this grievance; and if the matter was pressed upon him he would have to admit it for the sake of truth as well as for the sake of argument. The amount of money contributed in Ireland locally was very small; but the people in Ireland were not compelled to pay for education, and what was levied was a sort of voluntary rate. In some instances, the Boards of Guardians did not levy a rate; they had no control over the money, and the result was that they took up the Act of 1875 at one time with greater readiness than they did now; and the Act had now practically fallen into disuse. The Secretary to the Treasury seemed to be in great glee over the idea of another Division on this question, evidently believing himself to be safe with the myrmidons whom he had brought down by a four-line Whip to defeat the Irish Members. He remembered that not long ago, when the hon. Member for Waterford asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for an interview respecting the granting of some money for certain purposes in Ireland, the hon. Gentleman said he did not want an interview, and the hon. Member could put down what he wanted to say in writing. The Secretary to the Treasury endeavoured to prevent a purely Irish fund being applied to Irish purposes; but in the end he was forced to give way, and now, in regard to this case of the Irish teachers, the best he could say in a speech specially prepared to minimize the claims of the teachers, was that the English teachers only received half as much again as the Irish teachers. Then he endeavoured to make a distinction, and to show that, after all, the Irish teachers were in almost as good a position as the English teachers. When this question was brought forward, the hon. Gentleman calmly said the Irish teachers were as well paid as the English teachers, having regard to the demand for labour, and the current rate of wages in England and in Ireland. But the class from whom these teachers were drawn had now open to it a variety of occupations. Since the Civil Service had been thrown open a large number of Irishmen had gone into the Service, and the result of so many of this class being drawn away was that the teachers, and especially the younger teachers, had to be recruited from a class very inferior to that from which they were drawn 10 or 15 years ago. That was due to the fact that the salaries given to teachers were not equal to the salaries given in the Civil Service, and if this state of things continued the class of Irish teachers was bound to still further depreciate; and whatever the Secretary to the Treasury might say against further grants from the Consolidated Fund, it was certain that unless something was done to improve the class of Irish teachers and the future education in Ireland there would be an end to efficient instruction.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, he thought that all who knew anything about Irish education would agree that the emoluments given to Irish teachers were not such as they would desire to see given to men of efficient training. There were some points, at all events, of common agreement on which Irish Members on the opposite side, and many educationalists on this side would be in common accord. In the first place, the Irish teachers had been and were very efficiently trained. Religious difficulties in Ireland had prevented their getting their training in neutral and common training schools, and the Government—too late, he thought—had perceived that difficulty, and had recently voted a certain amount of money in order that teachers might receive training according to their religious professions and in denominational training schools — as, indeed, they were trained in Scotland. This Vote all educationalists would like to see augmented; and if that were done, as the teachers got better training their classification would improve. As their pay depended on their classification, more efficient training would produce a larger grant, and any such larger grant he, at least, should gladly welcome. There was another reason why they thought the Education Vote should be increased in Ireland, and partly from the Exchequer, and that was that there might be better results from training and a better set of teachers. When payment was according to results there must be effective teachers to obtain those results. The payment for results would become augmented, and that would be a legitimate source from which the Imperial Exchequer might augment the grant. A third point was that payment should be made for increased attendances. The average attendance in Irish schools was lamentably low; but if there was a system of compulsory attendance, there would be a larger number of scholars in the schools, and that was a result greatly to be desired. At present, in Ireland, there was the extraordinary result that there were still 41 per cent of the population who could neither read or write. If the Government only accepted the principle of compulsory education, and largely increased the attendances, that would be a legitimate method by which they could increase the grant for education in Ireland. Upon these three points they were agreed. Where did they differ? They differed in this. In England and Scotland they said—and they ought to say in Ireland also—that National education was not the duty of the State alone. It was the duty of the State and of the nation. They ought not to produce teachers by wholly Government expenditure. National education meant aid from the State supported by the nation to whom that aid was given, and here it was that they found such a lamentable difference between the position in Ireland and the position in Great Britain. Just let them see what the difference was. If they compared the Voluntary Schools in England with the Denominational Schools in Ireland—for, talk of the system of education as they liked, the schools in Ireland were notoriously denominational—they were to a large extent managed by the priests, and the masters were appointed by the clerical managers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, and were dismissable by them, and the subjects of study were controlled by these masters, so that there could be no doubt of the denominational character of the schools. Well, if they compared this system in Ireland with the rate-supported system in England they would find that the cost of a pupil in a Voluntary School in England was £1 14s. 0d., while in Ireland it was £1 13s. 0d., or very nearly the same. But how was this met in the two countries? Why, in England, it was met by 19s. of local aid—that was to say, by fees and subscriptions—and by 5s. 11½d. of local aid in Ireland, or nearly 6s.; so that, as hon. Members would see, the difference was very great. In Ireland the State had to pay 81 per cent of the cost of education. The pence of the children paid 18 per cent, and local subscriptions paid only 1 per cent. Now, what was 1 per cent for a nation to pay in aid of the State trying to advance the welfare of the people? It was nothing at all. In 1875 the Irish people came forward—he recollected speaking on the subject in that year—and put, not a compulsory system of rating on their Boards of Guardians, but a voluntary system, and in the second year they found £6,000 come in in that way. Last year, he was glad to say, the amount received in this way was larger than two years ago; but now it was only £14,000. Well, what was £14,000 given by the local rates of Ireland to meet the £720,000 given by the State? It was nothing at all. Ireland could not be absolved from its duty as a nation to come forward and co-operate with the State in the education of the people. The Irish had no right to say—"Give us everything from the Exchequer," and English and Scotch Members said to them—"Do your duty as a nation, and aid the State when it comes largely forward with money, giving £720,000 for the advancement and enlightenment of your country." Let them give, not 1 per cent, but largely. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) said the other day—"Do you wish us to have a compulsory rate in Ireland? If you do

I tell you that this compulsory rating must be applied wholly to Roman Catholic education, because 75 per cent of the population of Ireland are Roman Catholics. If you rate the people compulsorily the rates must be applied to Roman Catholic schools." Now, except in incidence, what was the difference between a local tax and an Imperial tax? The difference was only a matter of area and locality. Suppose they applied this principle of the hon. Member for Monaghan to the £720,000 which the State granted for education in Ireland. They would have to remember that out of that £720,000, £620,000 came from Protestant England and Scotland, and would be obliged to apply it to Protestant education. Whether they were taxing for Imperial or for local purposes, the money must be applied for the benefit of the people taxed. The Imperial taxes applied to the whole of the people whatever their religious belief, and local taxes were for the benefit of the whole of the locality on the same principle. In this matter what was he endeavouring to bring about? Hon. Members knew that he had always been and was extremely anxious for advanced education in Ireland. He was dissatisfied with the results obtained. They wanted a development of their National Board, for it had not achieved good results. It had been in existence 50 years, and certainly had not produced the results which were to have been expected. They must, before they could get complete command over their schools, have local rating and Local Boards. He knew the difficulties in the way of bringing about this local rating and establishing these Local Boards. Many would like to establish them; but would the priests like them? No; and if it was attempted to establish them great difficulties would be encountered. But if they could be appointed he did not doubt that they would be productive of great good in enlisting local co-operation. What they wanted in Ireland was Local Boards, and local co-operation in school matters. They should not always look to the Government for increasing aid. Let them get the localities interested in the advance of education, and having secured Local Boards and local management, let them come to the State for increased aid. Let the Government, which tried to advance education, find that ardent local co-operation which it wished to find, and let it discover those local desires for the purposes of education which were so essential, and without which the education and enlightenment of the people could not be satisfactorily advanced. An hon. Member opposite (Mr. Montagu Scott) said that on the Vote the other day they might have defeated the Government. He was sorry if that were so. If he had been present he should have voted with the Government, not because he had the least jealousy of the purposes of education in Ireland. He did not care whether education there was denominational, or mixed; but what he did care for was that the State should only do its part, and that the nation should do its part in order to meet the State. Without that they could not expect to diffuse education over Ireland, which was so essential in order to produce an industrious and useful people.

MR. MARUM said, that as the line of argument taken by the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) and the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to be a comparison between the local aid given in England and Scotland and that given in Ireland, he, for his part, should like to draw some comparison between the resources from which the local aid was derived in the two parts of the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had also used as an argument a comparison between the local aid given in England and that given in Ireland. When a complaint was made of the large increase in the cost of the Constabulary in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman had immediately drawn a comparison between the amount spent on police in the counties of England and the amount spent in the counties of Ireland. He (Mr. Marum) declined to accept that comparison. Let them compare the prosperity of the county of Kilkenny—the population since 1841 had decreased from 202,000 to 99,000, or more than 50 per cent—with the prosperity of any English county. The county contained 508,000 acres, of an annual value of £343,000. Let them compare that with any county in England of the same area. Let them compare the taxation, and then suppose that the two counties were brought into the market, would there be any comparison between either of their relative values capitalized? He might be told that this would give only the fee simple, and that that was unsaleable at that moment in Ireland. He would take the tenancy interest as a test of value, then. What comparison could they draw between the English county and the Irish from a farming point of view? In Ireland they would have to look at the soil, at the state of the labour market, the adaptability of the country to agricultural machinery, and the large and important question of markets. On the latter point alone, it would have to be borne in mind that they could get a beast from Canada to Manchester cheaper than they could get one from a Midland county in Ireland to Manchester. He put these matters simply to illustrate his argument. When comparisons were drawn between the local aid given in England and Scotland and that given in Ireland, they must make comparisons between the resources of the several countries. He would defy any practical agriculturist to stand up in that House and say that any comparison could possibly be made between the value of the tenancy interest in a county in Ireland and the value of the same interest in an English county or a Scotch county. If he found the fee simple and the tenancy interest in such disproportion to the valuation, how, he asked, if these were the sources from which taxation was to be derivable, could they come forward and complain that they did not give as much in aid as was given in England and Scotland? The agricultural value in Ireland was somewhere about £10,500,000—if they excluded the towns. Well, what was the local taxation in reference to that value? It was £8,500,000—that was to say, it was about 85 per cent of the actual gross value, agriculturally speaking. If they capitalized the interest on that £10,500,000, and put it against the capitalized interest on £10,500,000 of property in England, the result would astonish the Committee. It would show that the local taxation of Ireland was greater than that of England. If he looked at the incidence of the local taxation—in dealing with the question referred to by the Secretary to the Treasury—as compared with that of their Imperial taxation, he should have to detain the Committee by going into a matter that the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Poll) had twice brought before Parliament—namely, the agricultural interest of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire had twice brought forward, and twice obtained a favourable reception for, a Resolution to the effect that the incidence of local taxation should be regarded with reference to local interest; but although that Resolution had been twice carried, Ministers had not taken the least notice of it. There was a Notice calling attention to the subject on the Paper at that moment, he believed. He (Mr. Marum) wished to say this with regard to the incidence of local taxation—that when the occasion arose, and when a similar Motion was brought forward, the Irish Members on their side would be perfectly well satisfied, and perfectly well able to show that the incidence of local taxation in Ireland, compared with the Imperial taxation, called much more urgently for the consideration of that House than did that of Great Britain. He denied strenuously, taking the matter de novo, the force of the arguments of the Chief Secretary, the Secretary to the Treasury, or the right hon. Gentleman who had preceded him (Sir Lyon Playfair). He maintained that they were in a position here to say that if the entire circumstances were taken into account, it could be clearly proved that in Ireland their local circumstances were in such a condition that the Government could not demand from them the same local aid as they could demand from more favoured localities in other parts of the Empire. He denied the arguments of those right hon. and hon. Gentlemen in toto.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair), who spoke a few minutes ago, put a somewhat familiar view of this matter before them; and though it was very acceptable to the minds of the English and Scotch Members, it was an entire fallacy—the whole of his argument. The right hon. Gentleman's argument was a comparison between the amount of money contributed locally for education in Ireland and the amount contributed in England and Scotland. There was a fallacy underlying the argument. The argument went upon the assumption that Ireland was able and ought to contribute to education in like proportion to the rest of the United Kingdom. He (Mr. Sullivan) denied that altogether. He maintained that, in proportion to her wealth, Ireland contributed more than England to the cost of National education. He asserted that, even if it were not so, it was England's bounden duty to take the whole burden of National education in Ireland on her own shoulders. The wealth of England had been estimated to be, as compared with that of Ireland, as 13 to 1. They paid much more in Ireland for National education in proportion—as compared with England—than 1 to 13. He had heard the Chief Secretary say that the pence contribution of the Irish children was, on an average, 4s., and that of the English children 6s. Surely 4s. was a very large proportion indeed for Irish children to pay, considering the relative wealth of the two countries. Why did England expect that Ireland should pay even a larger proportion, and stand on a level with her in this particular matter? England robbed Ireland of education when she was educating herself—she made education in Ireland penal for several centuries. How much, then, did she owe on that score to the Irish people? She owed a debt she would never be able to repay. England had blinded the eyes of the minds of the Irish people, and now, a few generations later, the people were to be equal in the race of education in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Some time after robbing Ireland of education England was eager to give it to her again—Protestant education. She desired to force that on the Irish people; but they would not have it, and the result was that they were left, in a measure, to pay for education themselves out of their own pockets. Did that not keep up still more the charge, the claim, they had against England on this question of education? Moreover, there remained this fact—that, at the present day—as could be proved by Parliamentary Returns—Ireland was over-taxed, and paid a larger proportion to the Imperial Exchequer than was paid by England. Ireland, not only in the matter of education, but in many other respects, was over-taxed, over-burdened, and oppressed; and yet it was expected that in this matter of education they would be able to put down pound for pound, and penny for penny, in proportion with wealthy and opulent England. Moreover, the population of Ireland was divided. There was a large section of the people hostile to Irish interests and hostile to public education, in so far as it was a really National and Catholic education, and from this section they got no help. This section gave nothing towards the general purposes of education in Ireland; any money they had to spend in that way they preferred to spend on proselytizing institutions. So that Ireland was placed at a serious disadvantage all along the line in this matter. These circumstances deserved more consideration than they got from the Secretary to the Treasury or from the English Government, Whig or Tory as the case might be. Then he maintained that there was not in the whole world a people who had to so large an extent voluntarily taxed themselves for purposes of education and religion as the Irish people. They had in Ireland to support the whole of their clergy. They had to build their churches, their convents, their monasteries, and to do it all without any charge upon the British Exchequer. The English clergy were paid out of the money of the State; whereas in Ireland there was no claim in that matter against the State. Voluntarily, and of the free hearts of the people, hundreds and thousands of pounds were paid for education, convents, monasteries, churches, and yet no credit was given to Ireland for that by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair). Those facts should not be overlooked in this matter. Moreover, the Irish National Board had never been popular. Some surprise had been expressed that in 50 years a better result had not been produced. Why, it was only quite lately that they had been forcing them to travel in anything like a national groove. For some time this Board was denounced by the guardians of the morals and the faith of the Irish people; and when the Government chose to force on a system of education against the wishes of the people, was it to be wondered at that the operation of that system did not produce such good results as would have been the case under more prosperous circumstances? All those things went to show that on the side of the Irish people there was no fault; but that there was great fault on the side of the Government of England for endeavouring to force an unpopular system of education on a country, and, when their hands were somewhat relaxed in that respect, for starving the system, and not paying and maintaining it as they ought to pay and maintain it. They had a discussion there some nights ago as to the way in which the National School teachers were supported. The Irish Members had proved that no fair chance was given to them; and he maintained that it was only natural to think that, under better circumstances, these men would do better than they did now under the severe and unjust treatment they had experienced at the hands of the British Government. In every respect, in every detail, he believed this Board of Commissioners had not acted up to the requirements of their position. Indeed, they were not permitted or enabled to so act by the Government which paid and maintained them. To come to one small particular, a Question was asked in that House a few days ago about a school which had been built in a place in Westmeath. The parish priest had built a Convent School at the cost of the parishioners. When it was opened this reverend gentleman notified to the National Board that the female National School of the place would cease to exist, as all the children would naturally go to the new Convent School, where they would be better treated, and be in every respect better cared for than in the National School. The parish priest very naturally asked that the grant given in aid of the old National School would go, with the scholars, to the new school. The Board of Commissioners, when that request was made to them, said they could not comply with it. They said—"You must first pay to us the sum of £246, which was the amount expended on the old National School." The old National School was for boys and girls, and the new school was for girls only; and if the children chose to go from the old to the new school it was surely a most unfair thing to say to the parishioners and the parish priest that the new school should not be organized, and should not get a penny until the Commissioners had been refunded the large sum of £246, which was expended on the National Schools 40 years ago. The fact was that, until that amount had been got up, not one penny would they allow for the education of the children in the Convent School. Such was the liberality and sense of fair play and justice which actuated the Board of Commissioners in Ireland, and those who supported them in this Parliament. He (Mr. Sullivan) had heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) say that the payments in Ireland ought to be by results. Well, the nuns would be perfectly satisfied to get payment by results, if it could be done by examining the children only; but it could not; the nuns would have to subject themselves to examination by School Inspectors before they could obtain these payments, and that they objected to. The nuns did not get the results which were fairly earned by them. The whole system practised in Ireland was unfair and unjust, and certainly the contention that they were not doing their duty in that country, because, in proportion to their numbers, they did not lay down pound for pound and shilling for shilling with England and Scotland, was unfair and unjust. That contention was unjust, because of the greater poverty of Ireland than England and Scotland, because of the manner in which England had put a stop to all educational progress in Ireland in years gone by, and because of the large amount of voluntary contribution paid by the people of Ireland for purposes intimately connected with morality, enlightenment, and education. All these things went for nothing. They had a Rule of Three sum proposed to them by the Government, a sum in which these things should not be proposed. A very strong case for consideration had been put forward by the Irish Members—for consideration which they did not get. He was sorry to see the way in which the Government met their statements.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that the only address which had been delivered to the Committee from the neighbourhood of the Government Benches was that they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair); but to all who listened to him he must have seemed more like delivering an inaugural address as a newly-elected Rector of a University, than making a speech in Committee of Supply in the House of Commons, so professional in tone was he, and so exhortative of good behaviour on the part of the Irish people. But the right hon. Gentleman entirely evaded the question which the Irish Members wished to press on the attention of Parliament. The question was not one of the incidence of local taxation, or local effort in aid of education; but it was the present insufficiency of the payments made to the National School teachers in Ireland. How did the right hon. Gentleman attempt to meet that point? He said the Government had agreed to establish Denominational Training Colleges in Ireland, such as were established in England and Scotland; and he had said that when these Colleges had been at work for some years then they would have a staff of teachers in Ireland who would be able to have a better classification and to earn higher rates of salary, and who, being better qualified, would also earn increased results and enable the children to secure increased attainments. That might be all very true; but it had nothing to do with the salaries of the present teachers. The Training Colleges might hereafter turn out a very efficient staff for teaching purposes; but the existing teachers would not benefit one iota by the higher standard which was to be attained hereafter by their successors. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman entirely evaded the point at issue. No answer had been attempted by the Government—the Government did not make an appearance of concerning itself to understand the Vote. The Secretary to the Treasury sat there, as he was bound by his Office to do, with a volume of the Estimates before him; but he knew nothing about the administration of the Irish Education Department. The hon. Member knew himself that he did not possess the information necessary to enable him to deal properly with this subject. Sitting next the Secretary to the Treasury was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) wondered what English Members would think if, in place of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella), they were to see in charge of the English Education Votes, and directed to expound or defend them, the English Attorney General or the English Solicitor General? Why, English Members would simply refuse to accept the Government Estimate. They would refuse to pass it without a much better explanation and defence than either of those officials would be likely to give. The Solicitor General for Ireland sat on the Front Bench loyally enough to do what service he could in the matter; but it was entirely beyond his province even to explain this Vote and what took place in connection with it from one year's end to another. The hon. and learned Gentleman sat there merely, perhaps, because he thought there should be at least one Representative of some portion of the Irish Executive present. Well, he (Mr. A. O'Connor) was bound to say that, under these circumstances, the position of an Irish Member discussing these Irish Votes was not only painful, but cynically painful. It made a man feel that he came to the House simply because it was his duty to do so, and not because it was of any use—that he came simply because Ireland called him, just as he would shoulder a musket if she called upon him to do it. He was unable to do effective work. He met, as representing the Government, a Gentleman who could not be a master of the Estimate he had to propose to the Committee. It seemed to him that this was not treating the Irish Members—it was not treating the people of Ireland—it was not treating the interests of Ireland with that respect which the Government ought to show, bringing on Estimates of such immense consequence to the welfare of the Irish people, without even the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant being in his place. Well, that being the case, the temptation was strong on one not to say a word on the Vote at all; but simply to refuse assent to it—to divide against it as a whole. Yet one hardly liked to do that, because it would seem that they were not even giving expression to the feelings of dissatisfaction and grievance which they knew to be very strong in the country. He would not weary the Committee by adding to what had been said on the question of the pension and pay of the teachers; but he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland if he could say what the Irish Government proposed to do, or proposed to submit, with regard to the position of the assistant teachers? They were classed by examination; but whether they came out in the third class, or the second class, or the first class, they could receive pay only as third class teachers. That was a grievance which had been repeatedly urged on the attention of the Government, and he had never yet heard that the Government had arrived at any decision with regard to it. Then there was another question about books and school apparatus. The Department required schoolmasters throughout the country to furnish themselves, out of the present payments, with books and school apparatus, and the articles which they got for cash payments they had to retail, generally at considerable loss to themselves, to the children in the schools which they had under their charge. The teachers had repeatedly asked to be allowed the ordinary trade discount—some 10 per cent—in order that they might be protected from loss. It had never been allowed. And so throughout the whole of the headings in the Estimate substantial ground was found for questioning the general policy of the Government, and the treatment which they thought fit to mete out to the unfortunate starvelings who were in the position of teachers in Ireland. But he would not go through the melancholy catalogue. He proposed to move a reduction in the first division of the Vote under the head of “Administration.” The first head “A” amounted to £26,262, and he proposed to reduce that by £10,000, on a ground different to any he had hitherto mentioned. The administration of this Vote was in the hands of men who had drawn up certain rules and regulations for the conduct of work of the Department and the regulation of the teachers, and it was the policy of these Rules that he was prepared to challenge. And first, in regard to the grants which, under these Rules, were given for building schools. He was perfectly well aware that there was no grant in this Vote for building, and that, therefore, he could not object to any money which was allowed for building, neither did he propose to do so; but he objected to the Commissioners—the Resident Commissioner and the Secretary—who had the policy of this Department in their hands, and the reason, or one of the reasons, why he proposed the reduction, was that they did not treat with even the semblance of fairness a very large proportion of the schools throughout the country. Now, these schools were of two descriptions. Some were called “vested” and some “non-vested.” Of the Vested Schools, some were vested in the Commissioners of National Education, and others were vested in local Trustees for the purpose of being maintained as National Schools. Now, the Commissioners gave grants to Vested Schools. They paid, for instance, the whole of the expense of building schools which were vested in themselves; and with regard to schools which were vested in local Trustees, under Rule 17 of the Rules of this year, the grant amounted to two-thirds for any total estimate between £300 or £400 and £1,200. In his county there was a school vested in local Trustees—a school of which the parish priest was the manager. The parish priest, by dint of very great exertion, much self-sacrifice, and the co-operation of the poor people of the district, had kept his schools going, and had paid each of his staff. The staff was classified under the regulation of the National Commission; but the place being poor the priest was not able to secure a secular staff sufficiently large for the needs of the school, and, looking about him, he decided to solicit the assistance of some brothers living in a monastery in the immediate neighbourhood. These brothers, not priests, but men who had devoted their lives to works of charity, seeing the difficulty in which the priest was placed, accepted his invitation, and assisted by supplementing the secular staff of the school. Well, when an application was made by the manager to the Commissioners of National Education for the grant of two-thirds which, according to the Rules, was claimable for schools vested in local Trustees, he was met by a refusal. The reason of the refusal was that in his school he had a religious man or religious men teaching. It was of no consequence that all the Rules were complied with; that the school was efficient; that the teachers were classified, and had obtained certificates from the Commissioners, and that they were duly qualified for the work of teaching; the very fact that there were in that school teachers who were monks precluded it from obtaining a grant. He maintained that this was an instance of bigotry against a Catholic institution which would be disgraceful in any country, but which in a country which was itself Catholic was almost incredible. The Resident Commissioner, he was bound to say, had expressed his regret at the state of things; but stated that while the present Rules existed he was unable to give any assistance, and the only way in which assistance could be obtained was by dismissing the monks. The parish priest who gave this information said—

"This, of course, I declined to do, for the monks in question were men who had actually received certificates from the Commissioners themselves as qualified teachers."

He added—

"As a matter of fact, the school, for want of Government assistance, is hardly in a state to justify it in being used as a school."

It was tumbling all to pieces; the priest had no means of building another, and the Commissioners refused to give him aid. This priest went on to say—

"These Rules were made at a time when the Commissioners were hostile to Catholic education, and when it was declared by Archbishop Whately that Catholic education would be one of the most effectual means of undermining the religious instincts of the people. They wanted to throw an obstacle in the way of the children getting into the hands of religious communities. They are not now so bigoted."

He (Mr. A. O'Connor) hoped that they were not. Up to the year 1855 monks were allowed to teach in the schools and to be classified; but after the year 1855 until very recently they were not allowed to become classified at all. In the days of the late Chief Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), on representations which were made to him, the Rules were changed, so that the members of religious communities were admitted to classification as teachers; but although the grievance was in that way partly removed, and the teachers were allowed to remain, the injustice in reference to grants for buildings was not removed, but it had remained to the present day. The Commissioners themselves were fully aware of the injustice. The Resident Commissioner had written to suggest a mode of evading the Rules; but nothing had been done to alter them. He thought if the Chief Secretary could have been present the Committee might probably have heard something from the right hon. Gentleman about the intention of the Government to alter the Rules, because he had promised to look into the matter when it was brought before him some time ago; but in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman how were they to know what the intentions of the Commissioners were? Then there was another matter upon which, as well, the Chief Secretary might have been of use if he had been present—namely, in regard to the payment made to the nuns as teachers. The nuns in Ireland were unquestionably the best teachers the people had, and that was a fact which had long been recognized by almost every Inspector in every part of the country. The Appendix to the last Report which he had opened casually contained a paragraph stating that in eight Convent Schools the average attendance was 1,347; the teaching staff consisted of 40 nuns and 36 paid masters; the scholars were of a higher class than those in the ordinary schools; and the Inspectors reported that they had no doubt the Convent Schools were the best in the district, far surpassing the ordinary schools in the supply of books, while the class rooms were of a superior class, better kept and regulated; and, considering the higher education of the nuns, there was no doubt that the Roman Catholic children made more rapid progress than those of any other school. A wholesome tone of discipline pervaded all of them, and in many of them the children were learning extra subjects. The same kind of testimony was given by every one of the Inspectors throughout the country. He held in his hand a copy of the Inspector's Report in regard to Kinsale, and it was of such a favourable character that anyone interested in school management would take an interest in reading it. The total number of pupils in the school, according to Mr. Sheehy's Report, was 756; the teaching power was ample. The average attendance was large, and there were 20 teachers giving instruction in literary subjects, and one in industrial pursuits. There were also seven monitresses belonging to the school. He believed that all the ladies who taught in this school were highly qualified as regarded their acquirements, method of teaching, and skill in organization. The Report of the Inspector stated that the lady who had the chief charge of the school and directed the entire education of the children and the training of young nuns was superior to anyone connected with the Middle Schools in educational attainments. So far as the results were concerned, the first class were taught to read and spell, to explain words, and they answered questions in geography very well; the second class answered every question put to them extremely well, while the higher classes were very smart in composition, history, elementary astronomy, physiology, and electricity. It must be borne in mind that this was an elementary school. The fifth class, which consisted of the monitresses and other advanced pupils, were thoroughly well-organized, and attended public lectures on educational subjects in Dublin and elsewhere. The Inspector reported—

“ Their answers in questions relating to electricity simply astonished me. They appeared to be quite familiar with the apparatus, and I have no doubt, if time had permitted, would have been able to make simple experiments with it.”

The Report went on to show the treatment of the children in this Convent School, and the amount of attention the nuns paid to the development of the industry of the district. Work executed under their superintendence had been sent for exhibition both to London, Dublin, and New York. The Report in reference to this school was very long; but it was extremely interesting and valuable, and well worthy of perusal. He was sorry that he was unable to take out all the salient points it contained; but it would take up too much of the time of the Committee, and he was reluctantly compelled to pass many things by which he would have liked to bring before the Committee. It must, however, be borne in mind that the Report from which he had been quoting was simply that of one of the Irish Convent Schools. Something of the same kind was reported from almost every part of Ireland. Nevertheless, what was the actual fact? Why, that the nuns in Ireland were not allowed payment such as was given to the teachers in all the other schools. The very fact that they were nuns precluded them from obtaining that amount of payment which they would have received if they had not been nuns. He could not at that moment put his hands upon the passage; but there was one striking instance given to show the difference which was made between the nuns and other teachers. Taking schools with an average attendance of 100, the lay teachers would have £58; the assistant and third class teachers £27 10s., and two monitresses £9 each, making £103 10s. in all. But in the case of the Convent Schools no salaries were paid either to the nuns or to their assistants, and the only allowance was to the monitresses—namely, three at £9 each, making £27 altogether, and a capitation grant of £20 for every 100 scholars—or at the rate of 4s. a-head, with the remuneration to the monitress, making £47. Thus, while the lay teachers in an ordinary school received £103 10s. a year, in the Convent Schools the allowance was only £47, or less than one-half. When the Committee took into consideration the very low rate of pay which even lay teachers in Ireland got as compared with the teachers in England and Scotland, the absolutely ridiculous remuneration given to the nuns in Convent Schools demanded at once serious attention at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. When, some time ago, he had brought the matter under the notice of the Chief Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman promised that he would inquire into it, and had led him (Mr. A. O'Connor) to suppose that when the present Vote came on for discussion he would hear something of what the intentions of the Commissioners were upon the subject. He was afraid that in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman he would appeal in vain to the Secretary to the Treasury as to the way in which the matter now stood; and he very much doubted whether the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would have any more information to give. But, assuming that no alteration had been made in the Rules or in the administration of this Vote in this very important particular, he would beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £10,000 in reference to the charge for administration.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member object to the whole Vote? He does not specify to what particular item in the Vote his Motion would apply.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: In order that I may not preclude any further reduction being moved on any subsequent item, I will move the reduction of the Vote by £25,568, being the amount of the salaries and wages for the Office in Dublin, which forms the first item of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Item of £25,568, for Salaries and Wages, be omitted from the proposed Vote."
 —(Mr Arthur O'Connor.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), during the course of his speech, appealed to him, and suggested that it was somewhat strange that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) should be absent upon this occasion. The right hon. Gentleman was not absent through any fault of his own; he was anxious and desirous to take part in the discussion of every important Irish question, and to listen to the views of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, who sat below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House. Unfortunately, the cause of the right hon. Gentleman's absence was beyond his control. The right hon. Gentleman had been most unremitting in his attention to the Business of his Office, and for a long time he had been suffering from indisposition. He (Mr. Walker) was quite sure that if the hon. Member for Queen's County had known all these circumstances, he would scarcely have attributed to the right hon. Gentleman a desire to purposely absent himself from this discussion. They must remember that the right hon. Gentleman was present the other evening when this subject was before the House, and that he made a very useful contribution to the debate which then took place, embracing in his speech most of the points which had been advanced to-night. He (Mr. Walker) could not allow the observations of the hon. Member to pass by without acquainting the Committee with the real reasons of the absence of his right hon. Friend. Now, everybody admitted that the subject which was now under the consideration of the Committee was a most important one, inasmuch as the cause of education concerned not only the Irish people, but every people. The payment of teachers was a serious branch of the subject, because if teachers were not paid enough it was not alone the teachers themselves, but the cause of education, which suffered. It was admitted that the present system of education in Ireland had failed to produce the results which were, at all events, looked for. Both the late Government and the present Government had agreed that in the improvement of Irish education money was not everything. It had been felt that the cause of education would be promoted all the more by importing amongst the great body of teachers zeal and stimulus, than that education should be supported entirely by the State. It had been felt that every stimulus should be offered to Local Bodies to promote education. The Bill that was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) failed, it was said, because the voluntary test was offered, and that test had already broken down. The result of the voluntary test was summed up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) when he said that £14,726 was the total of the voluntary contributions. The compulsory scheme had been suggested, and it was shadowed forth by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) that, as the compulsory system had been successful both in England and Scotland, it might with advantage be applied to Ireland. It had been argued that if local contributions could be given to the great cause of Irish education, they would supply the zeal and stimulus which certainly were wanting, and that they would also supply one of the demands in the present system which hon. Members had alluded to—namely, that they had not that complete control over education that they desired to have. The greater the local contributions were, the more reason there would be to extend control to the people. For these reasons, it had been thought it would not be at all undesirable to give the system a trial. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) called attention to the alteration of the Rules, and had referred to what the Chief Secretary had, on a previous occasion, said upon the subject. He (Mr. Walker) would undertake to communicate with his right hon. Friend on the matter; and he was persuaded that if the right hon. Gentleman had made any promise upon the subject he would fulfil it. There was another matter to which the hon. Member for Queen's County referred, and that was the support which was given to schools conducted under the National system by nuns. He (Mr. Walker) knew something of Ireland, and he entirely agreed with everything that had been said by hon. Members in regard to the schools in charge of nuns. Those ladies had naturally no other object than the proper training of the children confided to their care; and he had seen schools managed by them in a way which would do credit to any managers. No doubt the present educational system was such that the nuns had not derived all the advantage others had. Being religious, they could not conform to the Rules other persons could. No doubt, when the system shadowed forth by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) came in force, the position of the nuns of Ireland in charge of National Schools would be greatly improved. He (Mr. Walker) did not expect his contribution to this debate would be of any great advantage; and, therefore, he regretted very much the absence of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman knew the subject perfectly; he devoted much of his attention to it before he went to Ireland, and he had made himself master of it during the years he had been at the Irish Office. The right hon. Gentleman deeply regretted his absence; and, from personal communication he (Mr. Walker) had had with the right hon. Gentleman that day, he could say that nothing gave the Chief Secretary more personal annoyance than that circumstances over which he had no control should have prevented him being present in the House that night.

MR. DAWSON said, they all shared the regret expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) at the absence of the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) from that debate that night. The word "national" was simply out of place when used in respect to the educational system of Ireland. The people of Ireland were very much attached to denominational education, and he always preferred to use the word "freedom" of education instead of denominational. Education was not free if there was compulsorily withheld anything which the people wished to learn. He was not educated as he desired, and his children were not educated as he desired, if, against his will, subjects which he held sacred were withheld from him and his children. It was well that they should compare the law which regulated education in Scotland and that which regulated education in Ireland. Scotland was truly religious, but it was not Catholic; and yet in Scotland the Catholic people, who were but the few amongst the many, could have denominational schools perfectly free to practise all those things, and to observe all those things they held dear, providing they satisfied the State as to the secular instruction given. He held in his hand the Scotch Education Act, and he found that in that Act Parliamentary grant might be made to the managers of any school which, in the opinion of the Scotch Education Department, efficiently contributed to the secular education of the parish or burgh in which the school was situated. He could not for the life of him see what justice or fair dealing should enable this country to pass a law so consonant with the religious feeling of the vast majority of the people of Scotland and with the small minority of Catholic feeling in Scotland, and, at the same time, refuse to pass a law in sympathy with the feelings of the multitudes of Catholics in Ireland. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) on every possible occasion read the Irish people very emphatic, very severe, and, as he (Mr. Dawson) maintained, very unjust lectures. That was the right hon. Gentleman's peculiar forte. If his strictures were just, he (Mr. Dawson) should certainly not wince under them; but they were not just. The right hon. Gentleman was fond of comparing the amount of aid contributed to education in Ireland with that contributed towards the same object in England. Now, in financial arrangements it had been set down that Ireland should only pay in the proportion of 2 in 17. Ireland had not got richer since that arrangement was made; but the right hon. Gentleman seemed to shut his eyes to that extraordinary and important fact. The system of education in Ireland was called national; but it was not national. On the contrary, it was entirely at variance with the opinions of the vast majority of the people of Ireland, who refused to join the system because it outraged their feelings. Who provided the thousands and thousands of pounds in Ireland for the Denominational Schools? Why, the poor people of Ireland out of their poverty. The nuns took a portion of the Government grant; though they had proved by their results that they had achieved the great object of teaching, they were only allowed a small grant because they could not comply with the regulation, which they did not think convenient to their close order and retirement, which, however, in no way detracted from the character of their instruction. Who supplied their schools, their magnificent convents, and residential places? The Catholic people of Ireland; and yet the right hon. Gentleman forgot all that, and shut out from his vision figures showing these facts. It was a computation which did not exceed the bounds of possibility that within the last 20 years, two decades of the utmost adversity, two decades which would not occur again owing to the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman, the Irish people had, for the purposes of religious instruction, expended out of their poverty £4,000,000 or £5,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Lyon Playfair) had said that the religious element was one of great difficulty. It was aroused, certainly, when it was insulted and outraged. The other day he visited a little Catholic school in Carlow. There was not a non-Catholic within 20 miles; but he found that all the religious emblems had been locked up for fear the Inspector, looking in suddenly, should see them. There was a mural slab in the school recounting the worth of a former parish priest, the inscription concluding with the words—"God rest his soul." That slab had to be covered up, because it was against the Rules that such an inscription should be displayed. Those were trifles; but they went to make life miserable, and to make the educational system exceedingly unpalatable to the people. Now, it had been said that the teachers in Ireland were inferior to those in England and Scotland. To say that was very like adding insult to injury. The Irish Members spent hours the other night showing how poorly the Irish teachers were paid, and yet how proficient in their art they were expected to be. They were paid £57 a-year, or only half what the English teacher got; and they were given none of the social position a teacher should be surrounded with. It was to the credit of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) that he had commenced to stem the torrent of injustice by providing Training Colleges. It was only the other day that there were no Training Colleges in Ireland. There were, however, now; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) would acknowledge, when he came to consult the statistics, how badly the teachers were paid. If the teachers had worked under the same conditions as the English teachers, and had then failed to achieve proper results, the right hon. Gentleman might have come forward, and with some ground passed censure upon the condition of Irish education. Now, he (Mr. Dawson) entirely approved of compulsory attendance; but he was of opinion that they would never be able to secure a proper attendance if the religious sentiments of the people were trampled under foot. If Denominational Schools were organized in Ireland a great source of irritation would be removed. As he had said, in Scotland a school was allowed to receive a grant if it contributed its fair share towards the secular education of the parish in which it was situated. That was what he desired to see in Ireland. If there was such a condition of things objections would be removed, and compulsory attendance might be enforced. He had had an opportunity of conversing with many of the Catholic Prelates on the subject, and he was in a position to say that those prelates were not opposed to the compulsory system if it was properly safeguarded, or if they were satisfied as to what they had a right to look after, and what it was their great and holy business to look after—namely, the faith of their flocks. There were in Scotland, and in many places in England, School Attendance Committees, which did not work such great revolutions as School Boards. Attendance Committees were, as a rule, composed of members of the Corporation, clergymen, and others, and he thought that such Committees might with advantage be formed in Ireland; each creed would be represented on the Committee, and, as a consequence, there would be no hardship. It was estimated that there were only 25 per cent of illiterate persons in Ireland. He wished that those persons could read and write; but considering all the impediments in the way of education in Ireland, and all the grievances which were heaped one upon another in the country, the percentage was not very discreditable. He was sorry to have troubled the Committee so long upon this matter; but it was one on which he felt a deep interest, and it was one in which the first step was to be taken to regenerate Ireland. There was a word or two he ought to say upon the unpractical character of the curriculum of the Irish schools. The total pursuit of mental and literary culture, to the prejudice of industrial education, which would enable the people to be bread-winners, was, in his opinion, a great blot on the Irish educational system. Industrial education was required in England; but it was wanted a thousand times more in Ireland. It was a reproach to many Irish people that they were not skilled in any trade. If, however, there was industrial training in the elementary schools of Ireland, the Irish people sent over to this great country would be able to take their proper part in the industrial machinery instead of being simply hewers of wood and drawers of water. Continual mental culture and continual literary pressure was prejudicial to young and immature minds; and nothing could possibly afford greater relief to the minds of their children than the introduction into the curriculum of their schools of industrial teaching suitable to the age. He had no doubt whatever that the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan), whom he hoped would very soon be able to resume his duties, and to pursue legislation in respect of education, would take cognizance of the important matters to which reference had been made during the debate, and that they would have, at no distant date, a system of education in Ireland which, first of all, would be in harmony with the feelings of the people, and which, secondly, would embrace the teaching of those industrial pursuits which would be of practical use to the populace; that they would have a system of education which would enable the Irish people at home and abroad to take that part in the communities in which they found themselves which their natural abilities entitled them to.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was very much disappointed by the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), because he thought it was possible that, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had had an interview with the Chief Secretary that day, he would be prepared to make some satisfactory statement on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman. But it seemed they were doomed to wait for another term before they got the opinion of the Chief Secretary upon the question of the salaries of the nuns in Ireland. They were also to wait for some time yet until they knew whether any of the other grievances respecting the educational system in Ireland were to be remedied or not. They were accustomed to hear that Ireland did not contribute as much to the support of education as England did, and it was often assumed that the Board School system in England and Scotland was a very great success. He thought it would be conceded that there was very great difference of opinion as to the result of the Board School system. A good many Members of the House of Commons thought that the Board School system in England and Scotland had not been by any means a great success; in fact, many considered that the tax was unreasonably high—indeed, so high that some children were sent to Board Schools whose parents could very well afford to send them to Voluntary Schools. In his opinion, it was the duty of fairly well-off parents to educate their children at their own expense; certainly, the children of such parents ought not to be educated at the expense of the public. Public schools were intended for the education of children whose parents could not meet the expense of their education. Ireland was part of the United Kingdom; and as it unfortunately happened that Ireland was the poorest part of the United Kingdom, it was only fair that the United Kingdom should contribute something to the education of the children of the poor people who lived in Ireland, and who were not able to afford to educate their children properly. The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) very properly told them that the education in Convent Schools was of a very satisfactory nature; but he did not say he had any authority for stating that the nuns would be better paid. The hon. and learned Gentleman agreed that these ladies were entitled to a much larger amount of remuneration for their services. It was a scandal that the very best female schools in Ireland should be the worst-paid schools, that they should get a small sum of money from the State, and that, at the same time, in very many cases they should get no fees whatever from the pupils. Many of the Convent Schools were nothing more nor less than Charity Schools, the children of which paid no fees, but were given a lunch to encourage them to attend. In the case of such schools it was clearly the duty of the State to give reasonable and fair compensation to the teachers. Another of the charges which had been brought against the Irish people was that they did not contribute to educational purposes as the English and Scotch people did; but he believed that was an entire fallacy. In every diocese in Ireland a very large boarding and day school existed for the children of the well-to-do parents, and these schools received no support from the State. The priest who undertook to superintend the erection of the schools built the schools entirely at the expense of the Catholic people, supplied Professors, and did everything that was required, without making any application whatever to the State. The same applied in a very marked degree to the provision made for the daughters of well-to-do people in Ireland, because a large number of the better class girls were sent as boarders to the different Convent Schools, which schools received no grant from the State. So, in point of fact, the contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) was entirely unworthy of consideration. He believed that the Irish people, in proportion to their means, were very much more liberal in regard to education than the people of England and Scotland. There were no wealthy people in Ireland to pay the expenses of the education of children; but a large number of people were on the verge of pauperism, and therefore it was too bad to complain that the Irish people did not provide sufficient funds for educational purposes. Complaint was made that the Irish teachers were less able to get result fees than the teachers here. It was not, however, so much the result of lack of ability on the part of the teacher that the fees were so small; but it was owing to the fact that the children were not kept at school a sufficient length of time to enable good results to be attained. Taking it all in all, the Government had given the Irish people great cause to complain of the way in which they had dealt with educational matters in Ireland. Complaint was very justly made on the score of the salaries paid to teachers in the position of nuns who taught in Convent Schools for years. The result of the examination of pupils in Convent Schools had been in advance of the National Schools generally; in some years it had been decidedly above the result in the Model Schools of Ireland, upon which a large amount of public money had been spent—spent both on the building of schools and on the payment of teachers. He thought the Government ought to give hon. Members an undertaking that the Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) would give them a reply with regard to Convent Schools on Report. On a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman had said that the Government did not propose to move a Supplementary Estimate that year for the assistance of Convent Schools; but he (Mr. Biggar) thought that if the Government were not prepared to do that this year, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) might very fairly give them his views with regard to what the increase ought to be in future years. The right hon. Gentleman might give them his opinion with regard to the amount of increased salary which ought to be paid to the nuns, and, also, as to the assistance afterwards of building of the schools in which nuns received their pupils.

Mr. DEASY said, he was very glad that his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who was so thoroughly well acquainted with the subject, had referred to the question of the payment of nuns. He hoped that the Government would seriously take the question into consideration next Session, when they would, he trusted, be forced to take in hand the general question of National education in Ireland. There could not be any doubt that the nuns laboured under very severe disadvantages from the present system, which debarred them from receiving any remuneration as result fees. He could not conceive why nuns should not be paid by results just as other teachers were. If the pupils of nuns compared favourably with the pupils of other teachers, he could see no valid reason for refusing to them similar remuneration to that which was granted to other teachers. He could not understand why it was that the Government refused on this occasion to propose a Supplementary Estimate for the payment of National teachers, as he recollected that it was not many nights ago that they had a very long debate upon a Supplementary Estimate for the payment of Divisional Magistrates in Ireland. Why should not the same rule be applied to National teachers, unless it was that the Government were unwilling to give a penny for the purposes of education, or for anything that would be of the slightest advantage to the people of Ireland? One matter which he wished to mention in connection with this Vote was the training of teachers. He felt that he ought to complain of the fact that the Government did not compel teachers in Ireland to acquire a knowledge of practical agriculture, so that they could educate the children who attended National Schools in agricultural matters. This to a purely agricultural country like Ireland was a question of great importance. It was one with which the Government could easily grapple, and one which concerned the people of Ireland more than the people of any other country. He trusted that next Session this subject also would receive the serious attention of the Government. He was persuaded that the Government would not be allowed to pass any Bill dealing with the educational system of Ireland, unless it contained a provision for the training of the rural population in practical agriculture. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury pointed out that if the Division which took place a few nights ago on the Motion in favour of National School teachers, made by the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M^cCarthy), had been taken at another time, the Government would have had a large majority. Well, that might have been the case, because hon. Members knew that when the Division Bell rang, Gentlemen rushed in from all quarters, and, without knowing what was going on, were prepared to vote with the Government on any question, no matter whether they were on the right side or not. Therefore, he could not congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the argument he had used. It was one of the injustices which Irish Members had to submit to in that House, that a large majority always voted against them on Irish matters, utterly regardless of right or wrong; but he was of opinion that, if the Division in question had been deferred for an hour, the Government would have been in a minority. If Divisions represented the actual opinions of hon. Members, he believed that in the case in question there would have been a very large majority in support of the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Justin Huntly M^cCarthy), and that the Government victory would have been turned into a defeat. Personally, he was glad that the Poor Law Guardians in Ireland had refused to become contributory under the Act of 1875, because, in the first place, he did not believe that the rates in Ireland should be made responsible for the salaries of Irish school teachers; and if there was no power to control the appointment of teachers and the remuneration they received, it was unjust to compel the ratepayers to contribute to their salaries. He believed it was then too late to introduce another system of taxation without representation, in addition to the Grand Jury system, which was one the people of Ireland would not allow to continue very long. He believed, if the majority of the Unions in Ireland had become contributory under the Act of 1875, Irish Members would have had no chance of improving the position of the teachers when the question would present itself next Session. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) that the Irish people had not done their duty in providing good schools; but the Irish people would do their duty in that respect when they succeeded in having their own Parliament, and the management of their own affairs. He did not see how they could do everything through the English Parliament; and even the small concessions that were passed through the House of Commons did not always escape destruction in the Upper Chamber. It was, therefore, not the fault of the Irish people that they could not always do what they wanted for themselves; they could not make any successful effort in the House of Commons to better the condition of the people of Ireland unless they had on their side the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, simply because there was a great majority at his back and that of the Prime Minister, or anyone who happened to be on the Treasury Bench, who could vote down any proposition they might make. He should be willing, and he was sure that everyone on those Benches would be also willing, to undertake that they would never come into that House with an education question relating to Ireland if they were permitted to live at home, and settle these matters in their own country. These were the reasons why the Irish people did not come up to the standard laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh. It was all very well for Scotchmen to raise this question. Irish Members knew perfectly well that if a majority of Scotch Members decided on doing anything, they had only to represent the matter to the Government, and the Government was quite willing to accede to any demand they might make. But it was altogether a different matter with Irish Members. The opinions of all Irish Representatives had more than once concurred with regard to certain measures being necessary for the country; but when they approached the Government, they found it did not suit them to consider the question, and they were simply told that their views could not be entertained. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had argued at great length on a large number of statistics, to show that the Irish people ought to contribute as much in Ireland towards National Education as the people contributed in England; and he said that even in the case of Irish Harbours—

MR. COURTNEY: I beg the hon. Member's pardon—I did not mention Ireland. I referred to the Harbours of Scotland.

MR. DEASY said, he accepted the statement of the hon. Gentleman. He thought he had referred to Ireland, because he knew that he never made any but uncomplimentary remarks with regard to Ireland; accordingly, he had taken for granted that nothing uncomplimentary to any country but Ireland could have fallen from the hon. Gentleman. But as he had disclaimed the observation, he should pursue the matter no farther. He would conclude by again pressing on the Government, when they took up this question, as undoubtedly before long they would be compelled to take it up, to seriously consider the question of improving the agricultural training of teachers in Ireland.

MR. KENNY said, that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) had left the Committee under the impression that the people of Ireland only contributed locally something like 1 per cent of the amount necessary for the purposes of National Education.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: I said 18 per cent in school fees, and 1 per cent in local rates.

MR. KENNY said, he wanted the Committee to understand that 19·6 of the amount necessary to develop National Education in Ireland was subscribed by the Irish people, either by local rates levied by Boards of Guardians, or in fees paid by the school children. That was the actual state of the case; but it seemed to be the impression with many Members of the Committee that the people of Ireland only contributed 1 per cent. It was well to know that there were two good reasons why the people of Ireland could not be expected to pay local rates for National Education. In the first place, there was no law making it compulsory upon anyone in Ireland to levy taxation in support of National Education; and, in the second place, there was no local representative Body which was empowered to deal with and disburse the funds which might be collected. It was purely optional with the Boards of Guardians in Ireland whether they took advantage of the Act of 1875, which was passed by the late Government; and when ratepayers and Boards of Guardians saw that there was no power whatever to control the distribution of the money, it was only natural that the Act should not be taken advantage of, and it was only the fair inference that the amount, which was at first estimated at £30,000 a-year, should have fallen in successive years below the miserable sum of £11,000. He would now refer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh. There was no person who had a greater admiration for the manner in which the Scotch people managed their educational affairs than he had; and there was no one more conscious of their shortcomings in other matters. It must be admitted that since the present educational system came into operation certain marked changes for the better had taken place. He found that in 1830, when the Irish educational system was introduced, that at that time in Scotland 77 per cent of the people were capable of reading and writing; whereas in Ireland, at the same time, the percentage capable of reading and writing was not more than half of what it was in Scotland. Since that time, however, the number of people who could read and write had increased to 67 out of every 100. He thought that that improvement in the condition of Ireland was one which gave fair promise that when a more popular and a more representative system was introduced, there would be an improvement corresponding to that which had taken place in England and Scotland. In addition to that, notwithstanding that the population of Ireland had fallen from something like 8,000,000 to 5,000,000, the average school attendances had enormously increased. He found that in 1845, when the population of Ireland had reached its highest point—namely, 8,000,000—the total number of pupils attending school was only 432,000; whereas, now that the population of Ireland was 5,000,000 or less, the total number of pupils attending National Schools was 1,083,000. He thought that showed a very great improvement. He was not, at the same time, prepared to express any opinion with regard to the constitution of Board Schools in Ireland. He was aware that that was a proposition which would lead to serious differences of opinion in that country. The condition of affairs in England was very much more suitable to a system of popular education than was the condition of affairs in Ireland; but, for his own part, he was inclined to the opinion that some system might be adopted under which popular education—National Education—might be entrusted to local popular control. He thought that such a system might be devised, and that taxation might be so adjusted to it that it would not press with undue severity upon any religious denomination—in fact, that the denominational system of education, which at the present time existed in Ireland, might be changed. He was aware that many would object to such a change, and it was only natural that the persons who objected should be those in whose hands the present school system had been left. But he was confident that the growth of intelligence in Ireland and the improvement which was being constantly manifested would in time improve the capacity of the people for local self-government; and he looked forward with hope, and with somewhat of a sanguine feeling, to the time when a re-adjustment of the system of National education would take place, which would be more in accordance with present opinions, and with the progress of Liberalism.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY said, he wished to touch upon a point which had not been dwelt upon—namely, the position which the Gaelic language ought to hold in any scheme of Irish education. He supposed that hon. Members had received two interesting documents containing correspondence which had taken place between the National Education Society and the Gaelic Union. The latter body had done a great deal to promote the spread of the National language in Ireland. There were two points from which this question of the Gaelic language might be regarded. One was from the point of view of the preservation of a valuable language, rich in epigrammatic expression, which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would at once appreciate, if he had as much time to devote to its study as he had to the Homeric poems. But from a National point of view the Gaelic language was the language of the Irish people, whereas the language which they now spoke was more or less a foreign or alien tongue. During the last few years there had been a remarkable increase in the study of the Gaelic language; it had taken new root and spread in all directions, and people were beginning to take in it a sneaking interest which they would have been ashamed, a few years ago, to show or acknowledge. Irish Members were anxious that in certain parts of Ireland education should be imparted first of all through the medium of the Irish tongue. It had been urged against that system that the Irish population were scattered about Ireland, and that it would be impossible to apply the system with success; but that surely was an inaccurate view of the case. It would be quite possible to apply the principle to the people in 14 baronies in Ireland, where the Gaelic language was spoken.

There was, of course, a proportion of bilinguists, in some parts, where, although Irish was the familiar language spoken, it was immaterial which language should be taught them—although, for his own part, he preferred the Gaelic. But where the Gaelic language was alone spoken he contended that instruction should be imparted in the schools in that language.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the neglect with which the Government had treated a question of vital importance to the Catholic population in Ireland—that was to say, the mode in which, at the present moment, educational endowments were devoted solely and exclusively to Protestant purposes which ought to be used for the general benefit of the population. Although, perchance, the discussion might have been more fully raised on the Votes for Endowed Schools which had been passed, yet as he had, from the changes made in the order of the Votes, not been enabled to then raise the discussion, he desired to now make a few observations in respect to the conduct of the Board of Education in taking one of these Endowed Schools under their control. He referred to the Swords Borough School. That school, though the funds by which it was supported were directed to be applied for the educational necessities of the inhabitants without distinction of religion, was, at the present moment, used entirely by Protestants. He had called attention more than once to the gross misapplication of the public funds, which, as shown in the Reports of the Royal Commissioners, had taken place in the management of that school. The Chief Secretary had not attempted to deny the existence of the abuse, or the injustice of the mode in which the revenues of the school were administered. Yet very recently the Board of Education, though there was a National School founded and supported by the Catholics of Swords out of their own resources, had granted to this Endowed School the privileges and rights of a National School, and they were entitled to a supply of school books at a cheap rate. Let him briefly mention that this Swords School, thus entirely devoted to Protestant scholars, was originally founded under a Charter, and supported out of lands granted by Parliament; these were now represented by a capital of £24,000, from which a revenue of about £700 was received. Now, the conditions of the Charter were that the funds of the Trust should be applied generally to the inhabitants of the borough, without distinction, for the purpose of education.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN (MR. SHAW LEFEVRE): May I ask the hon. and learned Member what connection there is between this case and the Vote before the Committee?

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, the question came within this Vote because the money intended by Parliament to be devoted exclusively for the benefit of the poor who required State aid for National Education was, by the Commissioners, applied for the benefit of the Swords School. At least, that was his opinion, subject to the ruling of the Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN (MR. SHAW LEFEVRE) said, the Committee were engaged in discussing the item of Salaries and Wages; and he did not, therefore, think the hon. and learned Gentleman was in Order in discussing the supply of school books, by the National Education Commission, to the Swords Borough School.

MR. GRAY asked whether it was not competent to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite to discuss the question of the Swords Borough School, seeing that it had been taken under the control of the National Education Board, whose salaries were included in this Vote?

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN (MR. SHAW LEFEVRE) said, he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the relevancy of the question to the Vote under discussion lay in the fact that the books supplied to the school were paid for out of the money voted by Parliament.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, he need not state that he should most readily submit to the judgment of the Chairman. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had pointed out that the salaries of the Commissioners came under this Vote; and he (Mr. Martin) ventured to think he was right in continuing his account of their action with regard to the Swords Borough School. He might remind the Chairman of the wide line of discussion, and the grave and serious questions that had been more than once raised in the House upon the Votes for Diplomatic Salaries. His complaint was that the school was now exclusively a Protestant foundation; that the revenues were now being used for Protestant purposes, in gross violation of the Charter and Trusts; and that the Education Commission had no right to have the school under their control. He put forward the case as one of the aptest illustrations of the misapplication of public funds which was taking place in Ireland.

MR. COURTNEY: I rise to Order. I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the only connection between this question and the Vote before the Committee is the fact that certain books were supplied by the Commissioners. Am I correct in so understanding the hon. and learned Gentleman?

MR. PATRICK MARTIN: No, Sir. What he arraigned was the conduct of the Commissioners in having this school under their control. [Mr. COURTNEY: How is it under their control?] Because it was under the Regulations; and if the hon. Gentleman would look into the subject he would find that the Swords Borough School was one of the schools which appeared on the roll. This school was a striking instance of gross misapplication of public funds. It was maintained by funds which Parliament voted for the general benefit of the inhabitants of that borough; and it was distinctly directed that those funds should be devoted to the general benefit of the inhabitants, and also that the children should be trained in industrial pursuits. In 1854 and in 1855 attention was called to the gross and fraudulent misapplication of these funds, and again when the Endowed Schools Commission was appointed in 1871. Not the slightest attention was paid by the Government to those Reports. He had himself, as he stated, called attention to this flagrant injustice, which, though admitted, was allowed to continue under the sanction of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. And it was a matter of grave complaint to find that the Education Board apparently sought to cloak and perpetuate the abuse by placing this Swords School on the rolls. As a mark of his sense of the conduct of the Government in the matter, he should, if a Division took place, vote for the reduction.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 71: Majority 35.—(Div. List, No. 211.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HEALY said, he wished again to call attention to the action of Mr. Sheridan, to which he had referred on Friday last. It was well known that Mr. Sheridan had thought fit to issue a Circular asking certain National School teachers, who had ventured to have a dinner in Dublin at which they drank the health of Her Majesty, why they had not also drunk the health of the Lord Lieutenant. The teachers had been obliged to cry "peccavi," and send apologies to Mr. Sheridan, simply because they had not drunk the health of a Member of the present Ministry. That was carrying things with a very high hand; and he could not see upon what ground the Government should object to these teachers holding this dinner—at which he was present, and which was a very humble affair—without drinking the health of the Lord Lieutenant. They might be satisfied with having the health of the Queen drunk, without insisting on the health being drunk of a Member of the Cabinet. For Mr. Sheridan to call upon these teachers to pour out the wine cup to the health of Earl Spencer was certainly a most extraordinary thing; anything more absurd than that the Government should take up this incident he had never heard of. How had they been benefited by that? Had Earl Spencer's health been improved by this proceeding? If he thought it would have done the smallest possible good to Earl Spencer he should not object to his health being drunk any number of times; but it was bringing the Government down to a very low point indeed when a few hundred teachers were called upon, at their annual dinner, to drink the health of Earl Spencer as well as of the Queen. Anything more insulting than Mr. Sheridan's letter it had never been his lot to read; but still more humiliating were the replies of the teachers, whom the Government had at their mercy. What was the consequence of Mr. Sheridan's Circular? The teachers, who did not care a straw about the abstract principle of a Lord Lieutenant, had to write humiliating letters in order to maintain their position. They were obliged to do that, not because they admired Earl Spencer at all, but because they knew they would lose their situations if they did not apologize. Now, he wanted to know whether the Government approved of this system of Circularizing teachers. Was it a practice in this country? Would the Government in this country insist on the health of all the Princes and Princesses, and all the little Princes and Princesses of Wales being drunk at such a dinner? The National School teachers received £57 a-year, and very much loyalty could not be expected for that. If they were to be required to drink the Lord Lieutenant's health at their dinners they ought to receive £10 extra for that purpose.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he was not aware of all the circumstances of this case, except from the hon. Member's speech; but it was obvious that the matter did not turn upon the consideration of any particular Government, or on the individuality of Earl Spencer. Drinking his health was part of the custom, he being the Representative of Her Majesty. He could not conceive that the matter had anything to do with Earl Spencer personally. There seemed to have been some over-susceptibility on the part of Mr. Sheridan, who, he thought, had rather overstrained the matter; but it did not seem to him worth while to pursue the incident any further.

Mr. GRAY said, he thought it important that the Committee should know whether the hon. Gentleman did or did not mean that Mr. Sheridan's Circular was to be acted upon. It was important to have some guide for the future, and it was from that point of view they desired to discuss the matter. It was quite impossible in Ireland to regard any distinguished person occupying the position of Lord Lieutenant simply as the Representative of the Queen. That never had been and never could be. He would remind the Prime Minister that when Earl Spencer was Viceroy in Ireland in 1870, as the Representative of the Queen and of the Government which had just disestablished the Irish Church, he was "Boycotted" by the noblemen and aristocracy of Ireland, who declined to attend his levées, or Lady Spencer's drawing rooms—not because they wished to show any disrespect to the Queen, but because they disapproved of the policy he represented. They disapproved of Earl Spencer the politician, and not of Earl Spencer the Viceroy; and they took every opportunity of slighting him. If those noblemen and gentlemen had a perfect right to show their disapproval of the policy which Earl Spencer then represented, surely the same right extended to men occupying a humbler position if they thought proper for any reason to disapprove of the policy of Earl Spencer the statesman and politician in 1884. The action of these teachers was dictated by no feeling of disloyalty, for they drank with all proper marks of respect the health of the Queen; but was it to be made a matter of censure in Ireland that persons thought fit at a banquet not to express approval of the policy of the Viceroy, who, at the same time, was the Representative of the policy of the Government? Were they to be visited with censure for that? This Circular of Mr. Sheridan threatened them with dismissal from their employment; with losing their situations and being reduced to beggary. If it was an offence in Ireland not to drink the Lord Lieutenant's health, why should it not also be an offence not to drink the Chief Secretary's health? The Chief Secretary was supposed to be, and Constitutionally he ought to be, a better Representative of the Constitution than the Viceroy. He held that the Viceroy ought to be the Representative of both Parties, while the Chief Secretary ought to be the Representative of the policy of the Government. Why, then, should people not be threatened with dismissal if they did not drink the health of the Chief Secretary? They might think Earl Spencer's policy had been a curse to the country; and for that reason, and not because of any hostility to him as an individual, they might refuse to drink his health. The Secretary to the Treasury seemed to have held out an indication that some quasi-intimation should be given to Mr. Sheridan that he should exhibit no such extreme sensitiveness in the future; and if that was to be taken as an assurance they might let the matter end. This Circular had created the greatest feeling of indignation among the teachers; but so much did they feel themselves under the power of the Board, and so much did they dread the exercise of that power, that they wrote replies which the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had not characterized too strongly. When the personnel of that Board was examined, there was no wonder that the teachers were afraid of Mr. Sheridan's threat. Judge Lawson was a member of the Board, and he was known in Ireland to be not very tolerant to those who differed from him, and to be ready to make use of such powers as he possessed. Judge O'Hagan was another member of the Board; but he enjoyed a different character. Lord Fitzgerald was another; and there were also Mr. Murray, a very decided politician, Judge Morris, the Rev. John Daly, the right hon. and most reverend Marcus Gervais Beresford, whose position in Ireland was not calculated to re-assure those who gave him any displeasure. Those unfortunate teachers wrote letters which must have caused them a feeling of extreme humiliation and irritation. He could not conceive why the Irish Government should go out of their way to exasperate and irritate these National School teachers. Instead of trying to conciliate the Irish people, the Government galled them with a sense of injustice, held out to them hopes which were never realized, gave them promises which were never fulfilled, and insulted and trampled on them in a way that the teachers in England, he ventured to say, would not tolerate for a moment. The teachers in England could come together and hold meetings, and say that they would not tolerate these things. Suppose the Vice President of the Council were to tell the English teachers to drink the health of the Prime Minister—who was, perhaps, more worthy of such an honour than the Lord Lieutenant—if they did not comply, did anyone believe that they would be dismissed or censured; and, if they were, did anyone believe that it would be tolerated for one moment? Would the teachers themselves tolerate it, however Radical they might be? He should think not. This was one of those insults which were calculated to sting and gall the Irish people, which they ought not to submit to in silence, and to which he hoped they would never submit.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is not possible that the discussion can be satisfactory under the peculiar circumstances of the case—seeing that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is unhappily prevented from attending the House. I have no doubt that he would have been fully acquainted with the circumstances, and would have been prepared to do what I think hon. Gentlemen opposite have a right to expect—that is to say, would have been prepared to express an explicit opinion on this subject, and to say whether the Government do or do not approve of this arrangement. We on this Bench are dependent entirely on the charity of hon. Gentlemen opposite for our knowledge of the facts of the case.

MR. HEALY: A Return has been presented to Parliament by the Chief Secretary containing the documents bearing on this question. Unfortunately, at the present moment, on inquiring in the Lobby for it, I find that it has not yet been received from the printers.

MR. GLADSTONE: Exactly, and that accounts for our having been unable to ascertain the exact facts of the case. This document, it is said, contained, first of all, a censure, and, secondly, a threat of dismissal. Is the hon. Gentleman quite sure that the document went the length of a threat of dismissal? If he is not quite sure, I should hope he made a mistake.

MR. GRAY: So far as my memory serves me, it was a general threat of dismissal, if certain conduct complained of in the letter was persevered in or carried on in future.

MR. GLADSTONE: I can only express my hope that the hon. Member's memory may be in error. I have no right to say it is so, because I have no knowledge of the facts. I am loth to believe that a threat of dismissal should be contained in a letter of that kind. If I had the paper before me, and the view of the matter taken by the Irish Commissioners of Education—whom I must look upon as responsible—I might be prepared to give an unconditional opinion. The hon. Gentleman supposes what he assumes to be a parallel case, and asks whether the English teachers would tolerate it, if they were told to drink my health? There are many meetings, at which I am not surprised to hear that my health is not drunk, and as to which I am very well pleased if a very decided opinion concerning me is not expressed. The case of Earl Spencer is a very different one; but, so far as I can give an opinion, it is of very doubtful wisdom to interfere with a body of gentlemen, even though they might be school teachers, in such a matter. If I may venture to give an opinion, and always reserving the right to change that opinion on circumstances not now known to me coming to light, I should say that Earl Spencer's wish would be that his health should be drunk freely, or that it should not be drunk at all. At any rate, I should think he would deprecate any interference with individual liberty for the purpose of procuring a compliment which, under such circumstances, and when so procured, would be of little value. That is the impression with which I should be disposed to look upon the matter. I hope that the day may be coming near when the Crown and everything relating to it may be welcomed in Ireland with the heartiest loyalty. I cannot deny there is something in the distinction drawn in the double character of the Lord Lieutenant, who is certainly, on the one hand, the Representative of the Crown—and, in my opinion, the Crown has never been more worthily represented—and, on the other hand, a partizan statesman who identifies himself with these measures of which we may take different views according to the political opinions we may entertain. It will be felt we cannot go further into the matter, not knowing more about the state of the case; and I would, therefore, express a hope that the discussion may not be continued.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would not, after what had fallen from the Prime Minister, further pursue the subject. The right hon. Gentleman's statement formed a very satisfactory conclusion to the debate. He (Mr. O'Connor) wished again to call attention to a subject which he was sorry to say he had had to note every year without, apparently, any amendment on the part of the Department. He found that this year, for books and apparatus, a sum of no less than £35,000 was set down, which was an increase of £1,000 on the Estimate of last year. Now, he had called attention over and over again to the character of these books. He did not suppose that any Education Department in the world purchased books, from the standpoint of common sense so imbecile, from the standpoint of literature so worthless, and from the point of view of nationality so insulting, as the Irish Board of Education. Owing to the system adopted in Ireland, the use of these books was practically compulsory, and there was nothing like free trade in the choice of books as there was in England. He knew the Secretary to the Treasury would not be able to give him any assistance in this matter, as he was as innocent of information upon them as he was of the ancient literature of Ireland. No; it was perhaps possible that the hon. Gentleman did know something about the ancient literature of Ireland; but he certainly did not know anything about the National School books of that country. The Irish Members had reason to complain of the manner in which these Irish questions were treated. For the first time for a considerable period they had had an utterance from the Prime Minister on an Irish question, and that utterance had been of a very satisfactory character. He thought if the Prime Minister were to intervene more frequently in Irish matters, they would have more reason to be satisfied with what went on in that country. They brought on Irish subjects, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary—owing to an illness which they all regretted and hoped would be soon terminated—was absent from his place. The Solicitor General for Ireland, with a prudent reserve not always practised by Law Officers, confined himself to giving opinions as sparse as lawyers usually gave when they were asked to give them for nothing. The hon. and learned Gentleman chained his tongue, and declined to say anything as to the educational administration of Ireland. The Secretary to the Treasury, being an old journalist, was, of course, able to pick up information with great facility, and was able to give it with that air of omniscience which every leader writer was able to display who was worth anything to a newspaper proprietor. If he (Mr. O'Connor) had been foolish enough to give forth a small share of the large store of knowledge he might have on a particular subject, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would get up and convince English Members of the Committee, and endeavour to teach him, that his (the Financial Secretary's) knowledge, as compared with his (Mr. O'Connor's), was as an Encyclopædia compared to an A B C or early primer. However, he would not now go fully into the arguments, but would defer his statement to the Report, if he thought it desirable to go into the subject. All the official information as to Ireland was confined to a single Member of the Government, and that was what he (Mr. O'Connor) had to complain of—that the other Members of the Government not only did not share the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, but took care to maintain their minds in a state of saturated ignorance on these subjects. What was the result? Why, that the Prime Minister, the Secretary to the Treasury, and the Solicitor General for Ireland were able always to take up an attitude—which he should have thought such good Protestants as they would be ashamed to observe—namely, an attitude of invincible ignorance on Irish affairs. As a rule, when the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had made his speech on an Irish subject all the debating power of the Treasury Bench was exhausted, and, accordingly, the rest of the debate was left to the reiterated arguments of the Irish Members addressing such of the English Members as came to listen to them. That was not Constitutional Government. The speech they had just heard from the Prime Minister had been satisfactory; but whenever the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the Prime Minister happened to be in their places together, and the latter seemed to be paying the smallest degree of attention to what fell from the Irish Members, he (Mr. O'Connor) observed, with almost a feeling of pity, the appealing attitude of the Chief Secretary. Whenever this occurred, however, the inevitable result occurred sooner or later—the Chief Secretary was thrown over, and the Prime Minister adopted the Irish view of the case. That had occurred several times. If the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary were there together, and he (Mr. O'Connor) were to re-quote the passages he had often brought before the House from these books, they would have the Chief Secretary getting up at, perhaps, 20 minutes past 11, and saying that the books were everything which his own brilliant pen could accomplish; and about 20 minutes after 12 they would have the Prime Minister getting up and declaring that the school books were a disgrace to any educational establishment in the country. The result was, that when the Chief Secretary and the Prime Minister were sitting on the Front Bench, the Prime Minister appeared to have his ears open to what was said, while the Chief Secretary all the time appeared to be like a hen on a hot griddle. He (Mr. O'Connor) would recommend the Secretary to the Treasury not to make any answer on this subject.

MR. COURTNEY said, he was aware that the hon. Member had called attention to this subject before, and that he had quoted extracts from the school books, and had amused the House very much. He had an impression, however, that he had seen a statement—he could not say whether he had dreamt this, or whether he had really seen it—in which it was stated that the book to which the hon. Member took exception had been superseded. He could not say whether that was the fact or not.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the hon. Member must, as a public man, know as well as he (Mr. O'Connor) did, the inutility of placing any reliance upon any statement affecting Ireland which appeared in The Times newspaper. If he were to occupy himself with correcting the misstatements with regard to Ireland which appeared in that paper, he would have nothing else in the world to do. He knew to what the hon. Member referred—to a letter which appeared in The Times, and was to be found in it nearly every day—a letter which was about as extraordinary a sample of impending and inflexible mendacity as had ever characterized any article in any journal in the world. The operations of nature, the pressure of the seasons, the daily rising and setting of the sun, were but mere awkward attempts at uniformity in comparison with the extraordinary regularity of the mendacity of this statement of Irish affairs in The Times newspaper.

MR. GRAY said, that if no hon. Member wished to discuss any other matter under Sub-heads A. B. and C. in this Vote, he wished to move to reduce it by £33,543, the amount proposed to be voted for the maintenance of Model Schools in Ireland. These Model Schools had been condemned by the Royal Commission which investigated the whole question of Primary Education in Ireland as long ago as the year 1869. That Royal Commission recommended on good grounds the complete abolition of these Model Schools, and the utilization of the funds for many other purposes. Like many of the recommendations of other Commissions, however, this recommendation had remained such, and nothing more, up to the present day. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Dawson) had obtained a Return dated 12th of August, 1880, which showed the work of these schools. At that time they were in receipt of £36,086 a-year. The sum seemed now to be somewhat reduced; at any rate, the amount asked for in the Estimate was only £33,543. Probably, if the matter were properly explained, it would be shown that the schools had some other source of income which was not mentioned in the Return, but which would bring the amount up to £36,086. But, whether the exact sum was £33,000 or £36,000, the Committee would agree with him that the sum was a substantial one. It was only right, when the Royal Commission had stated that this sum should not be expended any longer on this particular purpose, that the Secretary to the Treasury—a Gentleman so jealous of the public purse—should give some intimation why, for the past 15 years, he and his Predecessors had asked the House to sanction this expenditure. Now, the Return to which he referred was a Return first giving the cost of the construction of the Model Schools, and this he found to be £160,304. The cost of the staff and maintenance was, as he had stated, given at £36,086; and, besides these figures, the Return gave the number of pupils on the books, and an analysis of them both as to their religion and the occupation of their parents. In 1880 there were only 11,873 pupils on all the books of the Model Schools of Ireland. For these 11,800 pupils, this £160,000 had been spent on buildings—and very splendid buildings they were—and Parliament was called on to vote £36,000 a-year. When they compared the miserable salaries paid for the ordinary National Schools of the country with the enormous Vote—proportionately to the number of scholars educated in the schools—for these Model Schools, it would be seen that there were occasions when the Treasury could not only be liberal out of Imperial funds, but even extravagant, in some Departments in Ireland. They found an explanation when they came to make an analysis of the scholars in these schools, and the occupations of the parents. For reasons into which he need not now enter, the Heads of the Catholic Church in Ireland had long ago declared their complete disapproval of the Model School system, and had warned their clergy and their flocks not to permit Catholic children to attend these schools. He would not go into the reason why the Catholic Church in Ireland adopted that view. Suffice it to say that it had adopted it. The proportion of Catholics and Protestants in Ireland was as 5 to 1; yet out of the total number of 11,873 scholars in the Model Schools—and this was sufficient in itself to condemn them—only 3,198 were Catholics, the rest being Protestants. There were 4,100 belonging to the late Established Church, and 3,641 Presbyterians, the remainder belonging to other Protestant denominations. Thus, while Catholics were an enormous majority of the entire population, they were only a small minority of the scholars educated in these Model Schools. The schools were kept up for the advantage and convenience of a small minority of the population, composed of wealthy persons who had no claim whatever to education at the public expense. When they came to analyze the parentage of the children they were educating gratuitously they found that his statement with regard to their social condition was absolutely verified. Of the 11,873, 344 were agents or managers; and surely an agent or manager, whatever agency or managership he might have, had no claim to have his child educated gratuitously. He was not sure that some of these parents did not pay the nominal sum of 5s. a-quarter. Some of the children were educated gratuitously; but in some cases a nominal payment was made. Six were apothecaries, 29 were architects—who were, undoubtedly, professional men—30 were artists, 19 were attorneys, 33 auctioneers, 10 bailiffs, 2 barristers, 86 clergymen—endowed already by the State, and now getting their children educated for nothing—842 were clerks, 72 engineers, 2 fishery proprietors—he should like to know what claim fishery proprietors had to have their children educated for nothing—210 were Government employés other than clerks, 258 were grocers, 36 were medical doctors, 284 merchants and tailors,

Mr. Gray

7 newspaper editors—and as both a newspaper editor and, to a considerable extent, proprietor he felt ashamed to see this, and was at a loss to know what claim this class had to the gratuitous education of their children—164 had no profession—he did not suppose that meant that they were casuals, but only that they were persons who did not require to labour for their bread—256 were policemen, 932 were shopkeepers—he was skipping some—1 was a surgeon, 3 were surveyors, 756 widows—and they were a class who, doubtless, had something to say for themselves—46 were workhouse officials, 1,287 farmers—some of whom, probably, deserved to have a provision of this kind made for them—1,324 were labourers—who, of course, had a claim to the gratuitous education of their children—572 were soldiers, and 2,400 tradesmen. Those who, under the several heads he had mentioned, might have a claim, might, he imagined, well be provided for in the Primary Schools, and did not require a reckless system of intermediate education provided for them out of the public funds. The figures he had read showed, in the first place, he thought, the complete failure of the schools in regard to the number of scholars; secondly, that they did not serve the vast majority of the population; and, thirdly, that the schools were not used by the classes who had a need for gratuitous education; but by a class which was opulent, and had no right to come and ask, year after year, for free education for their children—no more right than they had to ask for Votes for clothing or food. These arguments, without his pressing them to a greater depth, showed great foundation for the Report of the Commission of 1869, and he must say that the funds should be devoted to other purposes. He listened with curiosity to hear what the Secretary to the Treasury would say in defence of the maintenance of this Vote in the Estimates. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £33,543—the amount appearing under Sub-head D.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Item of £33,543, for Model Schools, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”
—(Mr. Gray.)

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had only come in at the end of the hon.

Gentleman's figures, but had heard one or two things which were very curious, and which persuaded him that, if what he had not heard was of the same nature as what he had heard, the hon. Member's argument did not go very far. The hon. Member took, amongst others, the sons of clergymen, and added the extraordinary remark that these clergymen were already endowed by the State. His (Colonel King-Harman's) recollection was that the endowments of Protestant clergymen in Ireland had been taken away by the State, and that the clergy were no longer endowed by the State. They who had to pay for the support of the clergy had a good right to speak of the disendowment of the Church. The hon. Member objected to 256 policemen having their children educated in these Model Schools. Well, he (Colonel King-Harman) could not conceive a more meritorious body of men, and a body more entitled to have their children educated free. But he would go down a good deal further. The hon. Member objected to workhouse officials, widows, and over 2,000 tradesmen having these privileges for their children. Perhaps the Committee was aware that “tradesmen” in Ireland did not mean wealthy shopkeepers, who stood behind their counters and served out their wares—

MR. GRAY wished to inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he had not denied the claim of some of the classes he had referred to to this education. In quoting the figures he had admitted that some of the classes were entitled to send their children to these schools.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had understood the hon. Member to say that he skipped certain classes who might have a claim, and only quoted those to whose children he objected to see this gratuitous education given.

MR. GRAY said, he had mentioned labourers.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the hon. Member had mentioned, amongst others, “tradesmen;” and his (Colonel King-Harman's) contention was that the hon. Member's statement was misleading to the Committee, for the reason that “tradesmen” in Ireland—as all those who were thoroughly acquainted with Ireland were aware—did not mean grocers, butchers, linendrapers, and so on, as it did in England; but such men as blacksmiths, carpenters, stonemasons, and people other than agricultural labourers, journeyman shoemakers, tailors, bricklayers, masons, and so forth, were, perhaps, amongst the most needy men in Ireland, and amongst those who most required State aid in the education of their children. These classes were generally most industrious, and, in intelligence, were far above the agricultural labourer. They were certainly not amongst those who did not require this kind of education. He only mentioned those items he had heard the hon. Member refer to, and which, he maintained, were misleading.

MR. COURTNEY said, that at that time of night, when it was the desire of the Irish Members to enter upon the consideration of other subjects, he did not feel justified in occupying much time in replying to the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray). This question was one which had been often discussed. The Model Schools, everyone must admit, were institutions which few regarded with satisfaction. Some of them might be fairly described as a success; but there were others which certainly had not been successful; but, as the hon. Member for Carlow must know very well, it was one thing to set up a school and another thing to abolish it. So long as these schools were in existence and maintained a fair average of attendance of scholars, it would be difficult to put an end to them.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: What is the intention of the Government with regard to them?

MR. COURTNEY said, he was unable to answer that question at that moment. The attendance at present was at least a fair average, sufficient to justify the maintenance of the schools. There was an average attendance of 90 at the smallest Provincial Model School. That was sufficient to justify the maintenance of the school. The larger Model Schools had a very respectable attendance. The schools were there if scholars chose to make use of them; but, as the hon. Gentleman had pointed out, they had come under the ban of the Catholic hierarchy, and for that reason were not attended by as many Catholic pupils as might be expected in proportion to the population. The hon. Member had hinted that many persons availed themselves of this Model School education for their children who were perfectly well able to pay school fees. A great many of the parents did pay school fees according to their means. Three thousand paid 1s. 1d. per quarter, 4,000 paid 2s. 6d., 2,700 paid 5s., and 595 paid 10s. That 595, he should think, would cover a good many of those the hon. Member had referred to as hardly eligible for gratuitous education. He should hope, at least, that it would include the newspaper editors and proprietors. Then there were 35 who paid £1 a-quarter. Many of the parents, therefore, the hon. Member had referred to should be exempt from his censure.

MR. KENNY: Does the hon. Member mean that those who pay the highest fees compensate the State for the amount expended on them, or that the average payments compensate the State?

MR. COURTNEY: Of course, not the average.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: We all regret sincerely the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and particularly the cause of that absence. It is a perfect farce discussing Irish Educational Estimates with no one to take part in the discussion from the Government Bench but the Secretary to the Treasury, for it is plain from his defence that he is hopelessly ignorant of the whole subject of Irish affairs from beginning to end. If he had not been so hopelessly ignorant of these affairs, he could not have concealed from the Committee that these Model Schools are about the greatest imposture which could be kept up in Ireland. The House of Commons—particularly the English portion of it—have always been under the impression that there is a system of mixed education in Ireland, and these Model Schools are very often triumphantly pointed to as a part of the great success of mixed education in Ireland. But the fact is that mixed education does not exist in that country. The education there is thoroughly denominational, and the House of Commons has usually preferred to recognize the fact that it is maintaining in Ireland by grants from the State a system of education as denominational as it can be. Yet these Model Schools are every year trotted out to persuade the House of Commons that there is a system of mixed education existing in Ireland—a system in which Catholics, Presbyterians, and members of the Church of England join together in equal numbers to receive the benefits of education. It happened to me to be concerned in an inquiry into the subject of Irish Education, and I then found that there is no such thing as mixed education in the country. What you find, generally, in the model schools is this, that there are a great proportion of Protestants attending them—these schools, with the Universities and the elementary schools, are attended by a great proportion of Protestants, and by two or three model Catholics, who are trotted out whenever an inspection takes place to prove that a system of mixed education obtains in Ireland. But, as a matter of fact, you are keeping up these model schools in Ireland solely for the benefit of the Protestant body, and it is, undoubtedly, a source of great grievance and annoyance to the great body of the Catholic population, and particularly to the great body of the Catholic clergy. The Committee will observe that there are in Ireland 7,849 elementary schools, of which there is scarcely one which is not thoroughly denominational. But, in order to keep up the farce of mixed education, you sustain, at a cost of £35,000 a-year, these 30 model schools. Imagine what these are, scattered all over Ireland for the benefit, principally, of the Protestant population. You spend an original sum of £160,000, and £35,000 a-year, to maintain these schools merely for the farce of persuading English public opinion, which has always had a leaning towards mixed education, that you are maintaining a system of mixed education in Ireland. Is it worth the while of the House of Commons to spend that large sum every year for the sake of maintaining what is really nothing more nor less than an imposture? Is it fair to the great mass of the population that you should spend this large sum of money principally for the benefit of a particular sect and of a particular class? It was very right that the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) should ask for the intentions of the Government on this subject. The subject has been brought before the House of Commons many times, and year after year it has been put off—year after year the Government have refused to meet it. If the Committee can be induced to take an interest in it, and say they will pass the Vote for this year, but that next year they will insist upon having a positive statement from the Government as to what they will do, it will be an excellent thing. This is a very sore subject in Ireland. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin said it was not at all an improper thing that the members of the Irish Church should have their children educated in these model schools.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I said that a certain number of Irish clergymen were referred to as being endowed by the State, and that that was not the fact. I denied the statement.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I must take issue with the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I cannot see how he makes out that the Irish Church is not endowed by the State. I have an idea that when the Irish Church was disestablished, excellent terms were made by the clergy with the State. Nothing will induce me to believe that the terms they made with the State at that time do not form an endowment. It may not be as much as the hon. and gallant Gentleman could wish; but it is an endowment, and it is worth considering. I say that to keep up these model schools solely because they are agreeable to the caprices and remains of that ancient religious ascendancy, which I do not think contributed at all to the prosperity or welfare of Ireland, is a course which I do not think the House of Commons should go on consenting to. Here we have not only an imposture, but a State Establishment maintained principally for the benefit of a small section of the population who can perfectly well afford to pay for their own schooling. I hope, under these circumstances, the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) will not be inclined to injure his subject by taking a Division to-night, but that he will receive support from a large portion of the House, and will receive from the Government an assurance that the system of model schools in Ireland will be seriously considered by them with a view to their abolition.

MR. GRAY said, that, of course, he quite appreciated the difficulty of discussing this matter in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He could very well understand that the Secretary to the Treasury had some difficulty in announcing the intention of the Government on the subject; but, bearing in mind that this was a matter which had been frequently discussed since the Royal Commission condemned these schools in 1869, he must say it was time, having now arrived at the year 1884, for the Government to at least contemplate the possibility of, at some period or other, making up its mind with regard to the schools, and announcing its decision to the House. As the hon. Gentleman said, when a school was established it was difficult to abolish it; but how many generations were to elapse before the Government would put a stop to this system of education? He should be content if the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would state that this time next year the Government would say what decision they had come to with regard to the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1869. He should be delighted to withdraw his Motion, and to give the Government another 12 months to consider the subject. It was easy to vote them down, no doubt; but he did think the Irish Members had a moral right, in the face of the Report of the Royal Commission and of the Return which had been quoted to the Committee, to insist on the Government telling them that they would give the matter their serious attention. He did not think it was necessary for him to reply to the strictures of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman). He had been abundantly dealt with by the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill). He (Mr. Gray) considered that when the Irish Church and the incumbents of benefices in that Church got large sums which, by a special Act of Parliament, they were able to convert into a special fund for that Church, it did constitute an endowment. The clergy of the Disestablished Church in Ireland, whether they were at that time incumbents or not, who now derived benefit from the fund, were now entitled to be considered as endowed by that fund, and were not fit persons for public charity. He was quite aware that the Church had been disestablished in 1869; but he knew, also, that it had not been disendowed. He should be content with the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant if they could have an assurance that between this and next year the Government would take this matter into consideration. On that understanding—if anyone would tell them that the Report of the Commission would be acted on—he should be willing to withdraw his Motion; but if he did not receive such an assurance, and if he was informed that all these wealthy persons, or persons presumed to be wealthy, were to continue to have their children educated by the State, although he should be beaten, he should consider it his duty to go to a Division.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he was not disposed to argue this question, as the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Gray) had argued it in a better way than he could. He should like, however, to make an appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury. He (Mr. Biggar) very often blamed the Government for giving large sums of money where it was not required; and, on the other hand, for being exceedingly stingy where they ought to be liberal. This was a case in point. What they did in the matter of Irish education was this. They gave over £3 a-head for all the pupils in these schools, they being the children of a particularly well-off class, and acted in a most stingy manner towards the National School teachers, who had to teach the children of the very poor, and they treated the nuns in a worse way than they did the National School teachers. That was a matter which he thought the Secretary to the Treasury, from a purely English point of view, would do well to take into consideration. This system obtained in almost every Public Office. They saw a great many people who had to do very little work receiving large salaries, whilst those who did nearly all the work received small salaries. As the Secretary to the Treasury represented the Money Department of the State, it seemed to him (Mr. Biggar) that he would be doing a judicious thing by cutting off this £35,000 a-year of National Expenditure.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he had a word or two to say in reply to the appeals which had been made to him. With respect to the general question raised, it had been asked more than once that evening whether the Government would, next Session, take this matter into consideration. Well, it had been already stated that it was the intention of the Government, next Session, to bring in a Bill dealing with the question of education in Ireland, and he had no doubt the model schools would form a part of the subject of legislation. He (Mr. Courtney) would take care that the effect of the discussion that evening was represented to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, so that the subject could be considered by the Irish Government in connection with the Bill which was to be brought in.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, there would be very little chance of reform in the prescribed system of education in Ireland in the course of next year, and he thought that everyone who had listened to the discussion of this Vote must feel that though there might be a hundred and one points in relation to it to which the attention of the Government might reasonably be directed by the Irish Members, it would be very difficult to find more than one which the English mind could readily or easily grasp. He would not say that the English or the Scotch Members, or even the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, were to blame for their ignorance of this subject; but although they might not be able to appreciate most of the points arising upon it, there was one question, at least, which the English and Scotch Members would be able to understand as well as those who represented the Irish constituencies, and that was the question of inspection. He would remind the Committee that a Commission was appointed some years ago to inquire into the Civil Services of Ireland generally, and they had presented a Report recommending that the remuneration of the Civil servants in Ireland should be the same as that which was given in England in the case of those persons whose positions corresponded in point of difficulty and responsibility. On the 4th of July, 1873, the House of Commons passed a Resolution to the effect that the general inadequacy of the scale of salaries of the Civil servants serving in Ireland should as soon as possible be redressed. Now, of all the different classes of Civil servants in Ireland, he supposed there was no class which was so hard worked and highly qualified, and, at the same time, so much underpaid, as the Inspectors of National Schools; and he would ask the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, while he referred to the comparative positions of the National Schools in England and those employed in Ireland. In Page 331 of the Estimates they would find the details of one Vote, and at Page 397 the details of the other. In England, the two senior Inspectors started at £900 a-year, and there were three on the old scale at £700. There were 73 Inspectors at a minimum of £400, which rose by an annual increment of £50—a very substantial advance—every third year until it reached a maximum of £800. There were, also, 38 Inspectors on the old scale whose salaries rose from a minimum of £200 to a maximum of £600. Then, there were 25 Inspectors whose minimum salary of £300 a-year, rose to a maximum of £800. The Sub-Inspectors had been Inspectors' Assistants, after having been schoolmasters, and they had been appointed without any examination. The Sub-Inspectors had a minimum salary of £300, rising to a maximum of £500. Turning to Page 397, the Committee would be enabled to contrast the pay of the Irish Inspectors with that of the English Inspectors. There were in Ireland 66 District Inspectors who began with a salary of £250 a-year, which rose by an annual increment of £10, and in some cases of £15, to a maximum of £500. When it was considered that these Inspectors were appointed after a competitive examination, the programme of which was almost unequalled for severity in the Civil Service, it became obvious that the qualifications required from the English and Irish Inspectors respectively were by no means in proportion to their several salaries. It was not merely that some scholarship was required from the Irish Inspectors; but they had to discharge duties of so onerous and varied a character that none but the best men—men of first class acquirements, possessing great bodily strength as well as great tact and patience—could get through their labours. Their duties were a great deal more varied than those of the Inspectors in this country. They had themselves to examine the vouchers for promotion and classification; they had to look at the accounts of the schools; they were called on to advise the schoolmasters on a hundred different matters, which were dealt with by correspondence with the Education Department of this country, and, upon the whole, it would be very difficult to find a class of public servants on whom so many and such various responsibilities devolved as on this particular class of men employed to inspect the National Schools of Ireland. They began at a minimum salary, which was actually less than that of the English Sub-Inspectors who never passed an examination at all.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, surely the hon. Member was misinformed. No Inspector was admitted without a severe examination.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: But it is only a pass-examination.

Mr. MUNDELLA: It is an examination for the Civil Service.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he found he was mistaken, as there was an examination. He should have said they had a pass-examination; but the fact remained that the competition for the post of Inspector in Ireland was very much more stringent than they had to undergo in England, while the English Sub-Inspectors underwent merely a pass-examination. After having acted as schoolmasters they became Assistant Inspectors, and from that position they passed up to Inspectorships. They began at a scale of salary which was £50 higher than that which was given to the District Inspectors in Ireland, where some of the most qualified men who held these appointments went in at a minimum of £250, which was only what was given to a clerk in the upper division of the Civil Service, with an annual increment of £10 a-year up to a maximum salary of £500; whereas, in England, the Sub-Inspectors had a minimum of £300, while in the lowest scale of Inspectors the salary went up to £600 on the old scale and on the new scale to £800 a-year. Considering the qualifications required of these men, the nature of the competition they had to undergo, the duties they were called upon to discharge, and the responsibilities resting upon them, he thought it very unjust towards them that, contrary not only to the Report of the Commission to which he had referred, but contrary also to the Resolution come to by that House on the 4th of July, 1873, the existing scale of remuneration should not have been amended, but should still be maintained. He thought that if ever there was a claim for an increased allowance of pay which was a reasonable one, it was the claim now made on behalf of these Irish Inspectors. They had made application—he did not remember when it was sent in—but it was within his knowledge that they had applied to the Department for an improvement in the terms under which their services were remunerated. He was not aware whether the Government had given any final or favourable reply to that application, neither had he heard any argument which could for a single moment justify the refusal of the claim. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was prepared to make any statement in regard to this matter; but it was essentially a Treasury question, and if anything had been done or directed, it must necessarily have been reported to him. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would be able to give the Committee, not the determination of the Chief Secretary or of the National Education Department, but that which he had come to himself, and he also trusted that the communication he might have to make would be of a satisfactory character.

Mr. COURTNEY said, the subject was one he had had under his observation, because it was one of the matters that were referred to the Treasury. He must point out that the comparison the hon. Member had made as between the Inspectors of Schools in England and Ireland, was not quite exact. It was, in fact, inexact in this material circumstance, that more than half, or about half, of the Inspectors of England were in the lowest grade of Inspectors' Assistants. There were 291 Inspectors in England altogether, and of those no fewer than 142 were Inspectors' Assistants, who received salaries of from £150 to £300 per annum.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had confined his remarks to the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors.

Mr. COURTNEY said, he was aware the hon. Member had confined his remarks to the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors, and that fact constituted the point of his (Mr. Courtney's) observation. The hon. Member had not considered and compared that part of the organization which related to the large class of Assistants. In England, as he had stated, there were 142 of these Inspectors' Assistants, who were doing a lower class of work than the Inspectors and receiving lower salaries, which varied from £150 to £300 a-year. Then there were about 140 Inspectors and senior Inspectors running up to the highest grades, the Sub-Inspectors receiving salaries of from £300 to £500 a-year. Under the scheme of inspection in England, there was only a limited number of superior officers and a large number of officers occupying inferior positions; while, under the system which prevailed in Ireland, there was a large number of superior officers and a comparatively limited number of inferior officers; so that what had been done in Ireland had in reality been to change the distribution of inspection adopted in this country, by increasing the number of Inspectors to a number corresponding to the number of Inspectors' Assistants in England, who had inferior duties and smaller pay, and at the same time to diminish the number of Assistant Inspectors who, in Ireland, were out of all proportion to the number in this country. If they took the number of Inspectors of the higher grade in England—namely, 140, and compared them with those of Ireland, they would find that there were in the latter country no fewer than 66 persons in a position corresponding with that of the English Inspectors. If 140 Inspectors of this grade were sufficient for England, it could hardly be said that 66 were required in Ireland. The Irish ought, in fact, as a matter of proportion, to have a smaller number of this grade of Inspectors and a larger number of the inferior grade. From the point of view from which this question was regarded by the Treasury, it had been considered that the true redress of the existing inequality would consist in reducing the number of the Inspectors and increasing the number of the Assistant Inspectors. The Inspectors' Assistants in Ireland ought to be increased in the same proportion as in England.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had failed to deal with the very forcible arguments advanced by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor). All the speech of the Secretary to the Treasury had amounted to was that, some day or other, the Government might propose to diminish the number of Inspectors in Ireland and to increase the number of Sub-Inspectors; but, in the meantime, the Inspectors employed in that country were to be compelled to live on a salary which was so much less than that paid to officers of the same grade in England.

MR. COURTNEY said, the pay of an Assistant Inspector in Ireland was not much less than that of a Sub-Inspector in England.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he was speaking of the Assistant Inspectors in England as compared with the Assistant Inspectors in Ireland.

MR. COURTNEY: They are about the same.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he did not find that it was so. This was one of those points on which he was able to agree with hon. Members who sat below the Gangway on that (the Opposition) side of the House. They ought not, in his opinion, to look at these questions from a Treasury point of view; they ought rather to regard them from an educational point of view. If the Government required a highly qualified class of men to supervise the education of Ireland, they ought to pay proportionately; and, for his own part, he was not able to see anything in the argument of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, that because they had not in Ireland a large number of low class men, they were, therefore, right in giving insufficient remuneration to the high class men. Let the Government diminish the number of high class men, if they liked; but, at any rate, let them increase the pay of those they retained in the same proportion as appertained in England. He was certainly in favour of the views enunciated by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had been for some moments puzzled by the reply he had received from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. He had been at a loss to make out whether the nature of that reply was to be attributed to ignorance on the part of the hon. Gentleman, or to the ingenuity and dexterity with which he was able to evade an awkward subject. He could assure the hon. Gentleman he was mistaken in the view he had advanced, probably because of his want of acquaintance with the details of Irish education. It was not fair, in making a comparison between the systems adopted in England and Ireland, to compare the Sub-Inspectors of England with the District Inspectors in Ireland. However much the hon. Gentleman might attempt, by the repetition of certain figures, to obfuscate the minds of hon. Members, the fact remained that the Inspectors of the highest class went up to £900 in England, while the District Inspectors in Ireland did not go up to two-thirds of that sum. In Ireland the highest salary paid to the District Inspectors was £500, while the Inspectors' Assistants in that country received £125 as compared with £150, which was the salary of the Assistant Inspectors in England; while in England they went up to £300, and in Ireland to £200. It was true that the proportion of Assistants was much smaller in Ireland than in England; and what was the consequence? Why, that whereas in England every Inspector received substantial assistance from an Assistant Inspector, in Ireland the Inspectors had only a few days in each year in which they obtained any assistance. Again, in the matter of leave, in England the Inspectors had 42 days' holiday, while the Irish Inspectors had only 29, so that the English officers had 13 days more leave than was accorded to the Irish Inspectors. As a rule, also, he found that the Irish Inspector was a better qualified man than the English Inspector. In Ireland the Inspector had more duties to perform, duties of a more varied character and of greater responsibility than those discharged by the English Inspector. Under these circumstances, it was monstrous that the pay of the Irish Inspector should be only a little more than half the salary given to the English Inspector. The large number of Sub-Inspectors in England increased the advantages of the English Inspectors, while the small number in Ireland operated to the disadvantage of the Irish Inspectors. He hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would look more closely at the figures given in the two sets of Estimates, in which case he might be induced to admit, as the House of Commons had admitted 11 years ago, that, considering the competition which was required in the case of the Irish Inspectors, the officials in that country were greatly underpaid as compared with the Staff in England.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, there could be no doubt as to the superior organization of the Inspection Staff in England and Scotland to that in Ireland. Yet, on examining the Estimates, the Committee would find that the Inspection Department cost more in Ireland in proportion to population than it did in England or Scotland. In England the amount expended was £115,000; in Scotland it was £21,400; in Ireland it was £29,000. If there were a number of underpaid officials in Ireland, it was because there were too many persons employed in the work of inspection. The proper remedy for the present state of things was to make the organization of the Staff in Ireland similar to what it was in England and Scotland. The question, as it appeared to him, was one of readjustment, and not of amount of salaries.

MR. KENNY said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had instituted a comparison that was very unfair. He had said that if England had 140 Inspectors and Ireland 66, Ireland had too many. He (Mr. Kenny) was of opinion that the fair course would be to point out that England had 280 Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors, and Ireland only 73 Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors, which gave something like a fair relative proportion. It was perfectly clear, however, that the Inspectors in Ireland were paid a sum considerably less than was paid in England. They knew that the maximum salary to which an Irish Inspector could attain was £600 a-year, while in England an Inspector could rise to a position in which his salary was £900 a-year. No wholesale comparison between England and Ireland would get over this fact, or make it appear that the Irish Inspectors were as well paid as those of England. There was one point on which he should like to hear an answer from the Secretary to the Treasury, and if it should not come within the province of the hon. Gentleman, he hoped it would be answered by some other Member of the Government whose Department it did refer to. He wished to ask whether the Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors in England were compelled to devote their whole time from year's end to year's end to the duties of their offices, or were they allowed to do anything else?

MR. MUNDELLA said, they were compelled to devote the whole of their time to their duties.

MR. KENNY: To devote the whole of their time?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £1,195, to complete the sum for the Teachers' Pension Office, Ireland.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, this was a purely Irish Vote, and dealt with the pensions of Irish schoolmasters; but the Superintendent of the Office was an Englishman. He should be sorry to move a reduction of the Vote, because that gentleman happened to be a personal friend of his own; but he thought it was a very bad system that a purely Irish Vote should be given in charge to a subordinate official in one of the English Public Departments, which had nothing whatever to do with education, except that there was a certain amount, £200 a-year, to Mr. Denham Robinson, the Controller of the War Office, who went over for one or two days to see how things were going on in the Superannuation Office.

MR. COURTNEY said, it was true that Mr. Denham Robinson was the Superintendent referred to; but he had nothing to do with the working of the Office. He was the Actuary of the War Office, and had to revise the Tables under which the scheme was arranged, and from time to time to supervise its working, and see whether the scheme was carrying out financially that for which it was designed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: But why should an Englishman stationed in England have to do that?

MR. COURTNEY said, it was an economical arrangement by which the Government employed for the duty required to be done—which did not demand an Actuary's whole time—an official who was devoted to similar work under Government employ.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was aware that Mr. Denham Robinson's work was more than enough to take up the whole of his time, and that he was allowed extra pay and allowances?

MR. GRAY said, it would be obvious to the Committee that this appointment had the appearance of making a snug berth for Mr. Denham Robinson, who was a War Office official. It was only part of an entire system.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, this was not an Irish Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £1,250, to complete the sum for the Royal Irish Academy.

CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARTABLE SERVICES.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £206,828, be granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for Superannuation and Retired Allowances to Persons formerly employed in the Public Service, and for Compassionate or other Special Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury if this was the Vote which included the allowance for the superannuation of a person of the name of Connellan?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes, Sir.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the amount that was given to Connellan under the Vote?

MR. COURTNEY: £450.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if the hon. Gentleman was aware of the nature of the charges which had been made against this recipient of a Government pension, and whether, in the face of those charges, he still held that this Vote should be passed by the Committee in its integrity without any discussion? Was the hon. Gentleman aware that Connellan had escaped prosecution by removing himself into a foreign country? And, further, he would ask whether the Government had ever had under its consideration the position of this man, and his claim to a pension?

MR. COURTNEY said, it was perfectly true that the pension in question was included in this Vote. That pension had been awarded in 1868. Of course, the hon. Member was aware that, under the Superannuation Act, Civil servants in a certain position were entitled to pensions after attaining a certain age.

In the year 1868 this person was retired at a certain age—that was to say, at the age at which a person had a right to retire. Papers were sent in to the Treasury, which papers being in the required order, a pension was awarded. The circumstances dated so far back that he had no personal cognizance of the steps that were taken at the time; but he believed it was quite true that when Connellan retired, there were accusations of infamous conduct against him. He believed, also, that the matter had been so far inquired into as to ascertain that no warrant was issued against Connellan in England. He was, therefore, a person who, having served his time in the Civil Service, was entitled on that ground to a pension; and however grave might have been his conduct, whatever foundation there might have been for the charges against him, it must be remembered that there had been no warrant against him or conviction for felony, and, therefore, he (Mr. Courtney) apprehended that he had at the time an indefeasible right to a pension, and that it remained indefeasible to that day.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked on what Statutes or otherwise the claim was founded?

Mr. COURTNEY said, he had already referred to the Superannuation Act, and he believed the right and just view of the law to be, that conviction for felony would have forfeited the pension, and that there having been no conviction for felony the pension could not be taken away. The conclusion he had arrived at was that the Treasury would be liable to an action at law if payment were refused. Of course, if the House of Commons refused to vote the pension, it might be pleaded in defence of such action that Parliament had not placed any money at their disposal for the payment of the amount claimed; but he was not prepared to say whether a Court of Law would hold the plea to be valid. On these simple grounds the Government thought it right to submit a Vote to the House of Commons to meet this expense. They did not see their way to withdraw the pension which was awarded in 1868, which had been regularly paid from that time to the present, and which, there being no conviction for felony against this person, they believed was due as a right now. That was the view he ventured to lay before the Committee. The Committee would exercise their discretion in judging the matter; but in point of law he believed there was no answer to the claim. Whatever course might commend itself to him were he a private Member of that House, he found it impossible, as a Member of the Government, to withdraw the Vote from the Estimate.

Mr. HEALY said, he inferred, from the manner in which the hon. Gentleman had answered the questions of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) on the subject of Connellan's pension, and from the fact that he had given more information than he usually afforded the House, that the hon. Gentleman had consulted with his Colleagues, who had more experience than he possessed, with reference to this Vote. He inferred also that the hon. Gentleman had received information as to the verdicts which had just been given in Ireland, for he ventured to say that if those verdicts had not been returned, the Committee would have been told that Connellan was one of the most righteous persons in Great Britain, and that it was a shame and a scandal that such charges should be made against him. But he was quite sure, notwithstanding the position which the Government had taken up, that the hon. Gentleman knew a great deal more about Connellan than he had told the Committee. Although, perhaps, he had not gone back to the whole history of the case, having no desire to do so, he knew the facts of the case, and that the facts were as disgraceful as they could possibly be. Lord Carlisle, at the time Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was the man responsible for all that had taken place. The Government knew that.

Mr. COURTNEY: Lord Carlisle was not Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Mr. HEALY said, that it was his influence which settled the matter. That, at any rate, was the statement made on the subject. [Mr. Courtney: No.] Would the Government, then, inform the Committee on what ground Connellan obtained his pension? It appeared that at the time Connellan was stopping at a country house in Devonshire, that he there committed this disgraceful offence, and that the question was submitted to the Government of the day; it was also laid before a jury of honour, or a Court of Honour, which decided—that was to say, the noble Lord he had referred to decided for this jury or Court—that Connellan would have to resign his official position and leave the country. It was then and under those circumstances that this pension had been patched up for Connellan, and because he said that if he were prosecuted and did not get a pension, he would implicate many more persons than himself. It was said that the man Cornwall, now in Kilmainham Gaol, was one of the persons who would have been implicated. This was the case of a man who had been charged with the commission of a gross offence, who, upon that charge being inquired into, was obliged to give up his situation in the Civil Service and to leave the country, who, nevertheless, had been placed on a pension of £450 by the Government of the day, and which successive Governments had continued to him year after year. Supposing the charge had been one of murder, he asked, would the Government, in the case of a man so accused, who had left the country so quickly that a warrant could not be executed against him, have given him a pension? The idea was absurd. Connellan had now returned to London, because, the thing being 16 years old, he thought himself safe from the charge. But only let the Treasury refuse to pay the pension, and he (Mr. Healy) would like to see Connellan bring the action which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury so much dreaded, especially in the face of recent revelations. An action by Connellan against the Treasury was one of the richest things imaginable. Why, the hon. Gentleman was as much in dread of an action by Connellan as he was in dread of an action by Noah. What man of sense, knowing that Connellan had simply come back to England because he thought that his case had been forgotten, would believe for one moment that he would bring an action against the Treasury for his pension? Where were the virtuous supporters of this Christian Government that evening; did they not object to these kind of transactions? They were in favour of Christianity; were they also in favour of offences of this kind? They were in favour of Church rates being abolished; were they in favour of £450 a-year being given to Connellan, a man who had run from the country for a disgraceful offence?

Were not English Members as much interested in doing what was proper in this matter as Irish Members? They knew the class that Connellan belonged to; they knew that the Secretary to the Treasury admitted the circumstances; and, that being so, he asked hon. Members if they really intended to walk into the Lobby and support the Government in giving a pension to this man? The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), he believed, knew all the circumstances surrounding the dismissal of Connellan; but he questioned whether he had ever before heard that he was getting a large pension from the State, and he would very much like to know whether the hon. Gentleman, who represented a constituency somewhat interested in the question of pensions, was going to support the Vote? He would point out one fact to the hon. Member for Northampton. This was the first year that the Government had omitted to give the name of this man in the list of pensions. Anyone looking at the list in former years would think that the name of Connellan belonged to some nobody whom it was no harm to pension; but since the Dublin scandals the name had been omitted from the Estimates, and the fact that this pension was on the Superannuation List at all had to be extracted from the Government by a series of questions. He thought the Government would, in future, have to give back to Irish Members their Connellan, so that they might have an opportunity of discussing the question of his pension as long as it continued to be paid. He considered that it should go forth to the country that the Liberal Government, which assumed to itself the possession of such shining virtues, was going to vote a large pension annually for a man charged with an unnatural offence. He (Mr. Healy) should scrutinize the list of names of Gentlemen who went into the Lobby to support a Vote of the kind. They knew, of course, that the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) and other Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were going to support the Vote; but he would ask any ordinary Christian Gentleman who supported the Government, if he was going to vote for the pension of Corry Connellan in the face of the recent verdicts? There were rumours that the people of Mid Lothian complained that the House of Commons sat on Sundays; but what might be expected from them when it came out that they had voted £450 a-year as a pension to this man? He appealed to Her Majesty's Government not to allow their name to be tarnished by putting upon the Estimates a charge of this kind, and to the supporters of Her Majesty's Government not to go into the Lobby to vote it.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the result of the inquiry into the charge against this person was that he was invited to give up his official position, and to take his name off the books of the Clubs of which he was a member, with the knowledge that if he did not do so he would take the consequences. He practically admitted the allegation by taking his name off the Club books, and by giving up his official position. He (Mr. Labouchere) believed he went to America. He thought the Government might have acted in the same manner with regard to the pension. Supposing they were not to pay the pension. If they said—"We shall not pay you; we shall do precisely as those gentlemen did who investigated the matter; and if you like to bring an action you will take the consequences, but we shall not on our parts take action against you," he was quite satisfied that would end the matter. But the Government had not done so, and now the Committee was again asked to vote this pension. He believed that if hon. Members had been aware of what they were voting in former years, the Vote would not have been now on the Estimates. His view of the case was that, law or no law, the man ought not to have the pension. The Secretary to the Treasury had spoken of Connellan as a poor pensioner, 77 years of age, who would not live long, and who ought to have the pension as a provision for his old age. In his (Mr. Labouchere's) opinion, that was not exactly the provision that should be made for him—he thought it ought to be something in connection with one of the gaols. But as the pension had now come before the Committee, and as they had to vote on the question, he should divide, on his judgment, against Connellan having one penny of the money.

MR. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had referred, in the course of his speech, to Lord Carlisle. Since the hon. Member spoke he had made inquiries, and found that Lord Carlisle died in 1864, the pension in question having been awarded in 1868. Now, the hon. Member had also spoken of scrutinizing hon. Members who went into the Lobby to support this pension. He (Mr. Courtney) had put the matter before the Committee as a matter of law and justice, and he conceived, having regard to the principles of law and justice, that Her Majesty's Government would be entirely unworthy of their position, if they were then for the first time, upon no record, upon no conviction, and upon no warrant issued, to refuse the pension. The hon. Member, as he had pointed out, had directed some observations to hon. Members who should vote for the Motion before the Committee. He (Mr. Courtney) said, for himself, that if he were an independent Member of the House he should be ashamed of himself if he were to shrink from voting the pension because the hon. Member for Monaghan was going to intimidate him.

MR. HEALY said, he was not going to intimidate anybody. All the remarks made in that House, he presumed, were addressed to the intelligence of hon. Members, and he trusted no one would be led away by the remarks of the Secretary to the Treasury. He thought, in a matter of this kind, that argument alone should be used, and seeing opposite an hon. Member who was a very faithful supporter of the Government, he would put the case to him. The hon. Member knew that a Vote was going to be put to the Committee which involved a pension to a man accused of an unnatural offence, and he knew that it had never been found out till that evening that this pension was on the Books of the House. He (Mr. Healy) would put it to that Christian Gentleman the hon. Member for Donegal (Dr. Kinnear) to say with what face he could go before his constituents and before the Synod of which he was a member, and admit that he had voted for the pension of this offender being paid by the British taxpayer? He maintained that on this question Members must act on their own individual responsibility. On ordinary questions he would say that the Government were responsible; but in this matter the consciences of private Members were concerned. The Government had more information on this subject than was in possession of the Committee; but now, at all events, they had the fact that Corry Connellan was a man of the character described, and that he was getting a pension of £450 a-year. The Secretary to the Treasury said there was no warrant against him. But, whose fault was that? The Government of the time, and successive Governments, had hushed up the case because of Connellan's aristocratic relations; things of that kind were by no means uncommon; but it was little thought that this Corry Connellan on the Estimates was the individual about whom there was this old scandal. He hoped the appeal he made would be regarded favourably by hon. Members who were staunch supporters of the Government. The Secretary to the Treasury himself had admitted, and he would put it to hon. Members, and even to the Christian Divine who represented Donegal, that if the pension were refused by the House of Commons the Treasury would have a complete answer in law. [Mr. COURTNEY: No.] At all events, the hon. Member admitted that it would be a doubtful thing.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is making observations with regard to another hon. Member which are not in Order.

MR. HEALY: I apologize, if that is no.

THE CHAIRMAN: The remarks of the hon. Member are characterized by a term not usually employed here. He has addressed the hon. Member for Donegal as "The Christian Divine," which, I repeat, is a term not usually employed here.

MR. HEALY said, he would withdraw the word "Christian" or "Divine," just as the hon. Gentleman might like. It was said that in this case the Government would be in dread of an action if the House refused to vote the money. If that was so, that would relieve every Member who was a supporter of the Government from supporting them in this matter; but the Secretary to the Treasury said he was not aware what position they would be in if they were legitimately cast by their own motion. This gentleman was in receipt of a pension of £436 per annum, and he should move the reduction of the Vote by that amount; and, at the same time, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in future years, he would place the name of Mr. Connellan on the Estimates, as had usually been done until this year?

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that with regard to the observations of the Secretary to the Treasury as to the right, founded upon Statute, of this wretch to continue on the Pension List, he begged to direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to the 30th section of the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 24. That Act was to be construed with the Superannuation Act, 1854, which repealed some of its sections; but this 30th section contained this Proviso—

"Provided always, and be it further enacted, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to give any person an absolute right to compensation for past services."

Therefore, he denied the right of either this man Connellan, or any other person, to claim, as a matter of right, a pension for past services.

MR. COURTNEY said, it came under the present Act.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR repeated that the Superannuation Act, 1859, was to be construed with the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. c. 24, and the 30th section of the earlier Act distinctly laid down a Proviso and an Enactment Clause providing that no person should have an absolute right to superannuation on the ground of past services. Therefore, the contention of the Secretary to the Treasury would not hold water. But, on another ground, it was perfectly obvious that the Secretary to the Treasury was wrong. The hon. Gentleman said this man had been pensioned, and had a right to draw his pension; but Roundell Palmer's Act provided that if any pensioner on the Superannuation List was guilty of and convicted of a felony, he should forfeit his pension. The Secretary to the Treasury deduced from the wording of that Act the conclusion that unless a man was actually convicted of a felony he had an absolute right to continue in the enjoyment of his pension. Now, he would put it to the Committee whether, if a man was charged with committing treason and fled the country, he would still have a right, under this pretended statutory enactment, to continue to draw his pension? It was perfectly obvious that he would not, and the Treasury would not think of continuing the pension. But there was another point. How was it that if a Civil servant went on to the Pension List, and wished to draw his pension abroad, he had so much difficulty in obtaining permission to have his pension paid to him outside this country? And how was it that this infamous fellow, who was pensioned in 1868, was allowed to go all over the world, the Government not caring where he was, and was allowed to draw his pension through a Dublin bank, he supposed by power of attorney? This man was now in the United Kingdom, and ought to be proceeded against, and nobody knew that better than the occupants of the Treasury Bench. If not, then there was in this case some new departure as to the rule which obtained in this country as to issuing pensions abroad. Why was there this difference between the case of an ordinary Civil servant pensioned in England, and the case of this man? Had the Government, put as it were on the defensive, set their backs against the wall, and declared that, no matter what the charge against this man was, they would continue to defend him as they continued to defend wretches like French? It looked very much like it. He would appeal, then, to independent Members. This man, Corry Connellan, was charged with having committed a detestable offence, which made him utterly unfit to mix in any community of civilized beings; but he was retained on the Pension List, and the Government insisted on maintaining not only that it was equitable, but that he had a statutory right to remain on the Pension List. But they had not produced a single proof or legal argument in support of that contention, and on the strength of the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. he challenged that contention, and would like to hear his argument answered. He trusted that in 24 hours the names of all who voted in the Division would be published throughout the country, so that the public might know who were prepared to support the Government in their proposal to retain this man on the Pension List, infamous as this man was. There was no hiding the character of the Division. Irish Members did not object to anything else in this enormous Vote; but they held that the retention of this man on the Pension List was an outrage on public opinion in Ireland, because when he left Ireland it was supposed that he did not go on the Pension List, but that he received some assistance from the Secret Service Fund, and nobody would have thought that the Government would have the audacity to put him on the Pension List. As an ex-Civil servant, and not because he was a Member of that House, he felt wounded and outraged by the retention of such an infamous character as this man on the Pension List under all the circumstances.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said, he could easily understand the impossibility of the Government on their own initiative withdrawing this Vote from the cognizance of the House, and thereby judging the matter for themselves; but the Committee would have no such difficulty in the matter. There seemed to be no question that there were suspicious circumstances in connection with this case. That was not denied; and there also appeared to be no doubt that if this man had not left the country, a warrant would have been issued against him. Under these circumstances, although this alleged offence occurred 16 years ago, and this was the first time it had really been raised in the Committee of the House of Commons, he could not see that there was any reason why the Committee should not discuss the case, and, if they chose, refuse to grant this Vote. Certainly, the fact of its occurring so long ago was no reason for not doing so. It seemed to him that they would be doing no injustice if they refused the Vote. If they granted it, then, without question, Mr. Connellan would draw his pension, and the House of Commons would practically have declared that he was an innocent man; but if they refused the Vote, then, if Mr. Connellan applied for his pension and proved his innocence, there was no question that he would be in the right, and would be able legally to obtain his pension. That the Secretary to the Treasury had already told them; but, on the other hand, if Mr. Connellan was a guilty man, as was alleged, he would not dare to apply for this pension, and the House of Commons would have done its duty in the case. Therefore, in spite of the taunts which the Secretary to the Treasury levelled at those who were going to vote against this pension, he should support the Amendment.

Mr. WARTON said, he should be sorry that a single Member's vote should be influenced by taunts from either side of the House; but certainly there had been taunts, and two hon. Members had threatened to take notice of the names of Members who voted in support of the Government. He, at all events, was not to be deterred by taunts; and looking at the matter in a cool, quiet, lawyer-like way, with no emotion or prepossession, he felt it his duty to support this Vote, and on these grounds. In the first place, he did not think the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) was correct in the interpretation he had put upon the 30th section of the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV. He was sure the hon. Member would not quote an Act unfairly; but the hon. Member seemed to think the words of that section implied that no Civil servant was entitled to claim a pension absolutely. Now, that Proviso seemed to him to refer to an original claim for a pension, and to the question whether or not the person's past services warranted, or even appeared to warrant, the granting of a pension at the time. An adverse decision might give the Government a right to refuse a pension; but, whichever way it was decided, the question was then settled once and for all, and the quarterly or annual payments would follow, as a matter of course, on the granting of the pension. As the hon. Member opposite (Mr. S. Buxton) had said, the Committee were now about to declare the guilt or innocence of this man; but, in his opinion, they had nothing to do with either. All they knew was that a certain charge had been made against him; but there was no legal proof that the charge was well-founded; there was no record of a conviction; and, therefore, that was a sufficient answer to the other legal point, that a man convicted of felony should lose his pension. Both these legal points fell to the ground; and, therefore, he should be inclined to support the Vote on that ground, and because he could not see that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to do anything but stand by this Vote, as they were bound to do, in the usual way.

Mr. KENNY asked whether the Secretary to the Treasury could tell the Committee at what period Mr. Connellan fled from Ireland, and what time elapsed between his leaving Ireland to avoid prosecution, and the date when his pension was first made payable to him, because he apprehended that that point might affect the interpretation of the 30th section of the Act 4 & 5 Will. IV.?

Mr. COURTNEY replied, that the facts were rather difficult to get at; but Mr. Connellan resigned his office in September, 1868, and the pension was granted to him almost immediately afterwards.

Mr. HEALY asked why, as the Government had stated that this man was living in the East End of London, he could not receive his money in the ordinary way? Why should the Government take more trouble to see that this man got his pension than they would with regard to any decent man in this country? He was able to get his pension in Australia, or at the Cape of Good Hope, through the machinery of a bank in Dublin into which the Treasury paid it. It was now said that he had turned up in some of his old haunts in London; why, then, could he not get his money in the usual way?

Mr. PARNELL said, he thought a pension should be paid to the pensioner personally, for it seemed to him that the Statute did not require that a pension should be paid through a bank, but only required that it should be paid to the person entitled to receive it. Why, then, he would like to know, did the Government not put a literal interpretation on the Statute, and require this man, if he desired to have his pension, to come to the Office for it, and prove his identity? In that way they would be able to see whether Mr. Connellan was or was not so far conscious of his guilt as to be afraid of placing himself within the power of a warrant. It seemed to him that the Government had had ample time to inquire into this matter, and that in order to save the Committee from its present dilemma they ought to have adopted some policy with regard to it. He should be glad to know what further steps the Government intended to take in this matter in the event of his view being correct, that they were bound by Statute to pay a pension personally to the person entitled to receive it? It was manifest that the matter could not be allowed to rest where it now was. Some investigation must be made. Did the Government propose to wait, as they did in the case of French and others, until legal proofs were produced in the Courts of Law as to the guilt of this man; or did they propose to enter into any investigation of the subject? He thought that was a reasonable request, and one upon which the Committee would be disposed to insist, that this matter should be inquired into by the Government, with a view to further action, if it should be found that the allegations made that night, and on other nights, were true. These allegations had not now been made for the first time; but they had never been denied. They were notorious in Ireland, and some action must follow with respect to them on the part of the officials of the Government, who were responsible in such matters. It would be utterly impossible for Parliament to continue to vote a pension to this man under the circumstances which had come out until his character had been cleared. It was not denied that these charges were made against him—that he fled the country under the circumstances which had been related; that he had never come back, and during these 16 years had never appeared in Ireland—where he had always lived up to that time—and had never been heard of by any people who knew him in Ireland. Under all the circumstances, and pending an inquiry, he really did think the Government ought not to ask the Committee to vote this sum of money; and that, without deciding the question whether they would ultimately pay the pension or not, they should withdraw this money from this Vote, and suspend the payment of the pension until they had had time—if they had not already had abundant time—to ascertain their legal position, and the rights of the case.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): This is a question which no man in the House would wish to enter into very fully; but, at the same time, I think that when a matter of this kind has been challenged, it is important to state clearly how in point of law and of right the case stands. If I am rightly informed, the matter stands in this way. In the year 1868 the Government of that day granted a pension, or a superannuation allowance, to an officer in the Irish Civil Service; and at that time, it would appear, from what we have heard to-night, that there then were afloat certain reports, which seemed to have some authority, that that person had been guilty of an abominable offence. That offence, if it was committed, was committed before the pension was granted. The pension was awarded late in the year 1868. I can only assume that those who awarded the pension had no knowledge of these charges; but the pension was so awarded. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) says the impression at the time in Ireland was that this person had not received a pension, but had received assistance from the Secret Service Fund. Of this impression I know nothing; but the person referred to did receive a pension, and it was annually paid to him. From the time when it was granted, and every year since, the pension has appeared on the Estimates not only in the lump with other pensions, but as a pension to this person individually. Therefore, so far from the case being that he received Secret Service money, he has been, as everyone who cares to look at the Estimates will see, on the Pension List for some 15 or more years. That being the case, I ask what has happened with respect to this person since the time of the pension being awarded? I am told nothing whatever has happened. There has been no charge made against him, and no warrant has been issued against him; and he stands at this moment, so far as legal proceedings are concerned, innocent of the offence which rumour—and perhaps more than rumour—charged him with. He has been subject to no warrant and to no charge; but there were rumours before he received his pension, and those rumours have lately been revived. The question then arises whether, he being subject to no charge at the present time, his pension is to be stopped; and a clause of an old Act has been quoted, which, I am bound to say, never was understood to have—and, indeed, could not have—the meaning now assigned to it. It merely says that no one shall claim, as a legal right, a superannuation allowance for past services; but that clause embodies a well-known rule, that a pension is an act of grace and not of right. But that has nothing whatever to do with the stoppage of a pension which has already been awarded. That being the position of this person's pension now, that pension is called in question for the first time after the lapse of 16 years. What is the position, and what is the right, of the Government and of Parliament now? It has been suggested whether, inasmuch as this person does not apparently receive his pension in propria persona, through a practice which prevails in regard to pensions, but receives it through an agent, complying with the regulations laid down, we are bound to continue to pay this pension through that agency, and whether, under the circumstances, we should require this person to appear at a Government Office, where pensions are paid, to receive the pension in person. As to that, I am bound to say that the Government will consider the point, and the question will be this—whether there is a right—I do not mean a strict legal right, but a right of long-established custom—in the pensioner to receive his pension through some other person as his agent, or whether it is a matter of mere favour that he so receives it; and, if it is a matter of favour, whether, in a case like this, that favour should be withdrawn, and the pensioner should be required to come and receive the pension in person. For my part, I believe that the Government would do well to make inquiry upon this point, for we are not in a position, at this moment, to say whether this is a matter of favour or not. If, after due inquiry on the part of the Government, it should turn out to be a matter of mere favour, and not of official right or custom, and if it should turn out that this person was not a man to whom any favour should be granted, the favour might be withdrawn. That, however, could not be done without inquiry. If it were only a favour, the Government would certainly feel justified in withdrawing it if it were not deserved.

MR. HEALY said, the offer of the right hon. Gentleman, made on the spur of the moment, presented some points for consideration. On the Report he would again refer to this subject, and ask the Government what they proposed to do. He would now ask whether, if it were decided that Connellan should receive his pension in person, the Scotland Yard Detective Office would be informed of the exact date of the payment, so that steps might be taken to secure the arrest of the man? If a detective officer were at the bank when Mr. Connellan came to receive his pension, the taxpayers would be saved £436 a-year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): It is absolutely out of my power to answer this question. As to what legal proceedings, if any, might or would be taken, I have no knowledge whatever. I only speak for the Treasury as to this question of favour or of right. If Mr. Connellan receives his pension through an agent as a favour, the favour might, after inquiry, be withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL: I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he does not think it right, after this debate, to ask the Chief Secretary to direct the Chief of the Detective Department to look into this charge against Mr. Connellan? If I am not mistaken, ample evidence can be obtained at any moment as to the commission of these offences by Connellan some years ago.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): As I understand the matter, this was an offence committed in England; therefore, the Irish Officials are relieved from responsibility.

MR. HEALY: Are the English Law Officers relieved?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I only answered the question put to me.

MR. HEALY: I would take the liberty of asking the same question of the English Law Officers.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £11,000, to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, &c.

(7.) £461,000, for Pauper Lunatics, England.

(8.) £69,000, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Scotland.

(9.) £14,500, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Ireland.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask the Government whether, during the Recess, they would cause some inquiry to be made into the subject of the classification of lunatics in workhouses in Ireland? The condition of the imbeciles in Irish workhouses was an absolute disgrace to anything calling itself a civilized Administration. The poor creatures were absolutely without anything like proper guardianship, and the places in which they were confined were not fit for the occupation of human beings. In wet weather the ground was often moist. The rooms were not properly lighted. Moreover, children of from two to six years of age were allowed to play about amongst the imbecile women. The places in which these people were kept, and the manner in which they were treated, was absolutely horrible. Would any Member of the Government say that the matter should have attention?

MR. COURTNEY said, the question had been raised on the Vote for the Irish Local Government Board, and the Chief Secretary had then promised to give it consideration.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £12,747, to complete the sum for Hospitals and Infirmaries, Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, he did not wish to make a charge against any of the Institutions covered by this Vote; but he wished to say that he had heard it stated that the accommodation in the Rotunda Lying-in Hospital, for which £700 was charged, was scarcely what it should be. Would the Government cause an inquiry to be made—would they ascertain whether it was a fact that the students awaiting their turn were without proper accommodation, and had to occupy the same apartments as the women waiting to be confined? If such were the case, it was a lamentable state of things, and women should not be subjected to treatment of that kind. The place for the students should be quite apart; the students should not be interspersed with the patients in the wards. He did not wish to make the smallest charge against the Charity, which was a famous one. The expenditure of a few pounds would remedy the defect of which he complained.

MR. COURTNEY said, the Government would cause the matter to be inquired into.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

(11.) £48,115, for Friendly Societies Deficiency.

(12.) £2,101, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,648, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for certain Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances in Ireland."

MR. HEALY asked whether the Government would give the Committee some explanation of the following item:—

"F. French Church, Portarlinton: Stipend of the Rev. J. R. Triphook, Minister of St. Paul's, otherwise called the French Church, Portarlinton; a charge transferred from the Consolidated Fund. (This charge will cease on next vacancy), £43 18s. 4d.?"

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that on this point the late Lord Frederick Cavendish had promised to make arrangements for discontinuing the item on the death of the present incumbent. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) saw an asterisk in the Vote calling attention to the footnote—

"The charges included in these Sub-heads are in course of gradual diminution."

MR. HEALY wished to know the meaning of the item? There was a French Foundation at Portarlinton, where, 200 years ago, there had been a Colony of Huguenots. For what reason was this money voted for this French Church?

MR. COURTNEY said, that this Church was founded by an Act of the Irish Parliament in the 41st year of King George III.—just before the Union.

MR. HEALY said, it was most absurd to give a man nearly £44 a-year, because, 200 years ago, a number of Huguenots came over to Ireland from France. In that part of Ireland, French names were frequently met with, it was true; but there was no reason why a French Church should be maintained at the cost of the State. There might be a number of Greek names there, and, if there were, would the State keep up a Church for them? He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £44.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. COURTNEY said, he hoped the hon. Member would not think it necessary to press this Motion. They were getting rid of these Votes one by one. In the case of Great Britain, a Vote of this kind had ceased quite recently, and would never appear in the Estimates again. The gentleman in receipt of the salary at Portarlinton was a very old man, and when he died there would not be a successor appointed. The present incumbent had been receiving the salary for a long time, and it would be exceedingly hard to stop it now. The charge was not likely to continue very long.

MR. GRAY agreed that it would be hard to refuse to vote this sum to the rev. gentleman who had been receiving it for so long. Would it not, however, be better, in cases of this kind, instead of waiting for the gradual dropping off of Votes, which it was acknowledged could not be defended in principle, to estimate the value of the life interest, and give it as compensation to the recipient of the income? As the hon. Gentleman the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had had an understanding on this subject with the late Lord Frederick Cavendish, he (Mr. Gray) would appeal to the hon. Member for Monaghan not to go to a Division. They might, he thought, be content with the assurance that the arrangement come to with the late noble Lord would be carried out.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DEASY said, he should like to ask a question as to the last item but one—to defray the expense of maintaining 12 lunatics and idiots formerly supported in the Hardwicke cells of the House of Industry. How were idiots generally paid for and maintained in Ireland?

MR. COURTNEY said, this item was in respect of idiots who had been sent into the country to escape an epidemic disease. There was a great reduction in the item.

MR. HEALY said, there was a great deal of money wasted under this Vote and other Votes in Ireland. When these useless Votes dropped out one by one, would it not be as well to devote the money so saved to useful purposes, such as the construction and maintenance of fishery piers?

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(14.) £875, for Redemption of Consolidated Fund Allowances.

THE CHAIRMAN: Class VII.—

MR. GRAY: What Class have we arrived at?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am now going to put the Votes in Class VII.

COLONEL NOLAN: What is their character?

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the Committee had not been very stingy to the Government that night, having raised no serious opposition to the Votes in Class VI. It was too hard to ask them now to go on with Class VII., at 10 minutes to 2 in the morning. He would move to report Progress.

MR. COURTNEY said, there were only two Votes to be taken, and the Committee would find no difficulty in disposing of them.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

(15.) £18,776, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

(16.) £4,693, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Expenses.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is that I report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Before you put that Question, Sir, I should like to ask what was the last Vote but two—we could not catch it in this part of the House at all?

THE CHAIRMAN: £875, for Redemption of Consolidated Fund Allowances.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: In what Class did that come?

THE CHAIRMAN: In Class VI.

Eleven following Resolutions agreed to.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, this was a Vote which, according to many authorities, was absolutely indefensible. The Commissioners themselves admitted in their Reports that they were unable to discharge this duty—that they had too many other duties to perform, and were not remunerated for this work. They, practically, declined to do it. There were several estates concerned in this matter which the Commissioners complained they had not the means of visiting. The schools were in a state of dilapidation—the Commissioners could not keep them in repair; and in respect of some schools the Commissioners had money which they could not spend. In some cases they had more masters than scholars, and in one place they had a master over 83 years of age. They had no power to combine their resources from different estates, and, from beginning to end, there was not one particle of their administration which could meet with approval or deserved commendation in any way. The Commissioners desired to be relieved of their duties; everything was going to rack and ruin under their hands; their schools were a perfect farce; and a considerable amount of money which, if properly managed, could be turned to great national benefit, was now only an example of how well certain persons knew "how not to do it." Under these circumstances, and considering that the House had to meet again in a few hours, he must urge the Secretary to the Treasury to postpone this Vote. For that purpose, he should move that the debate be adjourned.

MR. COURTNEY agreed to postpone the Vote.

Vote postponed.

Subsequent Resolution agreed to.

Postponed Resolutions to be taken into Consideration To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.
